The Scherzo was much better, so much better that we hope that it may have a hearing in future concert programmes apart from the rest of the work. It is popular music in the best sense, and it was wise to put it in the second place (the Scherzo is usually third), for it formed an admirable foil to the agitation of the first movement. It was entitled "Alla Siciliana," but was rather slow in its theme for a true Siciliana—the dance-song of the Sicilian peasantry is generally about allegretto in tempo, and is usually 6-8 rhythm. The melody, not very Gaelic in character, was very attractive, and was excellently played by the oboe, appearing afterwards upon the English horn. This beautiful theme was finely treated through the movement, being varied with a freedom that brought it well into the field of actual thematic development. This was brilliantly done in an allegro episode, which seemed to have the Scherzo character far more than the opening theme, although it occupied the place of the conventional "Trio." The return of the slow theme now took place upon the English horn, and after a short duet between oboe and English horn, the movement had a very dainty ending. It evoked the most spontaneous applause of all of the movements, and the composer was compelled to bow her acknowledgments from her seat.

The third movement (the slow one) had also its beautiful moments, but was carried to far too great a length.

It began with a heroic crash and then settled down to permanent melancholy, beginning with a charming theme upon the violoncello. A mysterious pizzicato on the contrabasses seemed bigger with impending fate than the glorious one which came later, and much more effectively, in the "Freischuetz" overture, but it brought forth nothing more important than a sentimental violin solo. There were a few touches of hexachordal scale treatment here which seemed to endeavor to justify the Gaelic title. There were some bold points of scoring in this movement, notably a duet between bass clarinette in the deepest register, and violin in the highest, an effect not more successful here than the similar union of the pedal tones of the bass trombone and the highest notes of the piccolo in Berlioz's "Requiem." In both cases the effort was probably made to express vast emptiness, but the result was scarcely attained. The solo on the bass clarinette was very finely played. The movement, if it were shorter, would be as successful as its predecessor.

The finale gave a little of the Gaelic lilt almost buried under heavy scoring, and swerved between meditation and rhapsody thereafter. The figure treatment was here somewhat monotonous and the climaxes were not finely wrought up. In the final appearance of the theme with all the resources of the orchestra, the intention to be very grand was too obvious to be very successful. The one perfect gem of the work, the second movement, holds forth so much of promise that one hopes that the composer will write some further movements in the lighter and freer forms rather than exhaust her muse in such heavy self-imposed tasks as symphonic composition. The work was received with cordial appreciation, and the composer was obliged to bow again and again. Yet the reviewer can only wish that the allegro and the finale had reached the high level of the two central movements.

It was a delight to welcome back Giuseppe Campanari to the scenes of his former labors. It is a pretty musical romance that the man who used to sit among the violoncellos should have risen to the rank of a vocal star and be the solo artist where he had recently been lost in the ensemble work. He received a royal welcome and deserved it, for, perhaps inspired by the surroundings, his old companions behind and plenty of his old friends before him, he sang superbly and his broad, virile, baritone voice never seemed so resonant. The baritone aria from Massenet's "Herodiade," and the prologue from "I Pagliacci" were his two numbers, and after each the applause was practically a furore. Yet the "Pagliacci" number scarcely fitted to its symphonic surroundings.

[illegible] variations [illegible] are most interesting if [illegible] ing, a fine study in contrapuntal [illegible] in modern tone-coloring. The work [illegible] Haydns Haydn, but it shows Brahms as the peer of Beethoven in this branch of orchestral treatment; both of these composers have overthrown the wall between variation and development, and the strict architecture of the theme is by no means preserved in its every appearance. People decry Brahms for his abstruse and complex style of variations, but such adversaries should read a review of "Mr. Beethoven" in the "Allgemeine Musik-zeitung" of 1799, wherein a sapient critic says: "Mr. Beethoven does not and cannot vary a theme. He does not know how to choose his theme in the first place, still less to treat it," and then goes on to counsel Beethoven to study Mozart as to how to vary themes!! It sounds very like a modern anti-Brahms cry. The concert ended with the "Freischuetz" overture. The noblest of horn quartettes began this work and the whole performance was a striking one. What dark forebodings there are in that simple, thrice repeated, pizzicato "A" on the contrabasses, following the horn passages! how spectral the deep chalumeau tones of the clarinette and the pedal tones of the lowest trombone sound! and the very form, a classical one although made from themes taken from the opera, is a beautiful combination of the sonata-allegro with the medley overture idea. The overture was most brilliantly played, although Mr. Paur must be aware of exaggerating the pauses even in so theatrical a work.

It was a foregone conclusion that the chief interest of the evening, as regards orchestral work, should centre in Mrs. Beach's new symphony, and it is a matter of felicitation that the interest here grew on well towards enthusiasm. That slender and anaemic young maiden,—the American Muse—should bow her thanks to Mr. Paur for the encouragement that he has given her.

Louis C. Elson.

Munsey's Nov.

THE FOUNDER OF A WELL KNOWN ORCHESTRA.

The existence of one of the foremost of American orchestras, the Boston Symphony, is due to the disinterested generosity of a Boston banker, who spent $200,000 to set it upon its feet. Owing to the modesty of this gentleman—Mr. Henry L. Higginson—some confusion has arisen in the public mind. "Mr. Higginson of Boston" is identified by most people as Thomas Wentworth Higginson, the well known author. The latter lives in Cambridge, not in Boston, and he is a cousin of the founder of the orchestra. The literary Mr. Higginson is kept very busy at times trying to establish his relative's identity for the benefit of correspondents who write to him for information upon musical subjects.

Henry L. Higginson keeps his own personality in the background, and during the years when the Symphony orchestra depended upon his financial backing his name was seldom mentioned in connection with it. The money he spent will never return to him, but the orchestra is now self supporting.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. G., NO. 124.

SUNDAY, NOV. 1, 1896.

A WORK OF DECIDED WORTH.

Initial Concert Performance of Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic."

Given at Last Evening's Symphony Concert—Applause Both Spontaneous and Enthusiastic—Brahms Variations on a Haydn Theme Among Other Features.

The programme for the Boston Symphony orchestra concert last evening was:

Symphony, E-minor, "Gaelic"........... Mrs. H. H. A. Beach
Aria, "Herodiade"..................Massenet
Variations on a theme by Haydn......Brahms
Aria, "I Pagliacci"..............Leoncavallo
Overture, "Der Freyschutz"............Weber

Mr. Giuseppe Campanari was the soloist.

The chief point of interest was, of course, Mrs. Beach's symphony, which had its first concert performance. It is not often that a woman undertakes to compose a symphony, and the works in this class from that source might be counted on the fingers of one hand, and none of them has achieved more than a success of the moment, or, in other words, has not made a tour of the musical world. Perhaps Mrs. Beach's may have better fortune. It is built on a large model, and is wholly modern in style and treatment.

Place aux dames may well be the cry when a woman produces a work of such dimensions, and, all things considered, as creditable a work as this one is; but there is no allowance called for, and there are no apologies to be made on the ground of the composer's sex, for her symphony has not the faintest trace of effeminacy, but is distinctly and thoroughly masculine in effect, and for a first essay in an exacting task may be heartily and justly praised.

The various movements, with the exception of the second, are somewhat longer than the brevity of their themes warrants, and there is also over much of noisy orchestration that is frequently confused and confusing—a failing that, curiously enough, characterizes the scoring of most women composers—but in every direction Mrs. Beach shows a perfect knowledge of the technique of writing for the orchestra, and with experience will obtain a finer sense of discretion in regard to the temptation that besets a young composer to instrument too heavily.

On the whole, the treatment is made of more importance than are the materials with which it deals, and the work often has more of the aspect of a fantasie than of a symphony, and in the opening movement the composer has not made her intention quite clear. It abounds in well conceived and brilliant effects, and the Gaelic theme is charmingly introduced and gracefully used, but, taken altogether, the movement, despite the unflagging vigor with which it is carried on, its force and its occasional impressiveness, sinks too often to noisiness, of which the meaning is vague and which leads nowhere in particular.

The second movement is thoroughly charming, with its graceful Scottish theme, alla Siciliana, daintily and effectively given forth by the wind instruments, and breaking into a piquant and spirited scherzo, through which the first theme breaks with delightful results every now and then, until the first theme returns in its original form, to be more elaborately treated. This is the best and most thoroughly satisfying part of the symphony, and is a little masterpiece in its way in sentiment and orchestration.

The slow movement has some admirable moments, especially in its warm and flowing Gaelic theme, and in the skill with which it is contrapuntally used on its repetition, but it is spun out to a length that becomes at last tiresome, and notably in the prolongation of the close, which is delayed long after it has ceased to interest.

The finale opens with immense vigor, which is sustained without a break to the end, and the fiery pace at which it moves and the massive body of tone that the orchestra is made to produce are stirring in their way, but what is said is often obscured by the noisy way of saying it, and is now and again buried under the volume of brassy tone that blares under and even over it.

Still, when all that there is of faultfinding to utter has been uttered, there can be no question that the symphony has decided worth, creditable alike to the ambition, the knowledge and the skill of the composer, and a work that entitles her to rank prominently and honorably among our native composers. It never falls into triviality, but is steadily high-reaching, dignified and virile, and of an able musicianship that is beyond all question. It was listened to with attentive interest, and at its close the applause was spontaneous and enthusiastic, the stormy call for the composer being responded to by her from her seat in the auditorium.

The Brahms variations were heard again with pleasure, especially under the beautiful rendering accorded them by Mr. Paur and the orchestra. Mr. Campanari, who was greeted on his first appearance with prolonged plaudits, sang the Massenet air with splendid warmth, breadth of style and just dramatic sentiment, and was recalled four times, amid a tornado of applause. His delivery of the "Pagliacci" prologue was a noble bit of declamation of which the climax was worked up to with an effect that was fairly thrilling in its force and emphasis. Once more was he recalled again and again.

There will be no concert next Saturday, but a week later the following programme will be given:

Overture, "Richard III.," Volkmann; aria from "Il Re Pastore," Mozart; prelude to act II. "Ingewelde," Max Schilling, first time; aria from "Lucia," Donizetti; symphony C-major, No. 2, Schumann. Mme. Melba is to be the soloist.

MME. MELBA ARRIVES.

Among the passengers in the Campania, which arrived Friday, was Mme. Melba, the Australian prima donna, who is to sing again at the Metropolitan in New York this season. Since leaving here last spring Mme. Melba has sung in Paris and London. At the close of the Covent Garden season she took a cottage on the Thames through August, and recently she has been sojourning at her home in Paris. She is in excellent health, and eager to get back to work once more. Her rentree at the Metropolitan will be made on the Marguerite, in "Faust." She expects to appear in some new roles during the season, but did not care last night to say what they would be.

Before the opening of the opera season she will sing in concert with the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Boston, on Nov. 6 and 7; in Brooklyn, Nov. 9; in Philadelphia, Nov. 10, and in Baltimore, Nov. 11. She has a tempting offer to go to South America next spring, which she will accept if she can get her contract with the Covent Garden management cancelled. In October next she intends to make a concert tour through the English provinces.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 1, 1896.

Campanari Soloist at the Symphony Concert.

The usual large audiences were present at the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon and the concert last evening. The following uncommonly enjoyable program was superbly interpreted under Mr Paur's direction:

Symphony in E minor, Gaelic, op 32 (MS, first time)...............Mrs H H A Beach
Air, Vision Fugitive, from Herodiade, Jules Massenet
Variations on a theme by Josef Haydn (Chorale Sancti Antoni), in B flat major, op 56a.....................Johannes Brahms
Prologue to Pagliacci.....Ruggiero Leoncavallo
Overture to Der Freischutz, Karl Maria von Weber

The specially interesting feature of the concert was the performance of Mrs Beach's symphony, played from manuscript for the first time in public. It is the most pretentious composition that this talented musician has attempted, and its production entitles her to a high rank among American composers.

Boston is justly proud of her, and yesterday's audience gave emphatic expression of its appreciation. The usually undemonstrative rehearsal audience broke away from tradition and applauded with uncontrolled enthusiasm.

After the performance Mrs Beach responded to the imperative demands for her appearance by standing in the center aisle, bowing and smiling recognition of the demonstrative and long-continued plaudits.

Mrs Beach has been prominent in local musical circles for a number of years. She has won most fame as a pianiste, but she has also earned an enviable reputation as a composer. She has been a prolific writer, and among her larger works are a mass in E flat major, a scena and aria, "Eilende Wolken," a festival jubilate for chorus and orchestra and several cantatas. She has also written more than 60 shorter works for pianoforte and voice.

She was born in New Hampshire in 1867, and most of her musical education has been obtained in Boston. She has played several times with the symphony orchestra and her annual recitals are among the welcome musical events of the season.

Her "Gaelic" symphony is a splendid work. It is both scholarly and entertaining, qualities not always blended in the writings of the greatest masters. It is constructed in a thoroughly musicianly manner; its themes are melodious, well contrasted and clearly defined; most of them are new and all are treated with artistic effect.

The scoring is very elaborate, at times rather too elaborate, but this is a fault common with modern composers, and is, perhaps, to be expected. Indeed, Mrs Beach's work is of such general excellence that it would be hypercritical to enlarge upon its very few shortcomings.

The symphony is in four movements, Allegro con fuoco, Alla Sicicilina and Allegro vivace, Lento con molto and final, Allegro molto. There are some striking effects in the first movement, but over-elaboration tends at times to blur the meaning of the tonal pictures. The second movement is thoroughly delightful, and pleased the audience most of all. The themes are deliciously melodious, and the graceful Siciliano is treated in the daintiest fashion imaginable. The third movement is notable for artistic treatment of Gaelic folk songs, and the finale is impressive for power and brilliancy.

Sig Campanari was greeted with much enthusiasm, and his singing stirred the audience to demonstrative expressions of delight. He is a thorough artist, and deserves all the favor that has been accorded him. He is, perhaps, the best baritone on the operatic stage today; he is certainly foremost among singers residing in America.

The natural modesty and retiring disposition of the man delayed the recognition due him. Had he been constituted as is the average operatic singer he would long ago have won the fame which has finally come to him.

He sang the air from "Herodiade" with magnificent effect, but it was his spirited and expressive interpretation of the "Pagliacci" that received greatest applause from the audience. It was a superb effort.

The orchestra gave a fine performance of Brahams' interesting, but over-long, variations on a theme by Haydn, and interpreted the "Freischutz" overture with splendid effect.

Mme Melba will be the soloist at this week's Symphony concert. The program will be as follows:

Overture, "Richard III," Richard Volkmann; aria, "L'amero saro Costante," from "Il Re Pastore," Mozart, violin obligato, Mr Franz Kneisel; prelude to act II, "Ingwelde," (first time at these concerts), Max Schillings; aria from "Lucia," Donizetti; symphony in C major, No. 2, Schumann.

BOSTON DAILY AD[illegible]
Established 18[illegible]
The Official Paper of the [illegible]
The Official Paper of the City.

[illegible]DAY MORNING, NOV. 2, 1896.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The New Symphony of Mrs. Beach, the American Composer.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach is the foremost American composer among women, yet it is a far cry, even from such a high position in art, to the successful creation of symphonies; neither the male nor the female native composers have as yet produced a musical composition in this large, heroic form, that is going to stand the test of time. The reason for this is not far to seek; there is no form in which such versatility is demanded as in the symphony.

It is the combination of intellectuality and emotion, it is to present variety in unity, it is to give all possible learning in the development which forms the gist of the sonata-allegro (the first movement), the perfection of emotional expression in its slow movement, brightness and popularity in its Scherzo, and technical brilliancy of scoring and a well-workedup climax in its finale. Small wonder that almost every composer is partially overthrown by some of these manifold requirements. A Paine (foremost of all American composers) may give learned development of themes, a Chadwick the spontaneity and brilliancy of a true Scherzo, a Beach the delicate beauty and tenderness of a slow movement, but the musical "Admirable Crichton," who is to shine in all these fields has not yet appeared in the native symphonic repertoire.

The new symphony by Mrs. Beach, entitled "Gaelic" (and upon rather slight grounds), could not have been more advantageously placed upon the programme; it began the concert, was followed by a song, which in turn was succeeded by some Brahms' variations which in no way competed with the scope and purpose of the symphonic work; and it was admirably played too. The first movement was what the German would call "Regelrecht," not breaking any rule in either succession of keys or relation of parts and themes; but it did not present a development of ideas that could be characterized by any higher term than "ingenious," and there was an amount of chromatic agitation everywhere present that seemed to lack a reasonable cause. This storm and stress began in the very first measure and was not absent from the coda. There seemed to be a determination to be powerful, at all hazards. There was some complex work in the mingling of rhythms that suggested midnight oil and musical arithmetic, but the subordinate theme was a charming bit of melody, and the coda was very martial and combative.

The Scherzo was much better, so much better that we hope that it may have a hearing in future concert programmes apart from the rest of the work. It is popular music in the best sense, and it was wise to put it in the second place (the Scherzo is usually third), for it formed an admirable foil to the agitation of the first movement. It was entitled "Alla Siciliana," but was rather slow in its theme for a true Siciliana—the dance-song of the Sicilian peasantry is generally about allegretto in tempo, and is usually 6-8 rhythm. The melody, not very Gaelic in character, was very attractive, and was excellently played by the oboe, appearing afterwards upon the English horn. This beautiful theme was finely treated through the movement, being varied with a freedom that brought it well into the field of actual thematic development. This was brilliantly done in an allegro episode, which seemed to have the Scherzo character far more than the opening theme, although it occupied the place of the conventional "Trio." The return of the slow theme now took place upon the English horn, and after a short duet between oboe and English horn, the movement had a very dainty ending. It evoked the most spontaneous applause of all of the movements, and the composer was compelled to bow her acknowledgments from her seat.

The third movement (the slow one) had also its beautiful moments, but was carried to far too great a length.

It began with a heroic crash and then settled down to permanent melancholy, beginning with a charming theme upon the violoncello. A mysterious pizzicato on the contrabasses seemed bigger with impending fate than the glorious one which came later, and much more effectively, in the "Freischuetz" overture, but it brought forth nothing more important than a sentimental violin solo. There were a few touches of hexachordal scale treatment here which seemed to endeavor to justify the Gaelic title. There were some bold points of scoring in this movement, notably a duet between bass clarinette in the deepest register, and violin in the highest, an effect not more successful here than the similar union of the pedal tones of the bass trombone and the highest notes of the piccolo in Berlioz's "Requiem." In both cases the effort was probably made to express vast emptiness, but the result was scarcely attained. The solo on the bass clarinette was very finely played. The movement, if it were shorter, would be as successful as its predecessor.

The finale gave a little of the Gaelic lilt almost buried under heavy scoring, and swerved between meditation and rhapsody thereafter. The figure treatment was here somewhat monotonous and the climaxes were not finely wrought up. In the final reappearance of the theme with all the resources of the orchestra, the intention to be very grand was too obvious to be very successful. The one perfect gem of the work, the second movement, holds forth so much of promise that one hopes that the composer will write some further movements in the lighter and freer forms rather than exhaust her muse in such heavy self-imposed tasks as symphonic composition. The work was received with cordial appreciation, and the composer was obliged to bow again and again. Yet the reviewer can only wish that the allegro and the finale had reached the high level of the two central movements.

It was a delight to welcome back Giuseppe Campanari to the scenes of his former labors. It is a pretty musical romance that the man who used to sit among the violoncellos should have risen to the rank of a vocal star and be the solo artist where he had recently been lost in the ensemble work. He received a royal welcome and deserved it, for, perhaps inspired by the surroundings, his old companions behind and plenty of his old friends before him, he sang superbly and his broad, virile, baritone voice never seemed so resonant. The baritone aria from Massenet's "Herodiade," and the prologue from "I Pagliacci" were his two numbers, and after each the applause was practically a furore. Yet the "Pagliacci" number scarcely fitted to the symphonic surroundings.

[illegible] orchestral variations on [illegible] theme were most interesting if not striking, a fine study in contrapuntal work and in modern tone-coloring. The work un-Haydns Haydn, but it shows Brahms as the peer of Beethoven in this branch of orchestral treatment; both of these composers have overthrown the wall between variation and development, and the strict architecture of the theme is by no means preserved in its every appearance. People decry Brahms for his abstruse and complex style of variations, but such adversaries should read a review of "Mr. Beethoven" in the "Allgemeine Musik-zeitung" of 1799, wherein a sapient critic says: "Mr. Beethoven does not and cannot vary a theme. He does not know how to choose his theme in the first place, still less to treat it," and then goes on to counsel Beethoven to study Mozart as to how to vary themes!! It sounds very like a modern anti-Brahms cry. The concert ended with the "Freischuetz" overture. The noblest of horn quartettes began this work and the whole performance was a striking one. What dark forebodings there are in that simple, thrice repeated, pizzicato "A" on the contrabasses, following the horn passages! how spectral the deep chalumeau tones of the clarinette and the pedal tones of the lowest trombone sound! and the very form, a classical one although made from themes taken from the opera, is a beautiful combination of the sonata-allegro with the medley overture idea. The overture was most brilliantly played, although Mr. Paur must be aware of exaggerating the pauses even in so theatrical a work.

It was a foregone conclusion that the chief interest of the evening, as regards orchestral work, should centre in Mrs. Beach's new symphony, and it is a matter of felicitation that the interest here grew on well towards enthusiasm. That slender and anaemic young maiden,—the American Muse—should bow her thanks to Mr. Paur for the encouragement that he has given her.

Louis C. Elson.

Munsey's Nov.

THE FOUNDER OF A WELL KNOWN ORCHESTRA.

The existence of one of the foremost of American orchestras, the Boston Symphony, is due to the disinterested generosity of a Boston banker, who spent $200,000 to set it upon its feet. Owing to the modesty of this gentleman—Mr. Henry L. Higginson—some confusion has arisen in the public mind. "Mr. Higginson of Boston" is identified by most people as Thomas Wentworth Higginson, the well known author. The latter lives in Cambridge, not in Boston, and he is a cousin of the founder of the orchestra. The literary Mr. Higginson is kept very busy at times trying to establish his relative's identity for the benefit of correspondents who write to him for information upon musical subjects.

Henry L. Higginson keeps his own personality in the background, and during the years when the Symphony orchestra depended upon his financial backing his name was seldom mentioned in connection with it. The money he spent will never return to him, but the orchestra is now self supporting.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1896.

Mrs. Beach's Symphony Produced Last Night in Music Hall—The Overwhelming Triumph of Campanari.

The program of the third Symphony Concert last night in Music Hall, Mr. Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Symphony in E minor, "Gaelic," op. 32 (MS.) first time.......................Beach
Air, "Vision Fugitive," from "Hérodiade".................................Massenet
Mr. Campanari.
Variations on a theme by Josef Haydn.... Brahms
Prologue to "Pagliacci"...........Leoncavallo
Mr. Campanari.
Overture to "Der Freischütz".........Weber

Mrs. Beach is by no means the first woman who has written a symphony. A French woman, an admirable musician, wrote three, which were performed in Paris. Three English women have written symphonies, two of which have surely been performed in London. There are German women whose names appear in the catalogue of symphony writers. The most remarkable was Aline Hundt, a pupil of Liszt, whose symphony in G minor was played at Berlin in the spring of 1871, and conducted by her in a manner that won the praise of critics who were prepared to scoff.

But any consideration of the part played by woman in the history of orchestral works must be reserved for the Wednesday article.

Other thoughts suggested by the symphony of Mrs. Beach must be reserved till then. The election is just now the one important thing, and Art must sit quietly in the background.

* * *

It is fortunately not necessary to say of the "Gaelic" symphony, "This is a creditable work for a woman." Such patronage is uncalled for, and it would be offensive. Nor is it necessary to say, "A praiseworthy endeavor." The endeavor is of little importance in art. The result is more to the purpose.

The crowded news columns only allow today the record of a few impressions. Let me say frankly that this symphony is the fullest exhibition of Mrs. Beach's indisputable talent. I think it should be ranked as a whole above her Mass, which was performed by the Handel and Haydn. The themes themselves may or may not be of importance; we will talk this over together later; certainly the treatment of them in the first, second and fourth movements often excites honest admiration and gives genuine pleasure. I except the slow movement; for it seems the most labored and at the same time the weakest.

First of all this music, as a rule, sounds well. For the jest is true, that there is music which is better than it sounds. Charming ideas of Schumann, for instance, are often shockingly dressed in orchestral robes. But in this symphony of Mrs. Beach there is the evidence of orchestral instinct rather than the suspicion of loose experimenting. Some composers treat an orchestra as a child fools with a new box of blocks. There are grotesque combinations, impossible architectural devices. The child is surprised and delighted. Mrs. Beach wrote in this instance as though she were sure of the effects she had thought out. You do not at once feel that piano music has been fitted this way and that way and anyway to the orchestra.

Occasionally she is noisy rather than sonorous. Here she is eminently feminine. A woman who writes for orchestra thinks, "I must be virile at any cost." What Saint-Saëns said of Augusta Holmès is true of the sex.

Of the four movements, the second now stands out in sharpest relief. There is plenty of good stuff in the first; there is an elemental swing as well as a force that almost approaches grandeur in the finale; there are many excellent things in the detail on which I would fain dwell, but the scherzo is to me the most complete, rounded and truly musical of the movements.

Mrs. Beach, who was applauded heartily, acknowledged the tribute of the audience modestly.

* * *

Mr. Campanari was welcomed with unusual warmth and applauded enthusiastically after each appearance. His voice seems to grow steadily in power, which is kept under artistic control. He is more the master of the crescendo and the climax than he was when he first left the orchestra for the lyric stage. He shows a nicer appreciation of finesse, as in the air from Massenet's opera. So, too, in the prologue to "Pagliacci" the dramatic points were admirably accentuated, and in the great passage beginning "E voi, piuttosto" the noble organ of the singer inspired by the unfeigned passion of the man produced an irresistible, overwhelming effect.

I regret to say that the accompaniments to these airs were led by Mr. Paur without intelligence and played by the orchestra in a slovenly manner.

* * *

The program of the Symphony concert Saturday will be as follows: Volkmann, overture "Richard III."; aria from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore"; prelude to act II., "Ingewelde," Schillings; aria from "Lucia di Lammermoor"; Schumann's Symphony No. 2, C major. Mrs. Melba will be the singer.

PHILIP HALE.

MELBA RETURNS.

Among the passengers on the Campania, which arrived in New York on Friday evening, was Mme. Melba, the Australian prima donna, who is to sing again at the Metropolitan this season.

Since last spring Melba has sung in Paris and London. At the close of the Covent Garden season she took a cottage on the Thames through August, and recently she has been sojourning at her home in Paris. She is in excellent health and says that she is eager to get back to work once more.

Her reentree at the Metropolitan will be made on the opening night of the season, Nov. 16, as Marguerite, in "Faust." She expects to appear in some new roles during the season.

Before the opening of the opera season she will sing in concert, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in this city, on Nov. 6 and 7; in Brooklyn, Nov. 9; in Philadelphia, Nov. 10, and in Baltimore Nov. 11. She has a tempting offer to go to South America next spring, which she will accept if she can get her contract with the Covent Garden management canceled. In October next she intends to make a concert tour through the English provinces.

The Boston Traveler

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY.

FIRST PERFORMANCE OF MRS. BEACH'S LARGE WORK, "GAELIC."

It Is in Many Respects a Remarkable Production — Campanari a Success.

Sixteenth season, Boston Symphony Orchestra; third concert. The programme:

Symphony, E-minor, "Gaelic"..............
Mrs. H. H. A. Beach
Aria, "Herodiade" ....Massenet
Variations on a theme by Haydn........Brahms
Aria, "I Pagliacci"...............Leoncavallo
Overture, "Der Freyschutz"............Weber

A new symphony by a woman, and that woman Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, by all odds the foremost composer of her sex in America, was the point of Saturday's concert. This woman of genius is doing as much for music as any of her brothers of the present, and that the best orchestra in the land should produce her largest and most ambitious work was an eminently fit and proper thing on the part of Mr. Paur.

The first and most permanent impression made by the symphony is its complete strength and masculinity. If some learned, but perhaps not fully informed foreign musician, had been present and could have read H. H. A. Beach, minus the "Mrs.," he would at no time have had the least suspicion that he was listening to the output of a feminine mind; breadth, massiveness and sonority distinguish the work from beginning to end. Everything is written large, and in that very largeness lies the chief fault of a remarkably effective and noble production. Mere power of sound sometimes obscures the thought that one feels must lie underneath, and the resources of the full modern orchestra are so overtaxed as to make the whole rather cloudy. This is especially true in the "working-out" of the first and last movements.

The best movement, because fullest of beauty and clarity of expression, is the second, which opens with a very charming "Siciliano" in which the horns, strings and wood-wind are given excellent things. The dainty allegro vivace, which bursts in again and again, is pure and genuine music, worthy of any of the great symphonic composers. The slow movement has more of the Celtic than the Gaelic flavor—they are not precisely the same, musically considered—and has moments of attractiveness, which are overbalanced, however, by excessive elaboration and a general dullness. The last movement promises well with its fine and free beginning, but exhilaration is succeeded by a species of disappointment at the besetting fault of over-exertion. But with its shortcomings, the symphony is a thing of nobility and high musicianship, and is an event of importance in the musical world. It was finely played throughout, and was received with unstinted applause.

Mr. Campanari sang the lovely "Herodiade" air, and the "Pagliacci" prologue with great beauty of tone and phrasing, and thoroughly dramatic comprehension. Never has he appeared to better advantage in Boston. His voice is smoother, more easily controlled, and better fitted for "bel canto" as time goes on. His work aroused the greatest enthusiasm.

The Brahms variations on the Haydn "St. Anthony" theme are beginning to pall with repetition. Somehow it is not pleasing to hear the graceful air tossed about into such vortexes of contrapuntal developments as Brahms so well knows how to create. All very skilful, learned, instinctive in theory, but as a whole not very attractive in practise.

The "Freischutz" overture is in direct contrast. It is repeated religiously each year, yet it always has a fresh message of beauty and suggestiveness. That peerless horn quartette is in itself a liberal education as to the possibilities of the instrument, and Weber's preeminence in its use. The overture went with enormous splendor and complete finish.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The third symphony concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach: Symphony in E minor, "Gaelic" (MS.), opus 32.
(First time.)
Massenet: Aria, "Vision fuggitiva," from "Erodiade."
Brahms: Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn, in B-flat major, opus 56a.
Leoncavallo: Prologue to "Pagliacci."
Weber: Overture to "Der Freischütz."
Mr. G. Campanari was the singer.

We have more than once permitted ourself to note a certain change that has come about, of late years, in the use of a term, common in musical criticism; a change indicative of an altered point of view. Time was when, in speaking of a composer's technique, one meant his skill in counterpoint, part-writing, musical development; but when people use this term nowadays, they seem generally to mean nothing more than his skill in the art of instrumentation. As we have said, this altered use of a term indicates a change in musical point of view; it was perhaps necessary, in order that criticism should keep pace with the march of the art of composition in our day. For the most conspicuous conquests of modern musical technique have undeniably been made in the field of orchestration. And, now and then, one comes across an instance which proves how indispensable to composers a highly developed technique of this sort has become. There is no denying that the growth of the modern orchestra has afforded composers quite unprecedented means of producing beautiful and striking effects of coloring; but it should not be forgotten that these increased means have brought with them increased difficulties also. To handle the vast modern orchestra effectively is far more complicated and difficult a matter than to handle the old orchestra of Mozart's and Beethoven's day; it requires a vastly more developed technique. And, sad to say, the facilities young composers have nowadays for acquiring and perfecting this technique are, in one particular, not quite so common as of yore.

It was the merest coincidence that the present writer, in preparing the programme-book for this third Symphony concert, put in an "Entr'acte" on modern orchestration and the influence sheer dollars and cents had had upon one phase of its growth; the article in question had no intended reference to Mrs. Beach's symphony—indeed, it was written before the writer knew that this or any other modern symphony was to be played at the concert. But Mrs. Beach's symphony happens to bring us back to a point emphasized in that "Entr'acte": the influence of dollars and cents upon the modern art of orchestration—and in quite another way from the one therein mentioned. A fine orchestral technique—like all other sorts of technical skill—is not to be acquired by merely theoretical means. You cannot learn it from a book; you cannot acquire it from even the most careful and exhaustive study of the scores of the great masters of the art. Exactly the same case hardly ever presents itself twice; in scoring your own composition, you continually come across passages which present new problems, to which the example of your predecessors does not fully apply. And these problems you have to solve for yourself. They can, in general, be satisfactorily solved only by empirical means—by trying it on. Unless the composer can actually hear the effect of what he has written, can hear it actually performed by an orchestra, he will be considerably in the dark as to what he has really done. That is, the young composer, one who has not yet had a long instructive experience in hearing his own works played.

Now, in the old days, it was no very difficult matter for such a composer to have his compositions "tried over" by an orchestra. Overtures and even symphonies were of moderate length then; and, with the older style of instrumentation, it was by no means indispensable to the composer's purpose that they should be tried over by a large band. A basis of two double basses (with the other strings to correspond) was all-sufficient to enable an intelligent young writer, well up in the rudiments of instrumentation, to judge of the effect of his scoreing. And such a trial was not so difficult to procure. It was no doubt owing to this that composers—like Mendelssohn, for instance—were content to write so many symphonies before giving a single one to the public. They could write symphonies for practice, and this practice was fruitful of the best results, because it was not carried on in silence. But, to get a serviceable orchestra to try over a huge modern score—that is quite another matter. To fill the wind-parts alone takes nearly as many players as would have made up a full band in the older days; then, as one of the most ticklish points in modern orchestration is the exact dynamic balance of the parts, the young composer today would need a full complement of strings—making, in all, a band of eighty or ninety players—to enable him to judge rightly of the effect. Added to this, Mrs. Beach's symphony—to take it as a not unfair example—takes full three quarters of an hour to play through. To have such a work tried over to good purpose makes no slight demand upon the time and good nature of eighty or ninety men! Unless the young composer is willing (and able) to pay for it; and just think of what that would come to! For a young composer today to hear his symphony, he must have it publicly performed, not merely tried over in private. This is perhaps one reason why composers nowadays give their first attempts to the public so much more than they did formerly.

We have been led to this somewhat overlong preamble by our experience last Saturday evening in listening to Mrs. Beach's new symphony. A work of its style and scope is not to be judged after but one hearing. Suffice it to say here that there were many things in it which made us feel that it was a work well worthy of careful consideration; not a work to be crowned nor condemned off-hand. The admirable beauty and true inspiration of the last part of the second movement would have been enough in itself to assure us of this. A composer who can write so is to be taken seriously. But, as we are not yet in condition to speak intelligently about this [illegible] in detail, let [illegible] ourself to the most salient impression the work made upon us; especially as we feel pretty sure that this impression is, in the main, an accurate one.

In this "Gaelic" symphony—and notably in the first and last movements—Mrs. Beach has ventured to attempt one of the most terribly difficult tasks in all orchestral writing: to score exceedingly complex polyphonic and contrapuntal developments for full modern orchestra, and in the extreme modern style. As far as we know, tasks of similar difficulty have been attempted by comparatively few modern composers—let Wagner, Tschaikowsky and Richard Strauss be mentioned as conspicuous among them, and they are among the great crowned masters of modern orchestration! Men like Goldmark, for instance, who shine by the splendor of their mass-effects in orchestral coloring, have seldom attempted anything so complicated. Their writing is in general far more homophonic in character. Old Bach, or even Mozart, would have told you that it was no joke to score intricate polyphonic writing so that it should be clear to the listener even with the modest volume of tone of their small orchestra. Think, then, what it must be to score such writing—where themes and counter-themes cross each other simultaneously, amid a complex web of elaborate figural accompaniment—so that it shall seem clear, and the parts well balanced, through the deafening din of the full modern orchestra! To accomplish such a task demands the ne plus ultra of modern orchestral science, to be acquired only by conspicuous specific talent, developed by long and arduous practical experience. Mrs. Beach has tackled the task bravely, with the superb confidence of youth; at times with not-to-be-expected success. But in general the effect of her scoring—though often brilliant and gorgeous in coloring—is not clear. Her several parts too often stand in one another's light, instead of mutually helping each other toward a clear total effect. We got more light on her symphony by reading the score, and cursorily, at that, than we did from hearing it. The work was very cordially received by the audience, and the young composer had to bow her acknowledgments more than once from her seat on the floor of the hall.

Brahms's admirable variations and Weber's ever-wonderful "Freischütz" overture were capitally played and thoroughly enjoyed. Perhaps never before have we heard those great C-major chords in the coda of the overture start forth with such dazzling brilliancy.

Mr. Campanari fairly outdid himself. What a grand, vital singer the man has become—and, mark this, on a basis of sound musicianship! Those past years of 'cello-playing in orchestra and quartet were not wasted; they made Mr. Campanari so thoroughly at home in music that he has now only his voice and expression to think of! His singing carried everything before it; seldom has the Music Hall been the scene of greater enthusiasm. If any distinction is to be drawn, we liked him more completely in the "Pagliacci" prologue than in the air by Massenet. Of the latter he gave an "Italian version" in more senses than one. He sang it not only in Italian, but like an Italian. And with this we have no inclination to quarrel. When the text of a song is translated, it is perhaps just as well to translate the song all through—as Angelo Mariani, who conducted the first performance of "Lohengrin" in Bologna, said, "Marchesi has well translated the text into Italian; and I have succeeded in getting both singers and orchestra to translate the music into Italian, as well." Gounod once expressed his dissatisfaction at the effect of the opening measures of Faust's garden-aria in the Italian version; "Those wide-open vowels of 'Salve dimora casta e pura' sound brutal to me, compared with the French 'Salut, demeure chaste et pure,'" said he. If Mr. Campanari's singing of "Vision fuggitiva" was superb in its virile fire and passion, superb in its breadth of style, it still gave one but little suggestion of the more subtile, imaginative seductiveness of Massenet's "Vision fugitive" in its truest estate. But in the "Pagliacci" prologue the singer was on native soil, as it were; anything more completely splendid than his singing of it were hard to imagine.

The next programme is Volkmann, overture to "Richard III."; Mozart, aria, "L'Amero, saro costante," with violin obbligato, from "Il Rè Pastore"; Max Schillings, prelude to act II. of "Ingwelde" (first time in Boston); Donizetti, aria from "Lucia di Lammermoor"; Schumann, symphony No. 2, in C major, opus 61. Mme. Melba will be the singer.

[illegible], NOVEMBER 4, 1896.

A [illegible] of "motion pictures" is on view every week in Hamilton Place coming and going to and from the Symphony rehearsals and concerts, in the last twenty minutes before the concerts begin there is a procession of elegant turnouts and fashionably dressed women that are seen nowhere else on Boston streets. The artists in costumes and millinery stop work to gaze from the windows looking on the place and steal ideas from the imported finery on fashionable heads and shoulders. Nothing in this year's fashions is so noticeable as the collapse in sleeves. They reached their balloon-like proportions by slow degrees—like a vegetable growth—but the shrinkage has been sudden and some are worn quite tight except for a small ruffle at the shoulders. White is very conspicuous this year in vests and revers, in frills and bows, and light grays are much worn. The contrasts in color in hats and waists are more startling than ever; livid purples are much worn and every possible combination in blue and green in hats and waists, changeable mixtures of the two in silks and ribbons, and the two colors, in bows and feathers, in frills and velvet band. It is impossible to make a hat too large or two full of spikes or feathers. Mrs. Jack Gardiner is always watched for as her carriage with its driver and footman in light liveries drives up at the last moment. Her costumes are always worth looking at. At the first rehearsal she wore a simply made gown of rich dove-colored silk with white chiffon vest and a small bonnet of unobtrusive colors. She has always immaculate gloves on her hands which are famous for their beauty; though not a handsome woman she has an attractive face, happy and good-humored, and her figure is trim and graceful. She is public-spirited and generous as well as a leader in fashionable functions and a liberal patron of art. For the Symphony course she has always two seats for both rehearsals and concerts—for the latter the seats are in the balcony overlooking the stage on the left. At the last concerts a symphony by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach had its first performance from the manuscript; it was enthusiastically received and the young composer was obliged to rise in her seat and bow her thanks. Mrs. Beach was born in New Hampshire in 1857 and before her marriage to Dr. Beach was known as Miss Amy Marcy Cheney, a musical genius and a pianist of remarkable ability. She received her education in this country and has been an enthusiastic and industrious student.

MUSIC HALL.

Mme. Melba sailed from Europe last Saturday, and will arrive in ample time to make her first appearance in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore. Her appearance with the orchestra in this city will be at the first concert of the series of five to be given in Music Hall Wednesday evening, November 11. Season tickets for all the five concerts are placed at prices which are frequently paid to hear Melba alone. Mme. Carreno, Mr. Pol Plancon, Mr. Carl Hahir and Mr. Ben. Davis, in a programme composed entirely of Wagner selections, complete as attractive a list as was ever offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city. No increase in the price of single tickets will be made at any of the concerts.

Lewist Commwlth

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mme. Melba sailed from Europe last Saturday, and will arrive in ample time to make her first appearance in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Boston, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore. Her appearance with the orchestra in this city will be at the first concert series of five to be given in Music Hall, the date of which is November 11. Mme. Carreno, whose reappearance after several years' absence in Europe, during which time she has both matured and improved to such an extent that today she easily ranks among the foremost pianists of the world; Mr. Pol Plançon, like Melba, a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company, of New York; Mr. Carl Halir, the leading classical violinist of Europe today, and Mr. Ben Davies, the popular tenor, in a program composed entirely of Wagner selections, completes as attractive a list as was ever offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

Mme. Melba sailed from Enrope last Saturday, and will arrive in ample time to make her first appearances in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Boston, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore. Her appearance with the orchestra in this city, will be at the first concert of the series of five, to be given in Music Hall, the date of which is Wednesday evening November, 11th. It should be borne in mind by patrons of the concerts, that season tickets for all five concerts. are placed at prices which are frequently paid to hear Melba alone. Mme, Carrono, whose reappearance after several years absence in Europe, during which time she has matured and improved to such an extent that she easily ranks among the foremost pianists of the world; Mr. Pol Plancon, like Melba, a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York; Mr. Carl Halir, the leading classical violinist of Europe today; and Mr. Ben Davies, the popular tenor in a programe composed entirely of Wagner selections, completes as attractive a list as was ever offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city. No increase in the price of single tickets will be made at any of the concerts, a policy which has been steadily maintained by the Management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from the beginning.

MME. MELBA.

Ev'g Sat.

THE BALTIMORE NEWS.

PUBLISHED BY
THE EVENING NEWS PUBLISHING
COMPANY OF BALTIMORE CITY.
Office, No. 201 East Baltimore Street.

CHAS. H. GRASTY, President.
DOUGLAS H. GORDON, Secretary-Treasurer.

SATURDAY EVENING, OCT. 31, 1896.

MME. MELBA ON THE OCEAN.

Will Soon Come to Baltimore With the Symphony Orchestra.

Mme. Melba sailed from Southampton last Saturday and will arrive in plenty of time to fill her engagements with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore, Boston, Brooklyn and Philadelphia. Manager Strakosch of Music Hall says it is a marvel that she will come, for nobody, he declares ever heard Mme. Melba for $1.50 before. He says the price of a whole season ticket for the symphony concerts has been the price for Mme. Melba hitherto. The other soloists who will appear with the orchestra this year in Baltimore are: Mme. Carreno, Pol. Plancon, Carl Halir and Ben Davies.

According to Assistant Manager F. R. Comee the orchestra first appeared in Baltimore April 12, 1886, at the Academy of Music. Carl Faelten and Fritz Giese were the soloists. Wilhelm Gericke was the director. Franz Kneizel, who has been prominent in the Kneizel concerts, was one of the performers. Beethoven's overture "Lenora" was the first number of the programme. Professor anr Mme. Burmenister of this city occupied the upper left hand proscenium box and gave cordial approvement of the renditions of the orchestra. The Baltimore history of the orchestra is not clear in the following seasons, but in 1889-90 it appeared in Lyceum Hall for five concerts with Nikisch as director. The next season with the same director five concerts were given in the old Concordia Opera House. In 1891-92 six concerts were given under Nikisch in the Academy Concert Hall. The next season the same director had charge of the one concert given at Ford's Opera House.

In 1893-94 Director Paur took charge and gave five matinees at Ford's Opera House. In the season of 1894-95 Music Hall was opened with a great crowd. Mme. Melba was the principal attraction along with Plancon, Scalchi and Mauguiere. Since then the orchestra has given regular concerts at Music Hall. Among the prominent soloists it has brought to Baltimore have been Mme. Melba, Mme. Nordica, Mme. Materna, Miss Emma Juch, Mr. Eugene D'Albert, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Pol. Plancon and Mr. Campanari.

Gericke, the first director who came with the orchestra to Baltimore, is now living in Vienna, having retired from active work. Nikisch is now conducting in Leipsic. Herschel was the orchestra's first conductor, but he never came to Baltimore, for the orchestra had not then begun to travel outside of New England.

Gazette.

BOSTON SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 8.

The Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the season was given by the Symphony Orchestra last evening in Music Hall. The programme was:

Overture, "Richard III." .... Volkmann
Aria, "L'amero saro Costante" .... Mozart
Mme. Melba.
Prelude to Act II., "Ingwelde" ..... Max Schillings
(First time at these concerts.)
"Sevillana," from "Don Cæsar" .... Massenet
Mme. Melba.
Symphony, C major, No. 2 .... Schumann

A very large and enthusiastic audience listened to this concert, although it must be confessed that Schumann was not the magnet, nor a love of music for music's sake the cause of the excitement. The reception given to Mme. Melba before she opened her charmed lips demonstrated that hero-worship was the gravitative force that filled Music Hall to its sitting and standing limits.

He would be a lucky critic who could find anything new to say of Mme. Melba's singing, or who could find an unused adjective to describe the beauty of her voice or the graciousness of her art. It is dainty, graceful singing that in swallow-flight just breasts the surface of tragic depths, and then wings its way into the upper sunlight; it is singing in which art so closely simulates artlessness that one is in danger of praising the voice at the expense of the artist. The Mozart aria was an example of this; it was sung with fine simplicity, sparkling fluency and grace. It may not have been exactly Mozart for depth and large sincerity are not the characteristics of modern singing, but it was a very delightful piece of work. In the Massenet selection Mme. Melba was in her happiest mood; there were infinite grace, archness, spirit and daintiness. The music was on the level of Mme. Melba's talents, and these were poured forth with the lavishness of a spendthrift who has no fear of bankruptcy. The audience yielded to the spell and applauded with enthusiastic prodigality. It was a most brilliant and well deserved triumph.

The Prelude by Max Schillings seemed somewhat heavy and dull, rather than brilliant; but in its proper place it is, doubtless, a very attractive piece of work.

The Schumann symphony received a delightfully artistic and finished interpretation, and demonstrated once again, if demonstration were needed, the high and masterful art of the Symphony Orchestra, and the rare skill, large experience, keen insight and faultless taste of the Symphony Orchestra's conductor.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 8, 1896.

Mme Melba at the Symphony.

The Symphony audiences last week were of unusually large proportions, the special attraction being Mme Melba, who made her first appearance this season since her return from Europe. The famous soprano sang an aria from Mozart's opera, "Il Re Pastore," and "Sevillana," from Massenet's "Don Cæsar," the latter number rearranged by the composer for Mme Melba. The orchestral numbers of the program were the overture to Richard III, by Volkmann; prelude to Max Shillings' opera, "Ingwelde," and the Schumann symphony No. 2, in C major. Mme Melba's vocal skill has received so many tributes of praise in past seasons that the vocabulary of encomiums is pretty thoroughly exhausted now, and it would be almost impossible to find new superlatives to express one's opinions of her wonderful vocalism. Her auditors were not satisfied with hearing and seeing her upon the platform, but, gathering by hundreds in the hallway below and at the entrances, they waited for a parting glance at the artist.

The Mozart number was sung with fine dramatic expression and tenderness. The phrasing was perfect, the tones nearly faultless, and the blending of the voice with the violin obligato superbly played by Mr Kneisel was beautiful in effect and execution. The aria loses somewhat in impressiveness when given in concert form, but despite this drawback Mme Melba's triumph was indisputable, and the enraptured audience recalled her a half dozen times at the close. Mr Kneisel was obliged to bow his acknowledgments with Melba. In the florid "Sevillana" madam was heard to even better advantage than in Mozart's aria, and the trills, runs and sustained high notes seemed almost matchless in brilliancy and purity. The delicacy and clearness of the bravura passages were unclouded, and, when it is said that Melba "appeared at her best," the hackneyed phrase conveys the idea as well as any other form of expression. With a half dozen more recalls and a repetition of the aria, gaining another half dozen, Melba finally retired from the scenes of another triumph.

The work of the orchestra was generally of the usual high order of merit. Volkmann's battle picture was given with good effect. The solemn harmony of the introduction was treated with a sonorous dignity that formed a striking contrast with the whirlwind passages of the strings. In "Ingwelde" the composer, Max Schillings, has shown some evidences of Wagner's influence in treatment of the prelude, the excerp on the program. The melody in the introduction was sweetly sung by the strings, and afterward by the horns, and the cellos performed their part with pleasing effect. The triplets by the flutes deserve commendatory words, too. In fact, the various contingents gave forth their isolated phrases most admirably in every instance. Throughout the work its sympathetic quality was charmingly presented by Mr Paur.

The Schumann symphony was well defined in all of its phases. The remarkably dexterous work of the violins in the second movement, the closing coda. the contrasting rush of the strings against the forte chords of the other instruments, and the accentuation of the "motto" phrases are specially worthy of mention.

There will be no concerts this week. Mr Moriz Rosenthal will be the soloist at next week's performances. The program will be as follows: Overture, "Barber of Bagdad," Peter Cornelius; concerto for pianoforte in E minor, No. 1, Chopin; entr'acte, "Heimchen am Heerd," Goldmark; symphony, "From the New World," Dvorak.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 8, 1896.

THE FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT, ETC.

Said an epigrammatic acquaintance early in the week,—"Boston seems to be quite lost in joy over the two M's—McKinley and Melba." That was about true, for the announcement of that superb singer as the soloist in the fourth Symphony programme was received with such practical enthusiasm that every possible seat or admission ticket was purchased upon the instant of sale, with hundreds of would-be hearers left empty and unsatisfied.

Mme. Melba's appearance was hailed with most flattering demonstrations, and she was recalled impetuously again and again after her songs—indeed, at the rehearsal at least, she was fain to repeat her second selection in order to restore tranquility and gratify appeal. She effected her entrance in the flowing and bland love song from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," which begins directly with the words, "L'amero, saro costante"—from a man's scene, to be sure, but sung in the composer's day, as many other such were sung, by a soprano voice, quite in contrast to the older dramatic practice which appointed boys to enact female roles. Mme. Melba's perfect vocal articulation, her absolute ease and limpidity of delivery, her invariable command of her art and her technique, her exquisite tonality and her subordination of all display to the simple spirit of the music, united in a delightful illustration of how a Mozart air should be rendered—as a smooth, suave song, and not as a declamation or a set of broken emotional phrases. For her other number Mme. Melba had threatened to give the "Mad" scene from "Lucia di Lammermoor," which she now sings incomparably well, but which there seems to be no occasion for producing any more just at present. However, she revised her intention and substituted something which Boston had never heard, and which we understand only she has sung—the "Sevillana," composed as part of the incidental music written for a revival of "Don Cæsar de Bazan" at the Theatre Francais by Massenet and since reconstructed as a soprano air.

It is a song of fascination and delight, of festivity and love. It now pulses with the nervous swiftness of a bolero and now lingers with a longing languor. It flashes, sparkles and flies or caresses, persuades and soothes. The orchestral score is instinct with vivacity and ardor and tinted with the most various tone-colors, the bass drum, the cymbals, the triangles and the castanets softly accenting many a bar with characteristic beat. Not great music, of course, but gay, picturesque, significant and seductive to a degree. Mme. Melba sang it deliciously and some of her swift turns of fanciful expression were quite quaint. A dream of humor was perceptible here and there, and in the sentimental passages her growing dramatic understanding showed itself in a fair freedom which came close to abandon. The executive phrases were beautiful, soft and bright, and the delicacy blending with decision and distinctness wherewith she attained and maintained the high D at the end sent all the audience into raptures. So her re-entree resolved itself into the expected joy and success.

One other novelty beside that "Sevillana" was on the programme, being the prelude to the second act of Max Schillings's opera of "Ingwelde," which has been meeting some favor in Germany. This is supposed to prepare the listener for a scene in which a young bride casts "a mournful glance, full of pathetic yearning after happiness and peace" upon her brother-in-law, who is a Scandinavian skald. He thereupon gets up and improvises a melody which is said to "waft him upward to sacred inspiration." Thereupon the bride smiles her thanks and all the sons of the Thorstein (whosoever they may be) are satisfied. The prelude is thoroughly Wagnerian in the general drift of its thought and treatment. It is pleasant, pretty enough, peaceful and "sacredly inspired" to immense resonance in the brass choir, reaching a voluminous central climax and then dying down—probably to give the singers a chance when the curtain goes up. It is worth hearing once as a sample of the Schillings style, but it is not worth much more than his name signifies and need not be repeated.

Volkmann's magnificent "Richard III." overture began the programme, and Schubert's second symphony ended it. The orchestra was continuously good. Mr. Kneisel was perfection in the obbligato of the Mozart and the wood wind was charming in the Massenet. The neat programme is: Peter Cornelius, Overture, "Barber of Bagdad"; Chopin, Concerto for Pianoforte in E minor, No. 1; Goldmark, Entr'acte, "Heimchen am Heerd"; Dvorak, Symphony, "From the New World." Soloist, Mr. Moriz Rosenthal.

The Apollo and the Cecilia, which now offer the only opportunities for hearing other choral music than oratorios, are ready with the plans for their new season and can accept a few more subscriptions. The former will introduce at its first concert the great 'cellist, Halir, and has other strong soloists in reserve, while the latter promises for its great works "The Spectre's Bride," Beethoven's Mass in D and Mrs. Beach's new cantata, "The Rose of Avontown."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

PORTLAND [illegible]SCRIPT

PORTLAND, NOVEMBER 4, 1896.

A series of "motion pictures" is on view every week in Hamilton Place coming and going to and from the Symphony rehearsals and concerts, in the last twenty minutes before the concerts begin there is a procession of elegant turnouts and fashionably dressed women that are seen nowhere else on Boston streets. The artists in costumes and millinery stop work to gaze from the windows looking on the place and steal ideas from the imported finery on fashionable heads and shoulders. Nothing in this year's fashions is so noticeable as the collapse in sleeves. They reached their balloon-like proportions by slow degrees—like a vegetable growth—but the shrinkage has been sudden and some are worn quite tight except for a small ruffle at the shoulders. White is very conspicuous this year in vests and revers, in frills and bows, and light grays are much worn. The contrasts in color in hats and waists are more startling than ever; livid purples are much worn and every possible combination in blue and green in hats and waists, changeable mixtures of the two in silks and ribbons, and the two colors, in bows and feathers, in frills and velvet band. It is impossible to make a hat too large or two full of spikes or feathers. Mrs. Jack Gardiner is always watched for as her carriage with its driver and footman in light liveries drives up at the last moment. Her costumes are always worth looking at. At the first rehearsal she wore a simply made gown of rich dove-colored silk with white chiffon vest and a small bonnet of unobtrusive colors. She has always immaculate gloves on her hands which are famous for their beauty; though not a handsome woman she has an attractive face, happy and good-humored, and her figure is trim and graceful. She is public-spirited and generous as well as a leader in fashionable functions and a liberal patron of art. For the Symphony course she has always two seats for both rehearsals and concerts—for the latter the seats are in the balcony overlooking the stage on the left. At the last concerts a symphony by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach had its first performance from the manuscript; it was enthusiastically received and the young composer was obliged to rise in her seat and bow her thanks. Mrs. Beach was born in New Hampshire in 1857 and before her marriage to Dr. Beach was known as Miss Amy Marcy Cheney, a musical genius and a pianist of remarkable ability. She received her education in this country and has been an enthusiastic and industrious student.

MUSIC HALL.

Mme. Melba sailed from Europe last Saturday, and will arrive in ample time to make her first appearance in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore. Her appearance with the orchestra in this city will be at the first concert of the series of five to be given in Music Hall Wednesday evening, November 11. Season tickets for all the five concerts are placed at prices which are frequently paid to hear Melba alone. Mme. Carreno, Mr. Pol Plancon, Mr. Carl Hahir and Mr. Ben. Davis, in a programme composed entirely of Wagner selections, complete as attractive a list as was ever offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city. No increase in the price of single tickets will be made at any of the concerts. Lewist Commcl

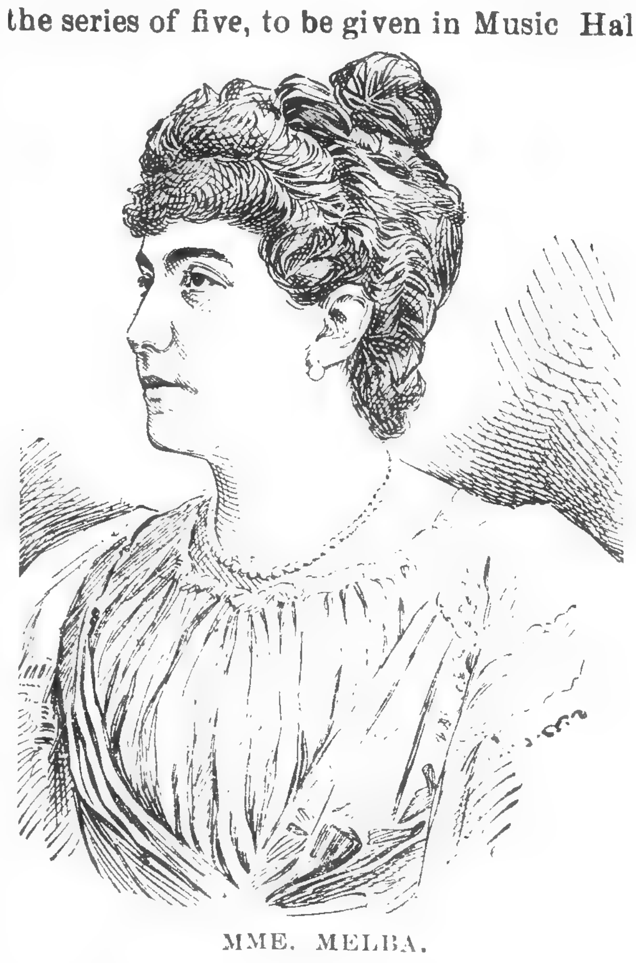
---

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mme. Melba sailed from Europe last Saturday, and will arrive in ample time to make her first appearance in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Boston, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore. Her appearance with the orchestra in this city will be at the first concert series of five to be given in Music Hall, the date of which is November 11. Mme. Carreno, whose reappearance after several years' absence in Europe, during which time she has both matured and improved to such an extent that today she easily ranks among the foremost pianists of the world; Mr. Pol Plancon, like Melba, a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company, of New York; Mr. Carl Halir, the leading classical violinist of Europe today, and Mr. Ben Davies, the popular tenor, in a program composed entirely of Wagner selections, completes as attractive a list as was ever offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

Mme. Melba sailed from Enrope last Saturday, and will arrive in ample time to make her first appearances in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Boston, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore. Her appearance with the orchestra in this city, will be at the first concert of the series of five, to be given in Music Hall, the date of which is Wednesday evening November, 11th. It should be borne in mind by patrons of the concerts, that season tickets for all five concerts. are placed at prices which are frequently paid to hear Melba alone. Mme, Carrono, whose reappearance after several years absence in Europe, during which time she has matured and improved to such an extent that she easily ranks among the foremost pianists of the world; Mr. Pol Plancon, like Melba, a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York; Mr. Carl Halir, the leading classical violinist of Europe today; and Mr Ben Davies, the popular tenor in a programe composed entirely of Wagner selections, completes as attractive a list as was ever offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city. No increase in the price of single tickets will be made at any of the concerts, a policy which has been steadily maintained by the Management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from the beginning.



MME. MELBA.

Ev. Rec.

THE BALTIMORE NEWS.

PUBLISHED BY
THE EVENING NEWS PUBLISHING
COMPANY OF BALTIMORE CITY.
Office, No. 201 East Baltimore Street.

CHAS. H. GRASTY, President.
DOUGLAS H. GORDON, Secretary-Treasurer.

SATURDAY EVENING, OCT. 31, 1896.

MME. MELBA ON THE OCEAN.

Will Soon Come to Baltimore With the Symphony Orchestra.

Mme. Melba sailed from Southampton last Saturday and will arrive in plenty of time to fill her engagements with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore, Boston, Brooklyn and Philadelphia. Manager Strakosch of Music Hall says it is a marvel that she will come, for nobody, he declares ever heard Mme. Melba for $1.50 before. He says the price of a whole season ticket for the symphony concerts has been the price for Mme. Melba hitherto. The other soloists who will appear with the orchestra this year in Baltimore are: Mme. Carreno, Pol. Plancon, Carl Halir and Ben Davies.

According to Assistant Manager F. R. Comee the orchestra first appeared in Baltimore April 12, 1886, at the Academy of Music. Carl Fealten and Fritz Giese were the soloists. Wilhelm Gericke was the director. Franz Kneizel, who has been prominent in the Kneizel concerts, was one of the performers. Beethoven's overture "Lenora" was the first number of the programme. Professor anr Mme. Burmenister of this city occupied the upper left hand proscenium box and gave cordial approvement of the renditions of the orchestra. The Baltimore history of the orchestra is not clear in the following seasons, but in 1889-90 it appeared in Lyceum Hall for five concerts with Nikisch as director. The next season with the same director five concerts were given in the old Concordia Opera House. In 1891-92 six concerts were given under Nikisch in the Academy Concert Hall. The next season the same director had charge of the one concert given at Ford's Opera House.

In 1893-94 Director Paur took charge and gave five matinees at Ford's Opera House. In the season of 1894-95 Music Hall was opened with a great crowd. Mme. Melba was the principal attraction along with Plancon, Scalchi and Mauguiere. Since then the orchestra has given regular concerts at Music Hall. Among the prominent soloists it has brought to Baltimore have been Mme. Melba, Mme. Nordica, Mme. Materna, Miss Emma Juch, Mr. Eugene D'Albert, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Pol. Plancon and Mr. Campanari.

Gericke, the first director who came with the orchestra to Baltimore, is now living in Vienna, having retired from active work. Nikisch is now conducting in Leipsic. Herschel was the orchestra's first conductor, but he never came to Baltimore, for the orchestra had not then begun to travel outside of New England.

Gazette

BOSTON SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 8.

The Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the season was given by the Symphony Orchestra last evening in Music Hall. The programme was:

Overture, "Richard III.".................Volkmann
Aria, "L'amero saro Costante".............Mozart
Mme. Melba.
Prelude to Act II., "Ingwelde".....Max Schillings
(First time at these concerts.)
"Sevillana," from "Don Cæsar"..........Massenet
Mme. Melba.
Symphony, C major, No. 2 ....Schumann

A very large and enthusiastic audience listened to this concert, although it must be confessed that Schumann was not the magnet, nor a love of music for music's sake the cause of the excitement. The reception given to Mme. Melba before she opened her charmed lips demonstrated that hero-worship was the gravitative force that filled Music Hall to its sitting and standing limits.

He would be a lucky critic who could find anything new to say of Mme. Melba's singing, or who could find an unused adjective to describe the beauty of her voice or the graciousness of her art. It is dainty, graceful singing that in swallow-flight just breasts the surface of tragic depths, and then wings its way into the upper sunlight; it is singing in which art so closely simulates artlessness that one is in danger of praising the voice at the expense of the artist. The Mozart aria was an example of this; it was sung with fine simplicity, sparkling fluency and grace. It may not have been exactly Mozart for depth and large sincerity are not the characteristics of modern singing, but it was a very delightful piece of work. In the Massenet selection Mme. Melba was in her happiest mood; there were infinite grace, archness, spirit and daintiness. The music was on the level of Mme. Melba's talents, and these were poured forth with the lavishness of a spendthrift who has no fear of bankruptcy. The audience yielded to the spell and applauded with enthusiastic prodigality. It was a most brilliant and well deserved triumph.

The Prelude by Max Schillings seemed somewhat heavy and dull, rather than brilliant; but in its proper place it is, doubtless, a very attractive piece of work.

The Schumann symphony received a delightfully artistic and finished interpretation, and demonstrated once again, if demonstration were needed, the high and masterful art of the Symphony Orchestra, and the rare skill, large experience, keen insight and faultless taste of the Symphony Orchestra's conductor.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 8, 1896.

Mme Melba at the Symphony.

The Symphony audiences last week were of unusually large proportions, the special attraction being Mme Melba, who made her first appearance this season since her return from Europe. The famous soprano sang an aria from Mozart's opera, "Il Re Pastore," and "Sevillana," from Massenet's "Don Cæsar," the latter number rearranged by the composer for Mme Melba. The orchestral numbers of the program were the overture to Richard III, by Volkmann; prelude to Max Shillings' opera, "Ingwelde," and the Schumann symphony No. 2, in C major. Mme Melba's vocal skill has received so many tributes of praise in past seasons that the vocabulary of encomiums is pretty thoroughly exhausted now, and it would be almost impossible to find new superlatives to express one's opinions of her wonderful vocalism. Her auditors were not satisfied with hearing and seeing her upon the platform, but, gathering by hundreds in the hallway below and at the entrances, they waited for a parting glance at the artist.

The Mozart number was sung with fine dramatic expression and tenderness. The phrasing was perfect, the tones nearly faultless, and the blending of the voice with the violin obligato superbly played by Mr Kneisel was beautiful in effect and execution. The aria loses somewhat in impressiveness when given in concert form, but despite this drawback Mme Melba's triumph was indisputable, and the enraptured audience recalled her a half dozen times at the close. Mr Kneisel was obliged to bow his acknowledgments with Melba. In the florid "Sevillana" madam was heard to even better advantage than in Mozart's aria, and the trills, runs and sustained high notes seemed almost matchless in brilliancy and purity. The delicacy and clearness of the bravura passages were unclouded, and, when it is said that Melba "appeared at her best," the hackneyed phrase conveys the idea as well as any other form of expression. With a half dozen more recalls and a repetition of the aria, gaining another half dozen, Melba finally retired from the scenes of another triumph.

The work of the orchestra was generally of the usual high order of merit. Volkmann's battle picture was given with good effect. The solemn harmony of the introduction was treated with a sonorous dignity that formed a striking contrast with the whirlwind passages of the strings. In "Ingwelde" the composer, Max Schillings, has shown some evidences of Wagner's influence in treatment of the prelude, the excerp on the program. The melody in the introduction was sweetly sung by the strings, and afterward by the horns, and the cellos performed their part with pleasing effect. The triplets by the flutes deserve commendatory words, too. In fact, the various contingents gave forth their isolated phrases most admirably in every instance. Throughout the work its sympathetic quality was charmingly presented by Mr Paur.

The Schumann symphony was well defined in all of its phases. The remarkably dexterous work of the violins in the second movement, the closing coda. the contrasting rush of the strings against the forte chords of the other instruments, and the accentuation of the "motto" phrases are specially worthy of mention.

There will be no concerts this week. Mr Moriz Rosenthal will be the soloist at next week's performances. The program will be as follows: Overture, "Barber of Bagdad," Peter Cornelius; concerto for pianoforte in E minor, No. 1, Chopin; entr'acte, "Heimchen am Heerd," Goldmark; symphony, "From the New World," Dvorak.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 8, 1896.

THE FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT, ETC.

Said an epigrammatic acquaintance early in the week,—"Boston seems to be quite lost in joy over the two M's—McKinley and Melba." That was about true, for the announcement of that superb singer as the soloist in the fourth Symphony programme was received with such practical enthusiasm that every possible seat or admission ticket was purchased upon the instant of sale, with hundreds of would-be hearers left empty and unsatisfied.

Mme. Melba's appearance was hailed with most flattering demonstrations, and she was recalled impetuously again and again after her songs—indeed, at the rehearsal at least, she was fain to repeat her second selection in order to restore tranquility and gratify appeal. She effected her entrance in the flowing and bland love song from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," which begins directly with the words, "L'amero, saro costante"—from a man's scene, to be sure, but sung in the composer's day, as many other such were sung, by a soprano voice, quite in contrast to the older dramatic practice which appointed boys to enact female roles. Mme. Melba's perfect vocal articulation, her absolute ease and limpidity of delivery, her invariable command of her art and her technique, her exquisite tonality and her subordination of all display to the simple spirit of the music, united in a delightful illustration of how a Mozart air should be rendered—as a smooth, suave song, and not as a declamation or a set of broken emotional phrases. For her other number Mme. Melba had threatened to give the "Mad" scene from "Lucia di Lammermoor," which she now sings incomparably well, but which there seems to be no occasion for producing any more just at present. However, she revised her intention and substituted something which Boston had never heard, and which we understand only she has sung—the "Sevillana," composed as part of the incidental music written for a revival of "Don Cæsar de Bazan" at the Theatre Francais by Massenet and since reconstructed as a soprano air.

It is a song of fascination and delight, of festivity and love. It now pulses with the nervous swiftness of a bolero and now lingers with a longing languor. It flashes, sparkles and flies or caresses, persuades and soothes. The orchestral score is instinct with vivacity and ardor and tinted with the most various tone-colors, the bass drum, the cymbals, the triangles and the castanets softly accenting many a bar with characteristic beat. Not great music, of course, but gay, picturesque, significant and seductive to a degree. Mme. Melba sang it deliciously and some of her swift turns of fanciful expression were quite quaint. A dream of humor was perceptible here and there, and in the sentimental passages her growing dramatic understanding showed itself in a fair freedom which came close to abandon. The executive phrases were beautiful, soft and bright, and the delicacy blending with decision and distinctness wherewith she attained and maintained the high D at the end sent all the audience into raptures. So her re-entree resolved itself into the expected joy and success.

One other novelty beside that "Sevillana" was on the programme, being the prelude to the second act of Max Schillings's opera of "Ingwelde," which has been meeting some favor in Germany. This is supposed to prepare the listener for a scene in which a young bride casts "a mournful glance, full of pathetic yearning after happiness and peace" upon her brother-in-law, who is a Scandinavian skald. He thereupon gets up and improvises a melody which is said to "waft him upward to sacred inspiration." Thereupon the bride smiles her thanks and all the sons of the Thorstein (whosoever they may be) are satisfied. The prelude is thoroughly Wagnerian in the general drift of its thought and treatment. It is pleasant, pretty enough, peaceful and "sacredly inspired" to immense resonance in the brass choir, reaching a voluminous central climax and then dying down—probably to give the singers a chance when the curtain goes up. It is worth hearing once as a sample of the Schillings style, but it is not worth much more than his name signifies and need not be repeated.

Volkmann's magnificent "Richard III." overture began the programme, and Schubert's second symphony ended it. The orchestra was continuously good. Mr. Kneisel was perfection in the obbligato of the Mozart and the wood wind was charming in the Massenet. The neat programme is: Peter Cornelins, Overture, "Barber of Bagdad"; Chopin, Concerto for Pianoforte in E minor, No. 1; Goldmark, Entr'acte, "Heimchen am Heerd"; Dvorak, Symphony, "From the New World." Soloist, Mr. Moriz Rosenthal.

The Apollo and the Cecilia, which now offer the only opportunities for hearing other choral music than oratorios, are ready with the plans for their new season and can accept a few more subscriptions. The former will introduce at its first concert the great 'cellist, Halir, and has other strong soloists in reserve, while the latter promises for its great works "The Spectre's Bride," Beethoven's Mass in D and Mrs. Beach's new cantata, "The Rose of Avontown."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 9, 1896.

Melba, the Celebrated Soprano, at the Symphony Concert.

It would be a fallacy to suppose that the tremendous audience of Saturday came to Music Hall merely because of orchestral attractions. While there are many persons in Boston who love the symphony concerts, the great mass of any public will always prefer a brilliant voice to any symphony that ever was written, and it was to Melba that the great concourse was mainly due; it was a symphony concert more in name than in reality, for the interest was almost wholly centred upon the celebrated soprano and her two numbers; yet it was gratifying to note that there was no great exodus after the vocal numbers were finished.

Mme. Melba was in best of voice, and was heard to the very best advantage; the Mozart aria in which she first appeared—"L'amero saro costante"—suited her voice perfectly, and the limpid passages of the tender aria were given with crystal clearness. This aria departs from the old custom of supporting a soprano with flute passages (Mozart never enjoyed writing for flute), and gives to the solo violin the task of forming a counterpoise to the vocalist. Mr. Franz Kneisel accomplished his duty in a commendable manner, his obbligato balancing exquisitely against the tones of the singer. The orchestral support was also commendable, and the entire ensemble was almost without flaw.

Mme. Melba's intonation was impeccable, and even the most difficult phrases were given with seeming ease and with that pleasing timbre of voice of which this singer is the best living exponent. Naturally the enthusiasm was of the most fervid character, and recalls, floral tributes, orchestral applause, and all the other adjuncts of triumphal success attended the Diva, who forced Mr. Kneisel to take his share in the ovation. Her second number was a "Sevillana," by Massenet, which seemed first cousin to a "Carmen" seguidilla. All the Spanish abandon and frenzy was present in this number, with the usual background of strong rhythm, and the conventional contrast of dejection in minor was not lacking. The brilliant ending, with a very pure D in alt thrown in as climax, could not fail to arouse the public, and recall upon recall followed, until the rule of the concerts was again broken, and the number repeated. It was a most brilliant exhibition of vocal virtuosity.

And now, having paid our homage to the bright particular star of the occasion, we turn to the orchestra numbers in a futile endeavor to draw them from their temporary eclipse. The first of these was a noble work nobly performed. Volkmann's "Richard III." overture is probably the very finest orchestral work which this composer has left to the world. His symphonies are more compact and strict, but the orchestral grandeur which speaks in this overture is not in either of them.

One may look in vain, however, for definite Shakespearian ideas in the work; a brooding and melancholy monarch and a tragic death on Bosworth Field are all that clearly appear in its measures. More than this, there is an anachronism in the overture which can never be passed easily by; it was as much a blunder for Volkmann to introduce "The Campbells are Comin'" on an English battlefield as for Shakespeare to place a seacoast in Bohemia, and, apart from the geographical error, it may be remembered that the battle of Bosworth was fought in 1485, while "The Campbells are Comin'" was not composed until 1568! But such an error in no degree militates against the enjoyment of the music, and the shocks of battle, the death of Richard, the trumpet fanfares of triumph, were each and all given with graphic power, the work forming a fitting introduction to a very exciting programme.

Less clear in its meaning (at all events after two hearings) was Max Schillings' prelude to act II. of "Ingwelde." Persons who have heard the work several times assure the reviewer that it is very effective music; for himself, not having undergone repeated inoculation, he can only say that it seems a thing of shreds and patches, containing many beautiful fragments but nothing that his memory could retain or delight in.

It has many points of effective scoring, after the modern vein, with almost all possible instruments called into requisition; it begins with rhapsody upon the harp (and Mr. Schuecker was excellent) and it ends with ecstasy upon the same instrument aided and abetted by the violins in high harmonics, a la "Lohengrin" prelude. There is considerable figure treatment and probably each of the figures has its special meaning, as yet unrevealed to the writer. Of course, the preluding of the Skald Bran, the sorrow of Ingwelde, and the bardic rhapsody are sufficiently well indicated; there is a romantic horn melody (it was finely played) and one broad climax. Further acquaintance may reveal new beauties.

Noblest and loftiest of all, there came at the end of the concert Schumann's second symphony. No man ever wrote his autobiography so clearly in tones as Schumann has done. This symphony is an outcome of the unhappy part of Schumann's life and it reflects sorrow, contention and strife in many of its measures. Schumann himself says that he sketched it during a period of great mental stress and physical agony, and one need not join the ranks of the "intention-seekers" to find a reflex of the composer's circumstances in the work.

The lofty introduction was very broadly given, the brasses, trumpets, horns and trombone, playing without that assertiveness which too often spoils this part of the composition; an introduction full of sombre mystery and suggestive of impending fate. To the reviewer it always suggests the mysterious brooding which is found in Franz's song, "Es Klingt in der Luft." It evidently meant a great deal to Schumann, this "Sostenuto Assai," for its thoughts reapper in almost every one of the succeeding movements, a species of continuity in which Schumann was the rival of Beethoven. This opening phrase is the very heart of the symphony. A slight break in performance marred its first entrance, but the trumpets nobly redeemed themselves before the end of the work, giving their difficult passages with incisive power.

The Scherzo, which here comes in the rather unusual second place, is by no means a playful affair. Schumann was never playful in the Mendelssohnian sense, still less in the grotesque Beethoven manner; [illegible] activity, dash, are here in full store, [illegible] lightheartedness. The use of the [illegible] trio, a new thing in the scherzo movements of that time, was undoubtedly a carrying-out of a Beethoven idea, for that master had used this form in his seventh symphony (and in the Minuet of his fourth)—"Scherzo"—"Trio"—"Scherzo"—"Trio"—over again—"Scherzo" to end with. From this to the introduction of a second trio in the fourth division, instead of a repetition of the same one, was not a very great step, although a great improvement. The performance was altogether admirable, especially in the capricious returning passages which serve to bring back the "Scherzo" on its second and third appearances.

If the Scherzo is not a true Scherzo, at least the Adagio is one of the truest of slow movements; not Beethoven himself could form a broader slow theme than Schumann, and in these days when slow movements are almost wholly given over to formless ecstasy, it is a rare delight to listen to a true Adagio.

The finale was given with electrifying effect, barring a trifling excess of power in the Coda, one of the best readings it has ever received in Boston. The strings displayed a wonderful virtuosity, and if the brasses were a little too loud, at least they were always in tune and without breaks. It is a very difficult movement to play, for Schumann indulges in syncopations here to his heart's content, and he was the greatest syncopater of them all! Yet the complex construction brought forth no aberrations of tempo in the orchestra and the attacks were steady, the ensemble undisturbed.

Schumann wears about as well as Beethoven. It is strange how a half-century has changed the pedestals of some of the masters! Mendelssohn, whose orchestral works were then held to be the model for all time, especially in England, elbowed out the Schumann symphonies; today the Mendelssohn symphonies seem to have their mawkish moments, while Schumann's works seem to be more virile than ever. The finale of this work, as it was played, seemed to outweigh the whole "Italian Symphony," yet this thought if expressed fifty years ago (when Schumann work was composed) would have awakened a howl of derision almost everywhere.

Louis C. Elson.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 8, 1896.

MELBA AT THE SYMPHONY.

Mme. Nellie Melba made her first appearance in Boston this season at the Symphony concert in Music Hall last evening as the soloist of the orchestra. Indeed, it was the initial appearance since her recent return from England, and a very large and friendly audience assembled to bid her welcome. She sang two numbers, the first being Mozart's familiar aria from "Il Re Pastore," in which the violin obligato was played by Franz Kneisel. The second was the "Sevillana" from the "Don Cesar de Bazan" of Jules Massenet, which was given for the first time in this city. In its original form the "Sevillana" was written as an orchestral movement, two solo flutes taking the leading parts, but Massenet afterwards arranged it especially for Mme. Melba for a soprano voice and an orchestra. It is a brilliant composition, the solo part rather rounding out the instrumental portion, which is strikingly Spanish in its style. The vocal work is intricate, making heavy demands on the singer by reason of its rapid and rather florid scoring. Although Melba was in admirable voice, the number taxed her severely, and in one or two instances she was guilty of false intonation. Her efforts were enthusiastically received and a repetition demanded.

Max Schilling's prelude to the second act of "Ingwelde" was heard for the first time at these concerts. It suggests Wagner's famous "Lohengrin" vorspeil and gives a graphic tone picture of the erratic praises of beauty at the Norse banquet. It was given an admirable reading by Mr. Paur.

The other numbers on the programme were Volkmann's overture to "Richard III." and Schumann's second symphony. There will be no rehearsal and concert the coming week.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1896.

Fourth Symphony Concert of the Sixteenth Season—Mrs. Melba Sings Airs by Mozart and Massenet.

The program of the Symphony concert last night in Music Hall, Mr. Paur conductor, was as follows:

Overture to Shakspeare's "Richard III.," op. 68..........Volkmann
Aria, "L' amero, saro Costante," from "Il Re Pastore"..........Mozart
Violin Obbligato by Mr. Kneisel.
Prelude to Act II. of "Ingwelde"..........Max Schillings
(First time at these concerts.)
"Sevillana" from "Don César de Bazan" Massenet
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 2, in C major.......Schumann

This concert does not call for extended comment. Mrs. Melba, who was applauded enthusiastically by a very large audience, sang an air from one of Mozart's early operas. When the opera was first produced this air was sung by a male soprano, but another air of Aminta, "Aer tranquilo" was preferred by sopranos, male and female, in Mozart's day. Mrs. Melba displayed beautiful sustained tones, and the cadenza was delivered with brilliancy; but the air itself is as dead, and no doubt as dull, as the other 13 or 14 settings of Metastasio's text.

Mr. Apthorp in the program book says that the Sevillana sung by Melba is taken "from the incidental music written by Massenet, for the revival of Adolphe d' Ennery's 'Don César de Bazan' at the Théatre Francais in Paris. Constant Coquelin was the Don César." Pray in what year was this play acted at the Francais? Revived? Was it ever in the repertory? And when did Coquelin act the part of Don César in Paris?

Massenet did write an opera, entitled "Don César de Bazan," which was given Nov. 30, 1872, at the Opéra-Comique. Bouhy was Don César; Priola was Maritana, and Galli-Marie was Lazarille. The opera was given eight times in '72 and five times in '73. The entr'acte between the second and third acts is a Sevillina, and from this Massenet probably made his arrangement for Melba. She sang it last night with her usual charm and bravura; but the thing itself is cheap, without distinction, not redeemed by a very few graceful orchestral touches. This piece was encored.

⁂

Schilling's prelude to the second act of "Ingewelde" has been played in many German towns. It was produced by Mr. Van der Stucken in Cincinnati, Dec. 13-14, 1895, and I believe it has been played in New York. The opera was first produced at Carlsruhe, Nov. 13, 1894; it was given at Weimar, May 19, 1895, and it was to have been given at Berlin this month.

The prelude is known as "Bran". Bran is a Skald, who I believe is driven finally to murder someone with an axe. Mr. Ernst Otto Nodnagel has written about the opera, seriously and at appalling length. I refer anyone who wishes to wade through his meditations and explanations to the Allgemeine Musik Zeitung of 1895. There are four themes in this prelude: the Dreamer, the Love Charm, the Skald, and Love's Languishing. In the concert-room this "symbolical" music becomes absolute music, and as such it seems to me "kapellmeistermusik" in the style of Wagner, for there is modern "kapellmeistermusik" in the style of Wagner as well as in the style of Hummel, or Mendelssohn. I prefer my Wagner undiluted. This music is an echo, a far-off echo. The themes are of no interest, and the treatment shows the uncertain hand of an adoring Wagnerian. They say that Schilling's symphonic poems "Meergruss" and "Seemorgen" are worthy of more respectful consideration.

⁂

Volkmann's overture to "Richard III." does not gain by repeated hearings. The wailing and the gnashing of teeth are cruelly prolonged, and the Battle of Bosworth Field is but a tawdry panorama. The depicture of the fall of Richard—with the kind assistance of the orchestra—was done long ago by Litolff and a drum in his "Robespierre" overture. Mr. Paur would do well to let this piece sleep on the shelf for a while with the overtures of Weber, and Beethoven's "Zur Weihe des Hauses." There are so many things that might not be played. There are also so many things that are not known here and might be played.

⁂

The glory of Schumann's Symphony in C is the wondrous Adagio. To hear this repays one for sitting through the first two movements. And in this Adagio the orchestra was heard to supreme advantage.

⁂

There will be no concert Saturday. The program of the next concert, Nov. 21, is as follows: Cornelius, overture, "Barber of Bagdad;" Chopin, concerto for piano in E Minor, No. 1; Goldmark, Entr'acte, "The Cricket on the Hearth;" Dvorak, Symphony, "From the New World." Mr. Moritz Rosenthal will be the pianist.

PHILIP HALE.

Mr. Apthorp, in the Program Book of the Third Symphony concert, says of "Hérodiade," first given at the Monnaie in Brussels Dec. 19, 1881: "It had a success of a season; but when given at the Opéra Italien in Paris on Jan. 30, 1884, after being partially rewritten by the composer, it failed completely."

It was given 55 times that season at Brussels, and it was given 10 times at the Opéra Italien during the season of '84. There was talk of giving it in London soon after its performance at Brussels, but there was a great outcry against "the irreverent treatment of a Scriptural subject;" there were letters to the Times, and the British Matron would not have "French [illegible] [illegible] Germany, [illegible] 1895, at Breslau.

I find [illegible] of a performance of "Vision F[illegible]" at a Symphony concert before [illegible] of Mr. Campanari, Oct. 31 ult. But the air of Salomé from the same opera has been sung at these concerts by Fursch-Madi, Dec. 23, 1886; Mrs. Henschel, April 16, 1892; Nordica, Oct. 21, 1893, and Miss Trebelli, April 21, 1894.

"Vision fugitive" is sung by Hérode to Salomé in the Temple. Saint-Saëns says of the air: "This act (II.) also contains a declaration of love which is extremely gallant. The melody is penetrating. It seems to me I have heard it before. But where? I cannot tell. It is true I have not searched carefully. Why should I spoil my pleasure?"

Manoury first sang it at the Monnaie. He was then receiving $750 a month, while Emma Calvé, who was in the company, was receiving only $140 a month. In Paris the part of Hérode was sung by Maurel.

⁂

The Boston Traveler

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1896.

A Great Audience Hears Melba Sing. A Novelty by Schilling.

Sixteenth season Boston Symphony; fourth concert. The programme:

Overture to Shakespeare's "Richard III.," op. 68..........Volkmann
Aria, "L' amero saro Costante," from "Il Re Pastore"..........Mozart
Violin Obligato by Mr. Kneisel.
Prelude to Act II. of "Ingwelde"........Max Schilling
(First time at these concerts).
"Sevillana" from "Don Cesar de Bazan" Massenet
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 2, in C major........Schumann

Of course the appearance of the golden-throated Melba as soloist augmented the usual large Symphony audience to the most enormous proportions allowed by the city ordinances, and her peerless art was appreciated to the full. She was in unsurpassed voice; indeed, she seems never to be less perfect at one time than another in that respect. And, wonder of wonders, she sang unfamiliar things. The Mozart aria from his early opera, "Il Re Pastore," is a guileless and smoothly-flowing piece of work, which does not inspire any particular interest nor emotion. It has a cadenza, which Melba delivered with pearly beauty and some sustained notes, taken with ease and entire loveliness of tone. The Massanet selection, a "Sevillana," based upon an entr'acte from "Don Cesar de Bazan," is made more entertaining, and has marked brilliancy and something akin to passion. It went with enchanting dash and piquancy, and the audience was so demonstrative that Mme. Melba finally brought back a song and gave it to pianoforte accompaniment.

Schilling's prelude to his "Ingwelde," the instrumental novelty of the concert, is somewhat difficult of judgment torn from its operatic surroundings and sequences. Considered absolutely, it seems but a pale and uninspired copy of Wagnerian methods. The "motives" have no great charm, nor does the orchestration, rich enough after a fashion, betoken any genius of expression. Spite of the magnificent treatment it received from Mr. Paur and his men, it failed to show cause why it should ever be repeated.

That Volkmann never really penetrated beyond the surface of the character of Richard III. his overture of that name shows clearly. The misshapen king did not always shout and tear his hair, we are certain; the battle of Bosworth Field was, of course, noisy, but Volkmann's orchestral picture is not convincing. The work has now been heard enough for a long time.

The Schumann Symphony, with its superlatively beautiful adagio, closed the concert with distinction. More and more does it testify to the genius of the man, the undying fire that will always thrill the soul of the listener. And when to its native worth is added such a superb performance as it was given by the orchestra, the result is impossible of too much praise.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, NOV. 8, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

As many were turned away as gained entrance at the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon and the concert last evening. Mme. Melba was the soloist and a royal ovation she received.

Mr. Moriz Rosenthal will be the soloist at this week's concerts and the programme will be:

Overture........"Barber of Bagdad"................................Peter Cornelius
Concerto for Piano in E minor No. 1....Chopin
Entr'acte.."Heimchen am Heerd"..Goldmark
Symphyony...."From the New World"..Dvorak

Madame Teresa Carreno's tour throughout the United States under the direction of Rudolph Aronson promises well for the great pianiste. Receptions will be tendered her in almost every city en route. In Boston she is to be the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Emil Paur. In Chicago she is to be entertained by Mrs. Dr. Watson, in Milwaukee the Woman's club of Wisconsin will honor her, and in New York the Manuscript society will give her a reception the day after her arrival from Europe, January 6, 1897.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in the Metropolitan opera house, New York, on Nov. 13, Dec. 10, Jan. 21, Feb. 25 and March 25.

VOL. C., NO. 131.

DAY, NOV. 8, 1896.

IN CHARMING VOICE.

Delighted Music Lovers at Last Night's Symphony Concert.

Heard in Mozart Aria, "L'Amero Saro Costante," and an Operatic Bit by Massenet—Schumann Symphony No. 2 in C Major Among Other Features of the Programme.

The programme for last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall was:

Overture, "Richard III."..........Volkmann
Aria, "L'Amero Saro Costante," from "Il Re Pastore"..........Mozart
Prelude to act 2 of "Ingwelde"..Max Schillings
"Sevillana," from "Don Caesar de Basan" Massenet
Symphony No. 2, C major..........Schumann

Mme. Melba was the soloist. The audience filled every available seat and standing place in the hall.

The Volkmann overture does not, on repeated hearings, become any clearer as a logically conceived introduction to Shakespeare's tragedy. If the general color of the music is to be applied to the humpbacked tyrant, it would seem that he was an amiably-cantabile sort of person, given to sudden outbursts of brassy rage, during which he lost his head so completely as to insist upon his band playing the Scotch tune, "The Campbells Are Coming," under the mistaken idea that it was an old English war song.

Considered as music, pure and simple, and without any reference to the play to which it was intended as a descriptive prelude, it is admirable, and often strikingly original in tone color and charming in the skill and effectiveness with which its melodious second theme is treated. Its reading and performance brought out every merit that the work possesses, and emphasized clearly all the interest that is in it.

The Schillings prelude was heard for the first time at these concerts. It is so close an imitation of Wagner's manner that it can scarcely be called original; but it lacks the easy flow and the continuity that mark Wagner in the same vein, and also his mastery of method. There is in it much of dreary vagueness. and is disjointed in effect, and suggests Lady Macbeth's "The attempt, and not the deed, confounds us." There is enough and to spare of restless passion, of sensuousness, of perturbed spirit, of noise, of chromatic harmonies, ceaseless and startling modulations, of melody that constantly breaks off short and never comes to an end, and in addition the inevitable surging through a long series of crescendo sequences up to the customary stormy climax and the as inevitable dimuendo to nowhere in particular—and then?

What is it all about except rich orchestration abused, of laboriously-slavish imitation that necessarily says nothing new and nothing that has not been better said by Mr. Schillings' model? The composer is only 28 years of age, and has before him time enough to become cured of the bad habit of dealing out Wagner at second hand; and also to discover that the reformer of opera has so completely exhausted all that his system of musical art could express that he left absolutely nothing to anybody else to extract from it. It was played superbly, but aroused no enthusiasm, which is strange, seeing that it so closely resembles what is applauded frenziedly when it bears the name of Wagner.

The Schumann symphony, in its clearness and serenity, was a welcome relief after the other orchestral selections of the evening. The work received full justice through the brilliant, beautifully phrased and sympathetically accented reading given it by Mr. Paur and the really magnificent performance by the orchestra. The scherzo, in particular, has rarely had a more thoughtful, finely colored and fascinating interpretation than it received on this occasion, and there were some slight changes in the time, here and there, that were delightful in effect, and so judiciously conceived that they can be accepted without the faintest demur.

Mme. Melba, who was rapturously welcomed, sang both her selections in the highest style or her art. She is to be complimented on having found a way to add new things to her repertory, and for having sung them so charmingly.

The Mozart air, which, by the way, has a violin obbligato, which was deliciously played by Mr. Kneisel, suggests the composer's "Dove sono" and his other opera airs in kind, and has the genuine Mozart flow, grace and tenderness. It is not strikingly interesting, except as an example of the composer's art when he was but 19 years of age, but it is perfectly written for the voice, and enables the singer to display her skill in the difficult art of sustained sostenuto singing.

After its performance Mme. Melba was wildly recalled some four or five times, on each of which occasions she took Mr. Kneisel's hand and led him forward, to his blushing embarrassment after the first time. At length the audience began to titter, which was not unnatural, for the situation began to take on something of absurdity.

The Massenet Sevillana is a sparkling and "catching" bit of brilliant operatic conventionality, effective and plaudit-winning, and dashing in effect. The orchestration is of more solid interest than the tune. Here Mme. Melba had an opportunity to display her familiar skill in coloratur, trilling and cadenza work, and she improved it as only she can. A turmoil of applause followed, and after her fourth recall she reappeared, and, flourishing the piano part of the song at Mr. Paur, rendered it impossible for him to refrain from breaking through the iron rule of these concerts, "no encores." Her repetition of the song was as perfect vocalization and method as was her first rendering of it, and drew forth quite as vigorous a demonstration of approval.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The programme for the next concert is:

Overture, "The Barber of Bagdad," Cornelius; concerto for piano in E minor, Chopin; Entr' Acte, "The Cricket on the Hearth," Goldmark; symphony, "From the New World," Dvorak. Mr. Moriz Rosenthal is to be the soloist.

Library of Utopia."

Treasures Which Mr. Apthorp Has Failed to Unearth—"Fra Diavolo" at the Castle Square Theatre—The Mapleson Opera Company—Musical Events Here and There.

From week to week, Mr. William F. Apthorp takes advantage of the profound and enthusiastic studies he has made in "The Court Library of Utopia," by setting forth excerpts from the priceless volumes he has there consulted, in the programme-books of the Boston Symphony orchestra. As delightful and as edifying as these excerpts are, they do scant justice to the storehouse of wisdom from which he has culled them. Some facts about the library itself may not be without interest. It was formed in the year 1574 by one Ernestus Smelfungus, a native of Graefenhaynchen, who, having made a fortune by the manufacture of hand-cheese, of which he is said to have been the inventor, devoted himself to the study of music and achieved reputation as a noted clavicembalist in his day, and is now remembered as the earliest musician of whom history speaks as the possessor of a society pull. The clavicembalo is the name under which the harpsichord was known in Italy, where it was also called gravicembalo, cembalo and harpsichordo. In France it was called clavecin and in Germany, kielfluegel and fluegel. The instrument on which Smelfungus performed was long preserved as a family heirloom, but it eventually fell into the hands of one branch of his descendants that kept a tavern and was utilized as a depository for ham of Westphalia, cheese of Limburg, and sausages of Frankfort, until it was rescued by a musical enthusiast of the period and deposited in the library of Utopia, where it may be seen at the present time by all who can obtain access to it. Mr. Apthorp must have seen it, perhaps even smelt it, when consulting the books over which he has pored so assiduously.

Judging by the cullings that Mr. Apthorp has made from these volumes, it might be imagined that the eminent Smelfungus' bibliomania leaned toward collecting works whose dulness and stupidity were their chief features. Such, however, is not the case. There are much better things in the "Paralipomena" of Diogene Cavafiaschetto, than he has, as yet, brought to light. For example, in the 131st chapter of the 42d volume of this work, under the caption, "How to worship one's self without guile," may be read: "Speak whereof thou knowest that thou knowest rather than whereof thou thinkest that thou knowest, and it will then follow that thou art not likely to trip over thine own guffins into the quagmire of the ridiculous, and thy points becoming untrussed, thou shalt, to thine own grave mortification, provoke the cruel laughter of the bystanders." It was this Cavafiaschetta, who, by the way, did the plumbing for the Doge's palace in Venice, who, on saying to Benvenuto Cellini, "Immortality is a questionable thing," which Mr. Apthorp has quoted in a recent programme book, receives from the famous artist the following retort: "Immortality is a questionable thing? Corpo di Baccho, so is the egg of the barnyard fowl, the which, no man gazing at its shell shall say whether it will bring forth a cock or a hen." This so mortified Cavafiaschetto, who was corroded with vanity, that he hied him at once to a tavern, and in his rage, indulged in the then favorite pastime of pulling a man's leg, for the which, he was, according to the veracious historian, Patricio Mulli Gatorni, challenged to deadly combat with sword and dagger, and slain incontinently. Those were stirring days, in which the blood was always hot and in which human life was little valued. Mr. Apthorp has, no doubt, read these curious facts during his researches in the Utopian library, but they are not known to the general public.

Montgomery Bullycarp, from whose "Transcendental Traveller's Guide," Mr. Apthorp quotes so freely and discriminatingly, was an Englishman who flourished in the reign of Henry VIII, and though the title of the work named does not indicate that he had any musical attainments, a small volume in the Court Library of Utopia, "Musicae artis praecepta," bears his name. It has evidently escaped Mr. Apthorp's notice. This book is a learned treatise on the art of performing on the Guimbarde, called in German Maul-trommel, Mundharmonica or Brummeisen, and in English, jewsharp. It was from this treatise that the soldier in the army of Frederick the Great became so proficient a performer on the instrument that the king, charmed with his playing on two jewsharps at the same time, gave him his discharge and a present of money. Mr. Apthorp should examine this curious old tome, whic he will find far more interesting than "The Transcendental Traveller's Guide." And, by the way, he might write an edifying entr'acte on the strange fact that Wagner, who used all instruments in his scores, neglected to utilize the jewsharp in tutti passages.

Some of Bullycarp's sentences are pregnant with wisdom, as when in this same "Transcendental Traveller's Guide," he says: "There be those, to compare things physical with things intellectual, who march to and fro on the earth with the peeky strut of the bantam and fancy it the majestic pace of the lion; and who imagine their plaintive little cock-a-doodle-do as terrifying as the roar of the more dread-inspiring creature; but these would do well to memory the saying of Demosthenes, who, on hearing that Aeschines had ridiculed him for practising enunciation with pebbles in his mouth, retorted: 'It is not what is in the mouth, but what comes through it from the brains which denote the intelligence of a man.' "

Fungolfactor Scriblerus, for whose writings Mr. Apthorp manifestly has a special regard, possibly because this Roman, while in Greece, furnished the programms with historical and descriptive notes for the Olympian games, was a very fat man, and for that reason attracted the Notice of Nero, who, when short of candles for a festivity, caused Scriblerus to be bound at the summit of a tall post and there set on fire to illuminate the arena. It is recorded that Scriblerus burned with a brilliant light for eleven hours. At the beginning of his "De scribenda arte," quoted by Mr. Apthorp, he states in a brief memoir, that nothing would induce him to put his stylus to vellum on any subject about which he knew aught, and on which he [illegible] all that [illegible] find [illegible] even in his [illegible] cant things, but [illegible] his fidelity to his friends [illegible] for when he resided there, in Athens, was a musical clique that exercised much sway. The leader was famous for blowing his own horn, it then being the fashion to play on other artists' horns, and for his cleverness in inducing his friends to blow it for him when he had other engagements; from which, it soon became an article of faith that it was treasonable to blow anybody else's horn. If Mr. Apthorp had read his Pleuthro Papyrus carefully he would have discovered a chapter entitled "On the Futility of Attempting the Impossible," and in it this sentence, written probably in the decline of life, when the author was brooding over its vanities: "That time which is passed in attempting to prove a fire-cracker a 16-ton cannon is time wasted." It was Papyrus who invented the expression "eviscerating elaborateness in working out," so felicitiously adopted by Mr. Apthorp in describing the finale of Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony. Translated into English it means "disembowelling elaborateness," which is quite picturesque when applied to a fugue.

Enough, however, of the Court Library of Utopia for the present. An occasional return will be made to the subject, for there are many unearthed treasures in it that will well repay being brought to light.

THE HOMESTEAD.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., NOV. 7, 1896.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

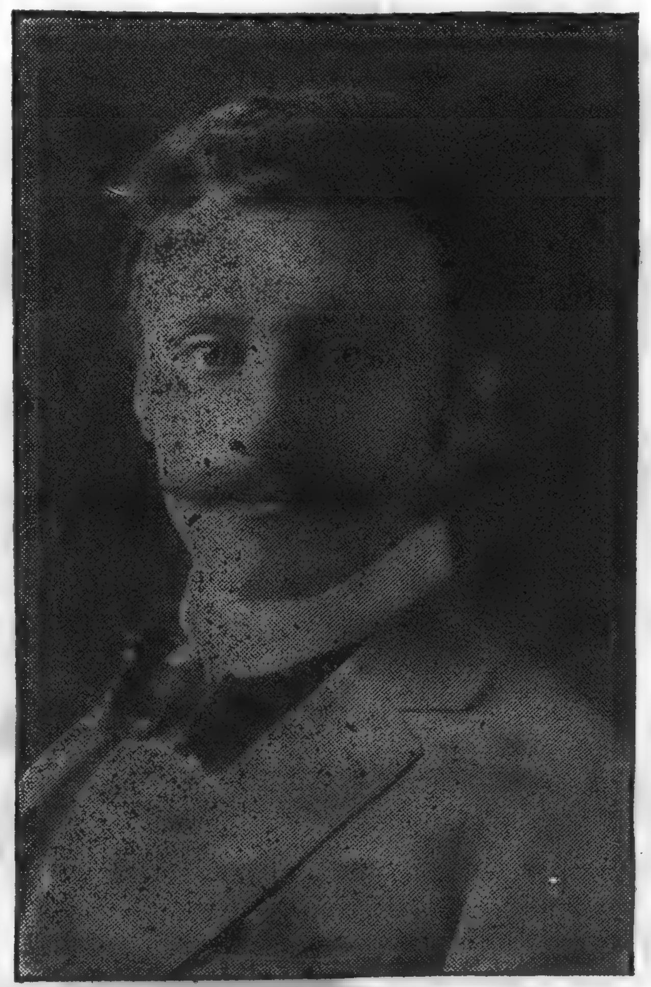
SPRINGFIELD AGAIN FAVORED.

Splendid Concert to Open the Musical Season Next Saturday Evening—Sieveking the Soloist.

The musical season of 1896-7 starts off magnificently with a grand concert next Saturday by the incomparable Boston symphony orchestra. Springfield is to be congratulated that we are to be again favored with a concert by this remarkable orchestra and the patronage of the forthcoming event should be sufficient to establish the concert as an annual institution. It is impossible to overestimate the excellence of the work of this historic organization; its playing is as near perfection as human efforts can hope to attain. These four score of the first musicians of the land are artists, every one of them, and they play as one man.

EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

When extravagant praise comes from the New York press of a Boston organization, nothing further need be said. Here is what the New York Sun says: "The Boston orchestra is ever the same, from conductor unto conductor, and, under whatever conditions of leadership, still remains the standard by which all other like musical bodies must be measured in this country. By years of association these Boston men have attained not only a precision and unanimity of purpose not surpassed in the world perhaps, but there shines through all this work the light of individual enthusiasm and pure devotion to high ideals, so that they compel, invariably, admiration and respect."



Martinus Sieveking.

Although the Boston Symphony orchestra has been in existence only since 1881, its aggregate of work done has been so much greater than that of any other orchestra in America, not excepting that of the Philharmonic society of New York, with its 54 years of history, that it may be fairly considered as the most representative and effective body of musicians on this side of the water. Maintained as it is by Mr Henry L. Higginson of Boston, who makes good an annual deficit which amounts to a considerable sum, the Boston symphony orchestra makes itself a powerful [illegible] influence, not only in its home [illegible] and Cambridge, but in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington.

The solo artist who will appear at the Springfield concert, Martinus Sieveking, is highly commended as one of the best pianists who have come to this country. Of his recent appearance in Boston with the symphony orchestra the Herald says: "Mr Sieveking was received with great cordiality and renewed the favorable impression made by himself on his previous appearances at these concerts. His selections were highly appreciated, as this was the first time they have ever been given in Boston. Mr Sieveking has fingers of steel and his work is noted for its clearness and he masters all the demands that may be made by modern pianoforte technique. His performance was musically interesting and thoughtful and in the finale his remarkable ability and powers of technique were displayed, with an interesting brilliancy and precision which brought forth well-merited outbursts of applause and he received three as stormy applauses and recalls as any artist has ever received at these concerts."

Last year's concert left little to be desired, but some of our musicians expressed the wish that more new compositions be included in the program of the next concert. The list chosen for this year will satisfy the tastes of the most exacting. They comprise a breadth of composition rarely found in one concert program and are far ahead of any one program given by the orchestra in Boston. The first four numbers are all new compositions with the orchestra and the other two are of such beauty and grandeur as to need no comment.

1 Emanuel Chabrier, overture, Guendoline
2 Tschaikowsky concerto for pianoforte No 1
Intermission.
3 Weber, overture, Abu Hassan
4 Bourganet, Ducrouday, The Burial of Ophelia
5 Weber, Invitation to dance
6 Beethoven, Symphony No 8

It is to the enterprise of Mr Koop of Boston that Springfield is indebted for this concert. Since the concert last spring which proved hardly a financial success he has had confidence that Springfield would support such a splendid concert and it remains for our music-loving people to prove that he has not underestimated the culture of our city.

Subscription tickets for the Boston symphony orchestra concert go on sale Wednesday morning at Steinert's music house and the regular sale will begin at the same place Thursday. Tickets will also be sold in Westfield by H. L. Bradley and at Northampton by Christopher Clark. Springfield ought to outdo herself this year and assure the recurrence of this delightful event.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. C., NO. 131.
SUNDAY, NOV. 8, 1896.

MELBA IN CHARMING VOICE.

Delighted Music Lovers at Last Night's Symphony Concert.

Heard in Mozart Aria, "L'Amero Saro Costante," and an Operatic Bit by Massenet—Schumann Symphony No. 2 in C Major Among Other Features of the Programme.

The programme for last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall was:

Overture, "Richard III."..........Volkmann
Aria, "L'Amero Saro Costante," from "Il Re Pastore"..........Mozart
Prelude to act 2 of "Ingwelde"..Max Schillings
"Sevillana," from "Don Caesar de Bazan"..........Massenet
Symphony No. 2, C major..........Schumann

Mme. Melba was the soloist. The audience filled every available seat and standing place in the hall.

The Volkmann overture does not, on repeated hearings, become any clearer as a logically conceived introduction to Shakespeare's tragedy. If the general color of the music is to be applied to the humpbacked tyrant, it would seem that he was an amiably-cantabile sort of person, given to sudden outbursts of brassy rage, during which he lost his head so completely as to insist upon his band playing the Scotch tune, "The Campbells Are Coming," under the mistaken idea that it was an old English war song.

Considered as music, pure and simple, and without any reference to the play to which it was intended as a descriptive prelude, it is admirable, and often strikingly original in tone color and charming in the skill and effectiveness with which its melodious second theme is treated. Its reading and performance brought out every merit that the work possesses, and emphasized clearly all the interest that is in it.

The Schillings prelude was heard for the first time at these concerts. It is so close an imitation of Wagner's manner that it can scarcely be called original; but it lacks the easy flow and the continuity that mark Wagner in the same vein, and also his mastery of method. There is in it much of dreary vagueness, and is disjointed in effect, and suggests Lady Macbeth's "The attempt, and not the deed, confounds us." There is enough and to spare of restless passion, of sensuousness, of perturbed spirit, of noise, of chromatic harmonies, ceaseless and startling modulations, of melody that constantly breaks off short and never comes to an end, and in addition the inevitable surging through a long series of crescendo sequences up to the customary stormy climax and the as inevitable dimuendo to nowhere in particular—and then?

What is it all about except rich orchestration abused, of laboriously-slavish imitation that necessarily says nothing new and nothing that has not been better said by Mr. Schillings' model? The composer is only 28 years of age, and has before him time enough to become cured of the bad habit of dealing out Wagner at second hand; and also to discover that the reformer of opera has so completely exhausted all that his system of musical art could express that he left absolutely nothing to anybody else to extract from it. It was played superbly, but aroused no enthusiasm, which is strange, seeing that it so closely resembles what is applauded frenziedly when it bears the name of Wagner.

The Schumann symphony, in its clearness and serenity, was a welcome relief after the other orchestral selections of the evening. The work received full justice through the brilliant, beautifully phrased and sympathetically accented reading given it by Mr. Paur and the really magnificent performance by the orchestra. The scherzo, in particular, has rarely had a more thoughtful, finely colored and fascinating interpretation than it received on this occasion, and there were some slight changes in the time, here and there, that were delightful in effect and so judiciously conceived that they can be accepted without the faintest demur.

Mme. Melba, who was rapturously welcomed, sang both her selections in the highest style or her art. She is to be complimented on having found a way to add new things to her repertory, and for having sung them so charmingly.

The Mozart air, which, by the way, has a violin obbligato, which was deliciously played by Mr. Kneisel, suggests the composer's "Dove sono" and his other opera airs in kind, and has the genuine Mozart flow, grace and tenderness. It is not strikingly interesting, except as an example of the composer's art when he was but 19 years of age, but it is perfectly written for the voice, and enables the singer to display her skill in the difficult art of sustained sostenuto singing.

After its performance Mme. Melba was wildly recalled some four or five times, on each of which occasions she took Mr. Kneisel's hand and led him forward, to his blushing embarrassment after the first time. At length the audience began to titter, which was not unnatural, for the situation began to take on something of absurdity.

The Massenet Sevillana is a sparkling and "catching" bit of brilliant operatic conventionality, effective and plaudit-winning, and darting in effect. The orchestration is of more solid interest than the tune. Here Mme. Melba had an opportunity to display her familiar skill in coloratur, trilling and cadenza work, and she improved it as only she can. A turmoil of applause followed, and after her fourth recall she reappeared, and, flourishing the piano part of the song at Mr. Paur, rendered it impossible for him to refrain from breaking through the iron rule of these concerts, "no encores." Her repetition of the song was as perfect vocalization and method as was her first rendering of it, and drew forth quite as vigorous a demonstration of approval.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The programme for the next concert is:

Overture, "The Barber of Bagdad," Cornelius; concerto for piano in E minor, Chopin; Entr 'Acte, "The Cricket on the Hearth," Goldmark; symphony, "From the New World," Dvorak. Mr. Moriz Rosenthal is to be the soloist.

[illegible]

Extracts from "The Court Library of Utopia."

Treasures Which Mr. Apthorp Has Failed to Unearth—"Fra Diavolo" at the Castle Square Theatre—The Mapleson Opera Company—Musical Events Here and There.

From week to week, Mr. William F. Apthorp takes advantage of the profound and enthusiastic studies he has made in "The Court Library of Utopia," by setting forth excerpts from the priceless volumes he has there consulted, in the programme-books of the Boston Symphony orchestra. As delightful and as edifying as these excerpts are, they do scant justice to the storehouse of wisdom from which he has culled them. Some facts about the library itself may not be without interest. It was formed in the year 1574 by one Ernestus Smelfungus, a native of Graefenhaynchen, who, having made a fortune by the manufacture of hand-cheese, of which he is said to have been the inventor, devoted himself to the study of music and achieved reputation as a noted clavicembalist in his day, and is now remembered as the earliest musician of whom history speaks as the possessor of a society pull. The clavicembalo is the name under which the harpsichord was known in Italy, where it was also called gravicembalo, cembalo and harpsichordo. In France it was called clavecin and in Germany, kielfluegel and fluegel. The instrument on which Smelfungus performed was long preserved as a family heirloom, but it eventually fell into the hands of one branch of his descendants that kept a tavern and was utilized as a depository for ham of Westphalia, cheese of Limburg, and sausages of Frankfort, until it was rescued by a musical enthusiast of the period and deposited in the library of Utopia, where it may be seen at the present time by all who can obtain access to it. Mr. Apthorp must have seen it, perhaps even smelt it, when consulting the books over which he has pored so assiduously.

Judging by the cullings that Mr. Apthorp has made from these volumes, it might be imagined that the eminent Smelfungus' bibliomania leaned toward collecting works whose dulness and stupidity were their chief features. Such, however, is not the case. There are much better things in the "Paralipomena" of Diogene Cavafiaschetto, than he has, as yet, brought to light. For example, in the 131st chapter of the 42d volume of this work, under the caption, "How to worship one's self without guile," may be read: "Speak whereof thou knowest that thou knowest rather than whereof thou thinkest that thou knowest, and it will then follow that thou art not likely to trip over thine own guffins into the quagmire of the ridiculous, and thy points becoming untrussed, thou shalt, to thine own grave mortification, provoke the cruel laughter of the bystanders." It was this Cavafiaschetta, who, by the way, did the plumbing for the Doge's palace in Venice, who, on saying to Benvenuto Cellini, "Immortality is a questionable thing," which Mr. Apthorp has quoted in a recent programme book, receives from the famous artist the following retort: "Immortality is a questionable thing? Corpo di Baccho, so is the egg of the barnyard fowl, the which, no man gazing at its shell shall say whether it will bring forth a cock or a hen." This so mortified Cavafiaschetto, who was corroded with vanity, that he hied him at once to a tavern, and in his rage, indulged in the then favorite pastime of pulling a man's leg, for the which, he was, according to the veracious historian, Patricio Mulli Gatorni, challenged to deadly combat with sword and dagger, and slain incontinently. Those were stirring days, in which the blood was always hot and in which human life was little valued. Mr. Apthorp has, no doubt, read these curious facts during his researches in the Utopian library, but they are not known to the general public.

Montgomery Bullycarp, from whose "Transcendental Traveller's Guide," Mr. Apthorp quotes so freely and discriminatingly, was an Englishman who flourished in the reign of Henry VIII, and though the title of the work named does not indicate that he had any musical attainments, a small volume in the Court Library of Utopia, "Musicae artis praecepta," bears his name. It has evidently escaped Mr. Apthorp's notice. This book is a learned treatise on the art of performing on the Guimbarde, called in German Maul-trommel, Mundharmonica or Brummeisen, and in English, jewsharp. It was from this treatise that the soldier in the army of Frederick the Great became so proficient a performer on the instrument that the king, charmed with his playing on two jewsharps at the same time, gave him his discharge and a present of money. Mr. Apthorp should examine this curious old tome, whic he will find far more interesting than "The Transcendental Traveller's Guide." And, by the way, he might write an edifying entr'acte on the strange fact that Wagner, who used all instruments in his scores, neglected to utilize the jewsharp in tutti passages.

Some of Bullycarp's sentences are pregnant with wisdom, as when in this same "Transcendental Traveller's Guide," he says: "There be those, to compare things physical with things intellectual, who march to and fro on the earth with the peeky strut of the bantam and fancy it the majestic pace of the lion; and who imagine their plaintive little cock-a-doodle-do as terrifying as the roar of the more dread-inspiring creature; but these would do well to memory the saying of Demosthenes, who, on hearing that Aeschines had ridiculed him for practising enunciation with pebbles in his mouth, retorted: 'It is not what is in the mouth, but what comes through it from the brains which denote the intelligence of a man.'"

Fungolfactor Scriblerus, for whose writings Mr. Apthorp manifestly has a special regard, possibly because this Roman, while in Greece, furnished the programms with historical and descriptive notes for the Olympian games, was a very fat man, and for that reason attracted the Notice of Nero, who, when short of candles for a festivity, caused Scriblerus to be bound at the summit of a tall post and there set on fire to illuminate the arena. It is recorded that Scriblerus burned with a brilliant light for eleven hours. At the beginning of his "De sentienda arte," quoted by Mr. Apthorp, he states in a brief memoir, that nothing would induce him to put his stylus to vellum on any subject about which he knew aught, and of which he could not find all that he desired to find

"Pleutro Papyrus [illegible] thiana" Mr. [illegible] ly, was much [illegible] for the [illegible] quency with which he used Persian, Arabic, Greek and other foreign words, even in the writing of the most insignificant things, but this was forgiven for his fidelity to his friends. In Athens, when he resided there, was a musical clique that exercised much sway. The leader was famous for blowing his own horn, it then being the fashion to play on other artists' horns, and for his cleverness in inducing his friends to blow it for him when he had other engagements; from which, it soon became an article of faith that it was treasonable to blow anybody else's horn. If Mr. Apthorp had read his Pleuthro Papyrus carefully he would have discovered a chapter entitled "On the Futility of Attempting the Impossible," and in it this sentence, written probably in the decline of life, when the author was brooding over its vanities: "That time which is passed in attempting to prove a fire-cracker a 16-ton cannon is time wasted." It was Papyrus who invented the expression "eviscerating elaborateness in working out," so felicitiously adopted by Mr. Apthorp in describing the finale of Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony. Translated into English it means "disembowelling elaborateness," which is quite picturesque when applied to a fugue.

Enough, however, of the Court Library of Utopia for the present. An occasional return will be made to the subject, for there are many unearthed treasures in it that will well repay being brought to light.

THE HOMESTEAD.
SPRINGFIELD, MASS., NOV. 7, 1896.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SPRINGFIELD AGAIN FAVORED.

Splendid Concert to Open the Musical Season Next Saturday Evening—Sieveking the Soloist.

The musical season of 1896-7 starts off magnificently with a grand concert next Saturday by the incomparable Boston symphony orchestra. Springfield is to be congratulated that we are to be again favored with a concert by this remarkable orchestra and the patronage of the forthcoming event should be sufficient to establish the concert as an annual institution. It is impossible to overestimate the excellence of the work of this historic organization; its playing is as near perfection as human efforts can hope to attain. These four score of the first musicians of the land are artists, every one of them, and they play as one man.

EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

When extravagant praise comes from the New York press of a Boston organization, nothing further need be said. Here is what the New York Sun says: "The Boston orchestra is ever the same, from conductor unto conductor, and, under whatever conditions of leadership, still remains the standard by which all other like musical bodies must be measured in this country. By years of association these Boston men have attained not only a precision and unanimity of purpose not surpassed in the world perhaps, but there shines through all this work the light of individual enthusiasm and pure devotion to high ideals, so that they compel, invariably, admiration and respect."

Martinus Sieveking.

Although the Boston Symphony orchestra has been in existence only since 1881, its aggregate of work done has been so much greater than that of any other orchestra in America, not excepting that of the Philharmonic society of New York, with its 54 years of history, that it may be fairly considered as the most representative and effective body of musicians on this side of the water. Maintained as it is by Mr Henry L. Higginson of Boston, who makes good an annual deficit which amounts to a considerable sum, the Boston symphony orchestra makes itself a powerful musical influence, not only in its home city and Cambridge, but in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington.

The solo artist who will appear at the Springfield concert, Martinus Sieveking, is highly commended as one of the best pianists who have come to this country. Of his recent appearance in Boston with the symphony orchestra the Herald says: "Mr Sieveking was received with great cordiality and renewed the favorable impression made by himself on his previous appearances at these concerts. His selections were highly appreciated, as this was the first time they have ever been given in Boston. Mr Sieveking has fingers of steel and his work is noted for its clearness and he masters all the demands that may be made by modern pianoforte technique. His performance was musically interesting and thoughtful and in the finale his remarkable ability and powers of technique were displayed, with an interesting brilliancy and precision which brought forth well-merited outbursts of applause and he received three as stormy applauses and recalls as any artist has ever received at these concerts."

Last year's concert left little to be desired, but some of our musicians expressed the wish that more new compositions be included in the program of the next concert. The list chosen for this year will satisfy the tastes of the most exacting. They comprise a breadth of composition rarely found in one concert program and are far ahead of any one program given by the orchestra in Boston. The first four numbers are all new compositions with the orchestra and the other two are of such beauty and grandeur as to need no comment.

1 Emanuel Chabrier, overture, Guendoline
2 Tschaikowsky concerto for pianoforte No 1
Intermission.
3 Weber, overture, Abu Hassan
4 Bourganet, Ducrouday, The Burial of Ophelia
5 Weber, Invitation to dance
6 Beethoven, Symphony No 8

It is to the enterprise of Mr Koop of Boston that Springfield is indebted for this concert. Since the concert last spring which proved hardly a financial success he has had confidence that Springfield would support such a splendid concert and it remains for our music-loving people to prove that he has not underestimated the culture of our city.

Subscription tickets for the Boston symphony orchestra concert go on sale Wednesday morning at Steinert's music house and the regular sale will begin at the same place Thursday. Tickets will also be sold in Westfield by H. L. Bradley and at Northampton by Christopher Clark. Springfield ought to outdo herself this year and assure the recurrence of this delightful event.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOV. 7, 1896.

MRS. BEACH'S SYMPHONY.

As she reponded from her seat in the center of Music Hall, at the third Boston Symphony matinee, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach had every reason to be proud of the reception accorded the first production of her Symphony; a beautiful work, especially in the second and third movements. The exquisite Siciliano rouses the question why the whole composition is called Gaelic; albeit other portions suggest the name.

The other instrumental numbers were the eight Brahms variations on the Haydn theme, Sancti Antoni (a name which seems somewhat a mystery), and the Der Freischutz overture. Campanari was the singer, lending his rich tones to the Vision aria, from Massenet's Herod, and to the Pagliacci Prologue, and receiving the warmest applause.

We can hardly do better than append to this report the program account of the Symphony and its composer, not yet thirty years old.

Mrs. Dr. Beach (Amy Marcy Cheney) was born at Henniker, Merrimack County, New Hampshire, September 5, 1867, of very old New England stock.

Her musical talent showed itself at the age of four, when musical ideas began to take definite shape in her mind; and she soon began little compositions. Even before she had taken any theoretical instruction, her writing was found to be musically correct. She had an accurate ear for absolute pitch. Her musical education was begun by her mother, who taught her the pianoforte; and this education was continued under C. L. Capen, Ernst Perabo and Carl Baermann. She also studied harmony under Prof. J. W. Hill of Wellesley College. After leaving his care she pursued extended and systematic courses of study by herself, in counterpoint, fugue, musical form and instrumentation, making translations of the treatises by Berlioz and Gevaërt. For the last fourteen years she has studied analytically all the best works performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, before, during, and after the performance; being advised to this course by Director Gericke. In this her accurate memory and keen ear were great helps.

Her first public appearance as a pianist was in the Boston Music Hall, October 24, 1883, she being then sixteen, when she played Moscheles's G minor Concerto, opus 60, with orchestra. At seventeen she played Chopin's F minor Concerto under Mr. Gericke, and the Mendelssohn D minor Concerto, with Theodore Thomas's orchestra, and she has given recitals of her own works.

With the exception of a couple of songs, all her compositions have been published since her marriage in 1885. The list includes a Mass in E-flat major, brought out by the Handel & Haydn Society in 1892; a scena and aria, Eilende Wolken, with orchestra, sung by Mrs. Alves at a concert of the New York Symphony Society, under Mr. Walter Damrosch, in the same year; a Festival Jubilate for chorus and orchestra, brought out under Mr. Thomas's direction, at the dedication of the Woman's Building at the Columbian Exposition in Chicago; besides over sixty shorter works for pianoforte, voice, violin, several cantatas. Her latest completed composition is a sonata for pianoforte and violin.

The first movement of her Symphony, Allegro con fuoco, in E minor (6-8 time), opens pianissimo, with a tremulous chromatic passage in the strings, which goes on gradually increasing in force and fulness of scoring until it reaches the fortissimo of the full orchestra. This passage may be regarded either as a first member of the first theme, or as a sort of introduction to it. After sixteen measures of this chomatic whizzing, the first theme proper sets in, first in the trumpets, then in the horns, then in the woodwind against a pizzicato accompaniment in the strings. It is developed at some length by the full orchestra (with a sparing use of the trombones, however) and makes way after a measure of ritardando (2-2 time), for a lighter first subsidiary, in which the skipping rhythm of the dotted triplet plays a prominent part. This subsidiary (also in E minor) begins piano and is developed in crescendo to fortissimo. A descending arpeggio passage in the strings leads to a reminiscence of the first theme in the horn, and then the chromatic passage returns, Poco piu tranquilla, in the strings, leading to another hint at the first theme, and then to the entrance of the melodious second theme in the clarinet, the strings keeping up their subdued chromatic whizzing. The second theme is, in its turn, briefly developed. Its tonality is very shifting, beginning in G major, then passing through B major, B minor, C minor, B-flat major, and other keys, until it comes to a closing cadence in G major. It is followed by a brisk little conclusion theme of Gaelic folk-song character (in G major) which enters first in the oboe, then is answered canonically by the flute, and dies away in the strings.

On a return to Tempo primo, the free fantasia begins with the whizzing chromatic phrase of the strings, and is carried through at great length and with much contrapuntal elaboration. It ends with quite the Beethovenish "moment of exhaustion," after which a recitative-like solo of the clarinet leads over to the third part of the movement. This is developed pretty closely on the lines of the first part, and is followed by an extended coda, with which the movement ends.

The second movement opens with a graceful melody, alla Siciliana, in F major (12-8 time), in which the characteristic rhythm and tranquil, flowing grace of the Siciliano are strongly marked. It begins in the horn and strings, and is then further developed by the oboe, clarinets, and bassoons, the flute and horns coming in at one time as the piano swells to forte. Then follows a brisk, tricksy scherzo movement, Allegro vivace in F major (2-4 time), with nimbly scurrying violins, which is very fully developed, little hints at the preceding Siciliano melody cropping up every now and then. Then the slower Siciliano returns in its original shape, and is more extendedly developed than at first, a few measures of the bright Allegro coming back at the end to close the movement. This movement is the one which corresponds to the scherzo in the traditional symphonic form. Considering the character of its two contrasted sections—the slow Siciliano and the brisk, sprightly Allegro vivace—one might almost call it a scherzo between two trios, instead of two scherzos with a trio between them.

The third movement, Lento con molto espressione in E minor (6-4 time), opens with some contrapuntal preluding in the wind instruments, kettle drums, and basses pizzicati, after which a solo violin leads over to the entrance of the first theme. This, a melody of strongly marked Gaelic character,—having the characteristic Keltic closing cadence, from the third degree of the scale to the tonic,—is exposed in elaborate part-writing by the muted strings, with a solo violin and cello, the latter taking the melody. It is followed by a more strenuous second theme, which opens as the little prelude as the beginning of the movement did, and is developed at considerable length. A third theme,—of well-marked folksong character,—which appears after a while in the strings, is in reality nothing else than a counter-theme to the first. The two are much worked up in conjunction; when the counter-theme makes its first appearance in the first violins, the theme is in the 'celli and basses. Then theme and counter-theme appear in the two clarinets. Still the counter-theme is at times treated entirely by itself, and so may not inaptly be called a true third theme. The development and working-out of this movement are extremely elaborate.

The fourth movement, Allegro molto in E minor (2-2 time) is, like the first, in the sonata form. It opens brilliantly with the energetic first theme fortissimo in the full orchestra; and the development of this theme is so protracted and elaborate that it has all the character of actual working out. The same may be said of the development of the martial, folksong-like second theme that follows it,—appearing first in the violas, celli, and bassoons in the dominant, B major, which is also worked out as soon as exposed. There is no real conclusion theme, and the free fantasia is comparatively short, as is not infrequently found to be the case in movements where the themes are very elaborately treated as soon as presented, so that the working out comes largely in the first and third parts, instead of being confined to the free fantasia and coda. In the coda an augmentation of the second theme returns fortissimo in all the strings, except double basses, in unison (not in octaves) reinforced by the trumpets in unison or octaves, against full harmony in the wind instruments; after which the movement comes to a free close in E major.

This symphony is scored for 2 flutes, 2 oboes, 2 clarinets, 2 bassoons, 4 horns, 2 trumpets, 3 trombones, 1 bass-tuba, a set of 3 kettle-drums, and the usual strings. The score bears no dedication.

Boston [illegible]

MONDAY, NOV [illegible]

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Volkmann: Overture to Shakspeare's "Richard III," opus 68.
Mozart: Aria, "L'amerò, sarò costante," from "Il Rè Pastore."
Violin obbligato by Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Max Schillings: Prelude to Act II. of "Ingwelde."
(First time at these concerts.)
Massenet: Sevillana from "Don César de Bazan."
(First time in Boston.)
Schumann: Symphony No. 2, in C major, opus 61.
Madame Melba was the singer.

Volkmann's "Richard III." overture has been heard here time and again before; somewhat "oftener than in its turn," as some of us might think, for the work is none of the greatest. Enormous sincerity Volkmann certainly had, and no little skill; but these qualities are not quite enough to achieve immortality by themselves, and it has seemed at times as if this overture were in danger of having a rather factitious immortality foisted upon it by over-many performances. But a thoroughly fine performance can cover a multitude of sins, sins far more heinous and numerous than can be laid to the charge of this overture; and the performance last Saturday evening can fairly be called ideal. It almost supplied what of greatness the work itself lacked. We cannot remember ever before hearing this "Richard III." of old Volkmann's placed in so entirely and genially favorable a light. Mr. Paur is to be congratulated upon a wonderfully fine reading.

No musical cyclopædia we know of is young enough to include the name of Max Schillings. He is known to habitual readers of musical periodicals as the composer of "Ingwelde"; and that is about all. The excerpt from that opera played last Saturday tells us somewhat more about him, though so short a story probably does not contain the whole truth. But, judging from this one sample, we should say that Mr. Schillings is an out-and-out Wagnerian (on principle), with a strong touch of Liszt in him (by natural affinity). He is evidently fond of those astonishing modulations which Liszt used to delight in dragging in by the very hair; those modulations which seem to make music actually "see double." The prelude tries as hard as music can to show us the young Skald, Bran, rising to his feet in the midst of a banquet and singing a song in praise of Ingwelde, his brother's betrothed. We could not, however, escape the impression that the "noisy merriment" at the banquet had been carried so far that, when Bran rose to his feet, he saw two Ingweldes before him. The composition gives evidence of no little skill in orchestration and thematic development, according to the modern manner. But seldom have we heard anything the expression of which seemed so foiled by oppressive self-consciousness. The performance was wonderfully fine.

After this decking-out a mediocre and a pretty feeble work in the most glowing colors by sheer perfection of reading and execution, we had a moment of misgiving as to what would become of Schumann's great C major symphony. For it is a too common experience that, when small works are superlatively well given, greater works are unduly slighted. But the event proved that our misgiving was superfluous. The great symphony was superbly, beautifully, grandly played from beginning to end! Ah! you younger ones who can remember no further back than Mr. Gericke's time, you little know the trepidation with which a performance of this symphony was looked forward to in the earlier days here; how hard it was then to believe that Schumann's orchestration was really the best-fitting dress for Schumann's thought! It is hard for you to imagine what absolute rags and tatters of music that first movement used to sound like, how everything would seem to go to pieces in the free fantasia! It is all different now; our orchestra has mastered Schumann's peculiar scoring, and shows it to be the thing it really is. Mr. Paur and his men have added one more to their list of triumphs. Once more we revert to Saint-Saëns's astonishing expression of opinion anent this symphony: "If the audience"—at a certain Conservatoire concert in Paris—"remained cold after the Finale, they but showed their good taste." What could Saint-Saëns have been thinking of? Can it be that he found in this Finale wellnigh everything that a Frenchman cannot do? To us it is the greatest symphonic finale since those to Beethoven's "Eroica" and C minor! It "breaks through the form," to be sure; but where was there ever a grander instance of a composer's breaking through a form, not from any wilful attempt to discover new musical domains, but in response to the impulse of sheer genius and a fine appreciation of the very necessities of the case?

Mme. Melba is much to be thanked for introducing us to the beautiful aria from Mozart's "Rè Pastore." The version she uses contains an overlong and modern-sounding duet-cadenza for voice and solo violin, and departs in one particular from Mozart's original score. But the substitution of two clarinets for Mozart's two English-horns was probably made with an eye to the practical exigencies of concert-touring—Robert Franz sometimes allowed himself to make the same substitution for old Bach's oboi da caccia—and it may well be argued that a cadenza must be modern-sounding, to fulfil its mission as a cadenza. The air itself shows Mozart at his best in a very characteristic vein; and, as for the scoring of the accompaniment, no more divinely beautiful piece of orchestral coloring can be found in all Berlioz and Wagner. Mme. Melba was in perfect voice and sang the aria most admirably; if not with the profoundest depth of emotional expression, yet with a purity of feeling for musical beauty that is rare nowadays. The composition itself is a classical aria, and should be classically sung; Mme. Melba sang it classically, in the best sense of the word, but without any tinge of merely academic rigidity. Mr. Kneisel's playing of the violin obbligato was perfection itself.

[illegible] "Sevillana" [illegible] items from [illegible] symphony programme; but, so long as [illegible] and callow sentimentalism are allowed to pass muster on such programmes, we cannot find it in our hearts to object to an occasional dash of genial frivolity. The piece is brilliant, musical, founded upon one of those seductive Spanish tunes that go far to reconcile us to the "higher uses" of the folk-song, full of dash and entrain. Mme. Melba sang it with the utmost brilliancy; no doubt she might have infused a thought more of sensuous seductiveness into her singing—but this might easily have toppled the whole thing over into the domain of the café-concert. But all that beauty of voice, admirable singing, and merely graceful charm could do she did triumphantly. The audience was not to be refused an encore; and, wisely judging that an encore is best when it is really an encore, Mme. Melba sang the "Sevillana" over again. The reception given the singer was of the very warmest.

The next programme—for Friday afternoon, Nov. 20, and Saturday evening, Nov. 21—is: Peter Cornelius, overture to "Der Barbier von Bagdad;" Chopin, Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in E minor, opus 11; Goldmark, entr'acte from "Heimchen am Heerd;" Dvorak, symphony No. 8, in E minor, "From the New World." Mr. Moritz Rosenthal will be the pianist. There is no rehearsal nor concert this week.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. 0., NO. 133.

TUESDAY, NOV. 10, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY IN BROOKLYN.

With Melba to Add to Its Strength It Fills the Academy of Music.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Nov. 9, 1896. Boston could not have furnished a more sympathetic audience for its unequalled Symphony orchestra than the Brooklyn Academy of Music did tonight. There was not a vacant seat in the house, and standing room was at a premium.

Mr. Paur must have felt himself eminently at home when he faced the tier upon tier of expectant faces, and, although tonight's large and brilliant house was in some measure due to the attraction of the great Australian prima donna, yet the success of the first Philharmonic leads one to conclude that Brooklyn is growing in appreciation of this highest form of music.

This occasion was notable as the first chance the admirers of Mme. Melba in this neighborhood have had this year of hearing her great voice. Its beauties were never displayed to better advantage. The selection given her was Mozart's aria, "L'Amero, Saro Costante," from "Il Re Pastore."

The violin obbligato was played by Mr. Franz Kneisel. So charming a vocal and instrumental combination evoked a tempest of applause that recalled the singer several times to the footlights. She merely bowed her thanks. The desire for a repetition was ignored.

The orchestral delights of the evening's entertainment were made up as follows, Mr. Paur's baton bringing out the varying coloring to the fullest tonic inspiration: Schumann's overture to "Genevela," in C minor, op. 81; Mozart's symphony in G minor; Max Schilling's prelude to act II., "Ingkelde"; Massenet's aria, "Sevillana," and Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," scored by Berlioz.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOV. 7, 1896.

MRS. BEACH'S SYMPHONY.

As she reponded from her seat in the center of Music Hall, at the third Boston Symphony matinee, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach had every reason to be proud of the reception accorded the first production of her Symphony; a beautiful work, especially in the second and third movements. The exquisite Siciliano rouses the question why the whole composition is called Gaelic; albeit other portions suggest the name.

The other instrumental numbers were the eight Brahms variations on the Haydn theme, Sancti Antoni (a name which seems somewhat a mystery), and the Der Freischutz overture. Campanari was the singer, lending his rich tones to the Vision aria, from Massenet's Herod, and to the Pagliacci Prologue, and receiving the warmest applause.

We can hardly do better than append to this report the program account of the Symphony and its composer, not yet thirty years old.

Mrs. Dr. Beach (Amy Marcy Cheney) was born at Henniker, Merrimack County, New Hampshire, September 5, 1867, of very old New England stock.

Her musical talent showed itself at the age of four, when musical ideas began to take definite shape in her mind; and she soon began little compositions. Even before she had taken any theoretical instruction, her writing was found to be musically correct. She had an accurate ear for absolute pitch. Her musical education was begun by her mother, who taught her the pianoforte; and this education was continued under C. L. Capen, Ernst Perabo and Carl Baermann. She also studied harmony under Prof. J. W. Hill of Wellesley College. After leaving his care she pursued extended and systematic courses of study by herself, in counterpoint, fugue, musical form and instrumentation, making translations of the treatises by Berlioz and Gevaërt. For the last fourteen years she has studied analytically all the best works performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, before, during, and after the performance; being advised to this course by Director Gericke. In this her accurate memory and keen ear were great helps.

Her first public appearance as a pianist was in the Boston Music Hall, October 24, 1883, she being then sixteen, when she played Moscheles's G minor Concerto, opus 60, with orchestra. At seventeen she played Chopin's F minor Concerto under Mr. Gericke, and the Mendelssohn D minor Concerto, with Theodore Thomas's orchestra, and she has given recitals of her own works.

With the exception of a couple of songs, all her compositions have been published since her marriage in 1885. The list includes a Mass in E-flat major, brought out by the Handel & Haydn Society in 1892; a scena and aria, Eilende Wolken, with orchestra, sung by Mrs. Alves at a concert of the New York Symphony Society, under Mr. Walter Damrosch, in the same year; a Festival Jubilate for chorus and orchestra, brought out under Mr. Thomas's direction, at the dedication of the Woman's Building at the Columbian Exposition in Chicago; besides over sixty shorter works for pianoforte, voice, violin, several cantatas. Her latest completed composition is a sonata for pianoforte and violin.

The first movement of her Symphony, Allegro con fuoco, in E minor (6-8 time), opens pianissimo, with a tremulous chromatic passage in the strings, which goes on gradually increasing in force and fulness of scoring until it reaches the fortissimo of the full orchestra. This passage may be regarded either as a first member of the first theme, or as a sort of introduction to it. After sixteen measures of this chomatic whizzing, the first theme proper sets in, first in the trumpets, then in the horns, then in the woodwind against a pizzicato accompaniment in the strings. It is developed at some length by the full orchestra (with a sparing use of the trombones, however) and makes way after a measure of ritardando (2-2 time), for a lighter first subsidiary, in which the skipping rhythm of the dotted triplet plays a prominent part. This subsidiary (also in E minor) begins piano and is developed in crescendo to fortissimo. A descending arpeggio passage in the strings leads to a reminiscence of the first theme in the horn, and then the chromatic passage returns, Poco piu tranquilla, in the strings, leading to another hint at the first theme, and then to the entrance of the melodious second theme in the clarinet, the strings keeping up their subdued chromatic whizzing. The second theme is, in its turn, briefly developed. Its tonality is very shifting, beginning in G major, then passing through B major, B minor, C minor, B-flat major, and other keys, until it comes to a closing cadence in G major. It is followed by a brisk little conclusion theme of Gaelic folk-song character (in G major) which enters first in the oboe, then is answered canonically by the flute, and dies away in the strings.

On a return to Tempo primo, the free fantasia begins with the whizzing chromatic phrase of the strings, and is carried through at great length and with much contrapuntal elaboration. It ends with quite the Beethovenish "moment of exhaustion," after which a recitative-like solo of the clarinet leads over to the third part of the movement. This is developed pretty closely on the lines of the first part, and is followed by an extended coda, with which the movement ends.

The second movement opens with a graceful melody, alla Siciliana, in F major (12-8 time), in which the characteristic rhythm and tranquil, flowing grace of the Siciliano are strongly marked. It begins in the horn and strings, and is then further developed by the oboe, clarinets, and bassoons, the flute and horns coming in at one time as the piano swells to forte. Then follows a brisk, tricksy scherzo movement, Allegro vivace in F major (2-4 time), with nimbly scurrying violins, which is very fully developed, little hints at the preceding Siciliano melody cropping up every now and then. Then the slower Siciliano returns in its original shape, and is more extendedly developed than at first, a few measures of the bright Allegro coming back at the end to close the movement. This movement is the one which corresponds to the scherzo in the traditional symphonic form. Considering the character of its two contrasted sections—the slow Siciliano and the brisk, sprightly Allegro vivace—one might almost call it a scherzo between two trios, instead of two scherzos with a trio between them.

The third movement, Lento con molto espressione in E minor (6-4 time), opens with some contrapuntal preluding in the wind instruments, kettle drums, and basses pizzicati, after which a solo violin leads over to the entrance of the first theme. This, a melody of strongly marked Gaelic character,—having the characteristic Keltic closing cadence, from the third degree of the scale to the tonic,—is exposed in elaborate part-writing by the muted strings, with a solo violin and cello, the latter taking the melody. It is followed by a more strenuous second theme, which opens as the little prelude as the beginning of the movement did, and is developed at considerable length. A third theme,—of well-marked folksong character,—which appears after a while in the strings, is in reality nothing else than a counter-theme to the first. The two are much worked up in conjunction; when the counter-theme makes its first appearance in the first violins, the theme is in the 'celli and basses. Then theme and counter-theme appear in the two clarinets. Still the counter-theme is at times treated entirely by itself, and so may not inaptly be called a true third theme. The development and working-out of this movement are extremely elaborate.

The fourth movement, Allegro molto in E minor (2-2 time) is, like the first, in the sonata form. It opens brilliantly with the energetic first theme fortissimo in the full orchestra; and the development of this theme is so protracted and elaborate that it has all the character of actual working out. The same may be said of the development of the martial, folksong-like second theme that follows it,—appearing first in the violas, celli, and bassoons in the dominant, B major, which is also worked out as soon as exposed. There is no real conclusion theme, and the free fantasia is comparatively short, as is not infrequently found to be the case in movements where the themes are very elaborately treated as soon as presented, so that the working out comes largely in the first and third parts, instead of being confined to the free fantasia and coda. In the coda an augmentation of the second theme returns fortissimo in all the strings, except double basses, in unison (not in octaves) reinforced by the trumpets in unison or octaves, against full harmony in the wind instruments; after which the movement comes to a free close in E major.

This symphony is scored for 2 flutes, 2 oboes, 2 clarinets, 2 bassoons, 4 horns, 2 trumpets, 3 trombones, 1 bass-tuba, a set of 3 kettle-drums, and the usual strings. The score bears no dedication.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Volkmann: Overture to Shakspeare's "Richard III," opus 68.
Mozart: Aria, "L'amerò, sarò costante," from "Il Rè Pastore."
Violin obbligato by Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Max Schillings: Prelude to Act II. of "Ingwelde."
(First time at these concerts.)
Massenet: Sevillana from "Don César de Bazan."
(First time in Boston.)
Schumann: Symphony No. 2, in C major, opus 61.
Madame Melba was the singer.

Volkmann's "Richard III." overture has been heard here time and again before; somewhat "oftener than in its turn," as some of us might think, for the work is none of the greatest. Enormous sincerity Volkmann certainly had, and no little skill; but these qualities are not quite enough to achieve immortality by themselves, and it has seemed at times as if this overture were in danger of having a rather factitious immortality foisted upon it by overmany performances. But a thoroughly fine performance can cover a multitude of sins, sins far more heinous and numerous than can be laid to the charge of this overture; and the performance last Saturday evening can fairly be called ideal. It almost supplied what of greatness the work itself lacked. We cannot remember ever before hearing this "Richard III." of old Volkmann's placed in so entirely and genially favorable a light. Mr. Paur is to be congratulated upon a wonderfully fine reading.

No musical cyclopædia we know of is young enough to include the name of Max Schillings. He is known to habitual readers of musical periodicals as the composer of "Ingwelde"; and that is about all. The excerpt from that opera played last Saturday tells us somewhat more about him, though so short a story probably does not contain the whole truth. But, judging from this one sample, we should say that Mr. Schillings is an out-and-out Wagnerian (on principle), with a strong touch of Liszt in him (by natural affinity). He is evidently fond of those astonishing modulations which Liszt used to delight in dragging in by the very hair; those modulations which seem to make music actually "see double." The prelude tries as hard as music can to show us the young Skald, Bran, rising to his feet in the midst of a banquet and singing a song in praise of Ingwelde, his brother's betrothed. We could not, however, escape the impression that the "noisy merriment" at the banquet had been carried so far that, when Bran rose to his feet, he saw two Ingweldes before him. The composition gives evidence of no little skill in orchestration and thematic development, according to the modern manner. But seldom have we heard anything the expression of which seemed so foiled by oppressive self-consciousness. The performance was wonderfully fine.

After this decking-out a mediocre and a pretty feeble work in the most glowing colors by sheer perfection of reading and execution, we had a moment of misgiving as to what would become of Schumann's great C major symphony. For it is a too common experience that, when small works are superlatively well given, greater works are unduly slighted. But the event proved that our misgiving was superfluous. The great symphony was superbly, beautifully, grandly played from beginning to end! Ah! you younger ones who can remember no further back than Mr. Gericke's time, you little know the trepidation with which a performance of this symphony was looked forward to in the earlier days here; how hard it was then to believe that Schumann's orchestration was really the best-fitting dress for Schumann's thought! It is hard for you to imagine what absolute rags and tatters of music that first movement used to sound like, how everything would seem to go to pieces in the free fantasia! It is all different now; our orchestra has mastered Schumann's peculiar scoring, and shows it to be the thing it really is. Mr. Paur and his men have added one more to their list of triumphs. Once more we revert to Saint-Saëns's astonishing expression of opinion anent this symphony: "If the audience"—at a certain Conservatoire concert in Paris—"remained cold after the Finale, they but showed their good taste." What could Saint-Saëns have been thinking of? Can it be that he found in this Finale wellnigh everything that a Frenchman cannot do? To us it is the greatest symphonic finale since those to Beethoven's "Eroica" and C minor! It "breaks through the form," to be sure; but where was there ever a grander instance of a composer's breaking through a form, not from any wilful attempt to discover new musical domains, but in response to the impulse of sheer genius and a fine appreciation of the very necessities of the case?

Mme. Melba is much to be thanked for introducing us to the beautiful aria from Mozart's "Rè Pastore." The version she uses contains an overlong and modern-sounding duet-cadenza for voice and solo violin, and departs in one particular from Mozart's original score. But the substitution of two clarinets for Mozart's two English-horns was probably made with an eye to the practical exigencies of concert-touring—Robert Franz sometimes allowed himself to make the same substitution for old Bach's oboi da caccia—and it may well be argued that a cadenza must be modern-sounding, to fulfil its mission as a cadenza. The air itself shows Mozart at his best in a very characteristic vein; and, as for the scoring of the accompaniment, no more divinely beautiful piece of orchestral coloring can be found in all Berlioz and Wagner. Mme. Melba was in perfect voice and sang the aria most admirably; if not with the profoundest depth of emotional expression, yet with a purity of feeling for musical beauty that is rare nowadays. The composition itself is a classical aria, and should be classically sung; Mme. Melba sang it classically, in the best sense of the word, but without any tinge of merely academic rigidity. Mr. Kneisel's playing of the violin obbligato was perfection itself.

Massenet's "Sevillana" might be objected to as rather a frivolous item in a symphony programme; but, so long as incongruous strenuousness and callow sentimentalism are allowed to pass muster on such programmes, we cannot find it in our hearts to object to an occasional dash of genial frivolity. The piece is brilliant, musical, founded upon one of those seductive Spanish tunes that go far to reconcile us to the "higher uses" of the folk-song, full of dash and entrain. Mme. Melba sang it with the utmost brilliancy; no doubt she might have infused a thought more of sensuous seductiveness into her singing—but this might easily have toppled the whole thing over into the domain of the café-concert. But all that beauty of voice, admirable singing, and merely graceful charm could do she did triumphantly. The audience was not to be refused an encore; and, wisely judging that an encore is best when it is really an encore, Mme. Melba sang the "Sevillana" over again. The reception given the singer was of the very warmest.

The next programme—for Friday afternoon, Nov. 20, and Saturday evening, Nov. 21—is: Peter Cornelius, overture to "Der Barbier von Bagdad;" Chopin, Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in E minor, opus 11; Goldmark, entr'acte from "Heimchen am Heerd;" Dvorak, symphony No. 8, in E minor, "From the New World." Mr. Moritz Rosenthal will be the pianist. There is no rehearsal nor concert this week.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. C., NO. 133.

TUESDAY, NOV. 10, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY IN BROOKLYN.

With Melba to Add to Its Strength It Fills the Academy of Music.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Nov. 9, 1896. Boston could not have furnished a more sympathetic audience for its unequalled Symphony orchestra than the Brooklyn Academy of Music did tonight. There was not a vacant seat in the house, and standing room was at a premium.

Mr. Paur must have felt himself eminently at home when he faced the tier upon tier of expectant faces, and, although tonight's large and brilliant house was in some measure due to the attraction of the great Australian prima donna, yet the success of the first Philharmonic leads one to conclude that Brooklyn is growing in appreciation of this highest form of music.

This occasion was notable as the first chance the admirers of Mme. Melba in this neighborhood have had this year of hearing her great voice. Its beauties were never displayed to better advantage. The selection given her was Mozart's aria, "L'Amero, Saro Costante," from "Il Re Pastore."

The violin obbligato was played by Mr. Franz Kneisel. So charming a vocal and instrumental combination evoked a tempest of applause that recalled the singer several times to the footlights. She merely bowed her thanks. The desire for a repetition was ignored.

The orchestral delights of the evening's entertainment were made up as follows, Mr. Paur's baton bringing out the varying coloring to the fullest tonic inspiration: Schumann's overture to "Genevela," in C minor, op. 81; Mozart's symphony in G minor; Max Schilling's prelude to act II., "Ingkelde"; Massenet's aria, "Sevillana," and Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," scored by Berlioz.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1896.

The program of the third Symphony concert, October 31, was as follows:

Symphony, E minor, Gaelic, op. 32	Mrs. Beach
(MS. First time.)
Vision Fugitive, from Hérodiade	Massenet
Mr. Campanari.
Variations on a theme by Haydn	Brahms
Prologue to Pagliacci	Leoncavallo
Mr. Campanari.
Overture, Der Freischütz	Weber

Let me add to the names of Mrs. Farrenc and Alice May Meadows White, mentioned in THE MUSICAL COURIER of the 4th, these names of women who wrote symphonies:

Otto Gumprecht in his essay Die Frauen in der Musik, published in Neue Musikalische Charakterbilder (Leipsic, 1876), says on page 10: "The older Berlin lovers of music remember well Emilie Meyer and her smooth string quartets and symphonies written after the model of Haydn." I have been unable to find anywhere a sketch of the composer or a record of the performance of her works.

Aline Hundt was a pianist, a pupil of Liszt. In the spring of 1871 she conducted the performance of her symphony in G minor at Berlin. Her skill as composer and conductor was praised by critics who went to scoff. I believe she died a few years afterward.

A symphony in D major, by Miss H. Edith Green, was produced in London April 30, 1895. A gushing reviewer wrote of it: "Titania in the Midsummer Night's Dream called for 'Music! such as charmeth sleep.' Had she been present at the performance of this symphony Queen Titania would, apparently, have been amply satisfied."

I am told that Miss E. M. Smyth, whose mass in D was produced in London in 1893, under royal patronage, has written a symphony of unusual merit. I have been unable to find any record of performance.

An andante pastorale, "fragment of a symphony," by Augusta Holmès, was played in Paris June 14, 1887. Was the symphony ever finished?

No doubt Mr. Willhartitz, of Los Angeles, is able to furnish the names of other female composers of symphonies. I have a vague recollection of a list published by him in THE MUSICAL COURIER of 1892, but the volume in which the list was published (as I think) is not in the Public Library, although the set of THE MUSICAL COURIER is nearly complete.

* * *

In speaking of a symphony by a woman, there is the temptation, first, to praise it lightly as "very good for a woman." But such patronage is impertinent and a shirking of a duty.

There is, then, the temptation to commend the "endeavor." To a composer such commendation must be galling, for it is tantamount to saying that the result is insignificant. What Edgar Allan Poe said of a certain kind of poetical achievement may be well applied to a musical composition. "If by 'sustained effort' any little gentleman has accomplished an epic, let us frankly commend him for the effort—if this, indeed, be a thing commendable—but let us forbear praising the epic on the effort's account. It is to be hoped that common sense, in the time to come, will prefer deciding upon a work of art rather by the impression it makes—by the effect it produces—than by the time it took to impress the effect, or by the amount of 'sustained effort' which had been found necessary in effecting the impression. The fact is, that perseverance is one thing and genius quite another; nor can all the quarterlies in Christendom confound them."

It is now over a week since Mrs. Beach's symphony was played in Music Hall. Much of it is still fresh in the memory; and of how many works can you say the same after one hearing?

The first movement is an allegro con fuoco. The themes are not of considerable value, but the treatment of them exhibits pleasantly the technical skill of the composer, and, more than this, stimulates the imagination of the hearer. I do not know what Mrs. Beach was thinking of when she worked away at the first movement. She was probably concerned with writing music. But a mood was created in the breast of the hearer; there was a decided musical atmosphere about him.

> "And 'mid this tumult Kubla heard from far > Ancestral voices prophesying war."

The second movement opens with a delightful melody, alla Siciliana, in F major. The tune is developed by the oboe, clarinets, bassoons. A lively movement follows, developed at considerable length. There are hints of the first theme. It finally returns in its original shape, is treated elaborately, and then a few measures of the allegro bring the close. As Mr. Apthorp says, "one might almost call it (the movement) a scherzo between two trios, instead of two scherzos with a trio between them."

This movement is thoroughly admirable, a joy to the amateur and the musician.

The third movement is a lento con molto espressione in E minor. I shall not debate the question whether the third theme in it is in reality nothing but a counter-theme to the first. It seemed to me that the movement as a whole was eminently Gaelic, dull and intolerably long winded.

But the finale, allegro molto, E minor, abounds in passages that proclaim loudly a breadth of conception, a skill in carrying out a liberal design, a mastery of climax that are not always found in modern symphonies. Themes that arrest the attention are treated in heroic spirit. The climax is inevitable and irresistible.

And this music sounds well. The jest is truth; there is music that is better than it sounds. How shockingly dressed in orchestral robes are certain fine ideas of Schumann! In this symphony by Mrs. Beach there is the evidence of orchestral instinct rather than the suspicion of loose experimenting. She writes as though she were sure of the effects she had thought out. You do not feel that piano music has been fitted painfully to the orchestra. You do not recall the old story of the bassoon player in the negro minstrel show, who when asked what he was going to play answered, "Anything that comes out."

The only trace of woman that I find in this symphony is the occasional boisterousness in orchestration. A woman who writes for orchestra thinks "I must be virile at any cost." As Saint-Saëns once wrote of Augusta Holmès, "Women are singular creatures when they concern themselves seriously with art; they seem first of all preoccupied with the wish to make you forget they are women by showing an exuberant virility. Nor do they stop to think that it is this very preoccupation which betrays the woman."

It seems to me that this symphony is the fullest exhibition so far of Mrs. Beach's talent. It should be ranked above her mass, which was performed by the Händel and Haydn. It displays a musical imagination that I have not been able to recognize in preceding works by her. There are elemental qualities, swing, a force that approaches grandeur in the finale, that show conclusively originality and profundity of thought, breadth of style, and a vigorous imagination controlled by skill and artistic feeling.

Applauded heartily, she bowed modestly her acknowledgments from the floor of the hall.

* * *

Mr. Campanari was welcomed with extraordinary warmth, and the saw about the prophet was set at naught. His voice grows steadily in power; he shows a nicer appreciation of finesse; he is more the master of the crescendo and the supreme moment than when he first left the Symphony Orchestra for the lyric stage. His gain in nuancirung was clearly noticed in the air from Massenet's opera. M. Leoncavallo's prologue, the dramatic points, were accentuated without exaggeration, and in the great passage beginning "E voi, piuttosto che le nostre povere gabane d'istrioni" the noble organ of the singer, inspired by the unfeigned passion of the man, produced an overwhelming effect.

The accompaniments to these airs were read without intelligence by Mr. Paur, and played in a slovenly manner by the orchestra. Mr. Paur has many excellent qualities as a conductor. As a rule his accompaniments are unsteady, insecure and too loud.

The program of the fourth Symphony concert last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Overture to Shakespeare's Richard III., op. 73	Volkmann
Aria, L'amerò sarò Costante, from Il Re Pastore	Mozart
(Violin obligato, Mr. Franz Kneisel.)
Prelude to Act II. Ingwelde	Schillings
(First time at these concerts.)
Sevillana from Don César de Bazan	Massenet
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 2, in C major, op. 61	Schumann

Melba was most enthusiastically applauded, and—rare thing at a Symphony concert and supposedly against the rules and ordinances—her second selection was encored.

She deserved the applause, for her golden voice was displayed in its purity and freshness in the dull tune of Mozart, which served chiefly to exhibit the beautiful tones and the legato of the singer. And the bravura shown in Massenet's cheap, tawdry piece was sure and brilliant.

I was reading the other night the Memoirs and Letters of Metastasio, edited in 1796, by the solemn Charles Burney, Mus. D., F. R. S. The abbé thought well of his libretto, Il Re Pastore, which was first set to music by Giuseppe Bono (or Bonno), 1751, and afterward by Agricola, Sarti, Hasse, Gluck (1756), Jommelli, Zonca, Piccini, Richter, Guglielmi, Uttini, Mozart (1775), Rauzzini, Parenti and Dos Santos, and no doubt by others. Listen to the abbé: "It is gay, tender, amorous, short." Bono wrote the music for four female sopranos and a tenor.

I know of few more entertaining volumes than these same Memoirs of Metastasio. Do you remember his abuse of fashionable singers of his period? "When they have played their symphony with the throat, they believe they have fulfilled all the duties of their art. Hence the audience keep their hearts in the most perfect tranquillity, and expect the performers merely to tickle their ears. For this purpose there is no occasion for good dramas; on the contrary, I should wish that not only words were banished from our theatres, but the whole alphabet, except a pair of vowels."

This tune of Mozart sung by Melba was first sung by a castrate. I do not see why it interested her, for it is of the younger Mozart, not the man of Figaro or Don Giovanni. She adorned it with a cadenza, as was eminently proper; for the most ridiculous superstition I know is that which forbids the introduction of ornamentation in airs written by Mozart in Italian style for Italian singers. I believe she used the cadenza for voice and violin that is in Lauterbach's arrangement for voice, piano and violin obligato. But the air is so dull, so academically dull! The sacred name of Mozart is enough. If the tune had been sung by an inferior singer and had bored you would have heard "The air is divine; but she made nothing of it." Whereas if the air were by Mr. Jones, of Ascutneyville, Vt., you would not hear it in the concert hall.

Et vous, gens de l'art,
Pour que j'en jouisse
Quand c'est du Mozart
Que l'on m'avertisse!

* * *

Mr. Apthorp was very precise in the program book when he came to speak of the Sevillana.

> This Sevillana—Allegro brillante in D major (4-4 time)—is taken from the incidental music written by Massenet, for the revival of Adolphe d'Ennery's Don César de Bazan, at the Théâtre Français in Paris. Constant Coquelin was the Don César. In its original form this Sevillana was an orchestral movement with prominent parts for two solo flutes. Afterward Massenet rearranged it for a soprano voice and orchestra, especially for Mme. Melba; it has, I believe, never been sung except by her.

But, my dear Mr. Apthorp, just when was this play revived at the Théâtre-Français? And are you cock-sure that Coquelin ever played Don César in Paris? Soubies, in his chart of the Théâtre-Français, does not seem to agree with you. By the way, Massenet wrote an opera Don César de Bazan, which was given November 30, 1872, at the Opéra Comique, Paris. Bouhy was Don César, Priola was Maritana, Galli-Marié was Lazarille. The opera failed dismally. The entr'acte between the second and third acts is a Sevillana. I do not say that Coquelin never played Don César in Paris; I only ask, in a spirit of love, when did he play it? And as the play was not originally given at the Théâtre-Français—but never mind. The tune is not worth talking about. There is no tune. And the orchestration is vulgar. I prefer even the Massenet known as the Wagner of the cabinets particuliers to the Massenet of such inconsequential jingle.

* * *

Schilling's prelude to Act II. of Ingwelde pleased me not. I had ploughed my way heroically through Mr. Ernst Otto Nodnagel's analysis, which was published last year in the Allgemein Musik-Zeitung, and I gathered that the prelude tells of Bran, a Skald, who finally killed somebody with an axe. I may be wrong; perhaps Bran was killed by somebody with an axe. At any rate, the prelude is appropriately named. I prefer my Wagner undiluted. The prelude is a series of alternate reminiscences and gropings. The themes are neither strong nor beautiful, and the treatment is uninteresting and apparently experimental.

Nor can I swing the hat for Volkmann's Richard III. overture. The wailing and gnashing of teeth are cruelly prolonged. Gloucester himself would have cried "Enough!" As for the battle music, it is panoramic, and you see the man in his shirt sleeves who turns the crank. And what is The Campbells Are Coming doing at Bosworth Field? Johnny Dugan would be as appropriate.

The orchestral feature of the concert was the soul-uplifting performance of the sublime adagio from Schumann's C major symphony. The hearer was repaid for sitting through the first two movements.

* * *

The program of the next Symphony concert, November 21, will be as follows:

Cornelius, overture, Barber of Bagdad; Chopin, concerto for piano in E minor, No. 1; Goldmark, entr'acte, Heimchen am Herd; Dvorák, symphony, From the New World.

Mr. Rosenthal will be the pianist.

PHILIP HALE.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOV. 14, 1896.

Of course Melba sang superbly at the Fourth Symphony Concert though an aria from Mozart's unfamiliar opera, Il Re Pastore, even with Kneisel's beautiful violin obligato, may not be best fitted to rouse the audience; nor yet the Seviliana (new here) from Massenet's Don Cesar de Bazan. All admission tickets were sold as soon as the office was open; and as for seats, even those under the rear gallery brought two and three dollars apiece. The overture was Volkmann's Richard Third; the Symphony, Schumann's Second, in C; the novelty, Max Schilling's Prelude to the second act of Ingwelde.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1896.

Itinerary.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA THIS WEEK.

Leave Philadelphia, Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Twenty-fourth and Chestnut streets, Wednesday, to-day, at 10:30 A. M.
Arrive Baltimore, Camden Street Station, 12:47 P. M.
CARROLLTON HOTEL.
1,417th concert at Music Hall at 8:15 P. M.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, Thursday, November 12, at 4:10 P. M.
Arrive Washington at 5:15 P. M.
1,418th concert at Columbia Theatre (formerly Metzerott's Hall) at 8:15 P. M.
Leave Washington, Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, at 12 midnight.
Arrive New York Friday, November 13, at 7 A. M.
Rehearsal at Metropolitan Opera House at 12 o'clock noon.
1,419th concert at Metropolitan Opera House at 8:15 P. M.
Leave New York, Grand Central Depot, Saturday, November 14, at 9 A. M.
Arrive Springfield at 12:45 P. M.
MASSASOIT HOTEL.
1,420th concert at City Hall at 8 P. M.
Arrive Boston at 7 A. M. Sunday, November 15. (Boston and Albany Depot.)

The North American
Daily Advertiser and United States Gazette.

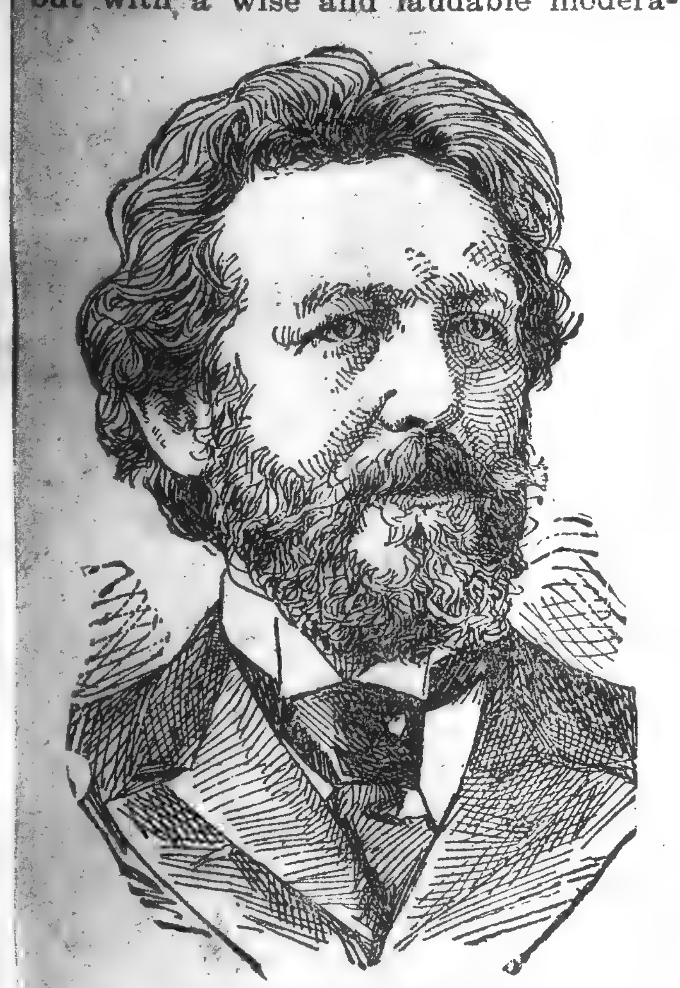
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1896.

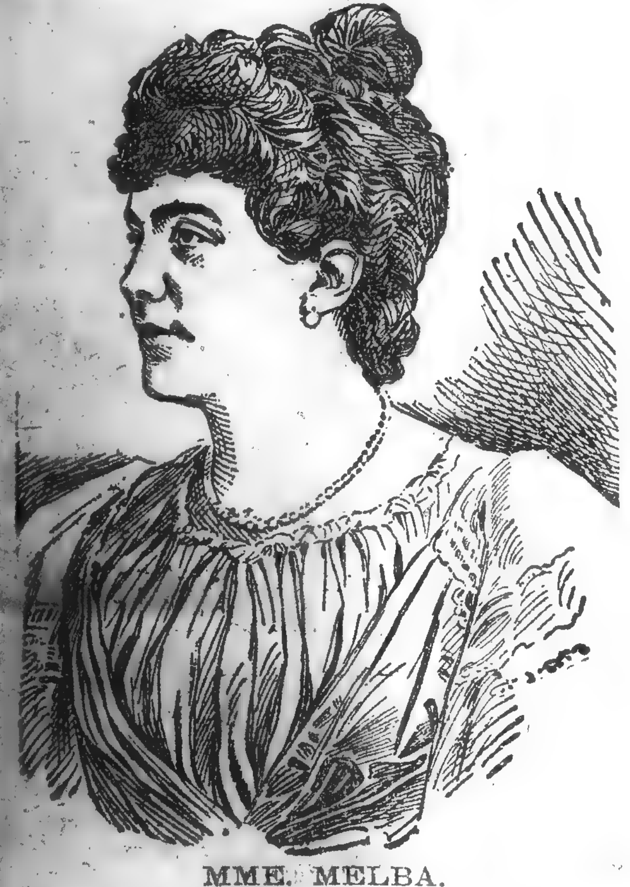
MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

A Crowded and Brilliant Audience to Hear Mme. Melba and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There was a great crowd at the Academy of Music last night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, gave its opening concert for the season, and Madame Melba, the distinguished singer, made her first appearance in Philadelphia since her brilliantly successful engagements under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis, in Paris, London and other European capitals. The pressure for admission to the Academy was very great, but with a wise and laudable moderation the managers of the orchestra refused to permit the entrance of more than the standing room would safely and comfortably accommodate, and so, while hundreds of people were turned away, the seat-holders sustained comparatively little inconvenience. There have been occasions when to get to one's seat was almost an impossibility, but it was not so last night, although that was not the fault of the public. The concert itself was an exceptionally charming one. The symphony, which was that by Mozart, in G minor, was played to perfection, and Mozart's music is so lucid, so elegant, so polished, and so exact, that to play it well is no mean test of orchestral ability. The grace and sweetness and finish of last night's performance could not have been excelled. The other orchestral numbers were Goldmark's glowing overture "Sakantala," Weber's brilliant prelude to "Abu Hassan" and Berlioz's stately setting of Weber's familiar "Invitation to the Waltz." Mme. Melba sang with the utmost suavity of style and incomparable art an air, with violin obligato, from one of Mozart's long since forgotten operas, "The Shepherd King," and by way of contrast an extremely vivid and vital scena from Massenet's new opera "Don Caesar de Bazan." Her delivery of both numbers, in beauty of tone, eloquence of feeling, and skill of execution, belonged to the highest order of vocal achievement, and it was vociferously applauded, an encore of the Massenet number being insisted upon and obtained. Altogether it was a great occasion.



EMIL PAUR, Conductor.



MME. MELBA.

The [illegible] Press

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Crowded Academy Greets the Orchestra and Madame Melba.

While it is unquestionably true that the unusual season sale of tickets for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is due in large measure to the greater interest in the better musical things which now marks Philadelphia, it was clearly apparent last night that the crowded Academy of Music was more or less of the nature of a tribute to Melba's divine art of singing. The bright new decorations of the Academy and the crowded house gave the first concert of the sixteenth season a rather gala air, which was more or less in keeping with the programme, which, beginning with Goldmark's poetic and richly colored "Sakuntala," closed with Weber's sensuous "Invitation to the Dance," so effectively scored for the programme by Berlioz.

Of Melba's singing there is little new to say. One of the charms of the performance last night lay, however, in the contrast of the two selections she rendered. The first, a Mozart aria from "Il Re Pastore," gave an opportunity to display the flexibility of her voice in an aria of the old idyllic Italian type, and this she handled with great simplicity and rendered, ably seconded by Mr. Kneisel on the violin, all the characteristic Mozartean runs in a delightful manner. The aria seems, perhaps, a little thin to-day, but the beauty of it, as interpreted by a Melba, is unquestioned. Still the feature of the night was Massenet's "Sevillana," for in this not only was the opportunity given her to display her musical virtuosity, but it requires a dramatic treatment, and Massenet is not Bizet and Melba is not Calve. The "Sevillana" was a triumphant success, and naturally had to be repeated. In writing this clever song with the fire, the language, the melancholy of Spanish love well brought out, Massenet has given Melba a concert piece which shows her at her best, and her best is something worth while.

The orchestral part of the programme represented well-chosen selections, if one excepts the Weber overture to his operetta "Abu Hassen," written when he was twenty-four, and while brief and merry not particularly interesting. The other Weber number, "The Invitation to the Dance," which is a schoolboy memory with others beside Du Maurier as narrated in "The Martians," is a concert piece that at the Boston Symphony's hands never fails. It foreshadows the best dance music of the day as the color in "Abu Hassan" and other of Weber's overtures foreshadow the rich dramatic work of the present. As a contrast the "Sakuntala" overture of Goldmark, with its wonderful variation, as a tone picture was an exquisite opening piece and exquisitely done. The symphony was Mozart's G minor and was handled in the dainty manner its smoothly flowing movements call for. Taking it all in all, with Melba the concert was one of lightness, brightness and rhythmic beauty.

The Times

TWELVE PAGES

PHILADELPHIA, NOVEMBER 11, 1896.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

The First Symphony Concert, With Melba, Draws a Brilliant Crowd.

Whether it was a tribute to the Boston Orchestra or a tribute to Madame Melba, or whether is was really a demonstration of musical interest, or all together, there was a great audience at the Academy of Music last night and many late-comers were turned away. And everybody enjoyed the concert, for Mr. Paur has not often given so bright a programme. The symphony was Mozart in G minor, one of those compositions so perfect in proportion, so clear in musical thought, so direct and pure in expression, that it is impossible to spoil it by any affectation of "reading." It was exquisitely played with a refinement of execution that was entirely delightful. The symphony was preceded by Goldmark's "Sakuntela" overture, and in the second part the orchestra played Weber's bright little Oriental bit, the "Abu Hassan" overture, and the immortal "Invitation a la Valse" as scored by Berlioz, an always fascinating work that beautifully displayed the suavity and richness and absolute exactness of the orchestra.

Madame Melba's selections had a corresponding range. They were Armintas' love song from Mozart's "Re Pastore," with violin obligato by Mr. Kneisel, and a brilliant Sevillana by Massenet. She sang the Mozart aria with a delicious purity of intonation and a calm and dignified style that seemed really ideal, while the Spanish song, with glittering staccato passages and scales, displayed the brilliancy of her voice and execution in a way that aroused great enthusiasm. Her voice grows richer and she has never sung with fuller mastery of her art.

The new electric lights in the Academy have substituted quite a dazzling effect for the former gloom of the auditorium and for the first time the audience in circle and balcony is brilliantly displayed. It is a little fatiguing to the eyes for two hours together, but the illumination will greatly vivify the eutr'-actes of the opera.

Philadelphia Inquirer

WEDNESDAY - - NOVEMBER 11, 189

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Melba Receives an Ovation on the Opening of the Concert Season.

It was a Melba night at the Academy last night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its twelfth season before an audience never exceeded in this city on a similar occasion. It was the 1416th performance by the orchestra and the 57th in this city, and the record of those fifty-seven concerts should be writ in gold. It was a curious program—in some respects a concession. Mr. Paur is a singular conductor and a more singular program maker. Sometimes he has failed to gauge his audience. Last night he held it fairly. Goldmark, Mozart, Weber and Massenet make a curious medley—one that might have given room for discussion on its purely orchestral phases. But Melba—really we are rapidly developing a Melba cult that bids fair to throw the Patti cult into the shade. Come, let us reason together. In ten years Patti has not filled two houses here in any one season. The name of Melba means the utmost capacity of the Academy on any occasion. It can be safely stated that the musical appreciation of this city grows yearly and there is no escaping the conclusion that to-day Melba is more popular than Patti has been for some years. In fact there were more heart burnings last night over the failure to get seats than has occurred in this city for a long time. Let us dismiss all comparisons and frankly say that to-day Melba is the most popular singer in America. Let us be truthful also and say she deserves it. Max O'Rell tells with glee of the cads of Melbourne who would not pay four shillings to hear Melba when she was one of their own people, whereas to-day seats could be sold for twenty pounds sterling to hear her—now that her fame has gone out through all the earth. There is this to be truthfully said of the peerless nightingale of the Antipodes. She sings better every year. The first time she was heard here there was alleged a lack of warmth—a deficiency of color in her notes. To-day the tones are golden and never fell a more brilliant string of pearls from her throat than last night. This may seem hyperbole, but the man who would attempt to put a cold, calculating, relative value on her notes deserves the condemnation of Lorenzo. He is "fit for treasons, stratagems and spoils." The worst impulses of our lives are those that prompt us to restrain our full measure of appreciation. The man that hath music in himself was last night filled with delight at hearing Melba's notes once more.

The aria was rich, refined and rapturous. That Mr. Kneisel added materially to its enjoyment was not only true, but was insisted on by Melba by her insisting on everyone of her recalls in taking him by the hand and compelling him to share the honors. Though his were the less, and though he is essentially modest, this little touch of nature, this unusual generosity of a great artiste, brought down the house again and again. If this be called policy, would more artistes were capable of it, but it was delicate and proper. It cost her no title of applause, but added to the measure of the woman. The brilliant solo from Massenet was a more florid work, a more showy production, but not more musically enjoyable than the aria. No apology is offered for encomiums on this singer, for the results more than justify what feeble words can say.

The orchestral work rested largely on the Mozart Symphony in G minor. It is true that this work is somewhat out of date, according to the views of advanced musical opinion, but Mr. Paur has given us so much of the modern symphonic school that the return to the classic symphony was most satisfactory. Ancient, if you please, it was satisfying and the wealth of musical beauty is not to be denied.

The whole concert was one of unusual satisfaction. This is the program:

Karl Goldmark, overture to "Sakuntala," op. 13; Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, aria, "L'amero, saro Costante," violin obligato by Mr. Franz Kneisel; Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, symphony in G minor (Koechel, 550); Karl Maria von Weber, overture, "Abu Hassan;" Jules Massenet, "Sevillana," from "Don Caesar de Bazan;" Karl Maria von Weber "Invitation to the Dance."

THE RECORD

Philadelphia, November 11, 1896.

Melba and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Melba was the star of the Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music last evening, with which the twelfth Philadelphia season of that superb orchestra was inaugurated. The Australian diva sang Aminta's aria, "L'amero, saro costante" (I will love her, I will be constant), from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore" (The Shepherd King), in true classic style, and Jules Massenet's "Sevillana," arranged expressly for her voice from his "Don Cesar de Bazan" music, with happy romantic effect. And yet it must be confessed, despite the ovation which was the peerless prima donna's first welcome of the new season, that these two arias—meagre morsels of melody in themselves—scarcely revealed her glorious soprano at its best. Her sparkling coloratura effects were missed. To be sure, the "Sevillana" had the genuine Spanish cachet, and Melba sang it with unusual spirit; yet it was rather odd to imagine her as a Carmen for the nonce warbling to the clapping of the castanets. Her voice lacks the sensuous, caressing charm indispensable to such music. Nevertheless it was a pleasure to hear the full-throated Australian nightingale singing two such strikingly contrasted numbers so different from her characteristic music. The Mozart aria had a peculiarly touching grace. As for the Symphony Orchestra it achieved a signal triumph in its playing of the Mozart symphony in G minor. The andante movement was given the noblest symphonic interpretation yet revealed by Conductor Paur. The whole composition was given an expression worthy of one of those three farewell symphonies of Mozart, of which the enthusiastic Ambros has exclaimed: "Considered as pure music, it is hardly worth while to ask whether the world possesses anything more perfect." Jahn calls the G minor symphony "A work of art exhausting its topic," a verdict in which every listener last night must have concurred. Goldmark's richly colored overture to "Sakuntala," Weber's fantastic overture to his comic singspiel," "Abu Hassan," and his delightful "Invitation to the Dance," the musical apotheosis of the waltz, formed the lighter embroidery to a splendidly fulfilled programme.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Wednesday, Nov. 11,

ENTERTAINMENTS.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Music does not necessarily spell poverty in these progressive days. That golden fact was instanced very conclusively last evening, when an overflowing audience, brilliant in the best sense of the word, assembled in the Academy of Music, to hear, enjoy and inwardly digest the first concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's local series. Here was practical musical appreciation with a vengeance; no playing to empty benches, but rather a gala scene denoting that art has its remunerative as well as its discouraging side. Poor Mozart, could he have returned to earth to see such a house, brought together, in part, by a desire to listen to one of his immortal symphonies (the noble G minor), he must have thought grimly, perhaps bitterly, of the days when music meant to him all the trials to which insufficient income is heir. Indeed, it was during the period which gave birth to this very G minor symphony that the great composer wrote to a friend asking plaintively for some money, and speaking of the gloomy thoughts which he "must repel with all his might." And when death closed his sufferings—sufferings none the less acute because they were induced by poverty—the body of mighty Mozart was deposited in a pauper's grave.

These are rather gloomy reflections, however, considering the air of enjoyment that pervaded the audience of last night, and they need not be followed further. Rather is it more appropriate to record the admirable impression made by Mr. Paur's forces, the welcome presence of the limpid-voiced Melba as soloist and the general interest of the programme. The latter, which was far better arranged than at least a few made familiar to us at past concerts, was thus carried out:

Goldmark...Overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13
Mozart......Aria, "L'amero, saro Costante," from "Il Re Pastore"
Violin Obligato by Franz Kneisel.
Mozart...Symphony in G minor (Koechel, 550)
Von Weber...........Overture, "Abu Hassan"
Massenet......"Sevillana," from "Don Cæsar de Bazan"
Von Weber...........''Invitation to the Dance"
(Scored for Orchestra by Hector Berlioz.)

For contributing her two numbers to this list Melba, who was in perfect vocal form, and as unemotional as ever, met with an enthusiastic reception that must have been grateful even to the exacting heart of a prima donna. Her first selection, the aria from "Il Re Pastore," is a delightful piece of melody, Mozartian in the truest meaning of the term, and it was given by the soloist with exquisite taste—although a trifle coldly—and with a simplicity finely suited to the spirit of the composition. The violin obligato by Mr. Kneisel well supplemented the achievement of the singer, and at the conclusion of the aria Melba was recalled again and again. Later in the evening she imparted unusual brilliancy to a "Sevillana," rearranged by Massenet from his "Don Cæsar" music, and thus illustrated in the most pleasing fashion the great purity and natural charm of her voice, as well as the wondrous refinement of her execution. In a purely dramatic sense Melba's performance of the "Sevillana" lacked warmth and the typical Southern color, and she missed the poetic significance of the lines running:

Les fleurs vont sur vos pas
De parfums embaumer la mantille.
D'azur, d'or, est le jour;
Et le soir, lorsque l'étoile brille,
Entend chanter l'amour!

Yet one never looks for actual sentiment in Melba, and as she imparted such shining vocal effectiveness to the number the crowded audience was amply justified in making her repeat it.

In speaking of the orchestral part of the concert warm praise should be bestowed upon Mr. Paur's sympathetic reading of the G minor symphony. It was Schubert who said of this great work that he could hear the angels singing in it, and in listening to its suggestive presentation last night imaginative hearers may have agreed with him, at least so far as concerned the andante—one of the most beautiful examples of symphonic writing. The other selections, comprising the "Sakuntala" overture, the vivid "Abu Hassan" overture of Von Weber, and the latter's charming "Invitation to the Dance," served to emphasize the perfection of execution and the adaptability of the orchestra—virtues now so well known that to dwell upon them would seem like the traditional painting of the lily. The "Invitation to the Dance," appropriately placed at the end of the programme, had a particularly delightful performance, and helped to send everybody home in excellent humor.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, NOV. 13, 1896.

MRS CLEVELAND ATTENDED.

Auspicious Opening of Season of the Symphony Orchestra.

WASHINGTON, Nov 12—The first concert of the Boston symphony orchestra for the season of 1896-7 was given tonight to an overflowing and fashionable audience.

Mrs Cleveland occupied one of the boxes, and with her were Sec and Mrs Olney, their daughter, Mrs Minot, and Sir Julian and Lady Pauncefote. Mrs Cleveland looked especially youthful and charming and in excellent health.

The audience was a very enthusiastic one, and freely applauded the various numbers. Mr Martinus Sieveking was the soloist, and his rendition of Tschaikowsky's wonderful composition for pianoforte, the first time heard in this city, created a perfect furor, and in response to the applause one of the movements was repeated.

[49]

Baltimore American.

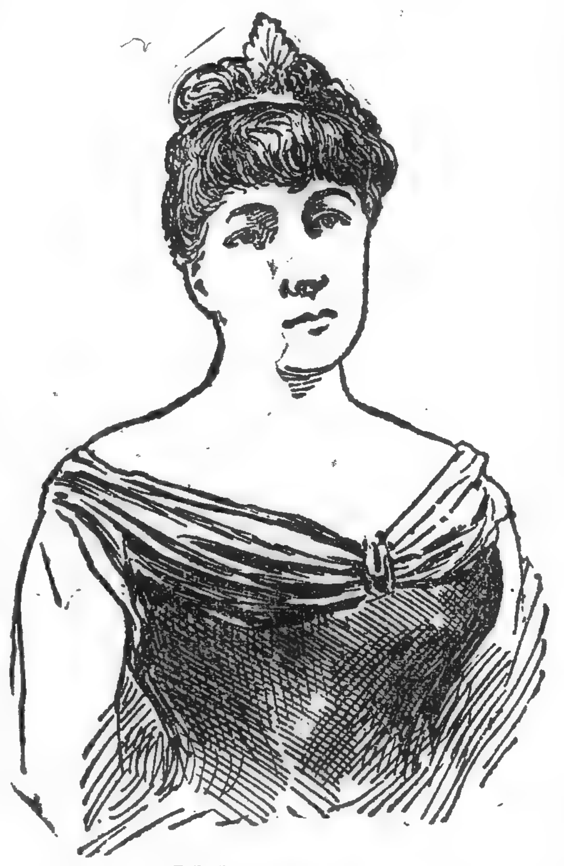
THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1896.

A FINE MUSICAL TREAT.

MME. MELBA AND THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Concert Season Is Opened at the Music Hall—A Large and Enthusiastic Audience—Melba Is in Excellent Voice and Sings in Her Matchless Style—The People, of Course, Delighted—Her Selections and Reception—The Work of the Orchestra.

When Director Paur made his bow at Music Hall last night, before opening the season of Boston Orchestra concerts, he faced one of the largest audiences he has seen since he became leader of that splendid body of players. Mme. Melba and the orchestra were two magnets powerful enough to draw most of the music-loving people out on a damp night. After hearing Chabier's overture to "Gwendoline," a novelty here, and a richly scored modern production, showing the influence exerted by Wagner and Berlioz on the composer, the audience was ready for Melba. She was dressed in white, and looked charming. Her voice never seemed better. The first selection was an aria, from Mozart, "L'Amero Saro Costante," from "Il re Pastore," which was exactly adapted to her voice. She sang the air with her unrivalled clearness and beauty of tone, and with great care, giving every passage with limpid purity and exquisite tenderness. The accompaniment was played on the violin by Mr. Franz Kneisel with his usual exactness. With such a voice, one would have preferred support from the flute, but Mozart was not overfond of that instrument. Melba's other selection was an air, "Sevillana," from Massenet's "Don Caesar de Bazan," which he rearranged especially for Melba and an orchestra. It has the sensuous swing and abandon of the Spanish dance movement, and the accompaniment is in harmony, the castanets coming in with a decided flavor. Melba reveled in it, taking the difficult phrases with ease, and giving trills, runs, and other vocal pyrotechnics, with such smoothness and sureness that no flaw could be discovered. Her intonation was, apparently, perfect. When she finished by giving a high D as an astonishing climax, the applause burst forth spontaneously. A beautiful bunch of flowers was handed over the footlights, and, of course, she had to come back. Mr. Paur allowed her to repeat the air, which she did in the same perfect style.



MME. MELBA.

The great work of the orchestra was Schubert's "Ninth Symphony, in C Major," his longest and best. Schubert stands next to Beethoven as a writer of symphonies. This symphony was written in 1828, a year crowded with work, but his whole life was one of activity. It is characterized by the originality, the fertility of invention, poetry of expression, delicate sense of instrumental coloring, breadth of treatment and spontaneous flow of melody which he possessed as no other composer did. He became more and more original as he grew older. In this symphony his versatility and power to produce effects with an orchestra are simply astonishing. It seems almost incredible that he could write the andante and the finale of this work as fast as he could use the pen, never making corrections; but that was his habit. One who could write in eighteen years over 1,100 compositions of all kinds in a manner almost perfectly original, never using devices, but simply giving expression to his genius, was, surely, inspired.

The orchestra played the work in a broad, noble style.

The other selections for the orchestra were Weber's overture to "Abu Hassan," new to our audiences, a spirited composition, played in a dashing manner; and Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," scored for the orchestra in a brilliant fashion, by Berlioz.

Throughout the concert the orchestra was in fine form. It is still the same matchless organization which has charmed our people for years.

HERALD, BALTIMORE
NOVEMBER 12, 1896.

SONG AND SYMPHONY.

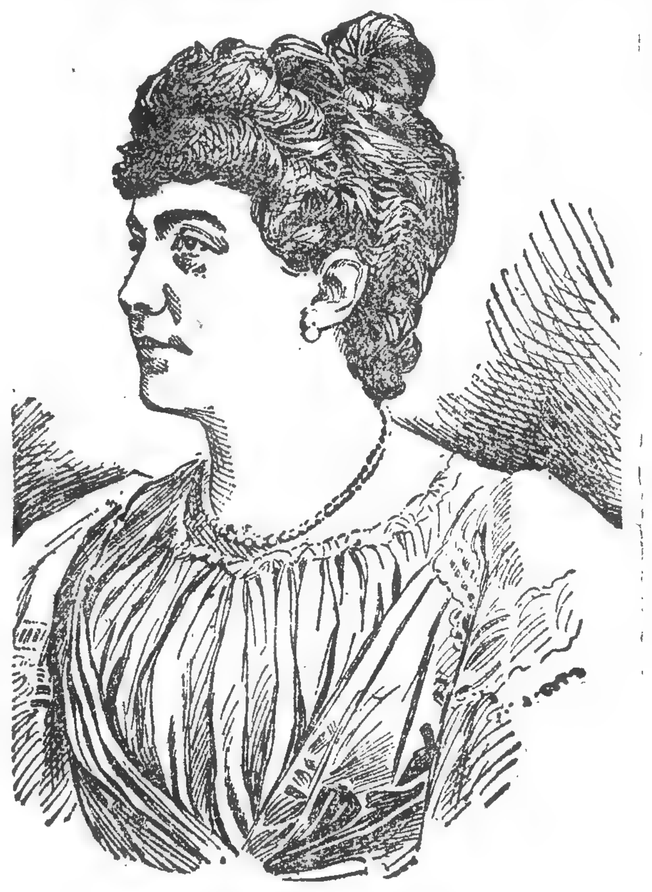
Auspicious Opening of the Present Musical Season.

MADAME MELBA'S TRIUMPH.

She Appears With the Boston Orchestra at the Music Hall and Is Given an Ovation—An Interesting Programme Thoroughly Enjoyed by a Large and Representative Audience—Other Musical Doings of the Day.

It was Melba, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that kindled the fires of enthusiasm at the Music Hall housewarming when the auditorium was first opened, marking what has since proven a new era in local musical doings, and it was this same incomparable combination that last night inaugurated the local music season.

Whether it was the appearance of the famous cantatrice, or an eagerness to give the orchestra a warm welcome at the first performance of the winter, that drew such a large and representative audience must remain a question, for the honors of the evening were divided between them. It can safely be said that about everyone interested in good music in Baltimore was there, ready to criticise or applaud, as the occasion required.



MADAME MELBA.

It was very evident, however, that the main interest was centred in Madame Melba. It seemed as yesterday that she stood upon the platform with Mole, the flutist, and captured her audience, by singing the celebrated arditti bird song. Then her controversy with Nordica and De Reszke in the Metropolitan Opera Company enhanced greatly the interest of those present, and she was given an ovation when she came forward to sing. She was more like the picture of submissive Marguerite, than a fiery Amneris, and her modest demeanor is shown when approached upon the troublesome opera subject.

"Nebensache," says Melba, when asked to speak of the affair, for she is hard at work on German, according to her Wagnerian aspirations, and Brunhilde is the goal Madame Melba hopes to reach.

Perhaps there was some little disappointment when the singer gave as her first number the semi-sancto creation of Mozart's, from the "Il Re Pastore." However, one does not necessarily expect a succession of vocal pyrotechnics simply because the singer has attained renown as a dramatic soprano. Melba sang the "L'Amera" with all the depth and pathos required of the work, and the purity of tone and exactness of enunciation were readily seen in the duo cadences with the violin, which part was faultlessly played by Franz Kneisel.

Her adeptness at colerateur was more readily discerned in "Sevillana" aria, written for Madame Melba by Massenet, the composer of "Don Caesar de Bazan," from which opera the selection is taken. Being originally an orchestral compilation, with prominence for two flutes, it will be readily understood that the writer had plenty of text to play on in evolving foriateur themes for the voice. Melba, howevr, was more than equal to the task, taking the roulades, straight and chromatique, with hardly an effort, and trilling like a bird. She was recalled again and again, and responded by repeating the number.

Of the orchestral work nothing but good words can be said. The two overtures and even the concluding number hardly measure up to the Boston Symphony standard, but the first named were new and therefore acceptable. The Schubert symphony, however, more than recompensed for hes hortcomings of the other numbers. The "Gwendoline" overture by Chabrier will hardly bear frequent repetition. It is characteristically French, despite the programmer's discovery of Wagnerian worms. The work is replete with contrapuntal colorings, heavy in the middle, light at the ends, with an unsatisfactory working out of striking themes.

The "Abu Hassan" overture by Weber would do well scheduled as a perpetual encore number. The contrast was indeed marked when the Schubert No. 9 symphony in C major was given. Despite the length of this work the beauty of orchestral grouping and repetition of melodies and scholarly themes make each movement more enjoyable than the last. Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," orchestrated by Berlioz, concluded the concert.

The orchestra is practically the same as last season. The principal change is in the first flute, Jacquea taking the place of Mole, who is concertizing on the other side of the pond.

BALTIMORE, THURSDAY
THE SUN.
NOVEMBER 12, 1896.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

An Admirably Artistic Performance at Music Hall, with Melba, the Great, as Soloist.

Fashion has decreed that the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra shall, as far as the audience is concerned, be successful. Remembering, then, the superb work of the orchestra in past years, a brilliant concert was almost a matter of course with such an inspiring audience as was present last evening at the opening concert of the season at Music Hall.

For eleven seasons the Bostonians have been coming to Baltimore, and in that time have so ingratiated themselves in popular favor that the limits of the musical season seem to be determined by their concerts, it having become almost an unwritten law that nothing in a musical way shall be attempted before their annual advent.

In accordance with the generous practice of the management, which has been in vogue for several years, the opening concert of the season is the occasion for the appearance of an artist of more than usual prominence, and at the opening concert of this, the twelfth season, Madame Melba was the soloist.

It is frequently a dangerous experiment to attempt to transfer a singer from the operatic to the concert stage, but in the case of Melba nothing seems to be lost in the change. The same perfection of vocal method, purity and brilliancy of execution is at all times noticeable.

An aria from one of Mozart's least-known operas, "Il Re Pastore," with a violin obligato beautifully played by Mr. Franz Kneisel, and an aria from the incidental music to "Don Cæsar de Bazan," by Massenet, especially arranged for Mme. Melba by the composer, were the numbers sung by the soloist. Both numbers presented great technical difficulties, which were overcome in such a manner as to leave little doubt that Melba is one of the greatest living singers. At the conclusion of the second solo she was compelled to repeat the number.

The symphony was Schubert's orchestral, smyphony No. 9, in C major. In regard to the numbering of Schubert's symphonies there seems to be a lack of unanimity, this one in C major being frequently called Schubert's tenth.

The same wondrous fertility and imaginative power which made Schubert the greatest and the most voluminous song writer of the century is noticeable in his orchestral writings. Criticisms have frequently been made of this symphony, chiefly because of its great length, but this is due to the great haste with which he did all his composition and partly to his unrestrained fertility of imagination. The great beauty of the melodies with which the work abounds makes it seem by no means diffuse.

In the first movement there occur passages of a descriptive character, one time having a peculiarly Scotch rhythm, at other times taking on something of a Moorish style. So strong is this oriental flavor that one is reminded of the Turkish music in Beethoven's fragment, the "Ruins of Athens."

The symphony ends with a tremendous climax, in which the themes used in the first and second movements are summed up in a long, well-sustained passage.

The other orchestral numbers were an overture to "Gwendoline," by Chabrier, one of the most ardent representatives of the frenzied Wagnerian movement which is now sweeping over France; Weber's overture to "Abu Hasson" and Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," which, as performed last night, had been scored for orchestra by Berlioz. The most interesting of these numbers, leaving out of consideration the "Invitation to the Dance," which is always enjoyable, was the overture to Weber's one-act operetta "Abu Hasson."

It this work, which was written when Von Weber was quite young, it is possible to see the beginnings of the dramatic power which later produced "Oberon" and "Der Freischuetz."

To say that the orchestra played as it usually does is equivalent to saying that its work was perfection. In the second movement of the symphony, however, some very curious slips were made by the wood-wind, which were most unexpected, coming, as they did, in the midst of an admirably performed composition.

As Director Paur from year to year becomes better acquainted with his magnificent resources his manner becomes less energetic, without in the least losing his enthusiasm. The same honesty of purpose and carefulness of detail which have characterized his work in the two years of his connection with the Symphony Orchestra were more than usually apparent.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. C., NO. 137.

SATURDAY, NOV. 14, 1896.

HERR ROSENTHAL THE SOLOIST.

First of Season's Concerts by Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Nov. 13, 1896. Herr Rosenthal was the soloist at the first of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which was given this evening at the Metropolitan Opera House. The composition he chose for his second appearance since his return was Chopin's popular E minor concert. The enthusiasm of the audience found expression in applause so prolonged that Herr Rosenthal was at last forced to respond with an encore—"The Lindenbaum." The evening was a repetition of his triumph of Tuesday at Carnegie Hall.

The orchestral programme led with the overture to "Gwendoline," an opera by Emanuel Chabries, a French composer. As the composer was a pronounced Wagnerian, it is not surprising that the overture has a distinctively Beyreuth flavor. Although being imitative, it abounds in bold tone coloring, and played as it was with superb spirit last night, it proved an interesting novelty, in spite of the rather commonplace theme given to the brass in an exceedingly boisterous finale.

The Berlioz orchestration of "The Invitation to the Dance" was charmingly rendered. Schubert's noble Lith symphony closed the evening's entertainment. Mr. Paur's direction showed the same earnestness and intelligence which have characterized it heretofore.

BOSTON POST,
NOVEMBER 14, 1896.

There will be no symphony concert in Music Hall tonight. Boston's pet orchestra is on tour, and is being everywhere received with that deference which is always accorded it in this city. In Washington, on Thursday night, the opening of the season was made more brilliant by the presence of Mrs. Cleveland and other glittering lights at the national capital. Mr. Paur's leonine head may be a bit increased in size on his return.

* * *

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1896.

MR. PAUR'S ORCHESTRA.

Washington, Nov. 12.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 16th concert season at the New Columbia Theatre here tonight. A large and distinguished audience were present, including Mrs. Cleveland, Secretaries Olney, Harmon and Lamont, and Sir Julian Pauncefote, the British Ambassador, and family

---

Brooklyn Daily Eagle
NOVEMBER 9, 1896

MELBA ARRIVES FROM BOSTON.

Her Voice in Fine Condition for the Symphony Concert To-night.

Mme. Nella Melba, who is to sing in the first Philharmonic concert at the Academy of Music to-night, arrived from Boston last evening. She went direct to the Windsor hotel, New York, where she enjoyed a good night's rest. Wherever practicable, Melba avoids the fatigue of night travel—a fact that accounts largely for her excellent health and readiness to meet any artistic emergency. Mr. Paur, the leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, also came yesterday, but the musicians did not arrive until this morning.

The Melba concerts at Boston on Friday and Saturday proved the most brilliant events of the season. The Music hall, in which the symphony concerts are held, was packed to its utmost capacity, and many were turned away. Melba, who sang at her best, said that the only shadow upon her pleasure of singing at the Symphonies was the fact that those who were turned away could not hear her, and added, that if it were possible, nothing would make her happier than to sing for them alone without money or price. After the performance of the Mozart aria, the cantatrice was recalled four or five times; on each occasion she led forth Mr. Kneisel, obligato; and made him share in her triumph. The Massenet Sevillana was even more rapturously received, and the audience broke through all Mr. Paur's rules by insisting on an encore. At the close of the concerts hundreds waited for the cantatrice in the hallway, blocking the exit. Melba escaped only after she had scattered flowers from her bouquet of chrysanthemums among the crowd.

BROOKLYN DAILY
EAGLE—MONDAY,
NOVEMBER 9, 1896.

At the Academy of Music.

Philharmonic Concerts
BY THE
Boston Symphony Orchestra,
SOLOIST:
MME. MELBA.
THIS MONDAY EVENING.
Reserved Seats. All Sold Out.
Admission, $1.00.
Amphitheater, 50 Cents.

Tickets for sale at the Brooklyn Institute, 502 Fulton st., and at CHANDLER'S, 300 Fulton st, and at the door.

BOSTON
HOME JOURNAL
A PAPER OF TO-DAY

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1896.

AS the greatest work performed at the fourth symphony concert last Saturday evening was neither heard at the proper time nor place, the concert might quite as consistently have been given without its symphony. Like the play of "Hamlet" without the part of Hamlet, you remark. Very true; but you would certainly regard as none the less absurd the interpolation of Hamlet upon the performance of some such play as "Love's Labor Lost."

—o—

That a star of the first magnitude was to appear and that it would necessarily shed its great light upon that display of art which is by no means inseparable from art itself, should have induced Conductor Paur to place such a purely art-creation as Schumann's C-major symphony where it could have been heard at its best. Then might have followed Massenet's "Sevillana," if indeed it had to be mixed up in a symphony concert.

—o—

Next, almost anything within the bounds of musical respectability would have been preferable to an orchestral prelude so vapidly uninteresting as the introductory music to Act II of "Ingwelde" by Max Schilling. It will be allowed in its favor, however, that the mood for hearing operatic music cannot easily be found in the concert hall.

—o—

But few overtures are so inherently operatic as to justify their exclusion from a symphony concert programme. An operatic aria, too, may be employed if it affords an artist any indispensable means for exhibiting the most effective auxiliaries of his or her art. Such music, however, as has been composed only for spectacular occasions should be granted its proper time and place of performance. The usurpation of any such right by the transference of the prelude by Max Schilling from an operatic play bill to a symphony concert programme was by no means justified in the effect it produced.

—o—

Other incongruities in the arrangement of the evening's repertoire were so transparent that only the genius of Mme. Melba could have enabled even the selections by Mozart and Massenet to be heard at their best.

—o—

The Boston Symphony Concerts, with all their perfection of detail, have nevertheless had no conductor since their first season under George Henschel who could be said to be unimpeachable as regards the selection and arrangement of programmes.

—o—

Conductor Paur would have been justified in using the knife on Volkmann's overture to Richard the Third and cutting out entirely "The Campbells are Comin'," a tune which, as Mr. L. C. Elson with no less wit than wisdom truly says, was as much a blunder for Volkmann to introduce "on an English battlefield as for Shakespeare to place a seacoast in Bohemia. The battle of Bosworth was fought in 1485, while 'The Campbells are Comin'' was not composed until 1568."

—o—

This faux pas reminds the writer of his experience at the opera house in Leipzig in 1872, when the play of "Richard III" was produced there with Hase in the title rôle. When the Duke of York and Prince of Wales appeared in London Harbor they left a ship magnificently decorated with the flags of all nations, including, inexplicable as it may seem, the star-spangled banner, although the scene of Shakespeare's drama refers to the historical events in English history about the year 1792.

—o—

Not to forget the symphony concert. Mme. Melba gave the aria "L'amerò saro contante," by Mozart, an interpretation which for delicacy of phrasing and purity of tone, exhibited more conspicuously than ever before the unrivalled Melba's own art. Her success with the audience was emphatic and complete, if not overwhelming, but best of all it was legitimately won with a Mozart aria. The fine art of Mr. Franz Kneisel as he played the violin obligato was given out with all the refinement, grace, sympathy and artistic subordination which not even Mme. Melba could have desired to have had surpassed.

—o—

No symphony concert to-night. The programme for next Saturday evening will include the overture to the "Barbier von Bagdag," Peter Cornelius; Concerto for pianoforte in E-minor, Chopin; Entr' acte from "Heimchen am Heerd," Goldmark; and symphony in E-minor No. 8, by Dvorak.

—o—

There will be another great star night in the Boston Symphony series, and that in the near future. Following Sig. Campanari and Mme. Melba, who appeared at the third and fourth concerts respectively, Herr Moritz Rosenthal will make his appearance at the fifth concert to be given Nov. 21.

—o—

Speaking of Rosenthal, no audience was ever more dazed by a display of pianoforte technique than that attending the concert he gave in this city eight years ago in Bumstead Hall when he played what might well be described as a homage to Hercules, namely, his "study" on the D-flat-major waltz by Chopin.

—o—

Rosenthal's first public appearance of note was in 1873, when he played with Mikuli Chopin's Rondo in C-major for two pianofortes. Then it was that sapient criticism regarded his chances for degenerating into an ex-prodigy as altogether excellent; but Rosenthal is still a prodigy, and his name will go down in history as one of the most marvellous virtuosi of his time.

—o—

Mme. Melba evidently had a good time while she was in this city, besides achieving a great artistic success. She spent much time with Mr. and Mrs. Adamowski in their cosey home on Massachusetts Avenue, and was delighted to be quite one of the family with these friends. She was seen in a box at Keith's one afternoon, and other theatrical attractions also gained her attention.

Mme. Melba looked quite Athenic in her late appearance at the Symphony Rehearsal. She is undeniably developing in stature, and reminds one of the free-waisted Greek goddesses of "ye ancient days." How trumpet-like and superb her voice sounded in the perfectly acoustic properties of our Music Hall.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1896.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was welcomed last evening at the first concert of its winter series as it deserved to be welcomed—as one of the influential and welcome factors in the musical activities of the New-York season. There was an audience that well filled the floor of the Metropolitan Opera House; and the fact that so large a portion of it stayed till the end of the concert was a compliment to the esteem in which the organization is held. The programme was not only mercilessly long, but ill-composed and ill-balanced. Furthermore, Mr. Paur's reading of the great Schubert symphony, which formed its centre of gravity, was not one that could be unreservedly accepted. It was, in fact, heavy, lacking in the life and animation that are the keynote of the composition, and in concentration; and it was marred by the over-anxious elaboration that the friends of this orchestra are pained to observe with increasing frequency in Mr. Paur's performances. There were exaggerations of nuance, both in tempo and in dynamic, from which the scherzo and its trio suffered especially. That the brilliant qualities of the organization have not suffered, however, was clear. The very fact that Mr. Paur brought so many of his effects to successful realization in the symphony was one proof of it. There was more in the splendidly muscular performance of Berlioz's orchestration of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," and of the overture to Chabrier's "Gwendoline." The latter, heard for the first time, is a feverish exposition of the Wagnerian influence upon the modern French composers, in which several striking effects of instrumentation do not make up for a lack of incisive thematic material nor the extreme commonplaceness of some of it.

The solo artist was Mr. Rosenthal, who played Chopin's first concerto in E minor. His playing last evening was in singular contrast in tone and spirit to that at his first appearance a few nights before in Carnegie Hall. Then everything was brilliant, almost to garishness; self-assertive sometimes to boisterousness. Last night he gave the concerto with a reserve that was moderation itself; his mood was quiet, tender, introspective. It was a performance of exquisite refinement, delicacy and sentiment, technically a marvel of lucidity. Not the least noteworthy part of it was the beautiful accompaniment provided by the orchestra, which was exactly in the spirit of Mr. Rosenthal's conception of the solo part. He was stormily recalled again and again, and finally played Liszt's arrangement of Schubert's song "Der Lindenbaum."

The Sun.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1896.

Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The gratification which all true music lovers find in welcoming the Boston Symphony Orchestra back to the city is none the less vivid from being an annually recurring one. The pleasure which this organization of artists affords is of that elevating kind that is inspired by the contemplation of high ideals put into well nigh perfect practice.

Last night's concert was opened with a performance of Emmanuel Chabrier's overture "Gwendoline," in which it was difficult to discover any startling merit. It seemed rather a bald imitation of Wagner, vague in aim and futile in accomplishment. It is cleverly orchestrated, and therein appears to lie its only claim to a public hearing.

Moriz Rosenthal was next on the programme, with Chopin's F minor concerto. In this the wonder-pianist deepened the impression produced at his previous concerts a few days ago that he is a past master of his art in so far as it covers technical accomplishment. His playing per se leaves nothing to be desired for absolute facility of execution and crystal purity and delicacy of tone. Yet the same want of the inner qualities was felt in his performance last night as before—a temperamental lack, which, however, came near to being fully supplied by the orchestra, whose accompaniment was beyond all praise for sympathy and sustaining power. Herr Rosenthal's marvellously brilliant playing of the last movement of the concerto roused his hearers to unusual enthusiasm, and he was forced to give an encore piece.

The remainder of the evening was devoted to the playing by the orchestra of Berlioz's familiar arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" and Schubert's C major Symphony (No. 9), compositions far too well known to require critical comment. It is only necessary to note the fact that both received treatment worthy of them from Mr. Paur and his men, especially Schubert's noble work, which was rendered with impressive dignity.

The New-York Times.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, NOV. 14, 1896.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

First Concert of the Season in the Opera House Last Night.

Emmanuel Chabrier..Overture to "Gwendoline"
Chopin.......Concerto in E minor, No. 1, Op. 11
Moritz Rosenthal.
Karl Maria von Weber...Invitation to the Dance
(Scored for orchestra by Hector Berlioz.)
Franz Schubert......Symphony No. 9, in C major

The eleventh season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New-York began last night at the Opera House, with the forty-eighth performance. The orchestra has had a fatiguing week of travel and performance, but its work last night gave little or no evidence of its labors. It had the same swing, the same unanimity, the same precision and finish to which it has accustomed us, and which for the past decade have been our standard of orchestral performance.

It has given us more interesting programmes. The Chabrier overture is interesting as the work of a Wagnerized Frenchman, the programme plausibly says of the only really Wagnerized Frenchman, that is to say the only French composer who has been influenced by a study of Wagner's music, as distinguished from an adhesion to Wagner theories. The result, however, is much what the result of such influence has been upon composers of other nationalities who have imitated what was imitable in Wagner's music, and left out what was individual and valuable—that is to say, it is a musical palette, a display of orchestral color, without definite musical form. It is, perhaps, worth hearing once, but it is not destined to become a staple concert number.

The Weber-Berlioz "Invitation to the Dance" is a questionable component of a symphony programme, but this was clearly justified by a superb performance, which showed the strings in particular at their very best, both in tone and in discipline, from the opening phrase in the 'cellos to the concluding measure. The Schubert symphony was, of course, admirably played. We are familiar with the Boston version of this work, and it need only be noted that Mr. Paur omitted the repeat at the end of the first movement, which used to be given to the last bar. The reduction was very welcome.

Mr. Rosenthal made a much more favorable impression than at his opening concert. That is to say, he played Chopin's E minor concerto nearly as effectively as a number of pianists we could name, who have no pretensions to rival him in his own specialties of technique. For these specialties the work gives no scope at all, although he made his opportunity for a bravura passage at the close. But he played the concerto, if not poetically, smoothly and clearly, and was very warmly applauded. For an encore, he gave the Schubert-Liszt "Lindenbaum," which was one of the most effective numbers of his former programme.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1896.

BOSTON'S SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Herr Rosenthal was the soloist at the first of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given last evening at the Metropolitan Opera House. The composition he chose for performance at his second appearance since his return was Chopin's popular E minor concerto. The enthusiasm of the audience which followed found expression in applause so prolonged that Herr Rosenthal was at last forced to respond with an encore, "The Lindenbaum."

The evening was a repetition of his triumph of Tuesday at Carnegie Hall. Yet the question of his growth in sentiment still awaits a definite answer. Was it not again the virtuoso who astonished with his marvellous facility of execution—the herculean strength with which he uses his instrument, so to speak—his dazzling brilliancy? The rondo could not have been played better, but in spite of the daintiness of Herr Rosenthal's mouse-tread pianissimos in the exquisite romance in the second movement, was there not an indescribable something wanting? More than once it seemed as though the answer that all awaited was coming, and it was in his interpretation of the romance that he showed more soulfulness than at any other time; but the fact remains that the caressing tenderness you longed for in his cantabile was lacking—the tenderness for which the most perfect technique is, after all, a far from satisfying substitute.

The orchestral programme led with the overture to "Gwendoline," an opera by Emmanuel Chabrier, a French composer. As the composer was a pronounced Wagnerian, it is not surprising that the overture has a distinctly Bayreuth flavor without being imitative. It abounds in bold tone coloring, and, played as it was with superb spirit last night, it proved an interesting novelty in spite of the rather commonplace theme given to the brass in an exceedingly boisterous finale.

The Berlioz orchestration of "The Invitation to the Dance" was charmingly rendered. Of course, the audience, as usual, applauded at the wrong place, notwithstanding the warning printed in the programme. Schubert's noble Ninth Symphony closed the evening's entertainment. Mr. Paur's direction showed the same earnestness and intelligence which have characterized it heretofore.

The Morning Advertiser.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1896.

Boston Symphony—Opera House.

The Boston Symphony gave its first New York concert for the season at the Metropolitan Opera House, and as though to make the beginning doubly effective the soloist of the evening was that pianist of pianists, Rosenthal.

The programme opened with Chalner's overture to his opera "Gwendoline." The work is comparatively new. It is decidedly Wagnerian in orchestration, heavy and dramatic. It ends with the melody being carried to a climax on the trombones. There was a precision and unanimity in the playing that showed how thoroughly Mr. Paur had trained his orchestra.

The second number of the programme was Chopin's concerto in E minor. And it was here that Rosenthal made his appearance. And how he did play that first movement, the allegro. The stunning runs, the arpeggi all were played as only this master can play them. He took the second movement, the romanza, with splendid delicacy and feeling. It contradicted in expressive terms the belief that Rosenthal is "hard." The softness of his touch was marvelous. The third movement is the vivace. As an encore Rosenthal playea a transcription of a Schubert song. It was enthusiastically received, but the man with muscles of steel refused to play again.

The third number on the programme was Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," scored by Berlioz. The conclusion of the programme was the Schubert symphony in C major. It was a splendid close to an evening resplendent in musical perfection.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 15, 1896.

Academy of Music Concerts.
THE
Opening Sale of Tickets
To the
SERIES OF POPULAR
MATINEE CONCERTS
BY THE BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA,
EMIL PAUR, Conductor,
AT THE
Art Building, Montague Street,
Tuesday Evening, November 24,
8 P. M.
DATES OF THE MATINEES:
SATURDAYS DECEMBER 12, JANUARY 23,
FEBRUARY 27, MARCH 27.
ROSENTHAL, SOLOIST,
December 12.
COURSE TICKETS, $4.00, $3.00, $2 50.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, NOV. 21, 1896.

Mr Rosenthal's Illness Makes a Change in the Symphony Program—Notes About This Week's Amusements.

Half an hour before the beginning of the public rehearsal by the Boston symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon a note was received by the management to the effect that the illness of Mr Rosenthal, the soloist announced, made it unsafe for him to appear. A hurried effort was made to secure the services of Miss Lena Little, the soloist with the orchestra at the concert in Cambridge the previous evening, but she was also ill. Conductor Paur substituted the overture to Gwendoline by Chabrier in place of Mr Rosenthal's solo number, otherwise the program was the same as announced.

Mr Rosenthal will not appear this evening and the program given yesterday afternoon will be repeated. Mr Rosenthal will play with the orchestra at a later date. The soloist for next week's concert is Mr Carl Halir, the famous classical violinist from Berlin.

Boston Journal.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1896.

PIANIST ROSENTHAL ILL.

Disappointment of Auditors at Symphony Rehearsal Yesterday.

Half an hour before the beginning of the public rehearsal by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon, a note from Dr. H. H. A. Beach was received by the management to the effect that the illness of Mr. Rosenthal, the soloist announced, made it unsafe for him to appear. A hurried effort was made to secure the services of Miss Lena Little, the soloist with the orchestra at the concert in Cambridge the previous evening, but she was also ill. Conductor Paur substituted the overture to Gwendoline, by Chabrier, in place of Mr. Rosenthal's solo number; otherwise the program was the same as announced, the symphony being given first. Mr. Rosenthal will not appear this evening, and the program given yesterday afternoon will be repeated. Mr. Rosenthal will appear with the orchestra at a later date. The soloist for next week's concert is Mr. Carl Halir, the famous classical violinist from Berlin.

BOSTON
HOME JOURNAL
A PAPER OF TO-DAY

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1896.

As the greatest work performed at the fourth symphony concert last Saturday evening was neither heard at the proper time nor place, the concert might quite as consistently have been given without its symphony. Like the play of "Hamlet" without the part of Hamlet, you remark. Very true; but you would certainly regard as none the less absurd the interpolation of Hamlet upon the performance of some such play as "Love's Labor Lost."

—o—

That a star of the first magnitude was to appear and that it would necessarily shed its great light upon that display of art which is by no means inseparable from art itself, should have induced Conductor Paur to place such a purely art-creation as Schumann's C-major symphony where it could have been heard at its best. Then might have followed Massenet's "Sevillana," if indeed it had to be mixed up in a symphony concert.

—o—

Next, almost anything within the bounds of musical respectability would have been preferable to an orchestral prelude so vapidly uninteresting as the introductory music to Act II of "Ingwelde" by Max Schilling. It will be allowed in its favor, however, that the mood for hearing operatic music cannot easily be found in the concert hall.

—o—

But few overtures are so inherently operatic as to justify their exclusion from a symphony concert programme. An operatic aria, too, may be employed if it affords an artist any indispensable means for exhibiting the most effective auxiliaries of his or her art. Such music, however, as has been composed only for spectacular occasions should be granted its proper time and place of performance. The usurpation of any such right by the transference of the prelude by Max Schilling from an operatic play bill to a symphony concert programme was by no means justified in the effect it produced.

—o—

Other incongruities in the arrangement of the evening's repertoire were so transparent that only the genius of Mme. Melba could have enabled even the selections by Mozart and Massenet to be heard at their best.

—o—

The Boston Symphony Concerts, with all their perfection of detail, have nevertheless had no conductor since their first season under George Henschel who could be said to be unimpeachable as regards the selection and arrangement of programmes.

—o—

Conductor Paur would have been justified in using the knife on Volkmann's overture to Richard the Third and cutting out entirely "The Campbells are Comin'," a tune which, as Mr. L. C. Elson with no less wit than wisdom truly says, was as much a blunder for Volkmann to introduce "on an English battlefield as for Shakespeare to place a seacoast in Bohemia. The battle of Bosworth was fought in 1485, while 'The Campbells are Comin'' was not composed until 1568."

—o—

This faux pas reminds the writer of his experience at the opera house in Leipzig in 1872, when the play of "Richard III" was produced there with Hase in the title rôle. When the Duke of York and Prince of Wales appeared in London Harbor they left a ship magnificently decorated with the flags of all nations, including, inexplicable as it may seem, the star-spangled banner, although the scene of Shakespeare's drama refers to the historical events in English history about the year 1792.

—o—

Not to forget the symphony concert. Mme. Melba gave the aria "L'amerò saro contante," by Mozart, an interpretation which for delicacy of phrasing and purity of tone, exhibited more conspicuously than ever before the unrivalled Melba's own art. Her success with the audience was emphatic and complete, if not overwhelming, but best of all it was legitimately won with a Mozart aria. The fine art of Mr. Franz Kneisel as he played the violin obligato was given out with all the refinement, grace, sympathy and artistic subordination which not even Mme. Melba could have desired to have had surpassed.

—o—

No symphony concert to-night. The programme for next Saturday evening will include the overture to the "Barbier von Bagdag," Peter Cornelius; Concerto for pianoforte in E-minor, Chopin; Entr' acte from "Heimchen am Heerd," Goldmark; and symphony in E-minor No. 8, by Dvorak.

—o—

There will be another great star night in the Boston Symphony series, and that in the near future. Following Sig. Campanari and Mme. Melba, who appeared at the third and fourth concerts respectively, Herr Moritz Rosenthal will make his appearance at the fifth concert to be given Nov. 21.

—o—

Speaking of Rosenthal, no audience was ever more dazed by a display of pianoforte technique than that attending the concert he gave in this city eight years ago in Bumstead Hall when he played what might well be described as a homage to Hercules, namely, his "study" on the D-flat-major waltz by Chopin.

—o—

Rosenthal's first public appearance of note was in 1873, when he played with Mikuli Chopin's Rondo in C-major for two pianofortes. Then it was that sapient criticism regarded his chances for degenerating into an ex-prodigy as altogether excellent; but Rosenthal is still a prodigy, and his name will go down in history as one of the most marvellous virtuosi of his time.

—o—

Mme. Melba evidently had a good time while she was in this city, besides achieving a great artistic success. She spent much time with Mr. and Mrs. Adamowski in their cosey home on Massachusetts Avenue, and was delighted to be quite one of the family with these friends. She was seen in a box at Keith's one afternoon, and other theatrical attractions also gained her attention.

Mme. Melba looked quite Athenic in her late appearance at the Symphony Rehearsal. She is undeniably developing in stature, and reminds one of the free-waisted Greek goddesses of "ye ancient days." How trumpet-like and superb her voice sounded in the perfectly acoustic properties of our Music Hall.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1896.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was welcomed last evening at the first concert of its winter series as it deserved to be welcomed—as one of the influential and welcome factors in the musical activities of the New-York season. There was an audience that well filled the floor of the Metropolitan Opera House; and the fact that so large a portion of it stayed till the end of the concert was a compliment to the esteem in which the organization is held. The programme was not only mercilessly long, but ill-composed and ill-balanced. Furthermore, Mr. Paur's reading of the great Schubert symphony, which formed its centre of gravity, was not one that could be unreservedly accepted. It was, in fact, heavy, lacking in the life and animation that are the keynote of the composition, and in concentration; and it was marred by the over-anxious elaboration that the friends of this orchestra are pained to observe with increasing frequency in Mr. Paur's performances. There were exaggerations of nuance, both in tempo and in dynamic, from which the scherzo and its trio suffered especially. That the brilliant qualities of the organization have not suffered, however, was clear. The very fact that Mr. Paur brought so many of his effects to successful realization in the symphony was one proof of it. There was more in the splendidly muscular performance of Berlioz's orchestration of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," and of the overture to Chabrier's "Gwendoline." The latter, heard for the first time, is a feverish exposition of the Wagnerian influence upon the modern French composers, in which several striking effects of instrumentation do not make up for a lack of incisive thematic material nor the extreme commonplaceness of some of it.

The solo artist was Mr. Rosenthal, who played Chopin's first concerto in E minor. His playing last evening was in singular contrast in tone and spirit to that at his first appearance a few nights before in Carnegie Hall. Then everything was brilliant, almost to garishness; self-assertive sometimes to boisterousness. Last night he gave the concerto with a reserve that was moderation itself; his mood was quiet, tender, introspective. It was a performance of exquisite refinement, delicacy and sentiment, technically a marvel of lucidity. Not the least noteworthy part of it was the beautiful accompaniment provided by the orchestra, which was exactly in the spirit of Mr. Rosenthal's conception of the solo part. He was stormily recalled again and again, and finally played Liszt's arrangement of Schubert's song "Der Lindenbaum."

The Sun.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1896.

Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The gratification which all true music lovers find in welcoming the Boston Symphony Orchestra back to the city is none the less vivid from being an annually recurring one. The pleasure which this organization of artists affords is of that elevating kind that is inspired by the contemplation of high ideals put into well nigh perfect practice.

Last night's concert was opened with a performance of Emmanuel Chabrier's overture "Gwendoline," in which it was difficult to discover any startling merit. It seemed rather a bald imitation of Wagner, vague in aim and futile in accomplishment. It is cleverly orchestrated, and therein appears to lie its only claim to a public hearing.

Moriz Rosenthal was next on the programme, with Chopin's F minor concerto. In this the wonder-pianist deepened the impression produced at his previous concerts a few days ago that he is a past master of his art in so far as it covers technical accomplishment. His playing per se leaves nothing to be desired for absolute facility of execution and crystal purity and delicacy of tone. Yet the same want of the inner qualities was felt in his performance last night as before—a temperamental lack, which, however, came near to being fully supplied by the orchestra, whose accompaniment was beyond all praise for sympathy and sustaining power. Herr Rosenthal's marvellously brilliant playing of the last movement of the concerto roused his hearers to unusual enthusiasm, and he was forced to give an encore piece.

The remainder of the evening was devoted to the playing by the orchestra of Berlioz's familiar arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" and Schubert's C major Symphony (No. 9), compositions far too well known to require critical comment. It is only necessary to note the fact that both received treatment worthy of them from Mr. Paur and his men, especially Schubert's noble work, which was rendered with impressive dignity.

The New-York Times

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, NOV. 14, 1896.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

First Concert of the Season in the Opera House Last Night.

Emmanuel Chabrier..Overture to "Gwendoline"
Chopin.......Concerto in E minor, No. 1, Op. 11
Moritz Rosenthal.
Karl Maria von Weber...Invitation to the Dance
(Scored for orchestra by Hector Berlioz.)
Franz Schubert......Symphony No. 9, in C major

The eleventh season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New-York began last night at the Opera House, with the forty-eighth performance. The orchestra has had a fatiguing week of travel and performance, but its work last night gave little or no evidence of its labors. It had the same swing, the same unanimity, the same precision and finish to which it has accustomed us, and which for the past decade have been our standard of orchestral performance.

It has given us more interesting programmes. The Chabrier overture is interesting as the work of a Wagnerized Frenchman, the programme plausibly says of the only really Wagnerized Frenchman, that is to say the only French composer who has been influenced by a study of Wagner's music, as distinguished from an adhesion to Wagner theories. The result, however, is much what the result of such influence has been upon composers of other nationalities who have imitated what was imitable in Wagner's music, and left out what was individual and valuable—that is to say, it is a musical palette, a display of orchestral color, without definite musical form. It is, perhaps, worth hearing once, but it is not destined to become a staple concert number.

The Weber-Berlioz "Invitation to the Dance" is a questionable component of a symphony programme, but this was clearly justified by a superb performance, which showed the strings in particular at their very best, both in tone and in discipline, from the opening phrase in the 'cellos to the concluding measure. The Schubert symphony was, of course, admirably played. We are familiar with the Boston version of this work, and it need only be noted that Mr. Paur omitted the repeat at the end of the first movement, which used to be given to the last bar. The reduction was very welcome.

Mr. Rosenthal made a much more favorable impression than at his opening concert. That is to say, he played Chopin's E minor concerto nearly as effectively as a number of pianists we could name, who have no pretensions to rival him in his own specialties of technique. For these specialties the work gives no scope at all, although he made his opportunity for a bravura passage at the close. But he played the concerto, if not poetically, smoothly and clearly, and was very warmly applauded. For an encore, he gave the Schubert-Liszt "Lindenbaum," which was one of the most effective numbers of his former programme.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1896.

BOSTON'S SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Herr Rosenthal was the soloist at the first of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given last evening at the Metropolitan Opera House. The composition he chose for performance at his second appearance since his return was Chopin's popular E minor concerto. The enthusiasm of the audience which followed found expression in applause so prolonged that Herr Rosenthal was at last forced to respond with an encore, "The Lindenbaum."

The evening was a repetition of his triumph of Tuesday at Carnegie Hall. Yet the question of his growth in sentiment still awaits a definite answer. Was it not again the virtuoso who astonished with his marvellous facility of execution—the herculean strength with which he uses his instrument, so to speak—his dazzling brilliancy? The rondo could not have been played better, but in spite of the daintiness of Herr Rosenthal's mouse-tread pianissimos in the exquisite romance in the second movement, was there not an indescribable something wanting? More than once it seemed as though the answer that all awaited was coming, and it was in his interpretation of the romance that he showed more soulfulness than at any other time; but the fact remains that the caressing tenderness you longed for in his cantabile was lacking—the tenderness for which the most perfect technique is, after all, a far from satisfying substitute.

The orchestral programme led with the overture to "Gwendoline," an opera by Emmanuel Chabrier, a French composer. As the composer was a pronounced Wagnerian, it is not surprising that the overture has a distinctly Bayreuth flavor without being imitative. It abounds in bold tone coloring, and, played as it was with superb spirit last night, it proved an interesting novelty in spite of the rather commonplace theme given to the brass in an exceedingly boisterous finale.

The Berlioz orchestration of "The Invitation to the Dance" was charmingly rendered. Of course, the audience, as usual, applauded at the wrong place, notwithstanding the warning printed in the programme. Schubert's noble Ninth Symphony closed the evening's entertainment. Mr. Paur's direction showed the same earnestness and intelligence which have characterized it heretofore.

The Morning Advertiser.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1896.

Boston Symphony—Opera House.

The Boston Symphony gave its first New York concert for the season at the Metropolitan Opera House, and as though to make the beginning doubly effective the soloist of the evening was that pianist of pianists, Rosenthal.

The programme opened with Chalner's overture to his opera "Gwendoline." The work is comparatively new. It is decidedly Wagnerian in orchestration, heavy and dramatic. It ends with the melody being carried to a climax on the trombones. There was a precision and unanimity in the playing that showed how thoroughly Mr. Paur had trained his orchestra.

The second number of the programme was Chopin's concerto in E minor. And it was here that Rosenthal made his appearance. And how he did play that first movement, the allegro. The stunning runs, the arpeggi all were played as only this master can play them. He took the second movement, the romanza, with splendid delicacy and feeling. It contradicted in expressive terms the belief that Rosenthal is "hard." The softness of his touch was marvelous. The third movement is the vivace. As an encore Rosenthal played a transcription of a Schubert song. It was enthusiastically received, but the man with muscles of steel refused to play again.

The third number on the programme was Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," scored by Berlioz. The conclusion of the programme was the Schubert symphony in C major. It was a splendid close to an evening resplendent in musical perfection.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 15, 1896.

Academy of Music Concerts.
THE
Opening Sale of Tickets
To the
SERIES OF POPULAR
MATINEE CONCERTS
BY THE BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA,
EMIL PAUR, Conductor,
AT THE
Art Building, Montague Street,
Tuesday Evening, November 24,
8 P. M.
DATES OF THE MATINEES:
SATURDAYS DECEMBER 12, JANUARY 23,
FEBRUARY 27, MARCH 27.
ROSENTHAL, SOLOIST,
December 12.
COURSE TICKETS, $4.00, $3.00, $2 50.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, NOV. 21, 1896.

Mr Rosenthal's Illness Makes a Change in the Symphony Program—Notes About This Week's Amusements.

Half an hour before the beginning of the public rehearsal by the Boston symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon a note was received by the management to the effect that the illness of Mr Rosenthal, the soloist announced, made it unsafe for him to appear. A hurried effort was made to secure the services of Miss Lena Little, the soloist with the orchestra at the concert in Cambridge the previous evening, but she was also ill. Conductor Paur substituted the overture to Gwendoline by Chabrier in place of Mr Rosenthal's solo number, otherwise the program was the same as announced.

Mr Rosenthal will not appear this evening and the program given yesterday afternoon will be repeated. Mr Rosenthal will play with the orchestra at a later date. The soloist for next week's concert is Mr Carl Halir, the famous classical violinist from Berlin.

Boston Journal.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1896.

PIANIST ROSENTHAL ILL.

Disappointment of Auditors at Symphony Rehearsal Yesterday.

Half an hour before the beginning of the public rehearsal by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon, a note from Dr. H. H. A. Beach was received by the management to the effect that the illness of Mr. Rosenthal, the soloist announced, made it unsafe for him to appear. A hurried effort was made to secure the services of Miss Lena Little, the soloist with the orchestra at the concert in Cambridge the previous evening, but she was also ill. Conductor Paur substituted the overture to Gwendoline, by Chabrier, in place of Mr. Rosenthal's solo number; otherwise the program was the same as announced, the symphony being given first. Mr. Rosenthal will not appear this evening, and the program given yesterday afternoon will be repeated. Mr. Rosenthal will appear with the orchestra at a later date. The soloist for next week's concert is Mr. Carl Halir, the famous classical violinist from Berlin.

…, NOV. 15, 1896.

…SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

…E CONCERT IN CITY HALL.

A Brilliant Program Including Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Chabrier's "Gwendoline" Overture, and Bourgault-Ducoudray's "Burial of Ophelia" —Mr Sieveking Forgets His Orchestral Parts and Plays Chopin Solos in Place of His Concerto.

It is a long time since Springfield has heard such a superb concert as was given last night by the Boston symphony orchestra in City hall. It far surpassed the concert given last year by the same organization, for the reason that the program was richer, fresher, less made up of "inevitable" selections. This was a model of a program—a stunning new French overture, and an exquisite French tone poem, a brilliant yet unfamiliar Weber overture, and the more brilliant and very familiar Weber "Invitation to the Dance," by way of interludes, and to top off, the brightest and most popular of the Beethoven symphonies. What more could one ask for one evening? The only disappointment was the loss of the great Tschaikowsky concerto, which many had looked forward to as the feature of the evening. When in place of the player appeared the orator, many feared that "the disappearing pianist," as Mr Sieveking has been popularly known since his sudden flight during his last visit to America, had vanished through a trap-door. But no; it was only the orchestral parts which had vanished—Mr Sieveking had forgotten them in his hurry to catch a train—and the pianist fell back on his own resources and played a group of Chopin selections, which nearly reconciled the audience to their disappointment.

Doubtless Mr Sieveking would have appeared to better advantage if he had given the brilliant concerto, for the execution of which he is famous, but his solo playing, while showing a few imperfections that seemed to indicate a hasty change, demonstrated that he is a virtuoso of remarkable attainments, and withal a genuine artist. He played first the great Fantasie in F minor, a noble work of the grand order, and although his execution of the rapid passages was not so clear as we can imagine might ordinarily be the case, and although he did not warm up to this as to some of the later numbers, it was a broad and satisfying interpretation. Then came two etudes, op. 10, No 3, in E, and the black-key study, which was played with astonishing fire and brilliance. Then followed the Prelude in F, which was musically played, and to give full measure—only four pieces had been promised—he played the great Fantasie-Impromptu, both parts of which were excellently rendered. He responded to an encore with an effective and brilliant morceau, with which the reviewer is unfamiliar. The advertising agent of Mr Sieveking, who has dwelt so eloquently on his herculean frame, his gigantic hands and his unparalleled powers of piano smashing, does him an injustice, for he is a real musician, as well as a virtuoso of very great technic. Would that we might have had the Tschaikowsky concerto!

The chief feature of the orchestral program—Beethoven symphonies are always hors concours—was certainly the overture to "Gwendoline" by the French composer, Emmanuel Chabrier, whose untimely death two years ago has robbed us of more than is generally realized. It seems to us a mistake to lay so much stress as Mr Apthorp does in the analytical program, on the Wagnerism of this opera. The overture is certainly as French as possible, French in rhythm, in subject and especially French in orchestration. That Chabrier learned much from Wagner may be admitted, but he shows a singularly striking and original individuality of his own. This overture is a tremendously exciting work, strong and virile as it can be, and the orchestra made a greater effect in it than in any other number. The other modern French composition, "The Burial of Ophelia," by Louis-Albert Bourgault-Ducoudray, is beautifully contrasted with this, and is an exquisite and touching tone-poem, elegiac rather than tragic in character, and with the wonderful delicacy and simplicity of orchestral treatment in which the French are unrivaled, and which show a higher technical development than the heavy and complex orchestration of the German school. "The Burial of Ophelia" is tender and poetic, but by no means lugubrious, and its pathetic quality gave variety to a rather exuberant program.

Rather curiously, Weber appeared twice on the program, and both times with a musical bonbon. The comic opera overture, "Abu Hassan," written in 1811, when the composer was 25 years old, is a lively and original work, full of sparkle and melody. Would that people were writing comic opera overtures of that sort nowadays. It is rather surprising that the "Abu Hassan" overture has not been played more in this country, for in Germany it has been a great favorite ever since it was published. The "Invitation to the Dance," with Berlioz's dazzling orchestration, is one of the most popular selections in the orchestral repertory, and made an effective intermezzo between the dirge for Ophelia and the Beethoven symphony. Considering the make-up of the program, this was by all odds the best of all the Beethoven symphonies with which to close. It is short, it is small, it is easy to grasp. There are times when one shrinks from the "Eroica," or the seventh, but one is never too tired to take joy in the simple and sunny good humor of the eighth. Only one movement, the finale, comes anywhere near the level of the big symphonies, but each has a charm of its own. In the case of the graceful and flowing minuet, we hold with Wagner, rather than with Berlioz, who came as near to disparaging it as was possible for a Beethoven worshiper. The first movement is delightful because of its simplicity, its fine bits of melody, and the ingenious economy in the use of material. The symphony was well played throughout. The first two movements were taken at a very moderate tempo, while the minuet was, if anything, hurried a bit, and missed something of its rather graceful flow. The finale went with [illegible]

…good sales early in the week gave reason for expecting, but was larger than that of last year, and we hope that the managers of the orchestra will not give Springfield up as too benighted for conversion. The city is large enough to support one concert like this every year, and it ought to do so. It is the finest music to be had in the country, and a powerful influence for musical culture. It would be interesting to see the experiment of lowering the prices, or at least, of increasing the proportion of dollar seats. The managers have the theory that there are only about so many people in Springfield who will go anyway, and that they are willing to pay whatever may be asked. They may be right, but unfortunately a love for music does not always go hand in hand with financial means, and there are many families that would gladly be present in mass instead of being represented by a delegation of one, if they could afford it. It was noticeable that almost every dollar seat in the house was sold. It would, at all events, be more inspiring to have the house packed at a lower price, and we should very much like to see the experiment made.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1896.

Boston Symphony Concert.

THE first New York concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season took place on Friday evening last, the 13th inst., at the Metropolitan Opera House. Rosenthal was the soloist.

Despite the noble virtues of this incomparable band, which brought forward, by the way, a new overture, that to Gwendoline, by Emmanuel Chabrier, it was evident from the outset that public interest centred around Rosenthal. He played the Chopin E minor concerto, that long, romantic poem freighted with melodies which seem to float half way between the pale, soft moonlight and our terrestrial space, and closing with a rondo, which in its ornate difficulty is the invitation as it is often the despair of the technician.

He played not alone superbly but most exquisitely. There is a war cry abroad about lack of native feeling. Let it rage. Rosenthal's robust, aggressive personality is an exterior menace to poetry, no doubt, but what boots it to rasp on this string if a man can so convincingly adapt the Shakesperian adage: "Assume a virtue," &c., as did this artist in the E minor concerto? If Rosenthal cannot in truth furnish an echo for every phrase of beauty in his inmost soul he can through a marvelous control of every technical device of lingering legato, of unsurpassable nuance, by power of brief, delicate phrases that come like little crystal sobs, produce the effect of veracious sentiment in a wondrously vivid degree. It is hypercriticism to seek to delve into the workings of this man's spirit, a man who gives us so much that is real, wonderful and magical beyond his brethren, and with whom the real feeling may only after all be covered up by the more dazzling, daring qualities which smite us with Rosenthal as with no other pianist. The one flaw—and it was redeemed later in the romance and larghetto—came in the first movement. Those delicate legatissimo runs with which Chopin has embellished his first lovely melody the pianist wound up with a sharp staccato, converting the aerial poetic tracery into a species of tour de force at war with the spirit of the theme. But the second movement throughout was exquisite.

And when it came to the rondo, then was Rosenthal Rosenthal. He set in like a hero who knew he had a field to conquer, and knew equally well that he could do it. He did and won his wreath well, and the house came down and shouted a hundred bravos and recalled the third and then the fourth time until this giant of the keyboard had to give an encore, playing Schubert's Der Lindenbaum.

The Metropolitan acoustics were bad for the piano, muffling the tone somewhat, but Rosenthal had the fortune to play with a marvelous orchestra, held in hand by Mr. Paur, subordinate to every shade of nuance after a masterly fashion. The original Chopin orchestration was used, a solid enough support for the texture of the solo.

Other numbers for the orchestra were Berlioz's orchestration of Weber's Invitation to the Dance, in which the virtuosity of the woodwind was admirable, the strings as ever being perfection, and the big C major Schubert symphony No. 9, which might better have come earlier on the program. After the scintillant brilliancy of the Chopin rondo and the buoyant Invitation to the Dance, the large-souled, lengthy symphony did not strike the prevailing vein, but it was nobly played, and the delicate sharpness of rhythm obtained by Mr. Paur in the andante con moto was delicious.

The Chabrier overture, richly scored, was played with superb sonority, and a fragmentary theme of melodious but somewhat conventional pattern was worked up by Mr. Paur to an imposing climax at the close.

The Boston band was never in better order, and sympathy reigned fully at this concert between Mr. Paur and his men. After the tremendous sonority patterned after Wagner which marked the Chabrier overture the fragility and clarity of the Chopin concerto accompaniment formed one of the most finished contrasts in orchestral work New York has ever enjoyed. There was a large audience charged with enthusiasm, and Madame Melba sat in a box to swell the applause for Rosenthal and the Boston Symphony Band.

SUNDA… …OVEMBER 22.

…curious slips on the part of the annotator of …grammes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra …ave made many people in the audience at the Metropolitan Opera House, last Friday evening a week, rub their eyes in bewilderment. They saw in Mr. Apthorpe's little terra-cotta pamphlet, first, that "Chopin wrote only two works (his concertos for pianoforte) with orchestral accompaniment," and, second, and more amazing still, that of Schubert's great C major symphony nothing was known "till the MS. score was discovered in Vienna, long after Schubert's death, by Sir George Grove"! Surely, these two statements are the result of slips of the pen, for Chopin's brilliant polonaise for piano, with orchestral accompaniment, is doubtless as well known in Boston as in New-York; and if the variations in "La ci darem la Mano" are not now heard in the concert-rooms of the Hub, they are at least familiar to even cursory readers of musical history as the occasion of Schumann's greeting to the youthful Chopin, "Hats off, gentlemen, a genius!" Also, there is the "Krakowiak." The Boston commentator was nodding deeply when he confused Sir George Grove's valuable later researches into Schubert's life and works with the famous visit of Robert Schumann to Ferdinand Schubert in Vienna in 1838 (ten years after the composer's death), his discovery of the great symphony, his sending of it to Leipsic, and Mendelssohn's triumphant production of it in the Gewandhaus there in 1839. These are well-known passages in musical history, and many friends of the Boston orchestra must have made their mental corrections as they read their programme-books at last week's concert; but, as annotated programmes are for the instruction of the public, and not for a test of their knowledge, it will be well to have some corrections made the next time these paragraphs are printed.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Boston
Symphony
Orchestra

(90 Performers.)
MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
Sixteenth Season, 1896-97. Twelfth Season in Phil…

FIVE CONCERTS.
TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 10.
MONDAY EVENING, DEC. 7.
MONDAY EVENING, JAN. 18.
MONDAY EVENING, FEB. 22.
MONDAY EVENING, MARCH 22,
At 8 o'clock.

Solo Artists.
Mme. MELBA
Mme. CARRENO
Mr. POL PLANCON
Mr. BEN DAVIES
Mr. CARL HALIR
(The famous Violin Virtuoso from Berlin.)

Proscenium boxes seating eight, and the new boxes seating six and four, will be sold at $75, $63, and $42, respectively, for the series of five concerts.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7, $5, and $3.50, according to location.

The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, October 19, at Fischer's Music Store, 1221 Chestnut street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

FIVE CONC…
Nov. 10, Dec. 7, …

SOLO ART…
Mme. MELBA, M… POL PLANSON, Mr. BEN DAVIE…

Season tickets, with reserve… of five concerts, $7, $5, and $… cation, now on sale.

A limited number of single tickets… first concert, with Mme. MELBA… Thursday morning, at Fischer's M… Chestnut street.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

MELBA

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FIRST CONCERT,
TUESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 10, at 8.15
SOLOIST:
Madame MELBA

ALL RESERVED SEATS SOLD.

Admissions at $1.00 and 50c., and amphitheatre at 25c., on sale at 1221 Chestnut st., Monday, November 9, at 9 A. M.

THE SALE OF SEASON TICKETS FOR THE FIVE CONCERTS BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC OPENS THIS (MONDAY) MORNING, AT 9 O'CLOCK, AT FISCHER'S, 1221 CHESTNUT STREET.

The Republican.

SPRINGFIELD, SUNDAY, NOV. 15, 1896.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

THE CONCERT IN CITY HALL.

A Brilliant Program Including Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Chabrier's "Gwendoline" Overture, and Bourgault-Ducoudray's "Burial of Ophelia"—Mr Sieveking Forgets His Orchestral Parts and Plays Chopin Solos in Place of His Concerto.

It is a long time since Springfield has heard such a superb concert as was given last night by the Boston symphony orchestra in City hall. It far surpassed the concert given last year by the same organization, for the reason that the program was richer, fresher, less made up of "inevitable" selections. This was a model of a program—a stunning new French overture, and an exquisite French tone poem, a brilliant yet unfamiliar Weber overture, and the more brilliant and very familiar Weber "Invitation to the Dance," by way of interludes, and to top off, the brightest and most popular of the Beethoven symphonies. What more could one ask for one evening? The only disappointment was the loss of the great Tschaikowsky concerto, which many had looked forward to as the feature of the evening. When in place of the player appeared the orator, many feared that "the disappearing pianist," as Mr Sieveking has been popularly known since his sudden flight during his last visit to America, had vanished through a trap-door. But no; it was only the orchestral parts which had vanished—Mr Sieveking had forgotten them in his hurry to catch a train—and the pianist fell back on his own resources and played a group of Chopin selections, which nearly reconciled the audience to their disappointment.

Doubtless Mr Sieveking would have appeared to better advantage if he had given the brilliant concerto, for the execution of which he is famous, but his solo playing, while showing a few imperfections that seemed to indicate a hasty change, demonstrated that he is a virtuoso of remarkable attainments, and withal a genuine artist. He played first the great Fantasie in F minor, a noble work of the grand order, and although his execution of the rapid passages was not so clear as we can imagine might ordinarily be the case, and although he did not warm up to this as to some of the later numbers, it was a broad and satisfying interpretation. Then came two etudes, op. 10, No 3, in E, and the black-key study, which was played with astonishing fire and brilliance. Then followed the Prelude in F, which was musically played, and to give full measure—only four pieces had been promised—he played the great Fantasie-Impromptu, both parts of which were excellently rendered. He responded to an encore with an effective and brilliant morceau, with which the reviewer is unfamiliar. The advertising agent of Mr Sieveking, who has dwelt so eloquently on his herculean frame, his gigantic hands and his unparalleled powers of piano smashing, does him an injustice, for he is a real musician, as well as a virtuoso of very great technic. Would that we might have had the Tschaikowsky concerto!

The chief feature of the orchestral program—Beethoven symphonies are always hors concours—was certainly the overture to "Gwendoline" by the French composer, Emmanuel Chabrier, whose untimely death two years ago has robbed us of more than is generally realized. It seems to us a mistake to lay so much stress as Mr Apthorp does in the analytical program, on the Wagnerism of this opera. The overture is certainly as French as possible, French in rhythm, in subject and especially French in orchestration. That Chabrier learned much from Wagner may be admitted, but he shows a singularly striking and original individuality of his own. This overture is a tremendously exciting work, strong and virile as it can be, and the orchestra made a greater effect in it than in any other number. The other modern French composition, "The Burial of Ophelia," by Louis-Albert Bourgault-Ducoudray, is beautifully contrasted with this, and is an exquisite and touching tone-poem, elegiac rather than tragic in character, and with the wonderful delicacy and simplicity of orchestral treatment in which the French are unrivaled, and which show a higher technical development than the heavy and complex orchestration of the German school. "The Burial of Ophelia" is tender and poetic, but by no means lugubrious, and its pathetic quality gave variety to a rather exuberant program.

Rather curiously, Weber appeared twice on the program, and both times with a musical bonbon. The comic opera overture, "Abu Hassan," written in 1811, when the composer was 25 years old, is a lively and original work, full of sparkle and melody. Would that people were writing comic opera overtures of that sort nowadays. It is rather surprising that the "Abu Hassan" overture has not been played more in this country, for in Germany it has been a great favorite ever since it was published. The "Invitation to the Dance," with Berlioz's dazzling orchestration, is one of the most popular selections in the orchestral repertory, and made an effective intermezzo between the dirge for Ophelia and the Beethoven symphony. Considering the make-up of the program, this was by all odds the best of all the Beethoven symphonies with which to close. It is short, it is small, it is easy to grasp. There are times when one shrinks from the "Eroica," or the seventh, but one is never too tired to take joy in the simple and sunny good humor of the eighth. Only one movement, the finale, comes anywhere near the level of the big symphonies, but each has a charm of its own. In the case of the graceful and flowing minuet, we hold with Wagner, rather than with Berlioz, who came as near to disparaging it as was possible for a Beethoven worshiper. The first movement is delightful because of its simplicity, its fine bits of melody, and the ingenious economy in the use of material. The symphony was well played throughout. The first two movements were taken at a very moderate tempo, while the minuet was, if anything, hurried a bit, and missed something of its proper graceful flow. The finale went with much dash and snap.

The audience was not quite so large as the good sales early in the week gave reason for expecting, but was larger than that of last year, and we hope that the managers of the orchestra will not give Springfield up as too benighted for conversion. The city is large enough to support one concert like this every year, and it ought to do so. It is the finest music to be had in the country, and a powerful influence for musical culture. It would be interesting to see the experiment of lowering the prices, or at least, of increasing the proportion of dollar seats. The managers have the theory that there are only about so many people in Springfield who will go anyway, and that they are willing to pay whatever may be asked. They may be right, but unfortunately a love for music does not always go hand in hand with financial means, and there are many families that would gladly be present in mass instead of being represented by a delegation of one, if they could afford it. It was noticeable that almost every dollar seat in the house was sold. It would, at all events, be more inspiring to have the house packed at a lower price, and we should very much like to see the experiment made.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1896.

Boston Symphony Concert.

THE first New York concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season took place on Friday evening last, the 13th inst., at the Metropolitan Opera House. Rosenthal was the soloist.

Despite the noble virtues of this incomparable band, which brought forward, by the way, a new overture, that to Gwendoline, by Emmanuel Chabrier, it was evident from the outset that public interest centred around Rosenthal. He played the Chopin E minor concerto, that long, romantic poem freighted with melodies which seem to float half way between the pale, soft moonlight and our terrestrial space, and closing with a rondo, which in its ornate difficulty is the invitation as it is often the despair of the technician.

He played not alone superbly but most exquisitely. There is a war cry abroad about lack of native feeling. Let it rage. Rosenthal's robust, aggressive personality is an exterior menace to poetry, no doubt, but what boots it to rasp on this string if a man can so convincingly adapt the Shakesperian adage: "Assume a virtue," &c., as did this artist in the E minor concerto? If Rosenthal cannot in truth furnish an echo for every phrase of beauty in his inmost soul he can through a marvelous control of every technical device of lingering legato, of unsurpassable nuance, by power of brief, delicate phrases that come like little crystal sobs, produce the effect of veracious sentiment in a wondrously vivid degree. It is hypercriticism to seek to delve into the workings of this man's spirit, a man who gives us so much that is real, wonderful and magical beyond his brethren, and with whom the real feeling may only after all be covered up by the more dazzling, daring qualities which smite us with Rosenthal as with no other pianist. The one flaw—and it was redeemed later in the romance and larghetto—came in the first movement. Those delicate legatissimo runs with which Chopin has embellished his first lovely melody the pianist wound up with a sharp staccato, converting the aerial poetic tracery into a species of tour de force at war with the spirit of the theme. But the second movement throughout was exquisite.

And when it came to the rondo, then was Rosenthal Rosenthal. He set in like a hero who knew he had a field to conquer, and knew equally well that he could do it. He did and won his wreath well, and the house came down and shouted a hundred bravos and recalled the third and then the fourth time until this giant of the keyboard had to give an encore, playing Schubert's Der Lindenbaum.

The Metropolitan acoustics were bad for the piano, muffling the tone somewhat, but Rosenthal had the fortune to play with a marvelous orchestra, held in hand by Mr. Paur, subordinate to every shade of nuance after a masterly fashion. The original Chopin orchestration was used, a solid enough support for the texture of the solo.

Other numbers for the orchestra were Berlioz's orchestration of Weber's Invitation to the Dance, in which the virtuosity of the woodwind was admirable, the strings as ever being perfection, and the big C major Schubert symphony No. 9, which might better have come earlier on the program. After the scintillant brilliancy of the Chopin rondo and the buoyant Invitation to the Dance, the large-souled, lengthy symphony did not strike the prevailing vein, but it was nobly played, and the delicate sharpness of rhythm obtained by Mr. Paur in the andante con moto was delicious.

The Chabrier overture, richly scored, was played with superb sonority, and a fragmentary theme of melodious but somewhat conventional pattern was worked up by Mr. Paur to an imposing climax at the close.

The Boston band was never in better order, and sympathy reigned fully at this concert between Mr. Paur and his men. After the tremendous sonority patterned after Wagner which marked the Chabrier overture the fragility and clarity of the Chopin concerto accompaniment formed one of the most finished contrasts in orchestral work New York has ever enjoyed. There was a large audience charged with enthusiasm, and Madame Melba sat in a box to swell the applause for Rosenthal and the Boston Symphony Band.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 22,

curious slips on the part of the annotator of grammes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ve made many people in the audience at the Metropolitan Opera House, last Friday evening a week, rub their eyes in bewilderment. They saw in Mr. Apthorpe's little terra-cotta pamphlet, first, that "Chopin wrote only two works (his concertos for pianoforte) with orchestral accompaniment," and, second, and more amazing still, that of Schubert's great C major symphony nothing was known "till the MS. score was discovered in Vienna, long after Schubert's death, by Sir George Grove"! Surely, these two statements are the result of slips of the pen, for Chopin's brilliant polonaise for piano, with orchestral accompaniment, is doubtless as well known in Boston as in New-York; and if the variations in "La ci darem la Mano" are not now heard in the concert-rooms of the Hub, they are at least familiar to even cursory readers of musical history as the occasion of Schumann's greeting to the youthful Chopin, "Hats off, gentlemen, a genius!" Also, there is the "Krakowiak." The Boston commentator was nodding deeply when he confused Sir George Grove's valuable later researches into Schubert's life and works with the famous visit of Robert Schumann to Ferdinand Schubert in Vienna in 1838 (ten years after the composer's death), his discovery of the great symphony, his sending of it to Leipsic, and Mendelssohn's triumphant production of it in the Gewandhaus there in 1839. These are well-known passages in musical history, and many friends of the Boston orchestra must have made their mental corrections as they read their programme-books at last week's concert; but, as annotated programmes are for the instruction of the public, and not for a test of their knowledge, it will be well to have some corrections made the next time these paragraphs are printed.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(90 Performers.)
MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
Sixteenth Season, 1896-97. Twelfth Season in Phil

FIVE CONCERTS.
TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 10.
MONDAY EVENING, DEC. 7.
MONDAY EVENING, JAN. 18.
MONDAY EVENING, FEB. 22.
MONDAY EVENING, MARCH 22,
At 8 o'clock.

Solo Artists:
Mme. MELBA
Mme. CARRENO
Mr. POL PLANCON
Mr. BEN DAVIES
Mr. CARL HALIR
(The famous Violin Virtuoso from Berlin.)

Proscenium boxes seating eight, and the new boxes seating six and four, will be sold at $75, $63, and $42, respectively, for the series of five concerts.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7, $5, and $3.50, according to location.

The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, October 19, at Fischer's Music Store, 1221 Chestnut street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FIVE CONCERTS, at 8 o'clock.
Nov. 10, Dec. 7, Jan. 18, Feb. 22, Mar. 22.

SOLO ARTISTS:
Mme. MELBA, Mme. CARRENO, Mr. POL PLANCON, Mr. BEN DAVIES, Mr. CARL HALIR.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7, $5, and $3.50, according to location, now on sale.

A limited number of single tickets for the first concert, with Mme. MELBA as soloist, ready Thursday morning, at Fischer's Music Store, 1221 Chestnut street.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

10/31/96

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MELBA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FIRST CONCERT,
TUESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 10, at 8.15.
SOLOIST:
Madame MELBA

ALL RESERVED SEATS SOLD.

Admissions at $1.00 and 50c., and amphitheatre at 25c., on sale at 1221 Chestnut st., Monday, November 9, at 9 A. M.

n6t

11/9/96

THE SALE OF SEASON TICKETS FOR THE FIVE CONCERTS BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC OPENS THIS (MONDAY) MORNING, AT 9 O'CLOCK, AT FISCHER'S, 1221 CHESTNUT STREET.

11/9/96

[52]

[illegible] afternoon, a [illegible] management to [illegible] the illness of Mr. Rosenthal, [illegible] announced, made it unsafe for [illegible] appear. A hurried effort was made [illegible] the services of Miss Lena Little, [illegible] with the orchestra at the con[illegible] Cambridge the previous evening, [illegible] also ill. Conductor Paur sub[illegible] the overture to Gwendoline by [illegible] in place of Mr. Rosenthal's solo [illegible] otherwise the programme was [illegible] as announced. Mr. Rosenthal [illegible] appear this evening and the pro[illegible] on yesterday afternoon will be [illegible] Mr. Rosenthal will play with [illegible] orchestra at a later date. The soloist [illegible] next week's concert is Carl Halir.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 22, 1896.

Rosenthal Unable to Play at Symphony Concert.

Although Mr Moriz Rosenthal was unable to appear at last week's symphony, and thereby disappointed thousands, his illness will be of short duration, and his manager is sanguine that the artist will give his piano recital here this week, as already arranged for. Mr Paur endeavored to get Miss Lena Little as soloist for Friday afternoon, but she too was sick, and the program was then made up entirely of orchestral numbers, Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline" being played instead of the scheduled piano concerto. The other selections were as follows: Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World;" overture, "Barber of Bagdad," Peter Cornelius, and prelude to part III, "Cricket on the Hearth," Karl Goldmark. "Gwendoline" closed the program.

The Chabrier overture does not improve upon a second hearing. It was given at the second symphony concert this season, and although skilfully orchestrated it does not show any special musical value, and besides being of a theatric character suggests the Wagnerian influence throughout its style of composition. There is no fault to be found with the work of the orchestra, for the interpretation was evidently in thorough accord with the ideas of the composer.

Mr Paur began the program with Dvorak's "New World" symphony, a work, as is well known, made up principally of melodies typical of the negro music of the south. The composition has been so frequently analyzed and discussed since it was written, about three years ago, that the performance by the orchestra is all that need be mentioned now. The notable part of the interpretation was in the second movement, which was faultlessly played. The pianissimo introduction, with the melodic theme by the English horn and the united accompaniment by the strings; the elaborate development, and the modulations into different keys; the return, and the coda, were each given with beautiful effect. The tripping episodes of the fourth movement and the stirring finale were each excellent in strongly contrasting styles.

The overture to "Barber of Bagdad" is full of catchy eccentricities in scoring, and the themes are fairly juggled by the different contingents of the band. The changes were charmingly made and without perceptible breaks, the magnificent team work of the strings being very conspicuous for daintiness, precision and smoothness of tonality. The wind instruments gave out the slow themes with admirable sonority.

"The Cricket on the Hearth" prelude, performed here for the first time, is a finely contrasted work, opening pompously and suddenly running into more joyous moments. Then come dainty little duet passages by bassoon and clarinet, followed by a lively dance theme, which is the personification of musical vivacity.

The audience thoroughly enjoyed the work, and the members of the band also appeared to take pleasure in it. The tone coloring of the opening phrases was deliciously harmonic and the violin contingent was all that could be desired in setting forth the jolly little melodies which continually sprang up from the mere sober musical background furnished by the basses.

This week's soloist will be the famous Berlin violinist; Mr Carl Halir. The program will include the overture, "Manfred," Schumann; entr'actes from "Carmen," Bizet; symphony No. 4, Tschaikowsky.

Gazette

BOSTON SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 22.

The Symphony Concert.

Owing to the illness of Mr. Rosenthal, he did not appear at the Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall. The changed programme was:

Overture, "Barber of Bagdad"........Cornelius
Overture, "Gwendoline" ....Chabrier
Entr' acte, "Cricket on the Hearth"...Goldmark
Symphony, "From the New World"....Dvorak

There is little that calls for extended notice in this programme. The Goldmark entr' acte suggests grace and vivacity in its brevity; it is a most attractive specimen brick, but it seems cruel to the composer to wrest it from its proper place and serve it up in its blushing loneliness. Age does not add fresh beauties to the Dvorak symphony; it is a large and dignified work, but it does not inspire joy. It was delightfully played by the orchestra with spirit, grace and the rarest finish.

The soloist for the next concert is Mr. Carl Halir, the famous Berlin violinist.

[illegible]

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1896.

Fifth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall Last Evening—A Program of No Marked Distinction.

The program of the Symphony concert last evening, Mr. Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Symphony No. 5, in E minor..........Dvorak
Overture to "Der Barbier von Bagdad," Cornelius
Intermezzo from "Das Heimchen am Herd" .... Goldmark
(First time in Boston.)
Overture to "Gwendolime" ....Chabrier

Mr. Morits Rosenthal was prevented by sickness from appearing as pianist, to the great disappointment of all. He will undoubtedly be able to give his recital Tuesday afternoon.

* * *

Let us examine a few statements of fact made by Mr. William F. Apthorp in the Program Book of the 21st.

* * *

Mr. Apthorp says Cornelius's "Barber of Bagdad" was brought out at Weimar in 1859.

It was produced at Weimar in 1858 (December 15).

* * *

Mr. Apthorp says Cornelius died October 24, 1874.

But Cornelius died October 26, 1374.

* * *

Mr. Apthorp says Goldmark was born December 17, 1840.

As a matter of fact, Goldmark was born May 18, 1830.

* * *

The overture to "The Barber of Bagdad" has a history, but Mr. Apthorp did not see fit to tell the story in the Program Book, although there is information concerning the "dotted triplet," "swept syncopated chords," and "a new counter-phrase in the violins and sextolet arpegg in the violas." Ouf!

This overture was composed by Cornelius after the first production of the opera, and he sketched it only for piano, for four hands. Liszt afterward orchestrated it. The whole instrumental part of the opera, by the way, was rewritten for a larger orchestra by Tausig, but when the opera was given for the first time in America (New York, Jan. 3, 1890) the score used was the one edited by Mottl.

Mr. Apthrop speaks of "strong chords in the brass and bassoons." Why does he not add that this pompous motive is the one that accompanies the naming of the Barber by name throughout the opera: Abul Hassan Ali Ebn Bekar. This phrase is used only in connection with the name, and always to produce a serio-comic effect. As Mr. Krehbiel says, "He (Cornelius) does not label the Barber with it, and compel the orchestra to announce his entrance like a footman or usher. It stands, not for him, but for his capacious name." The second and charming chief theme is taken from the first scene of the opera. With the exception of these themes and the ingenious counterpoint against the second theme, in which last night the strings were too powerful when the melody was sustained by wind instruments, this overture is like unto a mighty rattling of dry bones. What a sky-assailing prelude to a comic opera! The thought of Hanslick's sneer was in the mind: "This barber shaved with guillotines not with razors." The developments are for the most part sandy, and the capricious, changing rhythms jolt when they try to be piquant.

* * *

Goldmark's opera has been praised extravagantly and assailed bitterly in Germany. Some say it was inspired by the success of "Hansel und Gretel," although it is my impression that Goldmark was at work on his "Cricket" before Humperdinck's opera saw the footlights. With the opera we have now nothing to do. The entr'acte in concert is absolute music, and this particular entr'acte is cheap stuff, unworthy of the composer of the "Sakuntala," "Prometheus" and "Sappho" overtures. What in the world has the fugued movement that precedes the folk song to do with the affair? It is thrown in as though it were a sop to pedantry. The folk-song is "Weisst Du, wie viel Sternlein Stehen," if I am not mistaken. There is conventional and dull development of this theme, until the inevitable apotheosis of the tune with roar and bang and calcium lights. Then comes a beer-hall dance, vulgar, noisy, stupid, and the wretched thing ends with a general throwing about of furniture and a hurling of empty beer pots at the tired fiddlers. It seems incredible that Goldmark should have written such obscene music.

* * *

It was a pleasure to hear again the stirring, superb overture to "Gwendoline," which was passionately played. It is not necessary to be a negrophile to enjoy the symphony by Dvorak, which contains much that is beautiful. There are two Dvoraks in this work, one the naive Bohemian, the other the artful musician of these latter days, who prepares his simplicity with infinite pains. A composer of distinguished musical feeling and accomplishments said last night of the Largo, "It is meretricious." He spoke unerringly the one, the only word.

PHILIP HALE.

* * *

The sickness of Rosenthal disappointed many. Friday morning he was feverish and he stayed in his room hoping to be well enough to appear at the Public Rehearsal; but his physician forbade him to leave his bed.

I am told that few pianists have such an intimate knowledge of the construction of the piano as that enjoyed by Rosenthal. He took a practical course some time ago in a piano factory, until he knew the parts of the instrument. So particular is he in his choice, that he spent day after day in the Steinway wareroom in New York before the chosen piano suited him. One pianist will say, "This is too hard;" another "This is too weak;" but how many are able to put a finger here and there, talking intelligently of lead or the pricking of a hammer?

* * *

It is a singular fact that while Rosenthal is not characteristically emotional in his playing he provokes emotional outbursts from such writers as Mr. Huneker. Witness this extract from the Morning Advertiser (N. Y.) of last week:

"Rosenthal revels in the material splendor of his art. In his dreams are no pallid twilights, no haunted thickets, no brakes wherein hunts the nymph with slim busts. He sees firm, cool marble temples, and when the stars shine their light is frosty and glittering. His playing is linear perfection. No Tyrian purple dyes the miraculous fretwork of his musical mantle. He is electric, dazzling, but seldom melting; and as almost any school girl today plays with 'expression'—vague quantity—Rosenthal is all the more welcome. What I cannot comprehend is the poverty of brain that, because a Paderewski, a Joseffy or a D'Albert are admired, that same admiration inhabits one from admiring Rosenthal.

"Blessed are the catholic, for they shall enjoy more than the bigoted. In the kingdom of piano playing there are many mansions, and Rosenthal has a big one all to himself, with his name over the door in bronze letters."

* * *

The program of the Symphony Concert Saturday night will be as follows: Overture to "Manfred," Schumann; Entr'actes from "Carmen," Bizet; Tschaikowsky's 4th symphony. The soloist will be Mr. Carl Halir, violinist.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. C., NO. 145.

SUNDAY. NOV. 22. 1896.

SOLOIST ROSENTHAL WAS ABSENT.

Made Necessary a Rearrangement of Last Night's Symphony Concert Programme.

Despite the non-appearance of Mr. Moriz Rosenthal, owing to sudden illness, and the miserable state of the weather, there was a surprisingly large audience in attendance at last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall. The absence of the soloist caused an entire overturning of the programme, which had been prepared with the view of affording desirable contrasts to Chopin's T minor concerto, which was to come between the Cornelius overture and Goldmark's "Cricket on the Hearth" prelude, the Dvorak symphony appropriately bringing the concert to an end. As it was, the arrangement was as follows:

Symphony, "From the New World".....Dvorak
Overture, "The Barber of Bagdad"...Cornelius
Prelude to part 3 of "The Cricket on the Hearth" .... Goldmark
Overture, "Gwendoline"..............Chabrier

The Goldmark selection was given for the first time here. It is scarcely worthy the reputation and the skill of the composer, notwithstanding the effectiveness with which it is scored. The themes are uninteresting, and the prelude, as a whole, suggests very much ado about nothing. It opens vigorously enough with a stately subject, which is cleverly treated fugally, but which is dry and unattractive. It breaks into an old-fashioned melody of the German folk-song order, which is elaborately developed and varied, and is followed by a tripping bit of pretty commonplace of no marked originality, with which it winds up. It is true that it pertains to comic opera, but if the composer's name were not attached to it, no one would have guessed that it could possibly be by Goldmark, so lacking in grace of style, beauty of harmony and warmth of sentiment is it, to say nothing of the stiffness of its aspect of musical patchwork.

The Cornelius overture obtained an exceptionally brilliant and finely colored reading from Mr. Paur and a splendid performance from the orchestra. The symphony, also, had one of the most thoughtful and effective interpretations that it has had here, but it is as difficult as ever to discover wherein its themes are in any wise American or in the remotest degree typical of the negro melodies of the South.

If the themes in the largo are anything, they are distinctly and characteristically Scotch, while the principal subject of the scherzo is as decidedly Spanish in rhythm and style. The finale has a marked Gaelic suggestiveness, and in one place falls into an unmistakable Irish jig. However, leaving all question of national color out of consideration, the work is wholly interesting, improves on acquaintance, and is thoroughly pleasing in the hearing.

The Charbrier overture deserved the profound impression it made when it was first given, by its fine, its lavishly rich orchestral coloring, its strongly-marked individuality and the immense fervor with which the composer has sustained the passionate pace at which he starts out. The sympathetic and spirited reading of the work by Mr. Paur, and the incomparable virtuosity with which the orchestra overcame its difficulties made the performance stirringly effective.

The programme for next week is: Overture, "Manfred," Schumann; entr'actes from "Carmen," Bizet; symphony No. 4, Tschaikowsky, No. 4, first time. Mr. Carl Halir is to be the soloist.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 22, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Owing to the sudden illness of Mr. Rosenthal, who was to have played the Chopin Concerto No. 1, the programme of the fifth concert in the Symphony series last night was somewhat rearranged, the Dvorak symphony coming first and Chabrier's "Gwendoline" overture replacing the concerto.

The Dvorak symphony No. 5, styled "From the New World," has been heard here only once before, if we remember aright. It was written in 1893, and is based largely on negro melodies, which naturally make it of quite a modern order. At several points the Southern folk songs are prominently suggested; but again, the composer appears to have wandered off from his text, purposely, no doubt. To the casual listener, the third movement is by far the most interesting because of the general lightness and tunefulness. It is a pretty scherzo, which gradually develops into a lively dance-like movement. The fourth movement is thoroughly unconventional and of a much stronger character than the others. The orchestration is rich and sonorous, and, although the working out is rather long and the dainty themes are frequently repeated, it has much to interest, the musician especially.

The one novelty on the programme was the prelude to Act III. of Goldmark's "The Cricket on the Hearth." Like many other fragments of such works heard at these concerts, it is somewhat difficult to judge of the general excellence, or otherwise of the whole work. In the present case we are told that its success was instantaneous when presented in Berlin in June of this year. The prelude heard last night is of much dignity and rich orchestration, and the development calls into play several charming combinations of instrumentation. The music is of a rather light character, but if the entire score is as tuneful and vivacious as this prelude, the opera must be decidedly worth listening to. The other two numbers on the programme were the overture to the "Barber of Bagdad" and the overture to "Gwendoline."

At next week's concert a new symphony will be heard—the Tschaikowski No. 4—and Carl Halir will be the soloist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 22, 1896.

The fifth Symphony programme probably was to derive its chief value in the eyes of most people from the fact that its second number was Chopin's first, or E minor, pianoforte concerto, to be played by Mr. Moriz Rosenthal, who would make his reentrance therein and show what changes hnd come over the spirit of his dreams and his waking hours since he was last heard here as a "phenomenal" youth. But there was great disappointment, because he was medically certified as unequal to the task of playing, necessitating a change of programme.

But the musical value of the concert did not lie in this one number by any means, although there was only one thing new in Mr. Paur's selections, which were Peter Cornelius's "Barber of Bagdad" overture, an entr'acte from Goldmark's "Cricket on the Hearth," and Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony, together with Chabrier's "Gwendolen" overture, which was repeated in place of the concerto. The Goldmark piece was truly delightful, because, while orchestrated with its author's taste, skill and diversity, it was not pretentious and did not rise above its subject. It is generally vivacious, but contains however a charming folk-song-like bit, which suggests the popular "Mein Schatz" of the song-books, and is worked up to a high pitch of happy excitement at the close. Mr. Paur and the orchestra evidently did their best to atone for the loss of the concerto, and the playing was all of the finest quality in technique and in art.

The next programme will present Schumann's "Manfred" overture, the entr'actes from Bizet's "Carmen" and Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, which has not been heard here yet. There will also be a soloist, but the engagement is not announced.

Howard Malcom Ticknor.

ton Transcript

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1896.

Rosenthal Unable to Appear.

Half an hour before the beginning of the public rehearsal by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon, a note was received by the management to the effect that the illness of Mr. Rosenthal, the soloist announced, made it unsafe for him to appear. A hurried effort was made to secure the services of Miss Lena Little, the soloist with the orchestra at the concert in Cambridge the previous evening, but she was also ill. Conductor Paur substituted the overture to Gwendoline by Chabrier in place of Mr. Rosenthal's solo number, otherwise the programme was the same as announced. Mr. Rosenthal will not appear this evening and the programme given yesterday afternoon will be repeated. Mr. Rosenthal will play with the orchestra at a later date. The soloist for next week's concert is Carl Halir.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 22, 1896.

Rosenthal Unable to Play at Symphony Concert.

Although Mr Moriz Rosenthal was unable to appear at last week's symphony, and thereby disappointed thousands, his illness will be of short duration, and his manager is sanguine that the artist will give his piano recital here this week, as already arranged for. Mr Paur endeavored to get Miss Lena Little as soloist for Friday afternoon, but she too was sick, and the program was then made up entirely of orchestral numbers, Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline" being played instead of the scheduled piano concerto. The other selections were as follows: Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World;" overture, "Barber of Bagdad," Peter Cornelius, and prelude to part III, "Cricket on the Hearth," Karl Goldmark. "Gwendoline" closed the program.

The Chabrier overture does not improve upon a second hearing. It was given at the second symphony concert this season, and although skilfully orchestrated it does not show any special musical value, and besides being of a theatric character suggests the Wagnerian influence throughout its style of composition. There is no fault to be found with the work of the orchestra, for the interpretation was evidently in thorough accord with the ideas of the composer.

Mr Paur began the program with Dvorak's "New World" symphony, a work, as is well known, made up principally of melodies typical of the negro music of the south. The composition has been so frequently analyzed and discussed since it was written, about three years ago, that the performance by the orchestra is all that need be mentioned now. The notable part of the interpretation was in the second movement, which was faultlessly played. The pianissimo introduction, with the melodic theme by the English horn and the united accompaniment by the strings; the elaborate development, and the modulations into different keys; the return, and the coda, were each given with beautiful effect. The tripping episodes of the fourth movement and the stirring finale were each excellent in strongly contrasting styles.

The overture to "Barber of Bagdad" is full of catchy eccentricities in scoring, and the themes are fairly juggled by the different contingents of the band. The changes were charmingly made and without perceptible breaks, the magnificent team work of the strings being very conspicuous for daintiness, precision and smoothness of tonality. The wind instruments gave out the slow themes with admirable sonority.

"The Cricket on the Hearth" prelude, performed here for the first time, is a finely contrasted work, opening pompously and suddenly running into more joyous moments. Then come dainty little duet passages by bassoon and clarinet, followed by a lively dance theme, which is the personification of musical vivacity.

The audience thoroughly enjoyed the work, and the members of the band also appeared to take pleasure in it. The tone coloring of the opening phrases was deliciously harmonic and the violin contingent was all that could be desired in setting forth the jolly little melodies which continually sprang up from the more sober musical background furnished by the basses.

This week's soloist will be the famous Berlin violinist; Mr Carl Halir. The program will include the overture, "Manfred," Schumann; entr'actes from "Carmen," Bizet; symphony No. 4, Tschaikowsky.

Gazette

BOSTON SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 22.

The Symphony Concert.

Owing to the illness of Mr. Rosenthal, he did not appear at the Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall. The changed programme was:

Overture, "Barber of Bagdad"........Cornelius
Overture, "Gwendoline" ....Chabrier
Entr' acte, "Cricket on the Hearth"...Goldmark
Symphony, "From the New World"....Dvorak

There is little that calls for extended notice in this programme. The Goldmark entr' acte suggests grace and vivacity in its brevity; it is a most attractive specimen brick, but it seems cruel to the composer to wrest it from its proper place and serve it up in its blushing loneliness. Age does not add fresh beauties to the Dvorak symphony; it is a large and dignified work, but it does not inspire joy. It was delightfully played by the orchestra with spirit, grace and the rarest finish.

The soloist for the next concert is Mr. Carl Halir, the famous Berlin violinist.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1896.

Fifth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall Last Evening—A Program of No Marked Distinction.

The program of the Symphony concert last evening, Mr. Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Symphony No. 5, in E minor...........Dvorak
Overture to "Der Barbier von Bagdad," Cornelius
Intermezzo from "Das Heimchen am Herd" .... Goldmark
(First time in Boston.)
Overture to "Gwendoline" ....Chabrier

Mr. Moritz Rosenthal was prevented by sickness from appearing as pianist, to the great disappointment of all. He will undoubtedly be able to give his recital Tuesday afternoon.

* * *

Let us examine a few statements of fact made by Mr. William F. Apthorp in the Program Book of the 21st.

* * *

Mr. Apthorp says Cornelius's "Barber of Bagdad" was brought out at Weimar in 1859.

It was produced at Weimar in 1858 (December 15).

* * *

Mr. Apthorp says Cornelius died October 24, 1874.

But Cornelius died October 26, 1374.

* * *

Mr. Apthorp says Goldmark was born December 17, 1840.

As a matter of fact, Goldmark was born May 18, 1830.

* * *

The overture to "The Barber of Bagdad" has a history, but Mr. Apthorp did not see fit to tell the story in the Program Book, although there is information concerning the "dotted triplet," "swept syncopated chords," and "a new counter-phrase in the violins and sextolet arpegg in the violas." Ouf!

This overture was composed by Cornelius after the first production of the opera, and he sketched it only for piano, for four hands. Liszt afterward orchestrated it. The whole instrumental part of the opera, by the way, was rewritten for a larger orchestra by Tausig, but when the opera was given for the first time in America (New York, Jan. 3, 1890) the score used was the one edited by Mottl.

Mr. Apthrop speaks of "strong chords in the brass and bassoons." Why does he not add that this pompous motive is the one that accompanies the naming of the Barber by name throughout the opera: Abul Hassan Ali Ebn Bekar. This phrase is used only in connection with the name, and always to produce a serio-comic effect. As Mr. Krehbiel says, "He (Cornelius) does not label the Barber with it, and compel the orchestra to announce his entrance like a footman or usher. It stands, not for him, but for his capacious name." The second and charming chief theme is taken from the first scene of the opera. With the exception of these themes and the ingenious counterpoint against the second theme, in which last night the strings were too powerful when the melody was sustained by wind instruments, this overture is like unto a mighty rattling of dry bones. What a sky-assailing prelude to a comic opera! The thought of Hanslick's sneer was in the mind: "This barber shaved with guillotines not with razors." The developments are for the most part sandy, and the capricious, changing rhythms jolt when they try to be piquant.

* * *

Goldmark's opera has been praised extravagantly and assailed bitterly in Germany. Some say it was inspired by the success of "Hansel und Gretel," although it is my impression that Goldmark was at work on his "Cricket" before Humperdinck's opera saw the footlights. With the opera we have now nothing to do. The entr'acte in concert is absolute music, and this particular entr'acte is cheap stuff, unworthy of the composer of the "Sakuntala," "Prometheus" and "Sappho" overtures. What in the world has the fugued movement that precedes the folk song to do with the affair? It is thrown in as though it were a sop to pedantry. The folk-song is "Weisst Du, wie viel Sternlein Stehen," if I am not mistaken. There is conventional and dull development of this theme, until the inevitable apotheosis of the tune with roar and bang and calcium lights. Then comes a beer-hall dance, vulgar, noisy, stupid, and the wretched thing ends with a general throwing about of furniture and a hurling of empty beer pots at the tired fiddlers. It seems incredible that Goldmark should have written such obscene music.

* * *

It was a pleasure to hear again the stirring, superb overture to "Gwendoline," which was passionately played. It is not necessary to be a negrophile to enjoy the symphony by Dvorak, which contains much that is beautiful. There are two Dvoraks in this work, one the naive Bohemian, the other the artful musician of these latter days, who prepares his simplicity with infinite pains. A composer of distinguished musical feeling and accomplishments said last night of the Largo, "It is meretricious." He spoke unerringly the one, the only word.

PHILIP HALE.

* * *

The sickness of Rosenthal disappointed many. Friday morning he was feverish and he stayed in his room hoping to be well enough to appear at the Public Rehearsal; but his physician forbade him to leave his bed.

I am told that few pianists have such an intimate knowledge of the construction of the piano as that enjoyed by Rosenthal. He took a practical course some time ago in a piano factory, until he knew the parts of the instrument. So particular is he in his choice, that he spent day after day in the Steinway wareroom in New York before the chosen piano suited him. One pianist will say, "This is too hard;" another "This is too weak;" but how many are able to put a finger here and there, talking intelligently of lead or the pricking of a hammer?

* * *

It is a singular fact that while Rosenthal is not characteristically emotional in his playing he provokes emotional outbursts from such writers as Mr. Huneker. Witness this extract from the Morning Advertiser (N. Y.) of last week:

"Rosenthal revels in the material splendor of his art. In his dreams are no pallid twilights, no haunted thickets, no brakes wherein hunts the nymph with slim busts. He sees firm, cool marble temples, and when the stars shine their light is frosty and glittering. His playing is linear perfection. No Tyrian purple dyes the miraculous fretwork of his musical mantle. He is electric, dazzling, but seldom melting; and as almost any school girl today plays with 'expression'—vague quantity—Rosenthal is all the more welcome. What I cannot comprehend is the poverty of brain that, because a Paderewski, a Joseffy or a D'Albert are admired, that same admiration inhabits one from admiring Rosenthal.

"Blessed are the catholic, for they shall enjoy more than the bigoted. In the kingdom of piano playing there are many mansions, and Rosenthal has a big one all to himself, with his name over the door in bronze letters."

* * *

The program of the Symphony Concert Saturday night will be as follows: Overture to "Manfred," Schumann; Entr'actes from "Carmen," Bizet; Tschaikowsky's 4th symphony. The soloist will be Mr. Carl Halir, violinist.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. C., NO. 145.

SUNDAY. NOV. 22, 1896.

SOLOIST ROSENTHAL WAS ABSENT.

Made Necessary a Rearrangement of Last Night's Symphony Concert Programme.

Despite the non-appearance of Mr. Moriz Rosenthal, owing to sudden illness, and the miserable state of the weather, there was a surprisingly large audience in attendance at last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall. The absence of the soloist caused an entire overturning of the programme, which had been prepared with the view of affording desirable contrasts to Chopin's T minor concerto, which was to come between the Cornelius overture and Goldmark's "Cricket on the Hearth" prelude, the Dvorak symphony appropriately bringing the concert to an end. As it was, the arrangement was as follows:

Symphony, "From the New World".....Dvorak
Overture, "The Barber of Bagdad"...Cornelius
Prelude to part 3 of "The Cricket on the Hearth" .... Goldmark
Overture, "Gwendoline".............Chabrier

The Goldmark selection was given for the first time here. It is scarcely worthy the reputation and the skill of the composer, notwithstanding the effectiveness with which it is scored. The themes are uninteresting, and the prelude, as a whole, suggests very much ado about nothing. It opens vigorously enough with a stately subject, which is cleverly treated fugally, but which is dry and unattractive. It breaks into an old-fashioned melody of the German folk-song order, which is elaborately developed and varied, and is followed by a tripping bit of pretty commonplace of no marked originality, with which it winds up. It is true that it pertains to comic opera, but if the composer's name were not attached to it, no one would have guessed that it could possibly be by Goldmark, so lacking in grace of style, beauty of harmony and warmth of sentiment is it, to say nothing of the stiffness of its aspect of musical patchwork.

The Cornelius overture obtained an exceptionally brilliant and finely colored reading from Mr. Paur and a splendid performance from the orchestra. The symphony, also, had one of the most thoughtful and effective interpretations that it has had here, but it is as difficult as ever to discover wherein its themes are in any wise American or in the remotest degree typical of the negro melodies of the South.

If the themes in the largo are anything, they are distinctly and characteristically Scotch, while the principal subject of the scherzo is as decidedly Spanish in rhythm and style. The finale has a marked Gaelic suggestiveness, and in one place falls into an unmistakable Irish jig. However, leaving all question of national color out of consideration, the work is wholly interesting, improves on acquaintance, and is thoroughly pleasing in the hearing.

The Charbrier overture deserved the profound impression it made when it was first given, by its fine, its lavishly rich orchestral coloring, its strongly-marked individuality and the immense fervor with which the composer has sustained the passionate pace at which he starts out. The sympathetic and spirited reading of the work by Mr. Paur, and the incomparable virtuosity with which the orchestra overcame its difficulties made the performance stirringly effective.

The programme for next week is: Overture, "Manfred," Schumann; entr'actes from "Carmen," Bizet; symphony No. 4, Tschaikowsky, No. 4, first time. Mr. Carl Halir is to be the soloist.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 22, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Owing to the sudden illness of Mr. Rosenthal, who was to have played the Chopin Concerto No. 1, the programme of the fifth concert in the Symphony series last night was somewhat rearranged, the Dvorak symphony coming first and Chabrier's "Gwendoline" overture replacing the concerto.

The Dvorak symphony No. 5, styled "From the New World," has been heard here only once before, if we remember aright. It was written in 1893, and is based largely on negro melodies, which naturally make it of quite a modern order. At several points the Southern folk songs are prominently suggested; but again, the composer appears to have wandered off from his text, purposely, no doubt. To the casual listener, the third movement is by far the most interesting because of the general lightness and tunefulness. It is a pretty scherzo, which gradually develops into a lively dance-like movement. The fourth movement is thoroughly unconventional and of a much stronger character than the others. The orchestration is rich and sonorous, and, although the working out is rather long and the dainty themes are frequently repeated, it has much to interest, the musician especially.

The one novelty on the programme was the prelude to Act III. of Goldmark's "The Cricket on the Hearth." Like many other fragments of such works heard at these concerts, it is somewhat difficult to judge of the general excellence, or otherwise of the whole work. In the present case we are told that its success was instantaneous when presented in Berlin in June of this year. The prelude heard last night is of much dignity and rich orchestration, and the development calls into play several charming combinations of instrumentation. The music is of a rather light character, but if the entire score is as tuneful and vivacious as this prelude, the opera must be decidedly worth listening to. The other two numbers on the programme were the overture to the "Barber of Bagdad" and the overture to "Gwendoline."

At next week's concert a new symphony will be heard—the Tschaikowski No. 4—and Carl Halir will be the soloist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 22, 1896.

The fifth Symphony programme probably was to derive its chief value in the eyes of most people from the fact that its second number was Chopin's first, or E minor, pianoforte concerto, to be played by Mr. Moriz Rosenthal, who would make his re-entrance therein and show what changes hnd come over the spirit of his dreams and his waking hours since he was last heard here as a "phenomenal" youth. But there was great disappointment, because he was medically certified as unequal to the task of playing, necessitating a change of programme.

But the musical value of the concert did not lie in this one number by any means, although there was only one thing new in Mr. Paur's selections, which were Peter Cornelius's "Barber of Bagdad" overture, an entr'acte from Goldmark's "Cricket on the Hearth," and Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony, together with Chabrier's "Gwendolen" overture, which was repeated in place of the concerto. The Goldmark piece was truly delightful, because, while orchestrated with its author's taste, skill and diversity, it was not pretentious and did not rise above its subject. It is generally vivacious, but contains however a charming folk-song-like bit, which suggests the popular "Mein Schatz" of the song-books, and is worked up to a high pitch of happy excitement at the close. Mr. Paur and the orchestra evidently did their best to atone for the loss of the concerto, and the playing was all of the finest quality in technique and in art.

The next programme will present Schumann's "Manfred" overture, the entr'actes from Bizet's "Carmen" and Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, which has not been heard here yet. There will also be a soloist, but the engagement is not announced.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Paper of the State

The Official Paper of the City.

DAY MORNING, NOV. 22, 1896.

Symphony Concert a Success, Although Rosenthal Was Absent.

"The best-laid schemes o'mice and men gang aft agley" and the same statement applies to conductors who depend upon soloists. Rosenthal was to have been the soloist at Saturday's concert, but, owing to a sudden illness he disappeared from the programme as completely as that other valley of roses disappears in the second act of "Parsifal." It is a difficult matter to play "Hamlet" with the part of Hamlet omitted, yet this was successfully done on Saturday, for the large audience seemed quite contented with the musical list sans the Chopin piano concerto, and stayed almost to a man until the last note was played.

As if to console the public for the absence of the great pianist, the orchestra played in the most brilliant manner possible and gave a concert that was really memorable. The list required revision because of the excision of the concerto and, for once, began with a long symphony—Dvorak's "American."

It is right that this work should have frequent hearings for it is the only classical outgrowth (except two numbers of Dvorak's chamber music) of American folk-song. It is quite unnecessary to reopen the contention as to whether the negro music is "American" or an imported product; it remains the outcome of American surroundings, and Africa could never have produced such plaintive melancholy as is found in "Nobody knows de trouble I've seen," or "Swing low, sweet chariot," a sadness which speaks most eloquently (in a melody as sad as those named) in the best movement of this symphony,—the Largo.

Another characteristic touch in the work is the rhythmic strength, a touch as old as the ancient Egyptians but belonging to our Southern music in a most marked degree. The introduction, here used to foreshadow thematic material, was finely given, and the first movement probably has never had so perfect a performance since the symphony was composed. One of the charms of the work is the manner in which the themes are interwoven through the movements, the chief theme reappearing in the subsequent movements, and the themes of the second and third movements being similarly transferred from one movement to another, giving a continuity and homogeneity that are unusual in modern works. The subordinate theme of the first movement has the true flavor of the plantation, and introduces that flat seventh which is so characteristic of semi-civilized folk-music.

Familiarity with this symphony does not breed contempt but reveals new beauties; nevertheless the impression remains that the work is rather the ingenious handicraft of an orchestral master than the inspiration of a genius.

The tender chief theme of the second movement and the marchlike trio of the third were notably excellent touches of performance. It is quite true that the Americanism is all developed out of the finale but it remains a noble specimen of thematic treatment, nevertheless, and the employment of various scale forms in the construction of the themes, both in this and the preceding movements, lends a constant interest to a symphony that has already taken its place upon the standard repertoire of the world. But the crashes of that finale could only have been inspired by a monster barbecue.

Cornelius' overture to the "Barber of Bagdad" is full of modern musical embroidery after the latest polyphonic fashion.

The hand of Liszt is seen in the showy orchestration of the work, for it is well known that before the great pianist brought out the opera in Weimar (in 1858) he found the overture somewhat weak in scoring and revised it thoroughly. It is odd to read in the files of Hanslick's criticisms that the German party of musical radicals proclaimed Cornelius as "the German Cherubini," for there is not a trace of the clearness and conservatism of the severe Italian in the entire work and there is such a clatter and vigor in the overture that one can only imagine that the Barber of Bagdad is shaving with the "trust-razor." The work is much more akin to Berlioz than to Cherubini and to Berlioz in his bizarre moments, besides. Apart from the great racket of the scoring there are moments of very legitimate humor even in the bombastic vein the pompous figure on brasses and wood-wind which always announces the octo-syllabic name of the barber being a case in point. The performance was an ideal one.

Mr. Paur is giving the public many interesting novelties this season, and even if one is somewhat disappointed in the Intermezzo from Goldmark's "Cricket on the Hearth," one must confess that it was important enough for a single hearing. That Goldmark, the sensuous Oriental Goldmark, should turn from his extremely tragic and grandiose vein, should desert his Queen of Sheba, Sakuntala, Penthesilia and other aristocratic company and turn to the humble characters which Dickens has sketched, for his latest opera, is a pleasant surprise, and his new departure has won all Austria.

One might readily imagine that he has struck the Humperdinck trail save for the fact that he began this opera before "Hansel and Gretel" had won its success; spite of the anachronism one cannot but believe that the latter opera has influenced the former, for "Das Heimchen am Herde" has gone frankly and freely to the folk-song for its inspiration and its success. Yet Goldmark's road is, in one important respect, very different from the Humperdinck path, he does not endeavor to give continuous melody but divides into clearcut songs, duets, etc., and returns in some degree to the form of the pre-Wagnerian opera.

This intermezzo has been received with enthusiasm abroad, an enthusiasm which is not wholly deserved, for it is an attempt at mixing contrapuntal oil and melodic water; the fugal beginning and the cancan ending do not yoke well together. There is a tender duet sung by the woodwind which is a folk-song pure and simple; this was excellently played. A few muted horn passages presage with their evil color the mischief worked by Tackleton, and then there enters a dance theme, which is very much like a Laendler (although it is in 2-4 rhythm while a Laendler would properly be triple) which leads to an ending which a party of dancing dervishes could not have competed with.

It would detract from the estimation in which we hold the Peerybingles, Caleb, Bertha, or even Tilly Slowboy, to imagine them indulging in Bal Bullier revelry such as this intermezzo ends with. It was splendidly performed, but cannot be fully judged until we have the whole opera (and the English subject is bound to reach the English-speaking stage very soon), when [illegible] can form a fairer estimate of the number, hearing it with its proper surround-

---

[illegible] overture. It gains a little on acquaintance, although it is a trifle too robust for ordinary nerves. The orchestra gave its loud passages in a manner that made them clear even to the deafest auditor. This overture and Tschaikowsky's "1812" are two works which are perfectly stunning,—perhaps too much so for any enclosed space. The strings played a whirlwind and the brass players blew a hurricane at the final climax, yet there were no casualties either among the orchestra or the audience. Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fifth symphony concert, as given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Dvorak: Symphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," opus 95.
Peter Cornelius: Overture to "Der Barbier von Bagdad."
Goldmark: Prelude to Part III. of "Das Heimchen am Herd."
(First time in Boston.)
Chabrier: Overture to "Gwendoline."

Mr. Moriz Rosenthal was to have played the Chopin E-minor concerto, but was unable to appear on account of illness. So the Chabrier overture was substituted for the concerto.

Dvorak's American symphony — which stood as No. 8 before publication of the score, but is now No. 5—shows more than good staying-power. The composer's sympathy with his collected Negro material becomes more and more apparent with time, and the use he makes of it is seen to be more instinct with genius. Dvorak is a composer whose inborn Slavicism in music well survives the cosmopolitanizing influence of culture; he is just as much a Czech to the core now as when he first wrote his Slavische Tänze. And, though there is no discoverable ethnological connection between the Slav and the Negro, there is an accidental similarity between the music of the two races which enables Dvorak to handle Negro melodies without betraying anything like a foreign accent. Curiously enough, as one grows more familiar with this symphony and more and more impressed with its beauty and strength, the essentially Negro character of its thematic material becomes all the more patent. As for its being a wholly great work, we are still considerably in doubt; there is a certain unsophisticated simple-mindedness in Dvorak which prompts him to give quite unguarded expression to his sentiment and pathos, and he is not over-careful in the matter of distinction of style. We are still by no means sure that, in some of the warmer and more poetic moments in this symphony, he has not allowed his expression to degenerate into something very like silliness. But we are no longer sure that he has! Upon the whole, the work gives us greater and greater pleasure, the oftener we hear it; there is an enormous amount of beauty in it, a great deal of genuine strength and vigor; as a piece of orchestral coloring, it is admirable throughout. Perhaps the all too savage ferocity of some passages might be toned down a little by a less fierce style of performance, without losing any of their intrinsic vigor thereby. But the performance last Saturday was generally of very fine quality, well worthy of the work.

Peter Cornelius's "Barbier von Bagdad" overture does not wear as well as Dvorak's symphony. When the overture was first played here, one found a vivacity and life in it that were very charming indeed. But, with repeated hearings, its weak points become more evident. Although the composer was probably thirty when he wrote it, the overture has many of the distinctive characteristics of an early work. It has no homogeneity of style; Cornelius wavers uneasily between French opéra-comique and the Liszt-Wagner ideals; for one thing, he does not seem able to get the amplified coda to the overture to the "Fliegende Holländer" out of his head! The piece was excellently well played; but the impression it made was a disappointment after the more favorable one we had retained from earlier performances.

It must have been a mistake to give the little excerpt from Goldmark's "Heimchen am Herd" at a symphony concert. We can hardly imagine this entr'acte's sounding very well in its proper place, at the theatre; at a symphony concert it sounds merely drivelling. What was Goldmark after in that slow movement in 3-4 time? Was he trying to write "Weisst du wie viel' Sterne stehen," or trying not to? In either case, he failed!

We were heartily glad of another chance at Chabrier's "Gwendoline" overture. The work is perhaps not equally strong all through; but there are glorious things in it. It impresses one as being a very genuine inspiration. The performance was decidedly better than the one a few weeks ago, and some points in the score stood out with far greater clearness. Only we think Mr. Paur a little inclined to overdo the double-fortissimo business at times. We felt the same thing in parts of the finale of the Dvorak symphony.

The next programme is: Schumann, overture to "Manfred," opus 115; ——, violin concerto, to be announced; Bizet, entr'actes from "Carmen;" Tschaikowsky, symphony No. 4, in F minor, opus 36 (first time). Mr. Carl Halir will be the violinist.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1896.

The program of the fifth Symphony concert given last evening was as follows:

Symphony No. 5, E minor..........Dvorák
Overture, Barber of Bagdad..........Cornelius
Intermezzo, from the Cricket on the Hearth..........Goldmark
Overture to Gwendoline..........Chabrier

Mr. Rosenthal's sudden illness prevented his appearance, to the great disappointment of all. He will undoubtedly give his recital Tuesday afternoon, but he will not play here with the Symphony Orchestra until March or April.

The concert was not one of special interest. Goldmark's Intermezzo was played here for the first time. It seems to me cheap stuff, unworthy of the composer of the Sakuntala, Prometheus and Sappho overtures. The folk song is treated conventionally until the inevitable apotheosis, with crash and bang and lime lighteffects, makes you rub your eyes and ask, "Is this by Goldmark?" And the wretched beer hall dance that follows! Oh, Goldmark, let me hear your Oriental voice, with which you tell of hot jungles, shrouded and languorous women, white bearded old men asleep on nodding camels; or narrate the intimate life of Sheba's Queen and curious episodes in her visit at the court of Solomon.

The Cornelius overture, orchestration by Liszt, is for the most part a sandy bore. Hanslick said the word for all time, referring to the mighty straining of the prelude: "This barber must have shaved with guillotines, not razors."

It is not necessary to be a negrophile to enjoy much of the fifth Symphony of Dvorak. But how artful is the Bohemian in the preparation of his simplicity!

My esteemed friend Mr. Apthorp went sadly astray in the Program Book, which is read so devoutly by all true Bostonians and sold at the end of the season at Music Hall as an educational treatise.

According to him Goldmark was born December 17, 1840, whereas he was born May 18, 1830.

The Barber of Bagdad, according to him, was produced in 1859. It was produced at Weimar in 1858 (December 15).

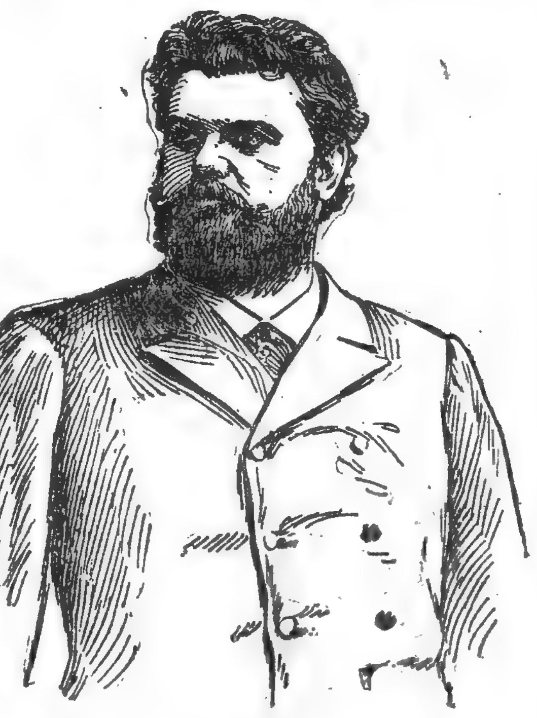
But why go on? Mr. Apthorp is often heroically inaccurate, and the pity of it is that he regards his inaccuracy with Olympian indifference, if not with an inexplicable, perverted pride.

PHILIP HALE.

The Telegram

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1896.

The Boston Symphony orchestra announces its second concert in the series at Infantry hall next Wednesday evening. The orchestral selections will include Beethoven's light and joyful symphony No. 8, the entr'actes and ballet music from "Carmen" and Schumann's lovely overture to "Manfred." The soloist at this concert will be the famous classical violinist, Mr. Carl Halir, who will play the concerto for violin No 8, by Spohr.



CARL HALIR,
Violinist.

Mr. Halir was born in a small village in Bohemia in 1859. As is often the case with great masters, his first lessons were received from his father, then he studied for a time at the Conservatory at Prague and later on went to Berlin to continue under the great master of the violin, Joachim. During his stay at that time in Berlin, Mr. Halir accepted the position of solo violinist of the renowned Bilse orchestra, and from there he went to Koenigsberg, where he was for a few years the concert master of the Royal orchestra.

Mr. Halir has made several tours all over Europe, establishing a reputation as one of the great violinists of the present day, and appearing in Vienna, Frankfort, Cologne, Berlin and Hamburg. He also won singular success in Russia in 1888 and in Paris in 1889. For several years he has made his home in Berlin, where he is the concert master of the Royal orchestra and professor of the High school of Music. His playing is always elegant, refined and finished.

It is worthy of note that during his tour of this country, Mr. Halir will play on the celebrated Stradivarius (known as the "Red Strad") which was presented to Joachim by the city of London on the occasion of his fiftieth jubilee. The instrument was kindly loaned by Joachim to his great confrere for his American tour.

Mr. Halir's appearance next Wednesday evening will be his first with the Boston Symphony orchestra, and during the next three weeks he will play with the orchestra in Boston and Cambridge and on the monthly tour in December to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER

Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at Infantry Hall. The soloist was Mr. Carl Halir, the great German violinist, and the programme offered was as follows:

Overtrure to "Manfred," in E-flat minor, Op. 115..........Robert Schumann
Concerto for Violin in A, No. 8, Op. 47 (Tragic)..........L. Spohr
Entr'actes and Ballet Music from "Carmen"..........G[illegible]
Symphony No. 8, in F-major, Op. 93..........Ludwig van Beethoven
Allegro vivace e con brio (F-major).
Allegretto scherzando (B-flat major).
Tempo di Menuetto (F-major).
Allegro vivace (F-major).

This was a programme of much interest, and rendered memorable, even among symphony concerts, by the remarkable manner of its performance. Seldom has this great orchestra exhibited such superb brilliancy, and their wonderful grasp of such totally different numbers as the "Manfred" and "Carmen" music was a revelation even to those who have heard them many times.

The appearance of Carl Halir, the celebrated German virtuoso and teacher, was naturally the chief event of the evening, as this artist is now making his initial tour of this country. At home he is regarded as the legitimate successor of Joachim, to whose position as the leading violin teacher at the Berlin Conservatory he has practically succeeded. As a player, too, he stands, as Joachim has for so many years, as the chief exponent of the classical school. So far, the American critics have not welcomed him with any marked degree of enthusiasm. They have termed his playing "academic," almost as if that were a term of reproach. True, he does not belong to the long-haired fraternity, who thrust their own personalities upon us to such an extent that elucidation of the composer's ideas becomes an apparently secondary consideration. If to be "academic" is to preserve a regard for well-grounded tradition, to respect a composer's intention, to prefer purity of tone and a just balance of rhythm and nuance to exaggerated personal display and sentimental mawkishness, then Mr. Halir deserves the title. The tone he produces is not large, but it is of great clarity and "carrying" quality, and he neither saws nor squeaks. The violin upon which he plays is one of the most famous Strads in existence, lent him by Joachim for his present tour. But if he had a poorer instrument, it is evident enough that the tone would never be anything but smooth and clear. His playing is impeccable upon every side; it is at once delicate, forceful and finished, displaying the ripe and complete artist.

The accompaniment which the orchestra gave him was marvellous in its sympathy and subordination, and the beauty of Spohr's keleidoscopic harmonies was brought out to the fullest extent. Mr. Halir was enthusiastically received. Four calls were given him, and finally he yielded to the manifest desire and gave a gavot by Bach.

Schumann's tragic overture was beautifully played, and the lively and original music of Bizet won warm applause. Beethoven's bright and sparkling eighth symphony brought to an end a most delightful concert.

There will be no appearance of the orchestra next month, the third concert coming upon the evening of Wednesday, Jan. 6.

Chicago Musical Times.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1896.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in the Metropolitan Opera house last Friday evening. Rosenthal who was the soloist, doubtless attracted the particularly large audience present. The Overture to Gwendoline by Chabrier was played for the first time at these concerts. It is of considerable brilliancy and sounds quite Wagnerian at times, but the ideas are few and the themes trivial and commonplace. Rosenthal played the Chopin E minor Concerto with great expression, particularly the larghetto. The last movement was played with great charm, and the concerto throughout was a refutation of the statement made by some that Rosenthal cannot hold the attention of an audience other than by his astounding feats of technic. Weber's dainty "Invitation to the Dance" was played charmingly by the orchestra. The great C major symphony by Schubert closed the program. The beautiful quality of the strings in the Boston Orchestra showed to best advantage in the delivery of the lovely themes of Schubert. Pauer's reading of the whole symphony showed his accustomed intelligence, and the orchestra cannot be too highly praised.

DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 23, 1896.

Symphony Concert a Success, Although Rosenthal Was Absent.

"The best-laid schemes o'mice and men gang aft agley" and the same statement applies to conductors who depend upon soloists. Rosenthal was to have been the soloist at Saturday's concert, but, owing to a sudden illness he disappeared from the programme as completely as that other valley of roses disappears in the second act of "Parsifal." It is a difficult matter to play "Hamlet" with the part of Hamlet omitted, yet this was successfully done on Saturday, for the large audience seemed quite contented with the musical list sans the Chopin piano concerto, and stayed almost to a man until the last note was played.

As if to console the public for the absence of the great pianist, the orchestra played in the most brilliant manner possible and gave a concert that was really memorable. The list required revision because of the excision of the concerto and, for once, began with a long symphony—Dvorak's "American."

It is right that this work should have frequent hearings for it is the only classical outgrowth (except two numbers of Dvorak's chamber music) of American folk-song. It is quite unnecessary to reopen the contention as to whether the negro music is "American" or an imported product; it remains the outcome of American surroundings, and Africa could never have produced such plaintive melancholy as is found in "Nobody knows de trouble I've seen," or "Swing low, sweet chariot," a sadness which speaks most eloquently (in a melody as sad as those named) in the best movement of this symphony,—the Largo.

Another characteristic touch in the work is the rhythmic strength, a touch as old as the ancient Egyptians but belonging to our Southern music in a most marked degree. The introduction, here used to foreshadow thematic material, was finely given, and the first movement probably has never had so perfect a performance since the symphony was composed. One of the charms of the work is the manner in which the themes are interwoven through the movements, the chief theme reappearing in the subsequent movements, and the themes of the second and third movements being similarly transferred from one movement to another giving a continuity and homogeneity that are unusual in modern works. The subordinate theme of the first movement has the true flavor of the plantation, and introduces that flat seventh which is so characteristic of semi-civilized folk-music.

Familiarity with this symphony does not breed contempt but reveals new beauties, nevertheless the impression remains that the work is rather the ingenious handicraft of an orchestral master than the inspiration of a genius.

The tender chief theme of the second movement and the marchlike trio of the third were notably excellent touches of performance. It is quite true that the Americanism is all developed out of the finale but it remains a noble specimen of thematic treatment, nevertheless, and the employment of various scale forms in the construction of the themes, both in this and the preceding movements, lends a constant interest to a symphony that has already taken its place upon the standard repertoire of the world. But the crashes of that finale could only have been inspired by a monster barbecue.

Cornelius' overture to the "Barber of Bagdad" is full of modern musical embroidery after the latest polyphonic fashion.

The hand of Liszt is seen in the showy orchestration of the work, for it is well known that before the great pianist brought out the opera in Weimar (in 1858) he found the overture somewhat weak in scoring and revised it thoroughly. It is odd to read in the files of Hanslick's criticisms that the German party of musical radicals proclaimed Cornelius as "the German Cherubini," for there is not a trace of the clearness and conservatism of the severe Italian in the entire work and there is such a clatter and vigor in the overture that one can only imagine that the Barber of Bagdad is shaving with the "trust-razor." The work is much more akin to Berlioz than to Cherubini and to Berlioz in his bizarre moments, besides. Apart from the great racket of the scoring there are moments of very legitimate humor even in the bombastic vein the pompous figure on brasses and wood-wind which always announces the octo-syllabic name of the barber being a case in point. The performance was an ideal one.

Mr. Paur is giving the public many interesting novelties this season, and even if one is somewhat disappointed in the Intermezzo from Goldmark's "Cricket on the Hearth," one must confess that it was important enough for a single hearing. That Goldmark, the sensuous Oriental Goldmark, should turn from his extremely tragic and grandiose vein, should desert his Queen of Sheba, Sakuntala, Penthesilia and other aristocratic company and turn to the humble characters which Dickens has sketched, for his latest opera, is a pleasant surprise, and his new departure has won all Austria.

One might readily imagine that he has struck the Humperdinck trail save for the fact that he began this opera before "Hansel and Gretel" had won its success; spite of the anachronism one cannot but believe that the latter opera has influenced the former, for "Das Heimchen am Herde" has gone frankly and freely to the folk-song for its inspiration and its success. Yet Goldmark's road is, in one important respect, very different from the Humperdinck path, he does not endeavor to give continuous melody but divides into clearcut songs, duets, etc., and returns in some degree to the form of the pre-Wagnerian opera.

This intermezzo has been received with enthusiasm abroad, an enthusiasm which is not wholly deserved, for it is an attempt at mixing contrapuntal oil and melodic water; the fugal beginning and the cancan ending do not yoke well together. There is a tender duet sung by the woodwind which is a folk-song pure and simple; this was excellently played. A few muted horn passages presage with their evil color the mischief worked by Tackleton, and then there enters a dance theme, which is very much like a Laendler (although it is in 2-4 rhythm while a Laendler would properly be triple) which leads to an ending which a party of dancing dervishes could not have competed with.

It would detract from the estimation in which we hold the Peerybingles, Caleb, Bertha, or even Tilly Slowboy, to imagine them indulging in Bal Bullier revelry such as this intermezzo ends with. It was splendidly performed, but cannot be fully judged until we have the whole opera (and the English subject is bound to reach the English-speaking stage very soon), when we can form a fairer estimate of the number by hearing it with its proper surround-

The absent Rosenthal was replaced by a second performance of Chabrier's "Gwendoline" overture. It gains a little on acquaintance, although it is a trifle too robust for ordinary nerves. The orchestra gave its loud passages in a manner that made them clear even to the deafest auditor. This overture and Tschaikowsky's "1812" are two works which are perfectly stunning,—perhaps too much so for any enclosed space. The strings played a whirlwind and the brass players blew a hurricane at the final climax, yet there were no casualties either among the orchestra or the audience. Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fifth symphony concert, as given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Dvorak: Symphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," opus 95.
Peter Cornelius: Overture to "Der Barbier von Bagdad."
Goldmark: Prelude to Part III. of "Das Heimchen am Herd."
(First time in Boston.)
Chabrier: Overture to "Gwendoline."

Mr. Moriz Rosenthal was to have played the Chopin E-minor concerto, but was unable to appear on account of illness. So the Chabrier overture was substituted for the concerto.

Dvorak's American symphony — which stood as No. 8 before publication of the score, but is now No. 5—shows more than good staying-power. The composer's sympathy with his collected Negro material becomes more and more apparent with time, and the use he makes of it is seen to be more instinct with genius. Dvorak is a composer whose inborn Slavicism in music well survives the cosmopolitanizing influence of culture; he is just as much a Czech to the core now as when he first wrote his Slavische Tänze. And, though there is no discoverable ethnological connection between the Slàv and the Negro, there is an accidental similarity between the music of the two races which enables Dvorak to handle Negro melodies without betraying anything like a foreign accent. Curiously enough, as one grows more familiar with this symphony and more and more impressed with its beauty and strength, the essentially Negro character of its thematic material becomes all the more patent. As for its being a wholly great work, we are still considerably in doubt; there is a certain unsophisticated simple-mindedness in Dvorak which prompts him to give quite unguarded expression to his sentiment and pathos, and he is not over-careful in the matter of distinction of style. We are still by no means sure that, in some of the warmer and more poetic moments in this symphony, he has not allowed his expression to degenerate into something very like silliness. But we are no longer sure that he has! Upon the whole, the work gives us greater and greater pleasure, the oftener we hear it; there is an enormous amount of beauty in it, a great deal of genuine strength and vigor; as a piece of orchestral coloring, it is admirable throughout. Perhaps the all too savage ferocity of some passages might be toned down a little by a less fierce style of performance, without losing any of their intrinsic vigor thereby. But the performance last Saturday was generally of very fine quality, well worthy of the work.

Peter Cornelius's "Barbier von Bagdad" overture does not wear as well as Dvorak's symphony. When the overture was first played here, one found a vivacity and life in it that were very charming indeed. But, with repeated hearings, its weak points become more evident. Although the composer was probably thirty when he wrote it, the overture has many of the distinctive characteristics of an early work. It has no homogeneity of style; Cornelius wavers uneasily between French opéra-comique and the Liszt-Wagner ideals; for one thing, he does not seem able to get the amplified coda to the overture to the "Fliegende Holländer" out of his head! The piece was excellently well played; but the impression it made was a disappointment after the more favorable one we had retained from earlier performances.

It must have been a mistake to give the little excerpt from Goldmark's "Heimchen am Herd" at a symphony concert. We can hardly imagine this entr'acte's sounding very well in its proper place, at the theatre; at a symphony concert it sounds merely drivelling. What was Goldmark after in that slow movement in 3-4 time? Was he trying to write "Weisst du wie viel' Sterne stehen," or trying not to? In either case, he failed!

We were heartily glad of another chance at Chabrier's "Gwendoline" overture. The work is perhaps not equally strong all through; but there are glorious things in it. It impresses one as being a very genuine inspiration. The performance was decidedly better than the one a few weeks ago, and some points in the score stood out with far greater clearness. Only we think Mr. Paur a little inclined to overdo the double-fortissimo business at times. We felt the same thing in parts of the finale of the Dvorak symphony.

The next programme is: Schumann, overture to "Manfred," opus 115; ——, violin concerto, to be announced; Bizet, entr'actes from "Carmen;" Tschaikowsky, symphony No. 4, in F minor, opus 36 (first time). Mr. Carl Halir will be the violinist.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1896.

The program of the fifth Symphony concert given last evening was as follows:

Symphony No. 5, E minor	Dvorák
Overture, Barber of Bagdad	Cornelius
Intermezzo, from the Cricket on the Hearth	Goldmark
Overture to Gwendoline	Chabrier

Mr. Rosenthal's sudden illness prevented his appearance, to the great disappointment of all. He will undoubtedly give his recital Tuesday afternoon, but he will not play here with the Symphony Orchestra until March or April.

The concert was not one of special interest. Goldmark's Intermezzo was played here for the first time. It seems to me cheap stuff, unworthy of the composer of the Sakuntala, Prometheus and Sappho overtures. The folk song is treated conventionally until the inevitable apotheosis, with crash and bang and lime lighteffects, makes you rub your eyes and ask, "Is this by Goldmark?" And the wretched beer hall dance that follows! Oh, Goldmark, let me hear your Oriental voice, with which you tell of hot jungles, shrouded and languorous women, white bearded old men asleep on nodding camels; or narrate the intimate life of Sheba's Queen and curious episodes in her visit at the court of Solomon.

The Cornelius overture, orchestration by Liszt, is for the most part a sandy bore. Hanslick said the word for all time, referring to the mighty straining of the prelude: "This barber must have shaved with guillotines, not razors."

It is not necessary to be a negrophile to enjoy much of the fifth Symphony of Dvorak. But how artful is the Bohemian in the preparation of his simplicity!

My esteemed friend Mr. Apthorp went sadly astray in the Program Book, which is read so devoutly by all true Bostonians and sold at the end of the season at Music Hall as an educational treatise.

According to him Goldmark was born December 17, 1840, whereas he was born May 18, 1830.

The Barber of Bagdad, according to him, was produced in 1859. It was produced at Weimar in 1858 (December 15).

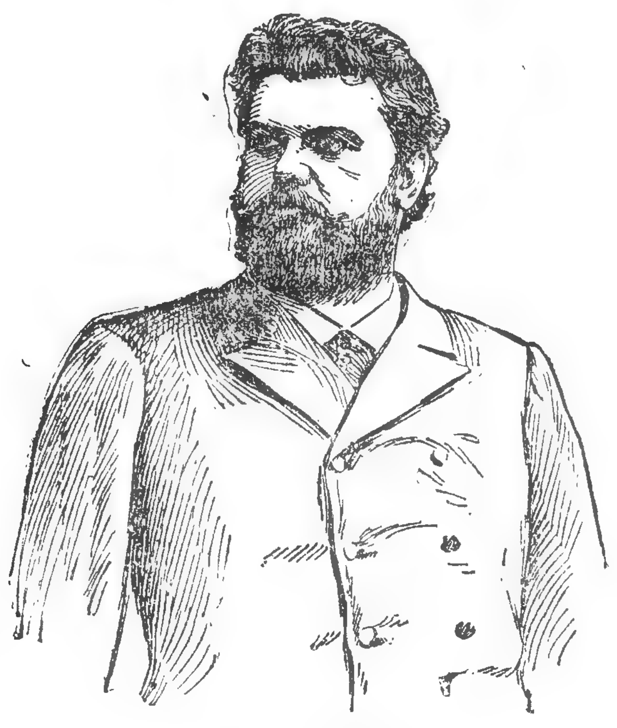
But why go on? Mr. Apthorp is often heroically inaccurate, and the pity of it is that he regards his inaccuracy with Olympian indifference, if not with an inexplicable, perverted pride.

PHILIP HALE.

The Telegram

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1896.

The Boston Symphony orchestra announces its second concert in the series at Infantry hall next Wednesday evening. The orchestral selections will include Beethoven's light and joyful symphony No. 8, the entr'actes and ballet music from "Carmen" and Schumann's lovely overture to "Manfred." The soloist at this concert will be the famous classical violinist, Mr. Carl Halir, who will play the concerto for violin No 8, by Spohr.



CARL HALIR,
Violinist.

Mr. Halir was born in a small village in Bohemia in 1859. As is often the case with great masters, his first lessons were received from his father, then he studied for a time at the Conservatory at Prague and later on went to Berlin to continue under the great master of the violin, Joachim. During his stay at that time in Berlin, Mr. Halir accepted the position of solo violinist of the renowned Bilse orchestra, and from there he went to Koenigsberg, where he was for a few years the concert master of the Royal orchestra.

Mr. Halir has made several tours all over Europe, establishing a reputation as one of the great violinists of the present day, and appearing in Vienna, Frankfort, Cologne, Berlin and Hamburg. He also won singular success in Russia in 1888 and in Paris in 1889. For several years he has made his home in Berlin, where he is the concert master of the Royal orchestra and professor of the High school of Music. His playing is always elegant, refined and finished.

It is worthy of note that during his tour of this country, Mr. Halir will play on the celebrated Stradivarius (known as the "Red Strad") which was presented to Joachim by the city of London on the occasion of his fiftieth jubilee. The instrument was kindly loaned by Joachim to his great confrere for his American tour.

Mr. Halir's appearance next Wednesday evening will be his first with the Boston Symphony orchestra, and during the next three weeks he will play with the orchestra in Boston and Cambridge and on the monthly tour in December to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington.

PROVIDENCE JOU

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1896.

Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at Infantry Hall. The soloist was Mr. Carl Halir, the great German violinist, and the programme offered was as follows:

Overtrure to "Manfred," in E-flat minor, Op. 115	Robert Schumann
Concerto for Violin in A, No. 8, Op. 47 (Tragic)	L. Spohr
Entr'actes and Ballet Music from "Carmen"	Georges Bizet
Symphony No. 8, in F-major, Op. 93	Ludwig van Beethoven
Allegro vivace e con brio (F-major).
Allegretto scherzando (B-flat major).
Tempo di Menuetto (F-major).
Allegro vivace (F-major).

This was a programme of much interest, and rendered memorable, even among symphony concerts, by the remarkable manner of its performance. Seldom has this great orchestra exhibited such superb brilliancy, and their wonderful grasp of such totally different numbers as the "Manfred" and "Carmen" music was a revelation even to those who have heard them many times.

The appearance of Carl Halir, the celebrated German virtuoso and teacher, was naturally the chief event of the evening, as this artist is now making his initial tour of this country. At home he is regarded as the legitimate successor of Joachim, to whose position as the leading violin teacher at the Berlin Conservatory he has practically succeeded. As a player, too, he stands, as Joachim has for so many years, as the chief exponent of the classical school. So far, the American critics have not welcomed him with any marked degree of enthusiasm. They have termed his playing "academic," almost as if that were a term of reproach. True, he does not belong to the long-haired fraternity, who thrust their own personalities upon us to such an extent that elucidation of the composer's ideas becomes an apparently secondary consideration. If to be "academic" is to preserve a regard for well-grounded tradition, to respect a composer's intention, to prefer purity of tone and a just balance of rhythm and nuance to exaggerated personal display and sentimental mawkishness, then Mr. Halir deserves the title. The tone he produces is not large, but it is of great clarity and "carrying" quality, and he neither saws nor squeaks. The violin upon which he plays is one of the most famous Strads in existence, lent him by Joachim for his present tour. But if he had a poorer instrument, it is evident enough that the tone would never be anything but smooth and clear. His playing is impeccable upon every side; it is at once delicate, forceful and finished, displaying the ripe and complete artist.

The accompaniment which the orchestra gave him was marvellous in its sympathy and subordination, and the beauty of Spohr's keleidoscopic harmonies was brought out to the fullest extent. Mr. Halir was enthusiastically received. Four calls were given him, and finally he yielded to the manifest desire and gave a gavot by Bach.

Schumann's tragic overture was beautifully played, and the lively and original music of Bizet won warm applause. Beethoven's bright and sparkling eighth symphony brought to an end a most delightful concert.

There will be no appearance of the orchestra next month, the third concert coming upon the evening of Wednesday, Jan. 6.

Chicago Musical Times.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1896.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in the Metropolitan Opera house last Friday evening. Rosenthal who was the soloist, doubtless attracted the particularly large audience present. The Overture to Gwendoline by Chabrier was played for the first time at these concerts. It is of considerable brilliancy and sounds quite Wagnerian at times, but the ideas are few and the themes trivial and commonplace. Rosenthal played the Chopin E minor Concerto with great expression, particularily the larghetto. The last movement was played with great charm, and the concerto throughout was a refutation of the statement made by some that Rosenthal cannot hold the attention of an audience other than by his astounding feats of technic. Weber's dainty "Invitation to the Dance" was played charmingly by the orchestra. The great C major symphony by Schubert closed the program. The beautiful quality of the strings in the Boston Orchestra showed to best advantage in the delivery of the lovely themes of Schubert. Pauer's reading of the whole symphony showed his accustomed intelligence, and the orchestra cannot be too highly praised.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 29, 1896.

The sixth symphony concert began with a just and feeling performance of Schumann's philosophic and yet not undramatic overture from his "Manfred" music. Its wandering, doubtful thoughts and moody contrasts, so suggestive of the spiritual roving and strivings of Byron's hero, were excellently expressed and sustained.

Then Mr. Carl Halir came forward to play Beethoven's violin concert, the length, weight, and difficulty of which have made it almost the one crucial test of a violinist who makes any pretension to eminence, although many a man of minor mark has found his reward and won his success in the opportunities for technical display, smooth song and curt emphasis which it can be made to furnish. Mr. Halir deepened and vivified the good impression which he made at the Appollo concert. Having the orchestra at his back and the great composition surely at his command, he added something of force and breadth to his manner, although even now he rose to no lofty height of fervor or of enthusiastic energy. He perhaps won admiration first of all by his purity of tone and ease of phrasing, in spite of some flaws in the intonation of rapid passages. His tone was not large, but it was most agreeable, and its softness was not to be confounded for an instant with weakness. It was not until he came to his cadenza, which was a mass of difficulties and intricacies, that the full extent and masterfulness of his technique were demonstrated and proved his right to his eminent position among violinists. The romance was very beautiful, gentle and suave, and its delicate final phrases fairly melted away into thin air under his hands. The last movement—which is easily displaced from its true value by being played too rapidly or nervously—seemed to us to fall just below its real self for want of a little more animation and activity. Mr. Halir did not appear to us to enjoy the music or to be exhilarated by it as he ought. It was exquisite playing, but there was little heartiness in it, we thought. The audience was greatly pleased and called and recalled the artist several times.

The symphony, which ended a pretty long programme, was new to Boston. It was Tsehaikowsky's fourth, in F minor, opus 36. It is a work in which its composer's national disposition appears as erratic—almost extravagant, indeed—because of its tremendous antitheses of temper, tone and appeal. The first and fourth movements are vehement almost to violence at times, and their sonority and clangor exceed almost anything else from the same pen, unless it be the tumultuous and vociferous "1812." But between these voluminous and potential movements, lie one which is dreamy, melancholy and searching, and one which is quaint, odd, and touched with a humor which is none the less real because it includes to grimness.

A spirit of contest agitates all the first movement to the fever heat of battle and is not wholly absent from the other three. It begins with a sturdy commanding call of the brass voices, which soon gives way to the main matter with a settlement of the rhythm into a waltz motion, although the character of the music is miles away from anything terpsichorean. For the turbulent elements are all abroad and the conflict between the shrill upper voices and the dully roaring lower ones is fierce and active. There is a little sudden and brief relief when a cool phrase for the clarinet falls into the strife, followed by bright and piquant running figures for the upper wooden wind. But the pugnacious mood of the earlier pages is not so ready to yield, and the rumorous opposition is renewed, increasing its forceful tumult and its hot haste until the movement ends almost in a whirlwind of a presto. The programme-book thinks that this is "a sort of ideal waltz." True, perhaps, for ideals are many; but this kind of a waltz would seem to fit in rather with some "Lanigan's Ball," where rival swains went crashing down amid the ruins of an irritated festivity.

The andantino presents two distinct phases—a soft sad song, first intimated by the oboe, and a graver, moodier, march-like measure, curiously ornamented by the flute, between which a less formal melody appears for a little while. The orchestration is interesting for the absence of all the brasses except the horns; and they have only a very little to say.

The scherzo is also of diversified character in theme and touch. It is noted as a "pizzicato ostinato," because the peculiar part assigned to the strings excludes all use of the bow. But there is another episode for the wooden wind, in which Mr. Jaquet's first flute shone brilliantly, and yet a third for the brass choir and the kettle-drums. These several integers are often blended with telling effect.

The finale is all at amazingly high pressure in speed and force, and the piccolo, bass-drum, triangle and cymbals are invoked to increase the din and enthuse the players. The whole movement is most exciting and at times almost deafening; but it is wrought out with firm hand and clear sight, so that the involutions of theme and treatment make no perturbing confusion. Toward the very end the strong air of the opening returns to incite to new fervors and the close is reached in the contribution of its fullest tone by every instrument.

The playing of this symphony, which must tax the attention and spirits of the players not less than their technique, was a luminous testimony to the virtuosity of the orchestra and to the confidence of Mr. Paur in their obedient responsiveness to his earnest and exacting commands.

The symphony for next Saturday will be Mendelsohn's "Italian," and the novelty Duparc's symphonic poem, "Lenore" Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture will be played and Mr. Pol Plancon will sing "Wotan's Farewell," and an air from Haydn's "Seasons."

[illegible] SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. C., NO. 152.

SUNDAY, NOV. 29, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Carl Halir, the Soloist, Wins Excited Plaudits.

Plays Beethoven's Violin Concerto with Overwhelming Success—Tschaikowsky Symphony Dazzlingly Brilliant, with a Finale Suggesting Sublimated Comic Opera.

The programme for the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last night, was:

Overture, "Manfred"	Schumann
Concerto for violin	Beethoven
Symphony No. 4, in F-minor (First time).	Tschaikowsky

The soloist was Mr. Carl Halir, whose performance of the Beethoven concerto, still the greatest masterpiece ever written for the violin, was wonderfully beautiful for the dignity, the purity, taste and the classic dignity of style that marked it at every point. There is no need to dwell on the artist's technique, further than to pay passing tribute to its utter perfection. The work was interpreted throughout with the most keenly sympathetic devotion to the composer, and without the remotest trace of anything than even suggested mere display. His tone is surprisingly large, firm and smooth; his phrasing fascinating in its grace and to musical truth; his cantabile is indescribably charming in its broad flow, as are also the simplicity and sincerity of his feeling. Brilliancy, virility, genuine artistic instinct and solidity are the leading characteristics of his playing His expression is without affectation, and his sentiment always lofty.

He is almost cold in his classic reserve, but if his efforts do not probe deep into the heart, their chaste intellectuality delights the intelligence. No purer playing than that of his has ever held the interest and rapt attention of an audience in Music Hall. He may not dazzle, nor magnetize his hearers, but he satisfies them, which is better. The fluency and precision of his finger work were convincingly proved in his splendid playing of the fireworks in the cadenza written by Joachin for the first movement; but the principal charm of his performance was to be found in the repose and the dignity that marked his interpretation of the concert as a whole, and that appealed irresistibly to the understanding. Nothing could be more exquisitely chaste than was his rendering of lovely larghetto, and he gave the finale, so piquant an accent, so just an emphasis, and so broad a sweep that, for once, it seemed less trivial than usual, and more in keeping with the preceding movements.

The absence of anything resembling showy virtuosity in his performance was one of its specially gratifying features, and the tremendous and prolonged applause that rewarded him at the close of the first movement was, therefore, all the more notable, since it was called forth by the sheer solid worth of his playing and the nobility of his style. His success was overwhelming, and at the close of the concert he was recalled five times amid excited plaudits, of whose sincerity there was not the shadow of a doubt. The manner in which M. Paur accompanied the soloist was exceptionally sympathetic and effective.

The Tschaikowsky symphony is an extraordinary work in its bold originality, its general barbaric emphasis and the astonishing brilliancy of its orchestration. Almost savage at times in its fury, striking in its daring mixing of cross rhythms; now sombre, now trivial, now brutal, now tender, with long stretches of noise, broken in upon often with charming bits of sensuous melody, it outrages nearly every received idea of a symphony. There is in it nothing of the composer of the splendid Pathetic symphony; on the contrary, it is music run riot, always interesting, always clear, but singularly puzzling in regard to what the composer aimed at.

The slow movement is the only place in which he refrains from eccentricity, and its mournful principal theme is piquant in conception and treatment. In the scherzo the composer falls back again on the barbaric, and produces some novel effects in the strings, which are kept playing pizzicato throughout. The finale is a frenzy of vigor and a torrent of orchestration from beginning to end. The pace at which the movement goes is tremendous, and the brass holds high revel with it.

The principal theme has decidedly a sublimated comic opera flavor on a large scale, and it whirls along with enormous fervor and with a heavy rhythmic pulsation that intensifies as it goes until at length it culminates in a dizzying whirl of accent. It is all very exciting and even interesting in its way, but when it is all over one is somewhat dazed, and when calm returns begins to wonder what it was all about. The work pleased the audience, and was heartily applauded. It was played with splendid brilliancy.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven; aria from "The Seasons," Haydn; symphonic poem, "Lenore," Duparc (first time); "Wotan's Farewell," Wagner; Italian symphony, Mendelssohn. Mr. Pol Plancon is to be the soloist.

Last Friday afternoon two small boys wandered into the Winter street corridor of Music Hall. They were anywhere from five to eight years of age, and that wholesome type of youngster that attracts any one who has a heart in his body. Looking about for a moment, they at last espied Assistant Manager Comee, and at once accosted him. "Say, mister, is the band playing now?" "It is," replied Mr. Comee, looking the pair over, and, greatly taken by their bright, fresh faces, he added, "Would you like to go in and hear the music?" "Oh, yes, sir," they responded eagerly. So the doorkeeper was instructed to admit them. About five minutes later Mr. Comee met the urchins on their way out. "Well, boys," he said pleasantly, "you didn't stay very long." "No, sir. We didn't like it!" The naive response very nearly finished the assistant manager, and he is still wondering what sort of a "band" the young gentlemen imagined they were going to hear. The honesty of the reply, however, if absolutely un-Bostonese in its criticism of the finest orchestra in the country, was

---

Boston Sunda

SUNDAY, NOV. 29.

Symphony Concert.

Last week's Symphony program comprised the overture to Schumann's "Manfred," Beethoven's concerto for violin and Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4, the latter for the first time in Boston. Mr Carl Halir was the violin soloist. The orchestra performed the charming Schumann overture in a sympathetic manner, bringing out its manifold beauties of passion and dreaminess most effectively. The animated phrases of the introduction were played with admirable distinctness, and of course the climax and the close of the overture were impressively given.

Mr Halir had debilitating weather and a hot and almost stifling auditorium with which to contend, and in consequence thereof the relaxing of his violin strings were a frequent annoyance to him. This mattered but little, for the artist demonstrated by his fine interpretation of the immensely difficult Beethoven concerto the qualities of a grand violinist, and emphasized the success won earlier in the week at the Apollo concert, in which he played compositions by Spohr and Bruch. It is a pleasure to speak of the man as an honest artist, in the sense that there is no affectation in his manner of playing. His appearance, both personal and as a performer, is simplicity personified. His tone is rich and smooth, his command of the instrument seemingly unlimited, his fingering marvelously rapid and true to pitch, and his chords are in perfect harmony.

The embroidery of the opening theme for the violin makes a brilliant introduction, and Mr Halir maintained the quality of his entrance throughout the long number. He used the Joachim cadenzas and successfully surmounted every one of the difficulties with which they teem. The dainty themes of the second movement were exquisitely phrased, and equal praise is due for the performance of jolly dance music in the last movement. His entire conception and execution is worthy of very high commendation, and the pleasure of the audience was made manifest by many recalls of the talented artist to the platform.

Tschaikowsky's symphony, No. 4, given for the first time here, shows the composer's sense of dramatic effects and coloring in a marked manner. At times the musical tumult is deafening and sounds inharmonious, the kettledrums are very liberally woven into the score and there are musical combinations of an eccentric nature in abundance. The symphony opens with fortissimo phrases by the brasses and bassoons and then runs into a daintier atmosphere, developing into the humorous vein, and closing with a perfect bombardment of instruments. The strenuous passages are followed by a free fantasia which precedes the closing waltz motif. The work of the orchestra may be classed under the general head, effective, especially in the fortissimo struggle.

A melancholy little theme and a rough melody, the latter capitally played by the celli, formed the principal parts of the second movement. The third part is mainly pizzicato and was mainly interesting from its peculiar nature. The strings were admirably played. The movement might consistently be introduced into Dvorak's "New World" symphony, being very suggestive of mandolin and banjo accompaniments. The closing was in the Tschaikowsky vein and resembled the first movement in general treatment. The whole interpretation by the orchestra was commendable, calling forth the might rather than the delicacy of the instruments.

Mr Pol Plancon will be the soloist this week. The following program will be given: Beethoven, overture, "Coriolanus;" Haydn, aria from "The Seasons;" Dupare, symphonic poem, "Lenore;" Wagner, Wotan's Farewell; Mendelssohn, symphony in A major, No. 4 (Italian).

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 29, 1896.

Copyright, 1896. Post Publishing Company.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The patrons of the Symphony had the opportunity last night of listening to a violinist of whom little had previously been heard, nor of whom very great things were expected; also to a new symphony by Tschaikowsky.

Mr. Carl Halir was the violinist referred to, and he made his bow before a symphony audience with the well-known and difficult Beethoven concerto in D major. He is a man of striking physique, whose whole manner impresses one with his earnestness and intensity. His actual worth as a virtuoso was not apparent until he had progressed some distance in the concerto, for in the early passages he seemed to be a trifle at variance with the orchestra as to the tempo, which may have been due to an unfamiliarity with the surroundings.

In the second movement of the concerto, however, he more than made up for any previous shortcomings, and his delicate interpretation of the measures was altogether delightful. Mr. Halir has an easy, natural style, and there is nothing of the sensational whatever about his playing. His intonation is well-nigh perfect and he has a delightful conception of light and shade. Taken all in all, his playing of the concerto was masterly, and while many violinists have been heard in this same concerto very many times, few have essayed it with such uniformly satisfactory results. The audience testified to its delight by calling Mr. Halir out some half dozen times.

The Tschaikowsky symphony is in four movements, and for the most part abounds in bizarre, showy effects. The first movement opens noisily, but is quickly followed by several graceful, undulating themes, but the fortissimo passages soon return with increasing strength, the movement ending with a coda which is short but strongly dramatic.

The second movement is extremely simple in form, but the third, the scherzo, is thoroughly unique, in the successive presentation of three themes, one for strings, pizzicati, one for wood-wind, and the third for the brasses and kettle drums. It is taken in rapid time, and is of a catchy order. The fourth movement is a brilliant rondo, with many prettily developed themes. The whole work shows masterly orchestration, and is thoroughly characteristic of this renowned composer.

At the next concert, Pol Plancon will be the soloist, and a symphonic poem, "Leonore," by Duparc, will be heard for the first time.

NOVEMBER 29,

Sixth Symphony Concert — Carl Halir, Violinist, Plays the Beethoven Concerto—First Performance of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony.

The program of the sixth Symphony concert last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Overture, "Manfred"	Schumann
Concerto for violin	Beethoven
Symphony No. 4, F minor	Tschaikowsky

The orchestra, under Mr. Paur's beat, gave a passionate performance of the "Manfred" overture.

Mr. Halir, who made his first appearance in Boston last Tuesday night at an Apollo Club concert, played last evening the concerto of Beethoven. What I wrote last week of his characteristics as a violinist might be now repeated in enlarged and more glowing language; for, whatever the Gesangscene may be with orchestra, I admit frankly that with piano it is a bore of the deadliest kind. That Mr. Halir should have left a decided impression after his playing the sugary music of Spohr is no slight tribute in itself. But last night the Beethoven concerto gave him a far greater opportunity.

Mr. Halir is an exceedingly fine and able specimen of the academic violinist. His tone is manly, frank, firm, convincing. His technique, so far as mere mechanism is concerned, is amply adequate to all demands, and it is never employed for aggressively personal display. In a larger sense his technique is most admirable. There is a reposeful authority about the man, an excellent imitation, no doubt unconscious, of his master Joachim. He is musical by nature; he has been most carefully taught; he is a credit to his teachers, to his profession, to his country, to himself; he is everything you say—but there is not one drop of virtuoso blood in his big, good-natured body.

He has nobility of style—the nobility that has been taught and is traditional. His performance is polished and scholarly. He respects the composer and endeavors to interpret him first for the composer's glory, then for his own. He is a most estimable and correct violinist—an example to the young, a model of good taste and pure style and musical thoughtfulness—but there is not one drop of virtuoso blood in his big, good-natured body, as he stands in Joachim's manner.

In other words, Madame, not one tone went straight to your heart and disquieted you or consoled you for something that as yet has been absent from your life. You applauded, because he played well, and you are a woman of intelligence. You have seldom heard a more serene performance of the concerto; but you were not moved strangely within you, so that while the music was played you were loose from time, space, reality. If you had been thus moved, you would not have applauded so loudly in the sight of the people. You would have felt abashed; you would have blushed if you had met suddenly the violinist face to face. Perhaps then it is well for you that Mr. Halir is a most excellent violinist without the divine or demoniacal spark.

⁂

The Andantino and the Scherzo of Tschaikowsky's 4th symphony were first played in Boston at a Symphony concert Oct. 18, 1890. It was the first introduction of Tschaikowsky's symphonies to a Boston public. The 2d was played by Damrosch's orchestra Dec. 9, 1891; the 5th was played at a Symphony concert Oct. 22, 1892, and the 6th was produced at a Symphony concert Dec. 29, 1894.

I should not quarrel with anybody who protested against the use of the word "symphony" in connection with this music and desired the word "suite." But call the work what you will, the work itself is one of unusual interest. The first movement is for a moment mindful of Schumann's first symphony, and then there is the thought of Italian melody sung wildly by a Russian voice. Long as the movement is, the interest does not flag, such are the rhythmic ingenuity and the varying, shifting procession of tone-colors. The second movement is distinctly Russian in feeling; the color is the drab of Dostoievsky; there is the suspicion of Death waiting quietly while the lonely villagers sing their mournful songs of love. The third movement is Oriental. How cunningly the composer avoids monotony! How dexterously he turns as he is about to plunge into dire vulgarity! The finale is hurrah and vodka, vodka and hurrah! Is the song "Vo poli berosa stoiala"? I know not. I care not. There is the mad finale to a Russian life.

Throughout this remarkable work blows the strong wind of inspiration. There are elemental qualities in it, qualities that characterize natural phenomena. And the wealth of ingenuity in the detail! Take, for instance, the use of the drums in the first movement. Inspiration and ingenuity: how seldom are they found together in a work of such long breath!

⁂

The performance of the orchestra was admirable throughout, and the performance of the symphony was a memorable one, for its color, beauty and its dazzling splendor. The accompaniment to Mr. Halir was played very sympathetically. There was a large and very applausive audience.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 29, 1896.

The sixth symphony concert began with a just and feeling performance of Schumann's philosophic and yet not undramatic overture from his "Manfred" music. Its wandering, doubtful thoughts and moody contrasts, so suggestive of the spiritual roving and strivings of Byron's hero, were excellently expressed and sustained.

Then Mr. Carl Halir came forward to play Beethoven's violin concert, the length, weight, and difficulty of which have made it almost the one crucial test of a violinist who makes any pretension to eminence, although many a man of minor mark has found his reward and won his success in the opportunities for technical display, smooth song and curt emphasis which it can be made to furnish. Mr. Halir deepened and vivified the good impression which he made at the Appollo concert. Having the orchestra at his back and the great composition surely at his command, he added something of force and breadth to his manner, although even now he rose to no lofty height of fervor or of enthusiastic energy. He perhaps won admiration first of all by his purity of tone and ease of phrasing, in spite of some flaws in the intonation of rapid passages. His tone was not large, but it was most agreeable, and its softness was not to be confounded for an instant with weakness. It was not until he came to his cadenza, which was a mass of difficulties and intricacies, that the full extent and masterfulness of his technique were demonstrated and proved his right to his eminent position among violinists. The romance was very beautiful, gentle and suave, and its delicate final phrases fairly melted away into thin air under his hands. The last movement—which is easily displaced from its true value by being played too rapidly or nervously—seemed to us to fall just below its real self for want of a little more animation and activity. Mr. Halir did not appear to us to enjoy the music or to be exhilarated by it as he ought. It was exquisite playing, but there was little heartiness in it, we thought. The audience was greatly pleased and called and recalled the artist several times.

The symphony, which ended a pretty long programme, was new to Boston. It was Tsehaikowsky's fourth, in F minor, opus 36. It is a work in which its composer's national disposition appears as erratic—almost extravagant, indeed—because of its tremendous antitheses of temper, tone and appeal. The first and fourth movements are vehement almost to violence at times, and their sonority and clangor exceed almost anything else from the same pen, unless it be the tumultuous and vociferous "1812." But between these voluminous and potential movements, lie one which is dreamy, melancholy and searching, and one which is quaint, odd, and touched with a humor which is none the less real because it includes to grimness.

A spirit of contest agitates all the first movement to the fever heat of battle and is not wholly absent from the other three. It begins with a sturdy commanding call of the brass voices, which soon gives way to the main matter with a settlement of the rhythm into a waltz motion, although the character of the music is miles away from anything terpsichorean. For the turbulent elements are all abroad and the conflict between the shrill upper voices and the dully roaring lower ones is fierce and active. There is a little sudden and brief relief when a cool phrase for the clarinet falls into the strife, followed by bright and piquant running figures for the upper wooden wind. But the pugnacious mood of the earlier pages is not so ready to yield, and the rumorous opposition is renewed, increasing its forceful tumult and its hot haste until the movement ends almost in a whirlwind of a presto. The programme-book thinks that this is "a sort of ideal waltz." True, perhaps, for ideals are many; but this kind of a waltz would seem to fit in rather with some "Lanigan's Ball," where rival swains went crashing down amid the ruins of an irritated festivity.

The andantino presents two distinct phases—a soft sad song, first intimated by the oboe, and a graver, moodier, march-like measure, curiously ornamented by the flute, between which a less formal melody appears for a little while. The orchestration is interesting for the absence of all the brasses except the horns; and they have only a very little to say.

The scherzo is also of diversified character in theme and touch. It is noted as a "pizzicato ostinato," because the peculiar part assigned to the strings excludes all use of the bow. But there is another episode for the wooden wind, in which Mr. Jaquet's first flute shone brilliantly, and yet a third for the brass choir and the kettle-drums. These several integers are often blended with telling effect.

The finale is all at amazingly high pressure in speed and force, and the piccolo, bass-drum, triangle and cymbals are invoked to increase the din and enthuse the players. The whole movement is most exciting and at times almost deafening; but it is wrought out with firm hand and clear sight, so that the involutions of theme and treatment make no perturbing confusion. Toward the very end the strong air of the opening returns to incite to new fervors and the close is reached in the contribution of its fullest tone by every instrument.

The playing of this symphony, which must tax the attention and spirits of the players not less than their technique, was a luminous testimony to the virtuosity of the orchestra and to the confidence of Mr. Paur in their obedient responsiveness to his earnest and exacting commands.

The symphony for next Saturday will be Mendelsohn's "Italian," and the novelty Duparc's symphonic poem, "Lenore" Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture will be played and Mr. Pol Plancon will sing "Wotan's Farewell," and an air from Haydn's "Seasons."

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. C., NO. 152.

SUNDAY, NOV. 29, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Carl Halir, the Soloist, Wins Excited Plaudits.

Plays Beethoven's Violin Concerto with Overwhelming Success—Tschaikowsky Symphony Dazzlingly Brilliant, with a Finale Suggesting Sublimated Comic Opera.

The programme for the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last night, was:

Overture, "Manfred"	Schumann
Concerto for violin	Beethoven
Symphony No. 4, in F-minor (First time).	Tschaikowsky

The soloist was Mr. Carl Halir, whose performance of the Beethoven concerto, still the greatest masterpiece ever written for the violin, was wonderfully beautiful for the dignity, the purity, taste and the classic dignity of style that marked it at every point. There is no need to dwell on the artist's technique, further than to pay passing tribute to its utter perfection. The work was interpreted throughout with the most keenly sympathetic devotion to the composer, and without the remotest trace of anything than even suggested mere display. His tone is surprisingly large, firm and smooth; his phrasing fascinating in its grace and to musical truth; his cantabile is indescribably charming in its broad flow, as are also the simplicity and sincerity of his feeling. Brilliancy, virility, genuine artistic instinct and solidity are the leading characteristics of his playing His expression is without affectation, and his sentiment always lofty.

He is almost cold in his classic reserve, but if his efforts do not probe deep into the heart, their chaste intellectuality delights the intelligence. No purer playing than that of his has ever held the interest and rapt attention of an audience in Music Hall. He may not dazzle, nor magnetize his hearers, but he satisfies them, which is better. The fluency and precision of his finger work were convincingly proved in his splendid playing of the fireworks in the cadenza written by Joachin for the first movement; but the principal charm of his performance was to be found in the repose and the dignity that marked his interpretation of the concert as a whole, and that appealed irresistibly to the understanding. Nothing could be more exquisitely chaste than was his rendering of lovely larghetto, and he gave the finale, so piquant an accent, so just an emphasis, and so broad a sweep that, for once, it seemed less trivial than usual, and more in keeping with the preceding movements.

The absence of anything resembling showy virtuosity in his performance was one of its specially gratifying features, and the tremendous and prolonged applause that rewarded him at the close of the first movement was, therefore, all the more notable, since it was called forth by the sheer solid worth of his playing and the nobility of his style. His success was overwhelming, and at the close of the concert he was recalled five times amid excited plaudits, of whose sincerity there was not the shadow of a doubt. The manner in which M. Paur accompanied the soloist was exceptionally sympathetic and effective.

The Tschaikowsky symphony is an extraordinary work in its bold originality, its general barbaric emphasis and the astonishing brilliancy of its orchestration. Almost savage at times in its fury, striking in its daring mixing of cross rhythms; now sombre, now trivial, now brutal, now tender, with long stretches of noise, broken in upon often with charming bits of sensuous melody, it outrages nearly every received idea of a symphony. There is in it nothing of the composer of the splendid Pathetic symphony; on the contrary, it is music run riot, always interesting, always clear, but singularly puzzling in regard to what the composer aimed at.

The slow movement is the only place in which he refrains from eccentricity, and its mournful principal theme is piquant in conception and treatment. In the scherzo the composer falls back again on the barbaric, and produces some novel effects in the strings, which are kept playing pizzicato throughout. The finale is a frenzy of vigor and a torrent of orchestration from beginning to end. The pace at which the movement goes is tremendous, and the brass holds high revel with it.

The principal theme has decidedly a sublimated comic opera flavor on a large scale, and it whirls along with enormous fervor and with a heavy rhythmic pulsation that intensifies as it goes until at length it culminates in a dizzying whirl of accent. It is all very exciting and even interesting in its way, but when it is all over one is somewhat dazed, and when calm returns begins to wonder what it was all about. The work pleased the audience, and was heartily applauded. It was played with splendid brilliancy.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven; aria from "The Seasons," Haydn; symphonic poem, "Lenore," Duparc (first time); "Wotan's Farewell," Wagner; Italian symphony, Mendelssohn. Mr. Pol Plancon is to be the soloist.

Last Friday afternoon two small boys wandered into the Winter street corridor of Music Hall. They were anywhere from five to eight years of age, and that wholesome type of youngster that attracts any one who has a heart in his body. Looking about for a moment, they at last espied Assistant Manager Comee, and at once accosted him. "Say, mister, is the band playing now?" "It is," replied Mr. Comee, looking the pair over, and, greatly taken by their bright, fresh faces, he added, "Would you like to go in and hear the music?" "Oh, yes, sir," they responded eagerly. So the doorkeeper was instructed to admit them. About five minutes later Mr. Comee met the urchins on their way out. "Well, boys," he said pleasantly, "you didn't stay very long." "No, sir. We didn't like it!" The naive response very nearly finished the assistant manager, and he is still wondering what sort of a "band" the young gentlemen imagined they were going to hear. The honesty of the reply, however, if absolutely un-Bostonese in its criticism of the finest orchestra in the country, was most refreshing!

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 29, 1896.

Symphony Concert.

Last week's Symphony program comprised the overture to Schumann's "Manfred," Beethoven's concerto for violin and Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4, the latter for the first time in Boston. Mr Carl Halir was the violin soloist. The orchestra performed the charming Schumann overture in a sympathetic manner, bringing out its manifold beauties of passion and dreaminess most effectively. The animated phrases of the introduction were played with admirable distinctness, and of course the climax and the close of the overture were impressively given.

Mr Halir had debilitating weather and a hot and almost stifling auditorium with which to contend, and in consequence thereof the relaxing of his violin strings were a frequent annoyance to him. This mattered but little, for the artist demonstrated by his fine interpretation of the immensely difficult Beethoven concerto the qualities of a grand violinist, and emphasized the success won earlier in the week at the Apollo concert, in which he played compositions by Spohr and Bruch. It is a pleasure to speak of the man as an honest artist, in the sense that there is no affectation in his manner of playing. His appearance, both personal and as a performer, is simplicity personified. His tone is rich and smooth, his command of the instrument seemingly unlimited, his fingering marvelously rapid and true to pitch, and his chords are in perfect harmony.

The embroidery of the opening theme for the violin makes a brilliant introduction, and Mr Halir maintained the quality of his entrance throughout the long number. He used the Joachim cadenzas and successfully surmounted every one of the difficulties with which they teem. The dainty themes of the second movement were exquisitely phrased, and equal praise is due for the performance of jolly dance music in the last movement. His entire conception and execution is worthy of very high commendation, and the pleasure of the audience was made manifest by many recalls of the talented artist to the platform.

Tschaikowsky's symphony, No. 4, given for the first time here, shows the composer's sense of dramatic effects and coloring in a marked manner. At times the musical tumult is deafening and sounds inharmonious, the kettledrums are very liberally woven into the score and there are musical combinations of an eccentric nature in abundance. The symphony opens with fortissimo phrases by the brasses and bassoons and then runs into a daintier atmosphere, developing into the humorous vein, and closing with a perfect bombardment of instruments. The strenuous passages are followed by a free fantasia which precedes the closing waltz motif. The work of the orchestra may be classed under the general head, effective, especially in the fortissimo struggle.

A melancholy little theme and a rough melody, the latter capitally played by the celli, formed the principal parts of the second movement. The third part is mainly pizzicato and was mainly interesting from its peculiar nature. The strings were admirably played. The movement might consistently be introduced into Dvorak's "New World" symphony, being very suggestive of mandolin and banjo accompaniments. The closing was in the Tschaikowsky vein and resembled the first movement in general treatment. The whole interpretation by the orchestra was commendable, calling forth the might rather than the delicacy of the instruments.

Mr Pol Plancon will be the soloist this week. The following program will be given: Beethoven, overture, "Coriolanus;" Haydn, aria from "The Seasons;" Duparc, symphonic poem, "Lenore;" Wagner, Wotan's Farewell; Mendelssohn, symphony in A major, No. 4 (Italian).

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 29, 1896.

Copyright, 1896. Post Publishing Company.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The patrons of the Symphony had the opportunity last night of listening to a violinist of whom little had previously been heard, nor of whom very great things were expected; also to a new symphony by Tschaikowsky.

Mr. Carl Halir was the violinist referred to, and he made his bow before a symphony audience with the well-known and difficult Beethoven concerto in D major. He is a man of striking physique, whose whole manner impresses one with his earnestness and intensity. His actual worth as a virtuoso was not apparent until he had progressed some distance in the concerto, for in the early passages he seemed to be a trifle at variance with the orchestra as to the tempo, which may have been due to an unfamiliarity with the surroundings.

In the second movement of the concerto, however, he more than made up for any previous shortcomings, and his delicate interpretation of the measures was altogether delightful. Mr. Halir has an easy, natural style, and there is nothing of the sensational whatever about his playing. His intonation is well-nigh perfect and he has a delightful conception of light and shade. Taken all in all, his playing of the concerto was masterly, and while many violinists have been heard in this same concerto very many times, few have essayed it with such uniformly satisfactory results. The audience testified to its delight by calling Mr. Halir out some half dozen times.

The Tschaikowsky symphony is in four movements, and for the most part abounds in bizarre, showy effects. The first movement opens noisily, but is quickly followed by several graceful, undulating themes, but the fortissimo passages soon return with increasing strength, the movement ending with a coda which is short but strongly dramatic.

The second movement is extremely simple in form, but the third, the scherzo, is thoroughly unique, in the successive presentation of three themes, one for strings, pizzicati, one for wood-wind, and the third for the brasses and kettle drums. It is taken in rapid time, and is of a catchy order. The fourth movement is a brilliant rondo, with many prettily developed themes. The whole work shows masterly orchestration, and is thoroughly characteristic of this renowned composer.

At the next concert, Pol Plancon will be the soloist, and a symphonic poem, "Leonore," by Duparc, will be heard for the first time.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1896.

Sixth Symphony Concert—Carl Halir, Violinist, Plays the Beethoven Concerto—First Performance of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony.

The program of the sixth Symphony concert last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Overture, "Manfred"	Schumann
Concerto for violin	Beethoven
Symphony No. 4, F minor	Tschaikowsky

The orchestra, under Mr. Paur's beat, gave a passionate performance of the "Manfred" overture.

Mr. Halir, who made his first appearance in Boston last Tuesday night at an Apollo Club concert, played last evening the concerto of Beethoven. What I wrote last week of his characteristics as a violinist might be now repeated in enlarged and more glowing language; for, whatever the Gesangscene may be with orchestra, I admit frankly that with piano it is a bore of the deadliest kind. That Mr. Halir should have left a decided impression after his playing the sugary music of Spohr is no slight tribute in itself. But last night the Beethoven concerto gave him a far greater opportunity.

Mr. Halir is an exceedingly fine and able specimen of the academic violinist. His tone is manly, frank, firm, convincing. His technique, so far as mere mechanism is concerned, is amply adequate to all demands, and it is never employed for aggressively personal display. In a larger sense his technique is most admirable. There is a reposeful authority about the man, an excellent imitation, no doubt unconscious, of his master Joachim. He is musical by nature; he has been most carefully taught; he is a credit to his teachers, to his profession, to his country, to himself; he is everything you say—but there is not one drop of virtuoso blood in his big, good-natured body.

He has nobility of style—the nobility that has been taught and is traditional. His performance is polished and scholarly. He respects the composer and endeavors to interpret him first for the composer's glory, then for his own. He is a most estimable and correct violinist—an example to the young, a model of good taste and pure style and musical thoughtfulness—but there is not one drop of virtuoso blood in his big, good-natured body, as he stands in Joachim's manner.

In other words, Madame, not one tone went straight to your heart and disquieted you or consoled you for something that as yet has been absent from your life. You applauded, because he played well, and you are a woman of intelligence. You have seldom heard a more serene performance of the concerto; but you were not moved strangely within you, so that while the music was played you were loose from time, space, reality. If you had been thus moved, you would not have applauded so loudly in the sight of the people. You would have felt abashed; you would have blushed if you had met suddenly the violinist face to face. Perhaps then it is well for you that Mr. Halir is a most excellent violinist without the divine or demoniacal spark.

⁂

The Andantino and the Scherzo of Tschaikowsky's 4th symphony were first played in Boston at a Symphony concert Oct. 18, 1890. It was the first introduction of Tschaikowsky's symphonies to a Boston public. The 2d was played by Damrosch's orchestra Dec. 9, 1891; the 5th was played at a Symphony concert Oct. 22, 1892, and the 6th was produced at a Symphony concert Dec. 29, 1894.

I should not quarrel with anybody who protested against the use of the word "symphony" in connection with this music and desired the word "suite." But call the work what you will, the work itself is one of unusual interest. The first movement is for a moment mindful of Schumann's first symphony, and then there is the thought of Italian melody sung wildly by a Russian voice. Long as the movement is, the interest does not flag, such are the rhythmic ingenuity and the varying, shifting procession of tone-colors. The second movement is distinctly Russian in feeling; the color is the drab of Dostoievsky; there is the suspicion of Death waiting quietly while the lonely villagers sing their mournful songs of love. The third movement is Oriental. How cunningly the composer avoids monotony! How dexterously he turns as he is about to plunge into dire vulgarity! The finale is hurrah and vodka, vodka and hurrah! Is the song "Vo poli berosa stojala"? I know not. I care not. There is the mad finale to a Russian life.

Throughout this remarkable work blows the strong wind of inspiration. There are elemental qualities in it, qualities that characterize natural phenomena. And the wealth of ingenuity in the detail! Take, for instance, the use of the drums in the first movement. Inspiration and ingenuity: how seldom are they found together in a work of such long breath!

⁂

The performance of the orchestra was admirable throughout, and the performance of the symphony was a memorable one, for its color, beauty and its dazzling splendor. The accompaniment to Mr. Halir was played very sympathetically. There was a large and very applausive audience.

PHILIP HALE.

[illegible] Paper of the State

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 30, 1896.

The Symphony Concert — The Orchestra at its Best.

Byron's "Manfred" is the subject of subjects for musical treatment. The hero, a close relative of Goethe's "Faust" (so close that Byron was accused of plagiarism), but a Faust without a Marguerite, a more sombre and more resolute sinner, has something of the dignity of a Miltonian Lucifer about him which finds worthy expression in lofty yet dark-toned music.

The supernatural touches, too, scarcely impressive in recitation, become really thrilling when presented in an orchestral guise. One must not confound this mysterious, pessimistic and philosophic Count Manfred of Byron and Schumann with another party of the same name who has also received much musical attention; "King Manfred" is a historical personage, who, in the 13th century, fought two popes, was made king of Sicily, was excommunicated, died bravely fighting his opponents at Benevento (1266) and was turned into an operatic character by a host of Italian and French composers and also by Carl Reinecke.

Naturally Byron's lofty hero, with only the ghost of a heroine, is not at all suited for the operatic stage but makes a splendid symphonic figure.

The sorrowful, metaphysical character of Manfred appealed to the innermost nature of the introspective Schumann and in his hands Manfred became a unique and most effective work, the overture, which began the concert on Saturday, being a masterpiece of its kind. Exactly as in Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture, there is a struggle between Light and Darkness, between Sorrow and Salvation, but here the darker side seems temporarily to triumph.

The mental torment, the inner struggle of Manfred, is at once indicated by the syncopations (and Schumann was the great master of syncopation) of the earliest measures, and that pianissimo call of trumpets is, like the call of trombones in Mozart's Requiem, a warning voice from another world. The tender Astarte motive hints at forgiveness, but the broken accents in which this appears at the close does not indicate clearly the salvation of the self-tormented one.

Possibly the best instrumental work which Schumann ever achieved, the "Manfred" overture, received a performance that was at least adequate although scarcely as subtle as it could have been. The Astarte figure, for example, could have had more tenderness. Our director, in his readings, shows a healthy, manly nature, and evidently fears mawkishness in music, but he is not near the borderline of that fault, and sometimes errs in a too careful avoidance of feminine tenderness.

Mr. Carl Halir gave a performance of the Beethoven violin concerto that is long to be remembered. Every concerto by Beethoven is in some degree a symphony, and the orchestra and Mr. Paur must share in the artist's triumph, for the ensemble was irreproachable and the shading perfect. In fact it is time to cease reiterating the praises of the orchestra, for it has now reached a standard beyond any point in its previous history, a perfection that fully justifies the warnings made in the days when its technique was retrograding, and the predictions uttered at the time when Mr. Paur began to turn the tide. Mr. Halir stated last week that he did not believe its equal was to be found in the world, its only possible rival being Lamoureux's organization in Paris.

To return to the concerto; it is an almost unplayable work and not the most attractive to the average auditor. Its rugged first movement with its four tremendous accents constantly reiterated, is a picture of the earnest Beethoven of the fifth symphony or the B flat piano sonata (op. 106) and might well bear the motto "Per aspera ad astra."

With the mighty impression of the work fixed in one's mind it is interesting to read in the "Allgemeine Musikzeitung" of January, 1807, the following words, "The admirers of the Beethoven muse will be interested in the news that this composer has just finished a violin concerto, so far as the writer knows, his first. It was performed by the eminent violinist Klement in his recently given benefit concert with his usual elegance and delicacy!" As Clement played parts of the work at sight, perhaps timidity was mistaken for "delicacy."

Of Halir's playing one can say emphatically, in Beethoven's words, "Das ist das Wahre,"—it was the true, classical, nonsensational school of performance; it was Joachim's self that seemed to stand there in the person of his colleague, and calmly, if not cooly, give the most difficult work of the concerto repertoire. Joachim's cadenza to the first movement gave the violinist a chance to show almost all points of violin virtuosity; in it there was ever so much of double-stopping, some fine martellato work, and the rapid trill in which Mr. Halir excels; it is too long a cadenza however.

In the tender Larghetto the violinist gave a most sympathetic tone, yet used the vibrato with becoming reserve, and his harmonics were as pure as crystal. In the Rondo which ends the work, and which is its weakest movement, there was splendid freedom in syncopation, broad bowing especially in the G string passages, and superb arpeggio bowing. Altogether a most straightforward and musicianly presentation of the great concerto and a performance which was understood by the audience, for a great furore ensued both at the end of the first movement and at the completion of the work, an outburst fully as frenzied as that which greeted Isaye, Thomson, or Sauret, and which proved that Mr. Halir is given his true rank with the leading violinists of the world, at least in Boston.

Has Tschaikowsky's niche in the temple of fame been settled yet? The reviewer sometimes believes that the future will place him higher than the past has done. [illegible] never wrote without having something [illegible] and his mastery of the orchestra [illegible] something absolutely great. [illegible] heard for the first [illegible] symphony [illegible] is not as [illegible] Pathetique, yet [illegible] war [illegible] The movement proper begins with a waltz rhythm, but there is considerable trouble in that ballroom; they begin by dancing a waltz and end by careering in a Carmagnole; the dancers seem afflicted with St. Vitus spasms which break forth periodically in runs on the different woodwind instruments, a formula of accompaniment which, by the way, is present in other movements of the work. Even in this, the least successful movement, one is impressed by the use of the woodwind, of which Tschaikowsky seems an absolute master.

After this spasmodic first movement the composer goes frankly and successfully to the Folk-music fountain for his stream of ideas. The oboe melody of the Canzone is full of Slavonic melancholy and the bassoon work is prominent and was excellently done.

The third movement, with its almost constant pizzicato of strings, was of a new and agreeable flavor. The contrast between the chief and the counter theme was a sharp and effective one, the piccolo flourishes added spice to the wild themes, and the coda was terse and fitting. In the finale our composer cried havoc and let slip the dogs of war, adding bass drum, cymbals and other military paraphernalia which are seldom found in classical symphony, spite of Beethoven's precedent in his ninth. There was plenty of chromatic unrest here as elsewhere, and the movement was not one that Haydn would have approved of, yet its bold, Slavonic character, its sweeping fury, were not without their charm and lost nothing in the reading.

A return of the figures of the introduction as Coda to the finale was a touch borrowed from Beethoven and Schumann, but the composer did not, as these composers, interweave the thoughts of the introduction in the progress of his work, at least a first hearing revealed no such coherency. There were certain brief canonic effects in the finale that were given with an emphasis that suggested artillery practice.

The Duke of Alva, during his campaign in the Netherlands, possessed a set of light cannon that gave a diatonic scale. This device has not yet been employed by any modern composers, but judging by the tendency of recent works, the bells, gongs, etc., that are beginning to add their crashes to symphonic music, artillery will soon be used to give proper accent to sforzando effects.

Louis C. Elson.

Gazette

BOSTON SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 29.

The Symphony Concert.

The sixth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given last night in Music Hall. The following was the programme:

Overture, "Manfred"..................Schumann
Concerto for Violin, D Major, op. 61..Beethoven
Symphony, No. 4, F Minor.......Tschaikowsky
Soloist, Mr. Carl Halir.

The interest in this concert naturally centered in the soloist, "the favorite pupil of Joachim." It may be said at once that Mr. Halir fully justified the reputation that preceded him. He is the artist, first and always; his wonderfully perfect and brilliant technique never attract attention to itself, any more than in a fine picture the artists brushmarks are obtrusive. How the work is done is for after-study, the interpretation, the result of large talent, supported by faultless technique, claiming first attention. The tone that Mr. Halir draws from his violin is a delight in itself; it is large, delightfully and unwaveringly smooth, warm, dignified and of the utmost sweetness. The sound wells forth in undisturbed beauty, clear, limpid and tenderly beautiful or dazzlingly brilliant. Like the player, it is unaggressive, but it contains the soul of the purest art. The thing is done with the artist in the background and the nobility and dignity of his art alone apparent. With Mr. Halir nothing is small or trivial; largeness characterizes his bowing, as it characterizes his style and his taste, and at the base of all his talents is a large sincerity that is almost fierce in its intensity.

Mr. Halir asks for no virtuoso credit; he faced his audience with a Beethoven concerto, and he vindicated his choice by reaching into the very soul of the work. Finer, richer, nobler, more dignified playing has not been heard in Boston, and it was all solid, honest, unimpeachable work, refined, majestic and graceful. The Titan's voice was heard in the magician's violin, speaking in its own large tone and its own large, free phrases. The finish is of the finest; but there is no niggling, no patchwork. The hearer listens to Beethoven and not to Mr. Halir, and this is the highest praise that can be given to an interpretative artist, as high as it is rare. The one little fault that may be found with Mr. Halir is that he is over-precise and thus somewhat checks the expression of the enthusiasm that his noble playing would otherwise arouse.

The fine Tschaikowsky symphony, heard for the first time in Boston at this concert, revealed all its graces, beauty and passion under the wise and sympathetic conductorship of Mr. Paur.

The soloist for the next concert is Mr. Pol Plancon.

HOME JOURNAL
A PAPER OF TO-DAY

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1896.

No account of the third symphony concert given in Music Hall last Saturday evening would be complete that failed to recognize as a well-nigh unprecedented event the production of a symphony composed by a woman. In this connection there should be no pinchbeck expressions of opinion. The symphony in E minor composed by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach could but have revealed itself, even at a single hearing, to any adept as a genuine symphony,—a real, soulful masterpiece.

—o—

If the object of a symphony, in other words a grand sonata for orchestra is, as Köstlin says, "to display a rich, expressive and subjective feeling, whether this flows forth in a full stream of emotional images or whether it shows in the form of a great tone picture, one of the different phases of the prevailing sentiment of emotional life," then indeed our composer has triumphed. How clearly her composition dwells on the beautiful, how complete is it void of false art; how elegantly it is framed into a structure no less full of intellect than of vocative power, and how identified with just such qualities of physical and corporeal beauty as to Corregio were ideal; with just such spiritual beauty as Angelico most loved; how it clings to all that is sincere and truthful in art; as unmistakably indeed as though it were some great painting by Rubens,—were some of the most irresistible impressions created by its first public performance.

—o—

As a work of form this symphony by a woman may also be likened to the proportional lines, outlines, masses, mouldings, intricate surfaces, or spaces which hold the light and shade of a fine piece of architecture. From the time its harmonies burst forth at the very beginning of the symphony to its final bar, it would be an injustice to the composer, upon a first acquaintance with her work, to offer any technical or academic kind of analysis of its manifold architectural beauties. That there is a uniform bond uniting the four beautiful movements of her work, and a psychological necessity in the symphonic association of its respective entireties, is one of the most masterly achievements that she has made. Beyond this and such other qualities as were unmistakable at its first performance a certain reserve is necessary if we would not lose ourselves in capricious phantasmagoria.

—o—

Albeit this work has been the creation of a woman, it is absurd to affirm that any such attribute as sex or gender can be applied to it. Few ironies of circumstance are more lamentable than that any discrimination against woman is so often made either in the creation or interpretation of a work of art. identified. Not even to the art of St. Cecilia can we ascribe such a factor, notwithstanding the feminine signification involved in the pretty legend that tells how sweetly St. Cecilia sang her hymns of praise upon the organ of her invention, so that even the angels from heaven came to listen to her voice.

—o—

While in art and science the creative capacity of woman has arbitrarily been suppressed, and placed at the unjust and humiliating disadvantage of a mere serfdom to man, it is none the less true that in our land of the free her thoughts and feelings, her dearest and most powerful impulses are being permitted to have their full and free play, and that the spring-time if not the golden age of their development has at last arrived. Owing to such important testimony in this direction as has been offered by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach she may quite justly be regarded as an epoch maker who has broken through old boundaries and presented an enrichment and extension of woman's sphere in art such as has not been surpassed or even equalled by any contemporary of her sex.

—o—

Into the heart and soul of this symphony conductor Paur entered with all the intelligence, zeal and unremitting loyalty of the unimpeachable musician and interpreter that he is, and even the composer of the work herself could not have exacted a performance more free from flaw than our peerless Boston Symphony Orchestra gave. Another interesting event of the concert was the reappearance on the Music Hall stage of Signor Campanari, this time not in the role of a member of the orchestra, but as a vocal interpreter of an air from "Herodiade" which he sang with superb artistry and expression. The programme also included the Variations by Brahms on a theme by Haydn, Prologue to "Pagliacci," by Ruggiero Leoncavello, and the Overture to "Der Freischutz."

Tonight,—Melba!

—o—

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, whose symphony was produced in Music Hall last Saturday evening, is one of the very youngest musicians to have attained celebrity in this country. Mrs. Beach comes from the same old sterling ancestry as that of Charlotte Cushman and Major-General Dearborn. Her latest composition of import is a sonata for pianoforte and violin, which will be produced this season by Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mrs. Beach at one of the Kneisel Quartette concerts.

—o—

The repertoire of her musical compositions includes a mass in E flat major, performed by the Handel and Haydn Society in 1892; a scena and aria, "Eilende Wolken," sung by Mrs. Alves and accompanied by the New York Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Walter Damrosch at a concert given in New York in 1892; a Festival Jubilate for chorus and orchestra, produced under the direction of Theodore Thomas at the Columbian Exposition in Chicago; several cantatas, and over sixty compositions for pianoforte, violin, voice, etc.

—o—

Mme. Melba, who will sing at the next symphony concert, will also appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore. Mme. Melba evidently makes her plans long in advance, for she is engaged to sing next May in a series of concerts to be given in South America.

—o—

Herald

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Hall next Wednesday evening inaugurates both the 12th year of this organization and the present musical season in Baltimore. It is no disparagement of previous seasons to assert that the list of soloists announced for the coming series of five concerts is the most attractive and brilliant of any yet presented here.

The simple announcement of the appearance of Mme. Melba at the first concert (which will be the only time she will be heard in Baltimore this year) is ample verification of this statement. Mme. Melba makes her re-entree in this country at the Boston concerts on Friday and Saturday, the 6th and 7th, and will also sing with the orchestra in Brooklyn on Monday evening, and Philadelphia on Tuesday. The sales for these concerts exceed any record ever made in this country before, as in all three cities every seat in the house is sold, and in Boston even the admission tickets for both performances were sold three days in advance, and hundreds turned away, absolutely unable to get into the house.

The programme in full is appended:

Overture, "Gwendoline," Chabrier (first time at these concerts).

Aria, from "Il Re Pastore," Mozart (violin obligato, Mr. Kneisel); Mme. Melba.

Symphony No. 9, in C major, Schubert.

Overture, "Abu Hassan," Weber (first time at these concerts).

Aria, "Sevillana," from "Don Cesar de Bazan," Jules Massenet (vocal part written expressly for Mme. Melba); Mme. Melba.

"Invitation to the Dance," Weber.

It is worthy of note that Melba's second selection was composed by Massenet as incidental music in the production of "Don Cesar de Bazan," the vocal part being expressly written for Mme. Melba.

Due credit should be given to the management for securing such a brilliant list of soloists as will appear with the orchestra this season, headed by the greatest living singer of the present age. It should also be borne in mind that the prices for tickets will be the same as usual, as it has always been contrary to the policy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to raise the prices under any circumstances.

MADAME MELBA.

The sale of single tickets will open at Albert's, 13 North Charles street, tomorrow morning.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 30, 1896.

The Symphony Concert — The Orchestra at its Best.

Byron's "Manfred" is the subject of subjects for musical treatment. The hero, a close relative of Goethe's "Faust" (so close that Byron was accused of plagiarism), but a Faust without a Marguerite, a more sombre and more resolute sinner, has something of the dignity of a Miltonian Lucifer about him which finds worthy expression in lofty yet dark-toned music.

The supernatural touches, too, scarcely impressive in recitation, become really thrilling when presented in an orchestral guise. One must not confound this mysterious, pessimistic and philosophic Count Manfred of Byron and Schumann with another party of the same name who has also received much musical attention; "King Manfred" is a historical personage, who, in the 13th century, fought two popes, was made king of Sicily, was excommunicated, died bravely fighting his opponents at Benevento (1266) and was turned into an operatic character by a host of Italian and French composers and also by Carl Reinecke.

Naturally Byron's lofty hero, with only the ghost of a heroine, is not at all suited for the operatic stage but makes a splendid symphonic figure.

The sorrowful, metaphysical character of Manfred appealed to the innermost nature of the introspective Schumann and in his hands Manfred became a unique and most effective work, the overture, which began the concert on Saturday, being a masterpiece of its kind. Exactly as in Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture, there is a struggle between Light and Darkness, between Sorrow and Salvation, but here the darker side seems temporarily to triumph.

The mental torment, the inner struggle of Manfred, is at once indicated by the syncopations (and Schumann was the great master of syncopation) of the earliest measures, and that pianissimo call of trumpets is, like the call of trombones in Mozart's Requiem, a warning voice from another world. The tender Astarte motive hints at forgiveness, but the broken accents in which this appears at the close does not indicate clearly the salvation of the self-tormented one.

Possibly the best instrumental work which Schumann ever achieved, the "Manfred" overture, received a performance that was at least adequate although scarcely as subtle as it could have been. The Astarte figure, for example, could have had more tenderness. Our director, in his readings, shows a healthy, manly nature, and evidently fears mawkishness in music, but he is not near the borderline of that fault, and sometimes errs in a too careful avoidance of feminine tenderness.

Mr. Carl Halir gave a performance of the Beethoven violin concerto that is long to be remembered. Every concerto by Beethoven is in some degree a symphony, and the orchestra and Mr. Paur must share in the artist's triumph, for the ensemble was irreproachable and the shading perfect. In fact it is time to cease reiterating the praises of the orchestra, for it has now reached a standard beyond any point in its previous history, a perfection that fully justifies the warnings made in the days when its technique was retrograding, and the predictions uttered at the time when Mr. Paur began to turn the tide. Mr. Halir stated last week that he did not believe its equal was to be found in the world, its only possible rival being Lamoureux's organization in Paris.

To return to the concerto; it is an almost unplayable work and not the most attractive to the average auditor. Its rugged first movement with its four tremendous accents constantly reiterated, is a picture of the earnest Beethoven of the fifth symphony or the B flat piano sonata (op. 106) and might well bear the motto "Per aspera ad astra."

With the mighty impression of the work fixed in one's mind it is interesting to read in the "Allgemeine Musikzeitung" of January, 1807, the following words, "The admirers of the Beethoven muse will be interested in the news that this composer has just finished a violin concerto, so far as the writer knows, his first. It was performed by the eminent violinist Klement in his recently given benefit concert with his usual elegance and delicacy!" As Clement played parts of the work at sight, perhaps timidity was mistaken for "delicacy."

Of Halir's playing one can say emphatically, in Beethoven's words, "Das ist das Wahre,"—it was the true, classical, nonsensational school of performance; it was Joachim's self that seemed to stand there in the person of his colleague, and calmly, if not cooly, give the most difficult work of the concerto repertoire. Joachim's cadenza to the first movement gave the violinist a chance to show almost all points of violin virtuosity; in it there was ever so much of double-stopping, some fine martellato work, and the rapid trill in which Mr. Halir excels; it is too long a cadenza however.

In the tender Larghetto the violinist gave a most sympathetic tone, yet used the vibrato with becoming reserve, and his harmonics were as pure as crystal. In the Rondo which ends the work, and which is its weakest movement, there was splendid freedom in syncopation, broad bowing especially in the G string passages, and superb arpeggio bowing. Altogether a most straightforward and musicianly presentation of the great concerto and a performance which was understood by the audience, for a great furore ensued both at the end of the first movement and at the completion of the work, an outburst fully as frenzied as that which greeted Isaye, Thomson, or Sauret, and which proved that Mr. Halir is given his true rank with the leading violinists of the world, at least in Boston.

Has Tschaikowsky's niche in the temple of fame been settled yet? The reviewer sometimes believes that the future will place him higher than the past has done. He never wrote without having something to say, and his mastery of the orchestra was something absolutely great. His F minor symphony, heard for the first time in Boston at this concert, is not as great as his Symphonie Pathetique, yet it is an interesting and at times an ex-

It opens with a brass [illegible] that sounds as if Schumann's B-flat symphony had suddenly joined the army and was going to sing of war instead of spring. The movement proper begins with a waltz rhythm, but there is considerable trouble in that ballroom; they begin by dancing a waltz and end by careering in a Carmagnole; the dancers seem afflicted with St. Vitus spasms which break forth periodically in runs on the different woodwind instruments, a formula of accompaniment which, by the way, is present in other movements of the work. Even in this, the least successful movement, one is impressed by the use of the woodwind, of which Tschaikowsky seems an absolute master.

After this spasmodic first movement the composer goes frankly and successfully to the Folk-music fountain for his stream of ideas. The oboe melody of the Canzone is full of Slavonic melancholy and the bassoon work is prominent and was excellently done.

The third movement, with its almost constant pizzicato of strings, was of a new and agreeable flavor. The contrast between the chief and the counter theme was a sharp and effective one, the piccolo flourishes added spice to the wild themes, and the coda was terse and fitting. In the finale our composer cried havoc and let slip the dogs of war, adding bass drum, cymbals and other military paraphernalia which are seldom found in classical symphony, spite of Beethoven's precedent in his ninth. There was plenty of chromatic unrest here as elsewhere, and the movement was not one that Haydn would have approved of, yet its bold, Slavonic character, its sweeping fury, were not without their charm and lost nothing in the reading.

A return of the figures of the introduction as Coda to the finale was a touch borrowed from Beethoven and Schumann, but the composer did not, as these composers, interweave the thoughts of the introduction in the progress of his work, at least a first hearing revealed no such coherency. There were certain brief canonic effects in the finale that were given with an emphasis that suggested artillery practice.

The Duke of Alva, during his campaign in the Netherlands, possessed a set of light cannon that gave a diatonic scale. This device has not yet been employed by any modern composers, but judging by the tendency of recent works, the bells, gongs, etc., that are beginning to add their crashes to symphonic music, artillery will soon be used to give proper accent to sforzando effects.

Louis C. Elson.

Gazette

BOSTON SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 29.

The Symphony Concert.

The sixth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given last night in Music Hall. The following was the programme:

Overture, "Manfred"....................Schumann
Concerto for Violin, D Major, op. 61..Beethoven
Symphony, No. 4, F Minor.......Tschaikowsky
Soloist, Mr. Carl Halir.

The interest in this concert naturally centered in the soloist, "the favorite pupil of Joachim." It may be said at once that Mr. Halir fully justified the reputation that preceded him. He is the artist, first and always; his wonderfully perfect and brilliant technique never attract attention to itself, any more than in a fine picture the artists brushmarks are obtrusive. How the work is done is for after-study, the interpretation, the result of large talent, supported by faultless technique, claiming first attention. The tone that Mr. Halir draws from his violin is a delight in itself; it is large, delightfully and unwaveringly smooth, warm, dignified and of the utmost sweetness. The sound wells forth in undisturbed beauty, clear, limpid and tenderly beautiful or dazzlingly brilliant. Like the player, it is unaggressive, but it contains the soul of the purest art. The thing is done with the artist in the background and the nobility and dignity of his art alone apparent. With Mr. Halir nothing is small or trivial; largeness characterizes his bowing, as it characterizes his style and his taste, and at the base of all his talents is a large sincerity that is almost fierce in its intensity.

Mr. Halir asks for no virtuoso credit; he faced his audience with a Beethoven concerto, and he vindicated his choice by reaching into the very soul of the work. Finer, richer, nobler, more dignified playing has not been heard in Boston, and it was all solid, honest, unimpeachable work, refined, majestic and graceful. The Titan's voice was heard in the magician's violin, speaking in its own large tone and its own large, free phrases. The finish is of the finest; but there is no niggling, no patchwork. The hearer listens to Beethoven and not to Mr. Halir, and this is the highest praise that can be given to an interpretative artist, as high as it is rare. The one little fault that may be found with Mr. Halir is that he is over-precise and thus somewhat checks the expression of the enthusiasm that his noble playing would otherwise arouse.

The fine Tschaikowsky symphony, heard for the first time in Boston at this concert, revealed all its graces, beauty and passion under the wise and sympathetic conductorship of Mr. Paur.

The soloist for the next concert is Mr. Pol Plancon.

HOME JOURNAL
A PAPER OF TO-DAY

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1896.

No account of the third symphony concert given in Music Hall last Saturday evening would be complete that failed to recognize as a well-nigh unprecedented event the production of a symphony composed by a woman. In this connection there should be no pinchbeck expressions of opinion. The symphony in E minor composed by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach could but have revealed itself, even at a single hearing, to any adept as a genuine symphony,—a real, soulful masterpiece.

—o—

If the object of a symphony, in other words a grand sonata for orchestra is, as Köstlin says, "to display a rich, expressive and subjective feeling, whether this flows forth in a full stream of emotional images or whether it shows in the form of a great tone picture, one of the different phases of the prevailing sentiment of emotional life," then indeed our composer has triumphed. How clearly her composition dwells on the beautiful, how complete is it void of false art; how elegantly it is framed into a structure no less full of intellect than of vocative power, and how identified with just such qualities of physical and corporeal beauty as to Corregio were ideal; with just such spiritual beauty as Angelico most loved; how it clings to all that is sincere and truthful in art; as unmistakably indeed as though it were some great painting by Rubens,—were some of the most irresistible impressions created by its first public performance.

—o—

As a work of form this symphony by a woman may also be likened to the proportional lines, outlines, masses, mouldings, intricate surfaces, or spaces which hold the light and shade of a fine piece of architecture. From the time its harmonies burst forth at the very beginning of the symphony to its final bar, it would be an injustice to the composer, upon a first acquaintance with her work, to offer any technical or academic kind of analysis of its manifold architectural beauties. That there is a uniform bond uniting the four beautiful movements of her work, and a psychological necessity in the symphonic association of its respective entireties, is one of the most masterly achievements that she has made. Beyond this and such other qualities as were unmistakable at its first performance a certain reserve is necessary if we would not lose ourselves in capricious phantasmagoria.

—o—

Albeit this work has been the creation of a woman, it is absurd to affirm that any such attribute as sex or gender can be applied to it. Few ironies of circumstance are more lamentable than that any discrimination against woman is so often made either in the creation or interpretation of a work of art. identified. Not even to the art of St. Cecilia can we ascribe such a factor, notwithstanding the feminine signification involved in the pretty legend that tells how sweetly St. Cecilia sang her hymns of praise upon the organ of her invention, so that even the angels from heaven came to listen to her voice.

—o—

While in art and science the creative capacity of woman has arbitrarily been suppressed, and placed at the unjust and humiliating disadvantage of a mere serfdom to man, it is none the less true that in our land of the free her thoughts and feelings, her dearest and most powerful impulses are being permitted to have their full and free play, and that the spring-time if not the golden age of their development has at last arrived. Owing to such important testimony in this direction as has been offered by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach she may quite justly be regarded as an epoch maker who has broken through old boundaries and presented an enrichment and extension of woman's sphere in art such as has not been surpassed or even equalled by any contemporary of her sex.

—o—

Into the heart and soul of this symphony conductor Paur entered with all the intelligence, zeal and unremitting loyalty of the unimpeachable musician and interpreter that he is, and even the composer of the work herself could not have exacted a performance more free from flaw than our peerless Boston Symphony Orchestra gave. Another interesting event of the concert was the reappearance on the Music Hall stage of Signor Campanari, this time not in the role of a member of the orchestra, but as a vocal interpreter of an air from "Herodiade" which he sang with superb artistry and expression. The programme also included the Variations by Brahms on a theme by Haydn, Prologue to "Pagliacci," by Ruggiero Leoncavello, and the Overture to "Der Freischutz."

Tonight,—Melba!

—9—

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, whose symphony was produced in Music Hall last Saturday evening, is one of the very youngest musicians to have attained celebrity in this country. Mrs. Beach comes from the same old sterling ancestry as that of Charlotte Cushman and Major-General Dearborn. Her latest composition of import is a sonata for pianoforte and violin, which will be produced this season by Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mrs. Beach at one of the Kneisel Quartette concerts.

—o—

The repertoire of her musical compositions includes a mass in E flat major, performed by the Handel and Haydn Society in 1892; a scena and aria, "Eilende Wolken," sung by Mrs. Alves and accompanied by the New York Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Walter Damrosch at a concert given in New York in 1892; a Festival Jubilate for chorus and orchestra, produced under the direction of Theodore Thomas at the Columbian Exposition in Chicago; several cantatas, and over sixty compositions for pianoforte, violin, voice, etc.

—o—

Mme. Melba, who will sing at the next symphony concert, will also appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore. Mme. Melba evidently makes her plans long in advance, for she is engaged to sing next May in a series of concerts to be given in South America.

—o—

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Hall next Wednesday evening inaugurates both the 12th year of this organization and the present musical season in Baltimore. It is no disparagement of previous seasons to assert that the list of soloists announced for the coming series of five concerts is the most attractive and brilliant of any yet presented here.

The simple announcement of the appearance of Mme. Melba at the first concert (which will be the only time she will be heard in Baltimore this year) is ample verification of this statement. Mme. Melba makes her re-entree in this country at the Boston concerts on Friday and Saturday, the 6th and 7th, and will also sing with the orchestra in Brooklyn on Monday evening, and Philadelphia on Tuesday. The sales for these concerts exceed any record ever made in this country before, as in all three cities every seat in the house is sold, and in Boston even the admission tickets for both performances were sold three days in advance, and hundreds turned away, absolutely unable to get into the house.

The programme in full is appended:

Overture, "Gwendoline," Chabrier (first time at these concerts).

Aria, from "Il Re Pastore," Mozart (violin obligato, Mr. Kneisel); Mme. Melba.

Symphony No. 9, in C major, Schubert.

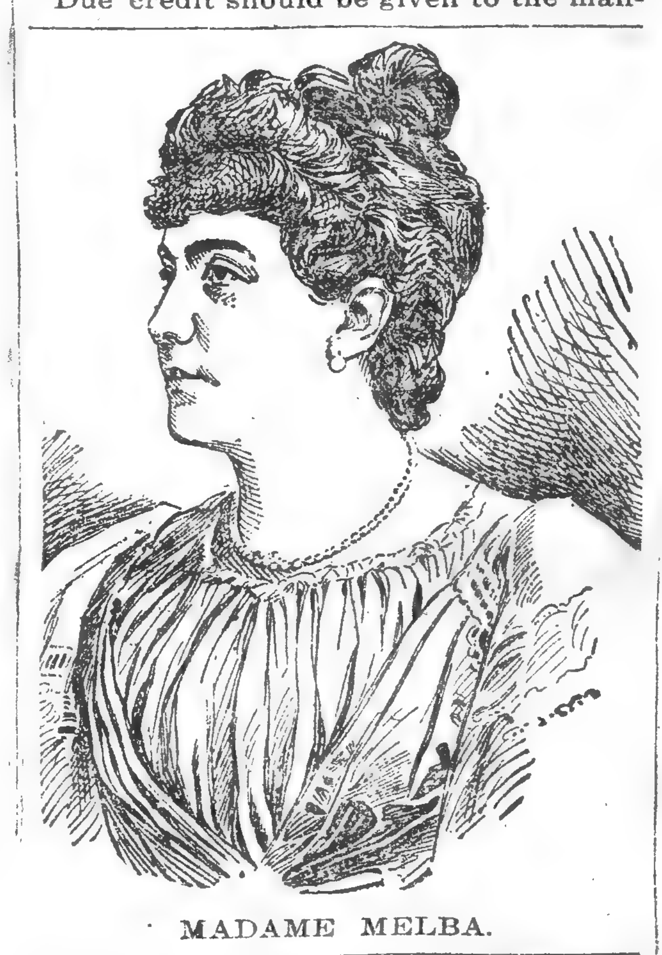
Overture, "Abu Hassan," Weber (first time at these concerts).

Aria, "Sevillana," from "Don Cesar de Bazan," Jules Massenet (vocal part written expressly for Mme. Melba); Mme. Melba.

"Invitation to the Dance," Weber.

It is worthy of note that Melba's second selection was composed by Massenet as incidental music in the production of "Don Cesar de Bazan," the vocal part being expressly written for Mme. Melba.

Due credit should be given to the management for securing such a brilliant list of soloists as will appear with the orchestra this season, headed by the greatest living singer of the present age. It should also be borne in mind that the prices for tickets will be the same as usual, as it has always been contrary to the policy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to raise the prices under any circumstances.



MADAME MELBA.

The sale of single tickets will open at Albert's, 13 North Charles street, tomorrow morning.

[56]

Baltimore
German Correspondent
Nov. 13th

Valentine vor Gericht.

Weiteres über die Transaktionen der New-Yorker Schwindlerbande. — Ein gigantiſches Complot.

Brooklyn, N.-Y., 11. Nov. — Wm. E. Valentine, einer der Hauptmacher der hier entlarvten Schwindlerbande, welche ſolche große Schwindeleien in verſchiedenen Landestheilen verübt hat, der Liebhaber May Wintage's, welche ſich zu erſchießen verſuchte, als ſie wegen Verausgabung eines ihr von Valentine gegebenen, gefälſchten Checks verhaftet werden ſollte, erſchien heute im hieſigen County-Gericht. Die gegen ihn erhobenen Anklagen lauten auf Großdiebſtahl, Fälſchung, Nothzucht und Entführung. Er plaidirt „nicht ſchuldig" und wurde dem Gerichtsverfahren überwieſen. May Wintage befindet ſich noch im Hoſpital und wird nach ihrer vollſtändigen Geneſung in Zeugenhaft behalten werden. Wenn man allen Gerüchten Glauben ſchenken dürfte, welche in den letzten Tagen über Valentine's Transaktionen cirkulirt werden, würde man es mit einem gigantiſchen Complot zur Beſchwindelung verſchiedener Kategorien von Geſchäftsleuten und Induſtriellen zu thun haben und die Brooklyner Polizei träumt ſchon davon, daß ſie einem Schwindel auf die Spur gekommen ſei, deſſen Fäden die halbe Welt umſpannen. Es verlautete geſtern, daß der Arreſtant Diſtriktsanwalt Backus gegenüber ein umfaſſendes Geſtändniß abgelegt hätte, doch wurde das von dieſem beſtritten. Man ſagt,

---

Sun Nov 9

MELBA WILL SING.

The Famous Soprano at the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Wednesday Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first concert of its series at Music Hall Wednesday evening. The soloist will be Mme. Melba. It is announced to be her only appearance in Baltimore this winter. She will sing an aria from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," with violin obligato by Mr. Franz Kneisel, and an aria, "Sevillana," from Jules Massenet's "Don Cæsar de Bazan," the vocal part of which was written expressly for her.

The two new numbers by the orchestra will be the overture to Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and the overture to Weber's "Abu Hassan." Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" and Schubert's Symphony No. 9, in C major, will also be rendered.

Thursday afternoon, in the Assembly Room of Music Hall, will occur the first of the chamber concerts by the Kneisel stringed quartette and Prof. Harold Randolph. The quartette is composed of five of the principal performers in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the series is arranged to correspond closely with the visits of the orchestra. The dates will be November 12, December 8, January 19, February 23 and March 23.

American Nov

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

First Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first concert of its series at Music Hall next Wednesday evening. This season's concerts of the organization will introduce a galaxy of notabilities as soloists, but the bright particular star will be Melba, who will appear at the opening concert. To hear this great artist is always a delight. Of all the singers who have visited America during the last thirty years, no one, with the single exception of Patti, has displayed so beautiful a voice and such perfection of vocalism. Whether judged by the opinion of the most reliable critics and professional musicians, or by the financial value placed upon her services by impressarios, Mme. Melba must be considered the greatest vocalist of the present day. She will again this season head the forces of the Abbey & Grau Opera Company at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and the concert of Wednesday evening will be the only opportunity of hearing her in this city during the season.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Schumann: Overture to "Manfred," opus 115.
Beethoven: Concerto for Violin, in D major, opus 61.
(Cadenzas by Joachim.)
Tschaikowsky: Symphony No. 4, in F minor, opus 36.
(First time in Boston.)

Mr. Carl Halir was the violinist.

Schumann's overture to "Manfred" was admirably played; the work itself is a fresh wonder every time one hears it. It is perhaps the one thing by Schumann which belongs in the same class with Beethoven's "Leonore," "Coriolan," and "Egmont" overtures.

The Tschaikowsky F minor symphony is not wholly new to Boston; Mr. Nikisch gave the two middle movements at one of the symphony concerts some years ago; if we mistake not, Mr. Gericke thought seriously of giving the work, or portions of it, but then thought better of it, the public not being ripe for it in his opinion. We think this was pretty wise on Mr. Gericke's part; at all events, there can be little doubt that the symphony would have made a very different impression even five years ago from what it did last evening. But now we have got used to Tschaikowsky's style, we know his "Romeo and Juliet," his "Pathetic" symphony, and E-flat minor quartet, and he no longer shocks us as he used to. What chances of long life this F minor symphony has, would be hard to say now. It is perhaps the most revolutionary work of Tschaikowsky's that has yet been heard here. The two movements played by Mr. Nikisch gave little notion of the character of the work as a whole, neither did they produce a tithe of their proper effect when given out of connection with the rest. Tschaikowsky's idea of making the first movement of a symphony one great waltz-movement is not without its element of daring. And yet this very movement is just the one which departs least from the symphonic character. It is too long, there is not enough thematic material in it for the enormous wealth of development; but it is full of beauty and musical life. Some of the devices look trivial in the score; but they do not sound trivial. The whole movement is a sort of huge, ideal Sahara-waltz. The slow movement, with its gloomy little principal theme, still keeps well within the lines of symphonic character; but the Scherzo and Finale are very surprising movements indeed to meet with in anything calling itself a symphony. The Scherzo, with its three contrasted themes—one each for strings pizzicati, wood-wind, and brass—would seem quite in character in some picturesque suite; it might have been called "Scene in the Market Place," or some such thing; but it is too purely picturesque for a symphonic movement, in the old acceptation of the term. The Finale is a still more curious jumble: its form and working-out are symphonic as possible, its thematic material is brilliant—if at times uncouthly Russian; but its general spirit out-Meyerbeers Meyerbeer in its flaunting, ludicro-terrific operatic flavor. It is immensely good fun to hear, in spite of the noise it makes; but it is a most uproarious bit of writing for a symphonic finale! Yet, take the work as a whole, there is a quite wonderful homogeneity of character in it; all four movements belong unmistakably together. If the first two movements are more symphonic in general spirit than the last two, they are only just enough more so to swear by; the difference is not more than that between very little and not at all. Upon the whole, the symphony gives the impression of great artistic sincerity. If one inclines to feel that its true motto would be, "Le l'audace, encore de l'audace, et toujours de l'audace," Tschaikowsky himself seems to have been only half-conscious of this. He strikes one as quite spontaneous in his excessiveness; his wild romanticism and thunderous ferocity have a very genuine ring. But it is a very savage piece of business; and, as Carlyle said of the French Revolution, barbarous with all the appliances of civilization! For, note this, it is throughout a wondrously stout piece of musical development; you feel the master's force and skill throughout. The performance was superb!

We are heartily glad that Mr. Halir chose the Beethoven concerto to play; not only because, as the event showed, it enabled us to hear a magnificent performance of a great work, but mainly because there is inevitably so strong a dash of curiosity in one's feelings toward a new famous artist, that one likes to hear him first in a familiar work of unquestioned worth, so as to be able to concentrate one's attention upon his playing, as such. One can better size up a new player in a well-known standard work than in a composition of the quality of which one is less sure. Mr. Halir carried everything before him. One could say "Yes, that is the Beethoven concerto!" His whole conception of the great work was unspeakably fine and genuine; his playing placed that conception before you with exhaustive clearness and force. His was not merely great violin-playing; it was a complete revelation of a great work by a great master. Most great performers have some one characteristic more salient than their others. If we were to pick out the especial quality which most distinguishes Mr. Halir, we should say it was great pathos of expression, untinged with vulgarity—an exceedingly rare quality, as the world goes. He is so big and strong that he can afford to be tender. The audience rose to him like one man; seldom has the Music Hall been the scene of warmer enthusiasm—in which enthusiasm the orchestra participated with unfeigned heartiness. Mr. Halir has come and conquered!

The next programme is: Beethoven, overture to "Coriolan," opus 62; Haydn, air from "The Seasons;" Duparc, symphonic poem, "Lenore" (first time); Wagner, Wotan's Farewell from "Die Walküre;" Mendelssohn, symphony No. 4, in A major, "Italian," opus 90. Mr. Pol Plançon will be the singer.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1896.

Seventh Concert of the Season—Duparc's Symphonic Poem, "Lenore"—Pol Plancon Sings Arias by Haydn and Wagner.

The program of the Symphony concert last night, Mr. Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "Coriolanus" .... Beethoven
Air, "Behold, Along the Dewy Grass" .... Haydn
Symphonic Poem, "Lénore" .... Duparc
Wotan's Farewell .... Wagner
Symphony in A major .... Mendelssohn

Henri Duparc of Paris is a pupil of César Franck. The earliest mention I find of him as a composer is dated Jan. 24, 1874, when he conducted a suite of his own waltzes for orchestra at a concert of the Societé Nationale de Musique at Paris. Some of the critics dealt harshly with him. One wrote: "Mr. Duparc has evidently never heard a waltz; he hunts out his ideas; his orchestration is affected; and he would have been wiser if he had allowed somebody else to conduct his work." Truly, an all-embracing curse in a few words. Mr. Duparc was then spoken of as a débutant.

From 1875 to 1877—perhaps earlier, perhaps later—he was secretary of this National Society; and in 1877 we find him with Vincent d'Indy eager to establish concerts for the performance of modern works, French and foreign. They issued a prospectus. I do not find any record of large works by him, with the exception of "Lénore." In 1890 he was said to be composing an opera "La Roussalkâ." Songs by him, highly praised, have been sung in Paris, from "Toujours l' aimer" (1875) to "La vague et la Cloche," sung by Auguez in '94, and "Phidylé" (orchestrated by Duparc for the singer Eléonore Blanc, 1894) and sung by Warmbrodt.

I understand that Duparc has been for some years an invalid, which may account for his non-productiveness.

⁂

And this is the story of his "Lénore" so far as I can learn it.

It was played April 29, 1876, as an arrangement for two pianos by Saint-Saens and Marie Jaell at a concert of the National Society, and the reviewer said: "This 'symphonie ballade' was first heard in its original orchestral form at one of these concerts last year." I find no record of the exact date of the performance.

It was played again as an arrangement for two pianos by Saint-Saens and Diémer, Jan. 13, 1877, at a National Society concert.

Pasdeloup produced it in its orchestral form at a popular concert Oct. 28, 1877.

It was played at the last of the Government Exposition orchestral concerts at the Trocadéro, Oct. 10, 1878.

It was played again as an arrangement for two pianos, April 19, 1890, at a concert of the National Society by Diémer and somebody else.

⁂

Now, how in the world did Mr. Paur get hold of this work, at least 21 years old, a work presumably little known to the concert goers of Paris today?

"Lénore" was played in Leipsic March 19, 1895, at a concert given by Constantin Sander to exploit certain publications of the house of F. E. C. Leuckart.

⁂

The piece itself is scarcely worth this historical prelude. The interest of the hearer, whatever it may be, is centred in the orchestration, which shows that the Duparc of '74 or '75 had an extended vocabulary, a sure command of rhetoric, and thoughts of comparatively little value. This music is not very original in themes or in harmonic treatment. Nor is the music suggestive. Nor again is it entertainingly panoramic. The "fair sweetheart with kilted skirt"; the spectral bridegroom; the fast ride of the dead; these may have impressed vividly the composer, but he has not imparted his impressions to the hearers, so that they in turn bewail Lenore and Wilhelm or shudder at the tramp of the midnight steed. A modern of the moderns, this Mr. Duparc; for, remember, that when he wrote, Wagner was not in favor at Paris, and even Berlioz was not established firmly on his throne. He has his aspirations, his convictions. He has a pretty orchestral knowledge, too. But there is no sweeping vitality in this "Lénore." I should like to hear some of his songs. Perhaps when our local singers have exhausted the treasure-house of our parochial composers, they may turn their attention to new men across the sea.

⁂

Mr. Plancon offered incense to Germany. First, he sang a dreary air by Haydn—for Haydn, as well as Beethoven, could write dreary songs, to show his versatility; he sang it in true, smug, respectable oratorio fashion, and I rubbed my eyes, thinking it was Sunday night and the Handel and Haydn sat upon the stage. Ah, Mr. Plancon, you are an admirable, thrice admirable singer. Would that you had sung something by a French composer—such a tune, for instance, as the Drum-Major's song from "Le Caïd." You were a most impressive Wotan, but as the game-eyed deity you sang too well. What is Wotan without shouting and roaring and breathing huskily after each word? Mr. Plancon, you committed an unpardonable offence; you made Wotan musical and interesting.

⁂

Beethoven's overture, noble in austerity and indomitable pride, was finely played, and Wagner's music was most brilliantly performed. When such symphonies as Sinding's and Franck's have not been heard here, why insist so strenuously, Mr. Paur, on Mendelssohn and the other ancients? We are of another generation; let us hear the works of men of our own period. Even the "novelty" by Duparc was at least 21 years old.

PHILIP HALE.

[57]

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. [illegible], NO. 159.

SUNDAY, DEC. 6, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening was:

Overture, "Coriolan" .... Beethoven
Air, "Behold Along the Dewy Grass" .. Haydn
Symphonic poem, "Lenore" ...... Henri Duparc
Wotan's Farewell, "Die Valkyrie" .... Wagner
"Italian" Symphony .... Mendelssohn

The soloist was M. Pol Plancon. The audience completely packed the auditorium, and seemed to be the largest of the season thus far. The enthusiasm over M. Plancon was tremendous. He wast recalled so many times after his solos that he must have at last become thoroughly fatigued parading between the ante-room and the stage. It can hardly be said that his selections were happily chosen to show off the best qualities of his singing and his style. He sang the Haydn aria in a large and robust style, and with easy freedom of execution, but notwithstanding the taste and musicianly spirit that marked his rendering of it, the effect of his interpretation was dry and formal, and one could not but wish that he had been heard in one of the opera airs or in a group of those French songs, in the interpretation of which he is so felicitous. Of the Wotan Farewell his performance was broad and noble, but the long instrumental interludes, in which he was obliged to stand, with what composure he could, doing nothing, were awkward, for the music meant absolutely nothing without the stage action which is indispensably necessary to its proper effect; and, impressive as it is on the operatic stage, it is unsatisfying in the concert room.— The composer appreciated this thoroughly when he pronounced against detaching his music from the surroundings. The instrumental score was read and played with wonderful beauty and richness of coloring.

The Duparc "Lenore" is not a new work, though it was heard here for the first time on this occasion. It was originally produced some 15 years ago, perhaps more. Its theme is Burger's ballad, the same that Raff used in his well-known symphony, but beyond this there is nothing in common between the two scores. Duparc's work is wholly in the modern vein, in regard to its orchestration, which is exceedingly rich and effective. It abounds in effects which are charming in their delicacy, and at times stirring in their brilliancy and their massiveness, but the composition, though clever in its themes and their development, and often pleasing in their sensuous flow. has nothing that distinguishes it from the flood of well-made and skilfully treated scores that pour from foreign music publishing houses, are commended for their workmanship, are heard once or twice without winning more than a passing compliment for the composer's "know how," and then disappear, and justly, from view. In regard to this particular work, it says nothing as music pure and simple, and without the title attachedto it the intention of its maker would be utterly lost. There is a bit of Wagner here, a bit of Berlioz there, bits of numerous somebody-elses in other places; undoubtedly effective as a whole, all that there is of color, impressiveness and power in it, was splendidly brought out in the thoughtful and solid interpretation it received at the hands of Mr. Paur and his players. The Beethoven overture had one of the most masterly readings that have ever been accorded it at these concerts, the lovely second theme and the closing part of the work being exquisitely given. The genial and buoyant Mendelssohn symphony renewed much of its earlier charm, in the beautiful treatment it received, particularly in regard to the tempi and the delicacy of expression and brilliancy of coloring imparted to it. It is growing old, but gracefully.

There will be no public rehearsal and concert this week. The next programme is: Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; concerto for violoncello (new, first time), Dvorak; the "Ocean" symphony, original version, Rubenstein. M. Alwin Schroeder is to be the soloist.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 6.

The Symphony Concert.

The following is the programme of the seventh Symphony rehearsal and concert, given respectively on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening:

Overture, "Coriolanus" .... Beethoven
Air, "Behold, Along the Dewy Grass" .... Haydn
"Lenore," Symphonic Poem .... Henri Duparc
Wotan's Farewell .... Wagner
Symphony No. 4, "Italian" .... Mendelssohn
Soloist, Mr. Pol Plancon.

The novelty of the evening was the "Lenore" symphonic poem, played for the first time in Boston at this concert. There is no striking originality in the work, and it seems to have been inspired by Berlioz, Wagner and Raff. The imitations or suggestions are not consciously made, they are the results of study, wherein perfection or orchestration is regarded as superior to originality of ideas. The work, however, is not chaotic, nor is it scored from the hearing point of noise; the intention is easily followed, and there are some charming movements, notably in the earlier portions of the work. It is suggestive rather of lightness and daintiness of touch than of profundity of thought and feeling; it leaves no lasting impression, but it does not weary or stun.

Mr. Pol Plancon was received with much enthusiasm, but at the Friday rehearsal he frequently wandered away from the key, and he was not successful in giving Haydn character from the air from "The Seasons." His fine, full, rich voice was heard to better advantage in the Wagner selection, which he interpreted with majesty, spirit and fervor. More than a word of praise is due to the orchestra for the manner in which it played the accompaniment, and it gave one a rare and most welcome glimpse of Wagner as he should be. The next concert will be given on the evening of Dec. 19.

Baltimore German Correspondent Nov. 13th

Valentine vor Gericht.

Weiteres über die Transaktionen der New-Yorker Schwindlerbande. — Ein gigantiſches Complot.

Brooklyn, N.-Y., 11. Nov. — Wm. E. Valentine, einer der Hauptmacher der hier entlarvten Schwindlerbande, welche ſolche große Schwindeleien in verſchiedenen Landestheilen verübt hat, der Liebhaber May Wintage's, welche ſich zu erſchießen verſuchte, als ſie wegen Verausgabung eines ihr von Valentine gegebenen, gefälſchten Checks verhaftet werden ſollte, erſchien heute im hieſigen County-Gericht. Die gegen ihn erhobenen Anklagen lauten auf Großdiebſtahl, Fälſchung, Nothzucht und Entführung. Er plaidirt „nicht ſchuldig" und wurde dem Gerichtsverfahren überwieſen. May Wintage befindet ſich noch im Hoſpital und wird nach ihrer vollſtändigen Geneſung in Zeugenhaft behalten werden. Wenn man allen Gerüchten Glauben ſchenken dürfte, welche in den letzten Tagen über Valentine's Transaktionen cirkulirt werden, würde man es mit einem gigantiſchen Complot zur Beſchwindelung verſchiedener Kategorien von Geſchäftsleuten und Induſtriellen zu thun haben und die Brooklyner Polizei träumt ſchon davon, daß ſie einem Schwindel auf die Spur gekommen ſei, deſſen Fäden die halbe Welt umſpannen. Es verlautete geſtern, daß der Arreſtant Diſtriktsanwalt Backus gegenüber ein umfaſſendes Geſtändniß abgelegt hätte, doch wurde das von dieſem beſtritten. Man ſagt,

---

MELBA WILL SING.

The Famous Soprano at the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Wednesday Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first concert of its series at Music Hall Wednesday evening. The soloist will be Mme. Melba. It is announced to be her only appearance in Baltimore this winter. She will sing an aria from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," with violin obligato by Mr. Franz Kneisel, and an aria, "Sevillana," from Jules Massenet's "Don Cæsar de Bazan," the vocal part of which was written expressly for her.

The two new numbers by the orchestra will be the overture to Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and the overture to Weber's "Abu Hassan." Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" and Schubert's Symphony No. 9, in C major, will also be rendered.

Thursday afternoon, in the Assembly Room of Music Hall, will occur the first of the chamber concerts by the Kneisel stringed quartette and Prof. Harold Randolph. The quartette is composed of five of the principal performers in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the series is arranged to correspond closely with the visits of the orchestra. The dates will be November 12, December 8, January 19, February 23 and March 23.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

First Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first concert of its series at Music Hall next Wednesday evening. This season's concerts of the organization will introduce a galaxy of notabilities as soloists, but the bright particular star will be Melba, who will appear at the opening concert. To hear this great artist is always a delight. Of all the singers who have visited America during the last thirty years, no one, with the single exception of Patti, has displayed so beautiful a voice and such perfection of vocalism. Whether judged by the opinion of the most reliable critics and professional musicians, or by the financial value placed upon her services by impressarios, Mme. Melba must be considered the greatest vocalist of the present day. She will again this season head the forces of the Abbey & Grau Opera Company at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and the concert of Wednesday evening will be the only opportunity of hearing her in this city during the season.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Schumann: Overture to "Manfred," opus 115.
Beethoven: Concerto for Violin, in D major, opus 61.
(Cadenzas by Joachim.)
Tschaikowsky: Symphony No. 4, in F minor, opus 36.
(First time in Boston.)

Mr. Carl Halir was the violinist.

Schumann's overture to "Manfred" was admirably played; the work itself is a fresh wonder every time one hears it. It is perhaps the one thing by Schumann which belongs in the same class with Beethoven's "Leonore," "Coriolan," and "Egmont" overtures.

The Tschaikowsky F minor symphony is not wholly new to Boston; Mr. Nikisch gave the two middle movements at one of the symphony concerts some years ago; if we mistake not, Mr. Gericke thought seriously of giving the work, or portions of it, but then thought better of it, the public not being ripe for it in his opinion. We think this was pretty wise on Mr. Gericke's part; at all events, there can be little doubt that the symphony would have made a very different impression even five years ago from what it did last evening. But now we have got used to Tschaikowsky's style, we know his "Romeo and Juliet," his "Pathetic" symphony, and E-flat minor quartet, and he no longer shocks us as he used to. What chances of long life this F minor symphony has, would be hard to say now. It is perhaps the most revolutionary work of Tschaikowsky's that has yet been heard here. The two movements played by Mr. Nikisch gave little notion of the character of the work as a whole, neither did they produce a tithe of their proper effect when given out of connection with the rest. Tschaikowsky's idea of making the first movement of a symphony one great waltz-movement is not without its element of daring. And yet this very movement is just the one which departs least from the symphonic character. It is too long, there is not enough thematic material in it for the enormous wealth of development; but it is full of beauty and musical life. Some of the devices look trivial in the score; but they do not sound trivial. The whole movement is a sort of huge, ideal Sahara-waltz. The slow movement, with its gloomy little principal theme, still keeps well within the lines of symphonic character; but the Scherzo and Finale are very surprising movements indeed to meet with in anything calling itself a symphony. The Scherzo, with its three contrasted themes—one each for strings pizzicati, wood-wind, and brass—would seem quite in character in some picturesque suite; it might have been called "Scene in the Market Place," or some such thing; but it is too purely picturesque for a symphonic movement, in the old acceptation of the term. The Finale is a still more curious jumble: its form and working-out are symphonic as possible, its thematic material is brilliant, if at times uncouthly Russian; but its general spirit out-Meyerbeers Meyerbeer in its flaunting, ludicro-terrific operatic flavor. It is immensely good fun to hear, in spite of the noise it makes; but it is a most uproarious bit of writing for a symphonic finale! Yet, take the work as a whole, there is a quite wonderful homogeneity of character in it; all four movements belong unmistakably together. If the first two movements are more symphonic in general spirit than the last two, they are only just enough more so to swear by; the difference is not more than that between very little and not at all. Upon the whole, the symphony gives the impression of great artistic sincerity. If one inclines to feel that its true motto would be, "Le l'audace, encore de l'audace, et toujours de l'audace," Tschaikowsky himself seems to have been only half-conscious of this. He strikes one as quite spontaneous in his excessiveness; his wild romanticism and thunderous ferocity have a very genuine ring. But it is a very savage piece of business; and, as Carlyle said of the French Revolution, barbarous with all the appliances of civilization! For, note this, it is throughout a wondrously stout piece of musical development; you feel the master's force and skill throughout. The performance was superb!

We are heartily glad that Mr. Halir chose the Beethoven concerto to play; not only because, as the event showed, it enabled us to hear a magnificent performance of a great work, but mainly because there is inevitably so strong a dash of curiosity in one's feelings toward a new famous artist, that one likes to hear him first in a familiar work of unquestioned worth, so as to be able to concentrate one's attention upon his playing, as such. One can better size up a new player in a well-known standard work than in a composition of the quality of which one is less sure. Mr. Halir carried everything before him. One could say "Yes, that is the Beethoven concerto!" His whole conception of the great work was unspeakably fine and genuine; his playing placed that conception before you with exhaustive clearness and force. His was not merely great violin-playing; it was a complete revelation of a great work by a great master. Most great performers have some one characteristic more salient than their others. If we were to pick out the especial quality which most distinguishes Mr. Halir, we should say it was great pathos of expression, untinged with vulgarity—an exceedingly rare quality, as the world goes. He is so big and strong that he can afford to be tender. The audience rose to him like one man; seldom has the Music Hall been the scene of warmer enthusiasm—in which enthusiasm the orchestra participated with unfeigned heartiness. Mr. Halir has come and conquered!

The next programme is: Beethoven, overture to "Coriolan," opus 62; Haydn, air from "The Seasons;" Duparc, symphonic poem, "Lenore" (first time); Wagner, Wotan's Farewell from "Die Walküre;" Mendelssohn, symphony No. 4, in A major, "Italian," opus 90. Mr. Pol Plançon will be the singer.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1896.

Seventh Concert of the Season—Duparc's Symphonic Poem, "Lenore"—Pol Plancon Sings Arias by Haydn and Wagner.

The program of the Symphony concert last night, Mr. Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "Coriolanus"..............Beethoven
Air, "Behold, Along the Dewy Grass"..Haydn
Symphonic Poem, "Lénore"..........Duparc
Wotan's Farewell........................Wagner
Symphony in A major...........Mendelssohn

Henri Duparc of Paris is a pupil of César Franck. The earliest mention I find of him as a composer is dated Jan. 24, 1874, when he conducted a suite of his own waltzes for orchestra at a concert of the Societé Nationale de Musique at Paris. Some of the critics dealt harshly with him. One wrote: "Mr. Duparc has evidently never heard a waltz; he hunts out his ideas; his orchestration is affected; and he would have been wiser if he had allowed somebody else to conduct his work." Truly, an all-embracing curse in a few words. Mr. Duparc was then spoken of as a débutant.

From 1875 to 1877—perhaps earlier, perhaps later—he was secretary of this National Society; and in 1877 we find him with Vincent d'Indy eager to establish concerts for the performance of modern works, French and foreign. They issued a prospectus. I do not find any record of large works by him, with the exception of "Lénore." In 1890 he was said to be composing an opera "La Roussalkâ." Songs by him, highly praised, have been sung in Paris, from "Toujours l' aimer" (1875) to "La vague et la Cloche," sung by Auguez in '94, and "Phidylé" (orchestrated by Duparc for the singer Eléonore Blanc, 1894) and sung by Warmbrodt.

I understand that Duparc has been for some years an invalid, which may account for his non-productiveness.

⁂

And this is the story of his "Lénore" so far as I can learn it.

It was played April 29, 1876, as an arrangement for two pianos by Saint-Saens and Marie Jaell at a concert of the National Society, and the reviewer said: "This 'symphonie ballade' was first heard in its original orchestral form at one of these concerts last year." I find no record of the exact date of the performance.

It was played again as an arrangement for two pianos by Saint-Saens and Diémer, Jan. 13, 1877, at a National Society concert.

Pasdeloup produced it in its orchestral form at a popular concert Oct. 28, 1877.

It was played at the last of the Government Exposition orchestral concerts at the Trocadéro, Oct. 10, 1878.

It was played again as an arrangement for two pianos, April 19, 1890, at a concert of the National Society by Diémer and somebody else.

⁂

Now, how in the world did Mr. Paur get hold of this work, at least 21 years old, a work presumably little known to the concert goers of Paris today?

"Lénore" was played in Leipsic March 19, 1895, at a concert given by Constantin Sander to exploit certain publications of the house of F. E. C. Leuckart.

⁂

The piece itself is scarcely worth this historical prelude. The interest of the hearer, whatever it may be, is centred in the orchestration, which shows that the Duparc of '74 or '75 had an extended vocabulary, a sure command of rhetoric, and thoughts of comparatively little value. This music is not very original in themes or in harmonic treatment. Nor is the music suggestive. Nor again is it entertainingly panoramic. The "fair sweetheart with kilted skirt"; the spectral bridegroom; the fast ride of the dead; these may have impressed vividly the composer, but he has not imparted his impressions to the hearers, so that they in turn bewail Lenore and Wilhelm or shudder at the tramp of the midnight steed. A modern of the moderns, this Mr. Duparc; for, remember, that when he wrote, Wagner was not in favor at Paris, and even Berlioz was not established firmly on his throne. He has his aspirations, his convictions. He has a pretty orchestral knowledge, too. But there is no sweeping vitality in this "Lénore." I should like to hear some of his songs. Perhaps when our local singers have exhausted the treasure-house of our parochial composers, they may turn their attention to new men across the sea.

⁂

Mr. Plancon offered incense to Germany. First, he sang a dreary air by Haydn—for Haydn, as well as Beethoven, could write dreary songs, to show his versatility; he sang it in true, smug, respectable oratorio fashion, and I rubbed my eyes, thinking it was Sunday night and the Handel and Haydn sat upon the stage. Ah, Mr. Plancon, you are an admirable, thrice admirable singer. Would that you had sung something by a French composer—such a tune, for instance, as the Drum-Major's song from "Le Caïd." You were a most impressive Wotan, but as the game-eyed deity you sang too well. What is Wotan without shouting and roaring and breathing huskily after each word? Mr. Plancon, you committed an unpardonable offence; you made Wotan musical and interesting.

⁂

Beethoven's overture, noble in austerity and indomitable pride, was finely played, and Wagner's music was most brilliantly performed. When such symphonies as Sinding's and Franck's have not been heard here, why insist so strenuously, Mr. Paur, on Mendelssohn and the other ancients? We are of another generation; let us hear the works of men of our own period. Even the "novelty" by Duparc was at least 21 years old.

PHILIP HALE.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. C., NO. 159.

SUNDAY, DEC. 6, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening was:

Overture, "Coriolan"...............Beethoven
Air, "Behold Along the Dewy Grass"..Haydn
Symphonic poem, "Lenore"......Henri Duparc
Wotan's Farewell, "Die Valkyrie"....Wagner
"Italian" Symphony.............Mendelssohn

The soloist was M. Pol Plancon. The audience completely packed the auditorium, and seemed to be the largest of the season thus far. The enthusiasm over M. Plancon was tremendous. He wast recalled so many times after his solos that he must have at last become thoroughly fatigued parading between the ante-room and the stage. It can hardly be said that his selections were happily chosen to show off the best qualities of his singing and his style. He sang the Haydn aria in a large and robust style, and with easy freedom of execution, but notwithstanding the taste and musicianly spirit that marked his rendering of it, the effect of his interpretation was dry and formal, and one could not but wish that he had been heard in one of the opera airs or in a group of those French songs, in the interpretation of which he is so felicitous. Of the Wotan Farewell his performance was broad and noble, but the long instrumental interludes, in which he was obliged to stand, with what composure he could, doing nothing, were awkward, for the music meant absolutely nothing without the stage action which is indispensably necessary to its proper effect; and, impressive as it is on the operatic stage, it is unsatisfying in the concert room. The composer appreciated this thoroughly when he pronounced against detaching his music from the surroundings. The instrumental score was read and played with wonderful beauty and richness of coloring.

The Duparc "Lenore" is not a new work, though it was heard here for the first time on this occasion. It was originally produced some 15 years ago, perhaps more. Its theme is Burger's ballad, the same that Raff used in his well-known symphony, but beyond this there is nothing in common between the two scores. Duparc's work is wholly in the modern vein, in regard to its orchestration, which is exceedingly rich and effective. It abounds in effects which are charming in their delicacy, and at times stirring in their brilliancy and their massiveness, but the composition, though clever in its themes and their development, and often pleasing in their sensuous flow. has nothing that distinguishes it from the flood of well-made and skilfully treated scores that pour from foreign music publishing houses, are commended for their workmanship, are heard once or twice without winning more than a passing compliment for the composer's "know how," and then disappear, and justly, from view. In regard to this particular work, it says nothing as music pure and simple, and without the title attachedto it the intention of its maker would be utterly lost. There is a bit of Wagner here, a bit of Berlioz there, bits of numerous somebody-elses in other places; undoubtedly effective as a whole, all that there is of color, impressiveness and power in it, was splendidly brought out in the thoughtful and solid interpretation it received at the hands of Mr. Paur and his players. The Beethoven overture had one of the most masterly readings that have ever been accorded it at these concerts, the lovely second theme and the closing part of the work being exquisitely given. The genial and buoyant Mendelssohn symphony renewed much of its earlier charm, in the beautiful treatment it received, particularly in regard to the tempi and the delicacy of expression and brilliancy of coloring imparted to it. It is growing old, but gracefully.

There will be no public rehearsal and concert this week. The next programme is: Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; concerto for violoncello (new, first time), Dvorak; the "Ocean" symphony, original version, Rubenstein. M. Alwin Schroeder is to be the soloist.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 6.

The Symphony Concert.

The following is the programme of the seventh Symphony rehearsal and concert, given respectively on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening:

Overture, "Coriolanus"................Beethoven
Air, "Behold, Along the Dewy Grass"....Haydn
"Lenore," Symphonic Poem.......Henri Duparc
Wotan's Farewell..........................Wagner
Symphony No. 4, "Italian"..........Mendelssohn
Soloist, Mr. Pol Plancon.

The novelty of the evening was the "Lenore" symphonic poem, played for the first time in Boston at this concert. There is no striking originality in the work, and it seems to have been inspired by Berlioz, Wagner and Raff. The imitations or suggestions are not consciously made, they are the results of study, wherein perfection or orchestration is regarded as superior to originality of ideas. The work, however, is not chaotic, nor is it scored from the hearing point of noise; the intention is easily followed, and there are some charming movements, notably in the earlier portions of the work. It is suggestive rather of lightness and daintiness of touch than of profundity of thought and feeling; it leaves no lasting impression, but it does not weary or stun.

Mr. Pol Plancon was received with much enthusiasm, but at the Friday rehearsal he frequently wandered away from the key, and he was not successful in giving Haydn character from the air from "The Seasons." His fine, full, rich voice was heard to better advantage in the Wagner selection, which he interpreted with majesty, spirit and fervor. More than a word of praise is due to the orchestra for the manner in which it played the accompaniment, and it gave one a rare and most welcome glimpse of Wagner as he should be. The next concert will be given on the evening of Dec. 19.

HOME JOURNAL
A PAPER [illegible] TO-DAY
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1896.

To what extent conductor Paur will tolerate almost anything in the musical line provided it bear the impress even of the weakest manner of a great German composer was well illustrated at the sixth Boston symphony concert last Saturday evening. Will any musician, not a native-born German, allow that Schumann's "King Manfred" overture is even an interesting work? Is it a remarkably able production? Is it logically well made?

—o—

Quite to the contrary, it is morbid, lugubrious, and drearily uninteresting, and does not even suggest an excuse for its existence in such artistry as attends it.

—o—

The pen with which it was written may have been mechanically guided by Schumann's hand;—certainly not by his genius.

—o—

Mr. Carl Halir was the solo violinist for the concert. He proved himself to be a virtuoso, and gave a memorably great performance of Joachim's cadenza to the first movement of the Beethoven concerto.

—o—

Yes, the cadenza was wonderfully well played; but how about the concerto? Artistic to a rare degree Mr. Halir truly was in his technical treatment of the work; yet he, nevertheless, so disindividualized it that there was very much more enjoyment to be derived from his technical skill than from anything worth recording that he did for Beethoven. It was not a performance of unexampled importance.

—o—

Did you notice how heartily concertmeister Kneisel applauded Mr. Halir? This was all very gracious of Mr. Kneisel, and it was a case similar to praise from Sir Hubert Stanley being praise indeed; but how about Mr. Halir's reading of the work?

—o—

Mr. B. E. Woolf once made a nice distinction to the effect that it is easier to tell what a Beethoven interpretation should not be than to affirm what it is. Certain it is that no such irregular, vacillating and oft tardy tempo as Mr. Halir exhibited with the first movement of the concerto in question was Beethovenish. His interpretation, if that it was, had a certain stylishness all its own; but it would have been gratifying not to have had in this connection such a brilliant Halir and so obscured a Beethoven in the performance. There could be no serious regret expressed that Mr. Halir was recalled many times, for although evidently not in mood—and possibly he never is in just the right mood for the Beethoven concerto—he is certainly in the foremost rank of contemporaneous violinists.

—o—

Bronislaw Huberman is a Polish lad not yet fourteen. The highest European authorities in musical criticism—the Hanslicks, Speidels, Hartmanns and Tapperts—have simply struck their pens before his musical genius and musicianly virtuosity. His American debut produced the same result. In his first concert with Seidl's Orchestra, and in each successive recital since, his audiences have gone wild, emotionally ecstatic à la Paderewski. Whether from the artistic, the psychological or the faddish standpoint—in any case the boy is a marvel, evidently. He is announced as the substitute for the usual rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

—o—

[illegible]
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 6, 1896.

Copyright, 1896. Post Publishing Company.

SEVENTH SYMPHONY.

The five-number programme announced by Mr. Paur for last night at Music Hall was of such brilliancy as to attract a large and "alive" audience with a goodly fringe of "standers only" at the edges. When the splendid orchestra began the tragic one-movement overture by Beethoven to Collin's "Coriolan" (and not to Shakspere's "Coriolanus," as has been supposed), good bronzed old Ludwig himself seemed to look approvingly down from his homely, corrugated surroundings—for once a week is about as often as he gets a hearing in these degenerate days. The "Lenore" symphonic poem, Henri Duparc, was given its first hearing in Boston, and vividly portrayed the heroine's grief because her lover was slain, her headlong and galloping ride with his spectre on horseback, and the stroke of midnight when Leonore dies, and steed and rider turn to ashes. Had the conductor himself been one of the spirits, following wildly in their train, he could scarcely have shown more energy in the climax. Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony in four movements closed the programme.

But around the two numbers introducing the magnetic basso, Pol Plancon, chief interest centred. The noted opera singer was never in finer form. He sang the rather tame music of Hadyn's "Seasons" with much expression, but it was rather amusing to see the genial, accomplished "gentleman of the world" portray the honest and humble husbandman whistling a "wonted lay" in his "furrows long," sowing seed (certainly not hay-seed!), and "harvesting golden ears." The stirring "Wotan's Farewell," with the swirling Wagner fire music, was far more to the public's liking. The flames, the spear, the shield, the sleeping Brunnhilde and all the fancies of the Wizard of Munich seemed to live in the thrilling Plancon interpretation, and the audience called him back again and again to acknowledge their expressions of pleasure.

Alwin Schroeder is the soloist Dec. 18 and 19, when Berlioz, Dvorak and Rubenstein figure in the programme—there being no rehearsal or concert next week, Dec. 11 and 12.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 7, 1896.

Unusually Attractive Programme at the Symphony Concert.

Between symphony and opera there was an exceptionally fine evening of musical activity in this city on Saturday, but so far as patronage was concerned, the triumph was with the symphony concert in Music Hall.

Mr. Paur made an unusually attractive programme for the occasion; and it was unfortunate for attractions elsewhere that Pol Plancon was the soloist.

The novelty for the evening was a symphonic poem entitled "Leonore," by Dupont. What this poem had to say that was new was certainly not important; but there was a praiseworthy brevity in this respect; and as for the rest of the poem one could at least feel grateful to the composer that his memory had served him so as regards the exceptionally choice character of his musical reminiscences. Neither interesting when new, nor new when most interesting this so-called symphonic poem had but a certain kaleidoscopic value in its effect upon the imagination, while so far as any tone poetry was concerned there was simply very little of it.

Mr. Plancon, though a Frenchman, seemed to regard paying homage to Haydn and Wagner as the most acceptable thing he could do at a Boston symphony concert. So he sang an aria by the former, entitled "Behold, Along the Dewy Grass," and "Wontan's Farewell," by Richard Wagner.

The refinement of Pol Plancon's art was ideal in its relation to the Haydn air, but just a little more roughness and vigor properly applied would have enhanced the otherwise unsurpassed effect with which he interpreted "Wontan's Farewell."

The concert which began with the overture to Coriolanus by Beethoven had for its finale the always welcome Italian symphony in A major by Mendelssohn, two real "old-timers" which were far from being treated with any undue familiarity by an orchestra so famous as is the Boston Symphony for impartial care and attention it so invariably bestows upon the old and new alike in art.

As the eighth concert next Saturday evening "The Roman Carnivale" overture and Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony will be played, while sandwiched between these two great works there will be a new concerto for violoncello, by Dvorak, introduced by Mr. Alvin Schroeder.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 6, 1896.

Burger's amorous and predatory spectre and eloping maiden appeared also at the seventh Symphony concert; for the central number of Mr. Paur's programme was a symphon ic poem "a leur intention" by Henri Duparc. It was the novelty of the occasion, and when asked for its name it "murmured back the word 'Lenore'—only this, and nothing more." It was not long, and it was interesting and picturesque; but although it was fanciful and suggestive, it did not rise very high in the scale of poetry. At any rate, one could say in its favor that it was not programme music in the ordinary acceptance of the term. It began with melancholy and complaining phrases, to which soon made answer others of more cheery and substantial character, out of which emerged a kind of dialogue-scene, as if the lover, summoned from his field of death, were persuading his sweetheart to fly with him. Then came the midnight ride and its tragic end, when the ghostly steed and its master crumble into dust, while Lenore falls dying on the graveyard turf. But in this central portion Duparc is far more imaginative than realistic. There are the swift and hurrying rush, the shrill voices of vague beings, the whistling and groaning of the wind, and the clangor of unearthly bands; but there is no set figure or emphatic beat of horses' hoofs. The listener can suit the composer's weird music with his own fancies as he derives them from the general course of the ballad, The finale is faint and tender, with a short, chorale-like passage following gently upon the quaint suggestion of dispersion which has come with the arrival at the dreadful goal. The orchestral scheme is extended and the handling bold and and firm.

The other orchestral numbers were Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture and Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, each of which was fully, finely and fittingly rendered, as the "Lenore" also had a splendidly free and yet positive rendering.

Mr. Paul Plancon sang the "Husbandman" air from Haydn's "Seasons" and "Wotan's Farewell." How well his noble voice, elegant diction, polished style and musicianaly feeling dealt by these contrasted songs, there is little need to say. The fluent grace and lightsomeness of the Haydn and the broad declamation and sturdy warmth of the Wagner were all remembered and respected, and he was recalled repeatedly. In the Wotan scene the instrumental part, magnificently played as orchestral virtuosity, was far too vehement and sonorous almost all the time, and there were many passages in which even Mr. Plancon's magnificent organ was almost inaudible.

There is no concert this week, and the next programmee will be: Berlioz, overture, "The Roman Carnival;" Dvorak, concerto for violincello, (new, first time); Rubinstein, Symphony No. 2 ("Ocean"), (original version). Soloist, Mr. Schroeder.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, DEC. 6, 1896.

Seventh Symphony Concert.

The seventh symphony concert of the season was given last evening with Mr Paul Plancon as the soloist. The first number on the program was Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus," and after this had been well rendered Mr Plancon sang Haydn's air, "With eagerness the husbandman," from "The Seasons." This is not a piece calculated to show the noted basso at his best, but it was Plancon singing, a great favorite with Boston people, and at the close of the selection he was recalled many times to bow his acknowledgments before the audience was satisfied.

The third number was "Lenore," symphonic poem after Burger's ballad by Henri Duparc, given for the first time in Boston. Much of the music is sweet, just a trifle monotonously so, perhaps, but it is relieved here and there by a rhythmical swing in which can be heard the hoof beats of the galloping spectral steed as the dead lover rides fast and faster, bearing his living bride to her doom. It is not as realistic as Raff's last movement in his "Lenore" symphony, but quite similar in style.

From this to Wagner's grand music of Wotan's farewell to Brunnhilde from "The Valkyr" was a sudden transition, and it was in this number that Plancon scored his greatest success. Here also Mr Paur was at his best, smiling his approval of his musicians' interpretation of the composer's work. At the close it seemed as though his hearers would never tire of applauding and almost half a dozen times Plancon came before the audience.

The last number was Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy's symphony No. 4 in A major, chiefly notable for the counterpoint work in the "Pilgrims' March," and the fine color effects produced by the horns and bassoons in the third movement.

There will be no concert this week.

Dec 18 and 19 Mr Alwin Schroeder will be the soloist, and the program as follows: Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; concerto for violoncello, Dvorak; symphony No. 2, "Ocean," Rubinstein.

The Musical Courier.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1896.

The program of the Symphony concert last night was as follows:

Overture to Coriolanus..............................Beethoven
Air, Behold, Along the Dewy Grass, from The Seasons........Haydn
Lénore, symphonic poem, after Bürger's ballad........Henri Duparc
First time in Boston.
Wotan's Farewell, from The Valkyr, Act III., Scene 3.......Wagner
Symphony No. 4 in A major, Italian......................Mendelssohn

This concert was not one of large interest. Has Duparc's Lénore been played in New York?

Henri Duparc is a pupil of César Franck. In 1874, January 24, he conducted his own waltzes for orchestra at a concert of the Société Nationale de Musique, at Paris, and the reviewers were not kind in their treatment of him as composer or conductor. For some years he was prominent in the concerts of this national society. His poor health accounts for the non-productiveness of his later years, though I find mention of his working at an opera, La Roussalkâ, and songs by him are still sung in Paris.

Lénore was first played at one of the concerts of the above named society in 1875. It was then called a "Symphonie ballade." Pasdeloup produced it October 28, 1877, and it was played at a Government orchestral concert at the exposition of 1878 (October 10), at the Trocadéro. It has been played three times at least in Paris, as an arrangement for two pianos.

It was played in Leipsic, March 19, 1895, at a concert given by Constantin Sander, to exploit publications of the house of Leuckart.

Here is another case of a man who has or had in 1874 or 1875 an extensive vocabulary, a sure command of rhetoric, and thoughts of comparatively little value. The music is not especially suggestive; it is not entertainingly panoramic. There is no sweeping vitality. However deeply the composer may have been moved by the ballad, he is not successful in moving the audience by the narration of his own emotions. Yet the piece is to be treated with a certain respect, for the Duparc of 1874 or 1875 had his aspirations, his convictions, and he speaks fluently the modern orchestral language. Remember the date, for Wagner was not a fad in Paris twenty years ago, and even Berlioz had not been fully canonized.

⁂

Mr. Pol Plançon sang an air from The Seasons in most respectable fashion. Would that he had sung anything else, for the air chosen is as dry as dust! In the selection from Die Walküre he actually made Wotan an impressive and interesting person. I fear he sang the music too well to suit the ultra-Wagnerites who were present.

⁂

The Coriolanus overture was played with due austerity, and Wagner's music was most brilliantly performed. I did not hear the symphony by Mendelssohn. I am told it was played with a finesse remarkable even at these concerts.

⁂

[58]

HOME JOURNAL
A PAPER OF TO-DAY

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1896.

TO what extent conductor Paur will tolerate almost anything in the musical line provided it bear the impress even of the weakest manner of a great German composer was well illustrated at the sixth Boston symphony concert last Saturday evening. Will any musician, not a native-born German, allow that Schumann's "King Manfred" overture is even an interesting work? Is it a remarkably able production? Is it logically well made?

—o—

Quite to the contrary, it is morbid, lugubrious, and drearily uninteresting. and does not even suggest an excuse for its existence in such artistry as attends it.

—o—

The pen with which it was written may have been mechanically guided by Schumann's hand;—certainly not by his genius.

—o—

Mr. Carl Halir was the solo violinist for the concert. He proved himself to be a virtuoso, and gave a memorably great performance of Joachim's cadenza to the first movement of the Beethoven concerto.

—o—

Yes, the cadenza was wonderfully well played; but how about the concerto? Artistic to a rare degree Mr. Halir truly was in his technical treatment of the work; yet he, nevertheless. so disindividualized it that there was very much more enjoyment to be derived from his technical skill than from anything worth recording that he did for Beethoven. It was not a performance of unexampled importance.

—o—

Did you notice how heartily concertmeister Kneisel applauded Mr. Halir? This was all very gracious of Mr. Kneisel, and it was a case similar to praise from Sir Hubert Stanley being praise indeed; but how about Mr. Halir's reading of the work?

—o—

Mr. B. E. Woolf once made a nice distinction to the effect that it is easier to tell what a Beethoven interpretation should not be than to affirm what it is. Certain it is that no such irregular, vacillating and oft tardy tempo as Mr. Halir exhibited with the first movement of the concerto in question was Beethovenish. His interpretation, if that it was, had a certain stylishness all its own; but it would have been gratifying not to have had in this connection such a brilliant Halir and so obscured a Beethoven in the performance. There could be no serious regret expressed that Mr. Halir was recalled many times, for although evidently not in mood—and possibly he never is in just the right mood for the Beethoven concerto—he is certainly in the foremost rank of contemporaneous violinists.

—o—

Bronislaw Huberman is a Polish lad not yet fourteen. The highest European authorities in musical criticism—the Hanslicks, Speidels, Hartmanns and Tapperts—have simply struck their pens before his musical genius and musicianly virtuosity. His American debut produced the same result. In his first concert with Seidl's Orchestra, and in each successive recital since, his audiences have gone wild, emotionally ecstatic à la Paderewski. Whether from the artistic, the psychological or the faddish standpoint—in any case the boy is a marvel, evidently. He is announced as the substitute for the usual rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

—o—

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 6, 1896.
Copyright, 1896. Post Publishing Company.

SEVENTH SYMPHONY.

The five-number programme announced by Mr. Paur for last night at Music Hall was of such brilliancy as to attract a large and "alive" audience with a goodly fringe of "standers only" at the edges. When the splendid orchestra began the tragic one-movement overture by Beethoven to Collin's "Coriolan" (and not to Shakspere's "Coriolanus," as has been supposed), good bronzed old Ludwig himself seemed to look approvingly down from his homely, corrugated surroundings—for once a week is about as often as he gets a hearing in these degenerate days. The "Lenore" symphonic poem, Henri Duparc, was given its first hearing in Boston, and vividly portrayed the heroine's grief because her lover was slain, her headlong and galloping ride with his spectre on horseback, and the stroke of midnight when Leonore dies, and steed and rider turn to ashes. Had the conductor himself been one of the spirits, following wildly in their train, he could scarcely have shown more energy in the climax. Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony in four movements closed the programme.

But around the two numbers introducing the magnetic basso, Pol Plancon, chief interest centred. The noted opera singer was never in finer form. He sang the rather tame music of Hadyn's "Seasons" with much expression, but it was rather amusing to see the genial, accomplished "gentleman of the world" portray the honest and humble husbandman whistling a "wonted lay" in his "furrows long," sowing seed (certainly not hay-seed!), and "harvesting golden ears." The stirring "Wotan's Farewell," with the swirling Wagner fire music, was far more to the public's liking. The flames, the spear, the shield, tne sleeping Brunnhilde and all the fancies of the Wizard of Munich seemed to live in the thrilling Plancon interpretation, and the audience called him back again and again to acknowledge their expressions of pleasure.

Alwin Schroeder is the soloist Dec. 18 and 19, when Berlioz, Dvorak and Rubenstein figure in the programme—there being no rehearsal or concert next week, Dec. 11 and 12.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 7, 1896.

Unusually Attractive Programme at the Symphony Concert.

Between symphony and opera there was an exceptionally fine evening of musical activity in this city on Saturday, but so far as patronage was concerned, the triumph was with the symphony concert in Music Hall.

Mr. Paur made an unusually attractive programme for the occasion; and it was unfortunate for attractions elsewhere that Pol Plancon was the soloist.

The novelty for the evening was a symphonic poem entitled "Leonore," by Dupont. What this poem had to say that was new was certainly not important; but there was a praiseworthy brevity in this respect; and as for the rest of the poem one could at least feel grateful to the composer that his memory had served him so as regards the exceptionally choice character of his musical reminiscences. Neither interesting when new, nor new when most interesting this so-called symphonic poem had but a certain kaleidoscopic value in its effect upon the imagination, while so far as any tone poetry was concerned there was simply very little of it.

Mr. Plancon, though a Frenchman, seemed to regard paying homage to Haydn and Wagner as the most acceptable thing he could do at a Boston symphony concert. So he sang an aria by the former, entitled "Behold, Along the Dewy Grass," and "Wontan's Farewell," by Richard Wagner.

The refinement of Pol Plancon's art was ideal in its relation to the Haydn air, but just a little more roughness and vigor properly applied would have enhanced the otherwise unsurpassed effect with which he interpreted "Wontan's Farewell."

The concert which began with the overture to Coriolanus by Beethoven had for its finale the always welcome Italian symphony in A major by Mendelssohn, two real "old-timers" which were far from being treated with any undue familiarity by an orchestra so famous as is the Boston Symphony for impartial care and attention it so invariably bestows upon the old and new alike in art.

As the eighth concert next Saturday evening "The Roman Carnivale" overture and Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony will be played, while sandwiched between these two great works there will be a new concerto for violoncello, by Dvorak, introduced by Mr. Alvin Schroeder.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 6, 1896.

Burger's amorous and predatory spectre and eloping maiden appeared also at the seventh Symphony concert; for the central nnmber of Mr. Paur's programme was a symphonic poem "a leur intention" by Henri Duparc. It was the novelty of the occasion, and when asked for its name it "murmured back the word 'Lenore'—only this, and nothing more." It was not long, and it was interesting and picturesque; but although it was fanciful and suggestive, it did not rise very high in the scale of poetry. At any rate, one could say in its favor that it was not programme music in the ordinary acceptance of the term. It began with melancholy and complaining phrases, to which soon made answer others of more cheery and substantial character, out of which emerged a kind of dialogue-scene, as if the lover, summoned from his field of death, were persuading his sweetheart to fly with him. Then came the midnight ride and its tragic end, when the ghostly steed and its master crumble into dust, while Lenore falls dying on the graveyard turf. But in this central portion Duparc is far more imaginative than realistic. There are the swift and hurrying rush, the shrill voices of vague beings, the whistling and groaning of the wind, and the clangor of unearthly bands; but there is no set figure or emphatic beat of horses' hoofs. The listener can suit the composer's weird music with his own fancies as he derives them from the general course of the ballad, The finale is faint and tender, with a short, chorale-like passage following gently upon the quaint suggestion of dispersion which has come with the arrival at the dreadful goal. The orchestral scheme is extended and the handling bold and and firm.

The other orchestral numbers were Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture and Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, each of which was fully, finely and fittingly rendered, as the "Lenore" also had a splendidly free and yet positive rendering.

Mr. Paul Plancon sang the "Husbandman" air from Haydn's "Seasons" and "Wotan's Farewell." How well his noble voice, elegant diction, polished style and musicianaly feeling dealt by these contrasted songs, there is little need to say. The fluent grace and lightsomeness of the Haydn and the broad declamation and sturdy warmth of the Wagner were all remembered and respected, and he was recalled repeatedly. In the Wotan scene the instrumental part, magnificently played as orchestral virtuosity, was far too vehement and sonorous almost all the time, and there were many passages in which even Mr. Plancon's magnificent organ was almost inaudible.

There is no concert this week, and the next programmee will be: Berlioz, overture, "The Roman Carnival;" Dvorak, concerto for violincello, (new, first time); Rubinstein, Symphony No. 2 ("Ocean"), (original version). Soloist, Mr. Schroeder.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC. 6, 1896.

Seventh Symphony Concert.

The seventh symphony concert of the season was given last evening with Mr Paul Plancon as the soloist. The first number on the program was Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus," and after this had been well rendered Mr Plancon sang Haydn's air, "With eagerness the husbandman," from "The Seasons." This is not a piece calculated to show the noted basso at his best, but it was Plancon singing, a great favorite with Boston people, and at the close of the selection he was recalled many times to bow his acknowledgments before the audience was satisfied.

The third number was "Lenore," symphonic poem after Burger's ballad by Henri Duparc, given for the first time in Boston. Much of the music is sweet, just a trifle monotonously so, perhaps, but it is relieved here and there by a rhythmical swing in which can be heard the hoof beats of the galloping spectral steed as the dead lover rides fast and faster, bearing his living bride to her doom. It is not as realistic as Raff's last movement in his "Lenore" symphony, but quite similar in style.

From this to Wagner's grand music of Wotan's farewell to Brunnhilde from "The Valkyr" was a sudden transition, and it was in this number that Plancon scored his greatest success. Here also Mr Paur was at his best, smiling his approval of his musicians' interpretation of the composer's work. At the close it seemed as though his hearers would never tire of applauding and almost half a dozen times Plancon came before the audience.

The last number was Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy's symphony No. 4 in A major, chiefly notable for the counterpoint work in the "Pilgrims' March," and the fine color effects produced by the horns and bassoons in the third movement.

There will be no concert this week.

Dec 18 and 19 Mr Alwin Schroeder will be the soloist, and the program as follows: Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; concerto for violoncello, Dvorak; symphony No. 2, "Ocean," Rubinstein.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1896.

The program of the Symphony concert last night was as follows:

Overture to Coriolanus	Beethoven
Air, Behold, Along the Dewy Grass, from The Seasons	Haydn
Lénore, symphonic poem, after Bürger's ballad First time in Boston.	Henri Duparc
Wotan's Farewell, from The Valkyr, Act III., Scene 3	Wagner
Symphony No. 4 in A major, Italian	Mendelssohn

This concert was not one of large interest. Has Duparc's Lénore been played in New York?

Henri Duparc is a pupil of César Franck. In 1874, January 24, he conducted his own waltzes for orchestra at a concert of the Société Nationale de Musique, at Paris, and the reviewers were not kind in their treatment of him as composer or conductor. For some years he was prominent in the concerts of this national society. His poor health accounts for the non-productiveness of his later years, though I find mention of his working at an opera, La Roussalkâ, and songs by him are still sung in Paris.

Lénore was first played at one of the concerts of the above named society in 1875. It was then called a "Symphonie ballade." Pasdeloup produced it October 28, 1877, and it was played at a Government orchestral concert at the exposition of 1878 (October 10), at the Trocadéro. It has been played three times at least in Paris, as an arrangement for two pianos.

It was played in Leipsic, March 19, 1895, at a concert given by Constantin Sander, to exploit publications of the house of Leuckart.

Here is another case of a man who has or had in 1874 or 1875 an extensive vocabulary, a sure command of rhetoric, and thoughts of comparatively little value. The music is not especially suggestive; it is not entertainingly panoramic. There is no sweeping vitality. However deeply the composer may have been moved by the ballad, he is not successful in moving the audience by the narration of his own emotions. Yet the piece is to be treated with a certain respect, for the Duparc of 1874 or 1875 had his aspirations, his convictions, and he speaks fluently the modern orchestral language. Remember the date, for Wagner was not a fad in Paris twenty years ago, and even Berlioz had not been fully canonized.

⁂

Mr. Pol Plançon sang an air from The Seasons in most respectable fashion. Would that he had sung anything else, for the air chosen is as dry as dust! In the selection from Die Walküre he actually made Wotan an impressive and interesting person. I fear he sang the music too well to suit the ultra-Wagnerites who were present.

⁂

The Coriolanus overture was played with due austerity, and Wagner's music was most brilliantly performed. I did not hear the symphony by Mendelssohn. I am told it was played with a finesse remarkable even at these concerts.

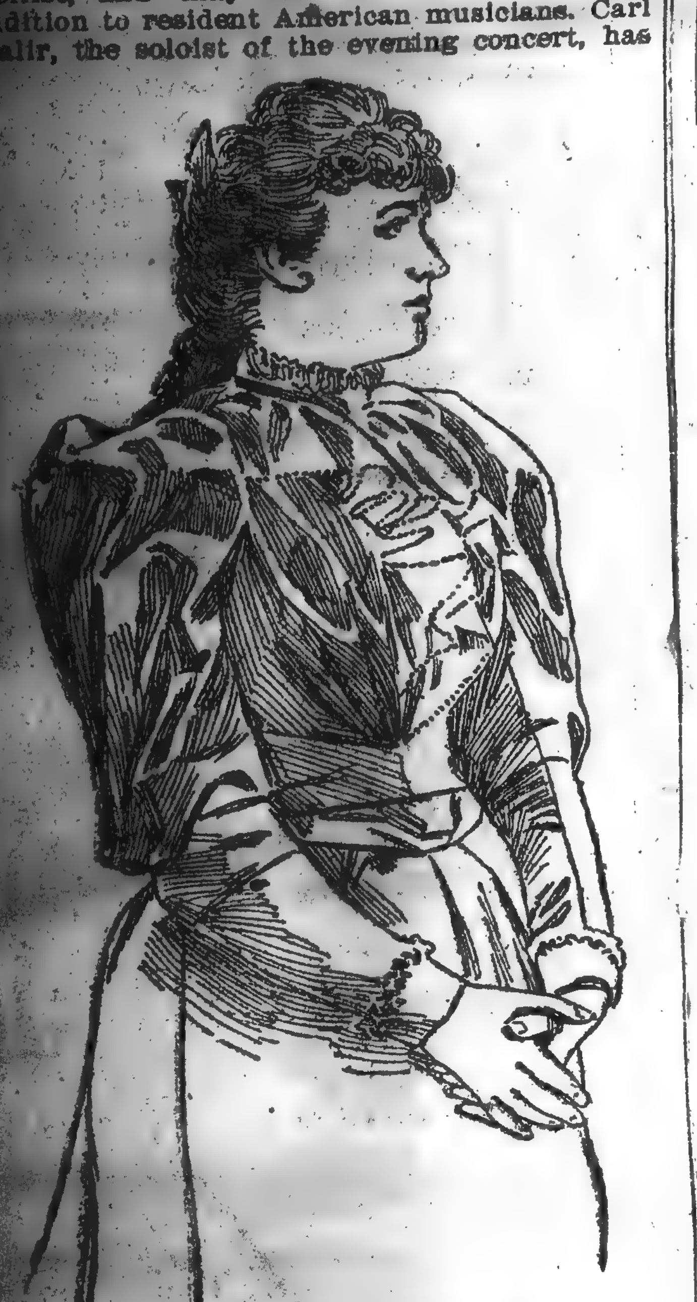
⁂

Brooklyn

DECEMBER 8, 1896.

Two Fine Boston Symphony Programmes This Week, With Carl Halir, violinist, and Antoinette Szumowska, Pianist.

The chief event of the week musically will be the return of that greatest of orchestras, the Boston Symphony, for two concerts under the auspices of the Brooklyn institute. On Friday evening the second of a series of evening symphony concerts will be given with Carl Halir, a German violinist, who has recently come to America as a soloist. On Saturday afternoon the first of the series of orchestral matinees will be given with Antoinette Szumowska as the soloist. This is the concert for which Moriz Rosenthal, the astonishing pianist, was engaged, but his critical illness will prevent his apearing. The institute would hardly have better filled the place than by securing Mme. Szumokska. Charm has its place in piano playing no less than power and is capable of giving keener enjoyment, although it creates less sense of wonder. Mme. Szumowska has charm. It is the keynote of her playing. She is a pupil of Paderewski, the only one, it was said when she played in New York last year. At any rate she does not discredit her teacher. Since her last visit she has married Joseph Adamowski, the cellist, and may be counted a valuable addition to resident American musicians. Carl Halir, the soloist of the evening concert, has not been here long, but he turned critical Boston upside down the other night by his playing of the Beethoven concerto for violin which he will play. The reviewers fairly emptied their dictionaries of superlatives next day. The performance was characterized as "wonderfully beautiful for the dignity, the purity, taste and classic diginity of style that marked it at every point." Another critic, Louis C. Elson, said: "It was the true, classical, non sensational style of performance; it was Joachim's self that seemed to stand there in the person of his colleague. Altogether a most straightforward and musicianly presentation of the great concerto and a performance which was understood by the audience, for a great furor ensued both at the end of the first movement and at the completion of the work, which proved that Mr. Halir is given his true rank with the great violinists of the world, at least in Boston." It is to be hoped that all this is true, because it will take a great performance to redeem the dryness and dullness of parts of the Beethoven concerto. Of the programme but little need be said except to note that the Schubert symphony in C major, the one "of heavenly length," will be played on Friday evening, and that the seldom heard Mendelssohn symphony of Saturday afternoon suits admirably a programme which represents the gentler, more winning aspect of music.



ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA.

Here are the lists in full:

Programme, Friday evening.

Overture—"Manfred" .... Schumann
Concerto for violin.......................... Beethoven
Overture—"Carneval Romain" .... Berlioz
Symphony in C major, No. 9...............Schubert

Soloist, Mr. Carl Halir.

Matinee, Saturday, at 3.

Overture—"Sakuntala" .... Goldmark
Concerto for pianoforte in G minor, No. 2, op. 22 Saint Saens
Symphony in A major, No. 4 (Italian) Mendelssohn
Overture—"Gwendoline" .... Chabrier
(First time.)

Soloist, Mlle. Antoinette Szumowska.

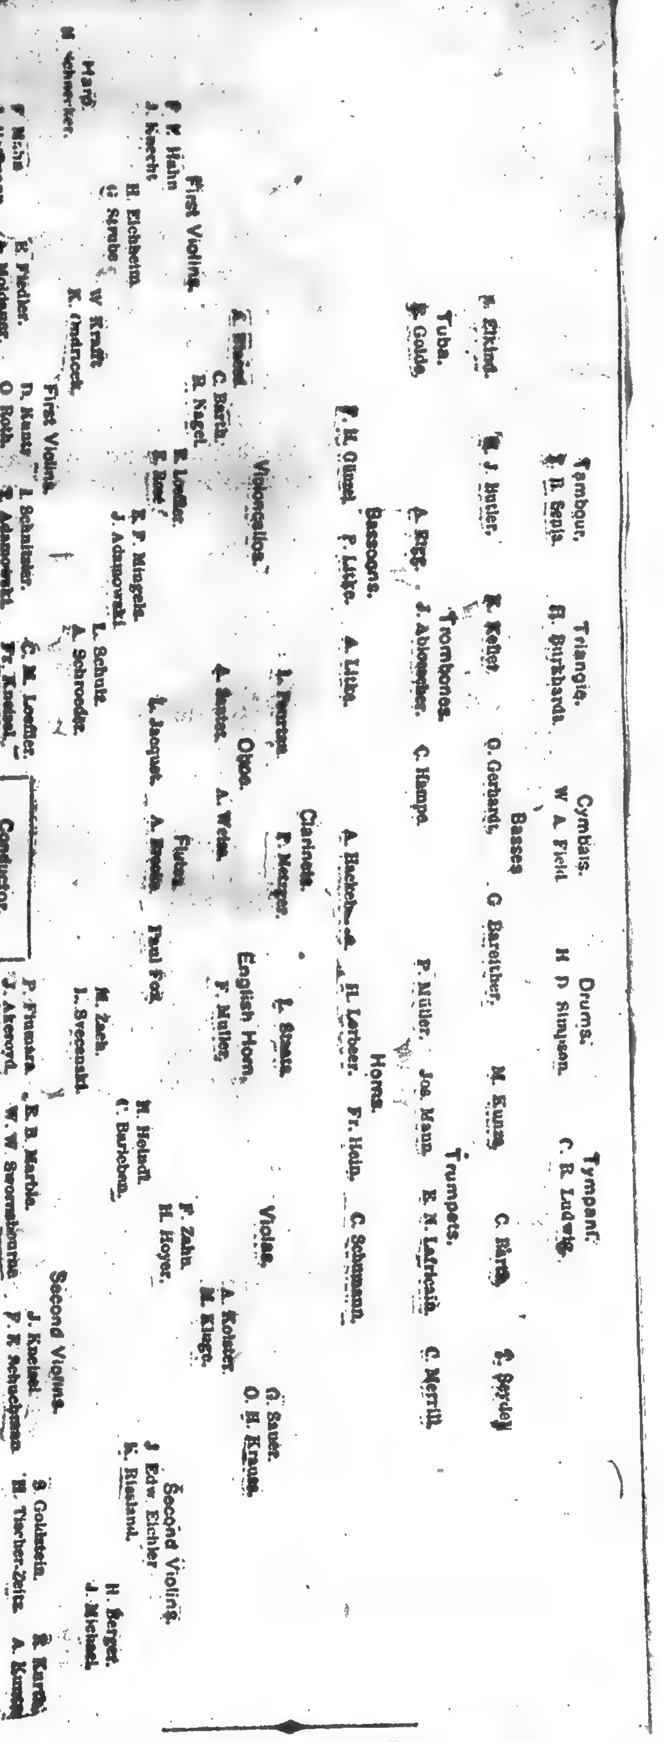
CONDUCTOR PAUR'S VIEWS

Concerning the Proper Seating of an Orchestra.

Emil Paur, now in his fourth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in an interview with an Eagle reporter, set forth his views on the seating of an orchestra, as follows:

"As the strings are acknowledged to be the fundamental basis of every orchestra, they should be so placed at the front and center of the stage as to be practically surrounded by the other instruments. As the flutes, clarinets, oboes and other wood wind instruments have a delicate tone, they should be grouped toward the front, between the first violins and violas, otherwise they will be easily overbalanced by the rest of the orchestra. Back of the wood wind instruments should come the brasses, and especial care should be taken to place the French horns that the bell or opening of the instruments should be opposite and away from the other brass instruments. In th rear should come the double basses as the natural background of the orchestra. One fault in orchestral arrangement which cannot always be obviated, owing to [illegible] instruments [illegible] too great prominence, in which event it is the especial function of the conductor to tone down these instruments to [illegible] proper ensemble effect. In considering [illegible] the subject of orchestral arrangement, due allowance should be made for the variable acoustics of different halls. Sometimes, though rarely, this difference is so marked as to necessitate a slight change in the seating of the orchestra, but in most cases the conductor maintains the same plan of arranging his forces."

The seating plan as carried out by the Boston Symphony orchestra is shown by the following:



The Press

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1896.

HALIR AT THE ACADEMY.

The Violinist Arouses Much Enthusiasm by His Magnificent Playing.

Another brilliant audience marked the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Academy of Music and was moved to great enthusiasm by the superb performance of Mr. Carl Halir, in Beethoven's concerts for the violin in D major. While Mr. Halir's playing was more or less the feature of the evening, the programme as a whole was an exceedingly effective one, opening with Schumann's picturesque overture to "Manfred" and concluding with Schubert's characteristic and beautiful symphony No. 9 in C major, and including, as it were, as an entrement of highly-spiced music Liszt's descriptive "Faust" music.

As the Symphony Orchestra ever interprets upon the highest level, the result was one of the best concerts Philadelphia has had given it by this great organization.

The masterful violin concerto of Beethoven, however, stands out as the chief memory of the evening, largely, of course, due to Mr. Halir's work, but the beauty of the orchestral rendering is not to be ignored. While possessing all the marks of Beethoven's greatness and some of his ruggedness, there are all through the concerto Mozart-like melodies and graces, and in the rondo the liveliness of Haydn. The solo parts for the violin are extremely difficult, even without Joachim's cadenzas, and yet this seems to be Mr. Halir's forte. From first phraze to final cadenza he rendered everything with the greatest poise, smoothness and utmost brilliancy, and in the more melodious passages, particularly the legende-like or ballad-like passages in the larghetto his playing had a delicacy and tenderness that was most delightful. Fortunately free from mannerisms, Mr. Halir easily ranks among the leading violinists of the day. He may not possess that deeper quality of insight that marked Ysaye's playing, his style verging more withal on the absoluteness of scholastic perfection, but although an artistic calmness, civil resoluteness and a straightforward manner are his characteristics, he has also the fire and such variety of temperament as made the concerto last night a thing of vital beauty. His tone in the tender passages was as pure as it was delicate, and in the broader movements it was large, firm and reserved, and yet in the rondo jocose and everywhere most graceful in phrasing. After the first movement with its flourishes and trills, and the Halir trill is the perfection of violin technique, there was much applause. This became an ovation after the exceedingly beautiful larghetto and the lively rondo had received so superb a reading, and the soloist was obliged to come out again and again.

After the intermission came Liszt's highly colored "Faust" music, which taxed the expression of the full orchestra. This Mr. Paur read with much verve, and then came Schubert's magnificent symphony. While magnificent as a whole, there is at times a wearisomeness, particularly in the second movement, which Mr. Paur's fine reading did not altogether remove. Still, the variety of effect and the color which the orchestra put into their performance made the symphony stand out, as it should, as one of the most interesting of compositions of this class.

Inquirer

TUESDAY [illegible] DECEMBER 8, 1896

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

First Appearance of a Great Violinist at the Academy Last Night.

The second concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Academy of Music last night to an audience that filled the auditorium. This was the program:

Robert Schumann, overture to "Manfred," Op. 115; Ludwig van Beethoven, concerto for violin, in D major, Op. 61, (Cadenzas by Josef Joachim); Franz Liszt, scene in the tavern (Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust;" Franz Schubert, Symphony No. 9, in C major; soloist, Mr. Carl Halir.

The Schuman overture to Byron's "Manfred," is by turns gloomy, passionate and tragic, and the composer has sought, by pathetic and constantly-modulating melody, to depict the turmoil, unrest and sorrow which filled the heart of the most striking of the poet's creations. Its rendition had a delightful individuality given to the varied themes, the theme for the violas and 'celli being rendered with a passion and verve that brought out all its beauties. There are also scattered through the work snatches of quaint instrumentation that are far beyond the conventional sonata form, and the orchestra seemed to grasp the composer's motive in the freest and most complete manner. The Liszt "Mephisto Waltz" pictures a scene in a village tavern, where a peasant wedding has taken place. Faust and Mephisto enter, and the latter taking a fiddle from one of the village musicians, plays a waltz tune, while all present dance. and he comments on love in a sardonic fashion. The introduction has a bright and rollicking atmosphere, and when the full orchestra breaks out into the maddening waltz strains, the effect is almost electrical. The piece served to illustrate the many-sided qualities of the orchestra and its aptitude for tone-painting of all kinds. Of the Schubert Symphony, which closed the program, criticisms have often been made on account of its great length, but it must be said that it exhibits wondrous fertility and imaginative power. The first movement is the most descriptive of the four, and there is a passage in it which has a peculiarly Scotch rhythm, and was delightfully given by the orchestra. Then again a semi-barbaric Moorish style seems to be dominant, and there is a strong reminder of that Beethoven fragment, the "Ruins of Athens." The orchestra appeared occasionally to lack animation in this work, and there was over-elaboration. The scherzo and the trio could have been betrered by less exaggeration of the tempo, but the tremendous climax, with which the symphony closes, was given with an effect that atoned for anything that was lacking elsewhere.

Much interest was felt in the appearance of Carl Halir, a violinist who was to make his first appearance in this city in the Beethoven concerto. He made an imposing figure when he stepped to the footlights, tall, massively built, swarthy as a Bohemian would be, and in movement as graceful as Sarasate. After the orchestra had played the first and second themes of the opening movement the violin entered, and the first chords had scarcely been struck by the player when every one felt that there stood an artist pre-eminent. The simple themes were given a color as rich as that of an Oriental sunset; the fantasias were interpreted with the most marvelous freedom and spontaneityand embroidered with a figuration that was as delicate as gossamer. The bravura scale passages, the arpeggi and the ascending thrills had about them a wonderful delicacy and a melody that seemed to come from the very heart of a nightingale. The third movement is based on a peasant dance theme, and its mirth, its jollity and rustic abandon were thrown out by the player with a dash and impetuosity that set every nerve tingling. The refreshing animation of his playing, his emotional temperament and his power to depict everything that is tender, are qualities that mark him as a consummate artist. It must be said, too, that the orchestra helped to bring out the full beauties of the work. Nothing could have been more charming than the ritornella with which the first movement opens, the work of the tympani and then of the oboes, clarinets and bassoons. It was in the accompaniment to the concerto that the orchestra vindicated its claim to unapproachable excellence.

The New York Press

DAILY EDITION.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1896.

HALIR'S FRESH LAURELS

Violinist's Second Appearance More Successful Than His First.

Carl Halir, the violinist, made a second triumph here last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Metropolitan Opera House. He was heard to better advantage than he was at his first appearance here, and aroused storms of applause by his dazzling technique. He chose Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin, No. 2, in D major, and stupefied the audience by overcoming its almost innumerable difficulties as if it were mere child's play.

As was said in this paper on last Sunday, his playing appeals more to the head than to the heart. He bewilders; he handles the violin as Rosenthal does the piano—as if he knew not the meaning of difficulties. He is not lacking in feeling, by any means, but his technical ability and facility overshadow everything else about his playing.

The orchestra's programme comprised Berlioz's "Roman Carnival Overture," Liszt's tone-picture, "Scene in the Tavern" (mephisto waltz), from Lenau's "Faust" and Schumann's great symphony in C major.

8, 1896.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra—Halir—

Mr. Paur used mighty names to conjure with when he directed last evening's Boston Symphony Concert in the Academy of Music—no less names, in fact, than those of Beethoven, Schumann, Liszt and Schubert—but as if to show that he was not insensible to the claims of living musicians he introduced to Philadelphia Herr Carl Halir, a German violinist, who comes here with the prestige naturally accruing to a colleague and former pupil of Joachim. It was, to be sure, an ambitious night, and one well worthy of the fine audience, as the following programme will show:

Schumann...Overture to "Manfred," Op. 115
Beethoven...Concerto for Violin in D major. Op. 61.
(Cadenzas by Josef Joachim.)
Liszt...Scene in the Tavern ("Mephisto" Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust."
Schubert............Symphony No. 9, in C major

As the element of novelty always has claim to first consideration, even in so abstruse a thing as a symphony concert, it may be said at once that Carl Halir proved himself a violinist of distinction. His appearance, as he first stepped upon the stage, had about it none of the marks which are supposed to characterize (with the accent on the supposed) the professional wielder of the bow. There were no flowing locks, no airy negligé or no careful carelessness; on the contrary, the newcomer looked like nothing so much as a prosperous Teutonic merchant. When he attacked the allegro in the Beethoven concerto, however, it became quickly in evidence that Herr Halir was something more than this—that he was, in fact, a performer of attainment, with admirable bowing, fine tone and a polished execution. This impression was strengthened as he glided easily and gracefully over the many difficulties that hedge in this remarkable example of Beethoven's genius (difficulties which would appall the average violinist), and when he had finished and bowed his acknowledgments repeatedly to the applauding audience there was every reason to declare that Halir had the real artistic temperament. It must not be inferred from this that his playing approached the ideal, but of its finish, facility and refinement of expression not the slightest doubt remained. Here and there one missed an indefinable something in the performance (was it a little more vigor that was wanted, or a more distinct individuality?), but for all that his achievement was one of interest and brilliancy—and any musician will understand how much that means in connection with the Beethoven concerto. Herr Halir did not give an encore piece, although the house hinted strongly for one, and it would be unfair to make any attempt to define his exact rank among his brethren. This much at least seems certain: he is a violinist of authority rather than one of greatness, and while not likely to efface memories of a Sarasate or an Ysaye, he is an adept in his own graceful sphere. And when it comes to that, let it be remembered that Sarasates and Ysayes do not grow on the high roads and by-roads, to be plucked at by every concert goer.

The orchestra was, as usual, admirably responsive to the requirements of the programme, and under Mr. Paur's virile direction gave worthy presentation to Schumann's "Manfred" overture and the "Mephisto" waltz of Liszt. The last number was the marvellous C major symphony of Schubert, a work which would have sufficed to send the fame of the composer rolling down the ages had he never written another line of music. Schumann called it a "heavenly, long-drawn out symphony" which should never end, and described it enthusiastically as possessing "more than mere melody," and "something above sorrow and joy." "In listening to symphonies like this," he went on to say, "we are transported to a region where we never remember to have been before. Here we have, besides masterly power over the musical technicality of composition, life in all its phases, color in exquisite gradations, the minutest accuracy and fitness of expression, and permeating the whole work a spirit of romance such as we recognize in other works of Franz Schubert."

It is a curious fact that when Schubert turned over the score of this symphony to the Musik-Verein of Vienna the difficulties involved in its proper presentation seemed so great that the society in question did not venture to give it a public hearing until after the composer's death. It was first withdrawn, indeed, at Schubert's own request. A bit of history like this calls fresh attention to the ambitious scope of the work, and indirectly bears eloquent testimony to the fine efficiency of the orchestra which gave it such noble production last evening. For a noble revival it proved in every sense of the word, and there was liberal opportunity for even the uncritical ear to detect the many beauties of the symphony—its wonderful breadth of treatment, its poetic suggestiveness, and, above all, its humanity—for it is the latter quality that constitutes the real depth of the great C major. Had the performance come earlier in the evening, the symphony might have been enjoyed with even keener zest than it was, but all who stayed until its end were amply rewarded.

THE AMERICAN HEBREW of Dec 11/96

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Metropolitan Opera House on Thursday evening, with Mr. Carl Halir as soloist. The programme was as follows: Overture Carneval Romain, Berlioz; Concerto for Violin, Tschaikowky; Mephisto Waltz, Liszt; Symphony in C Major No. 2, Schumann. The selections were well performed as is usual with this excellent orchestra, and the music lovers who were on hand to applaud him, may once more thank Mr. Paur.

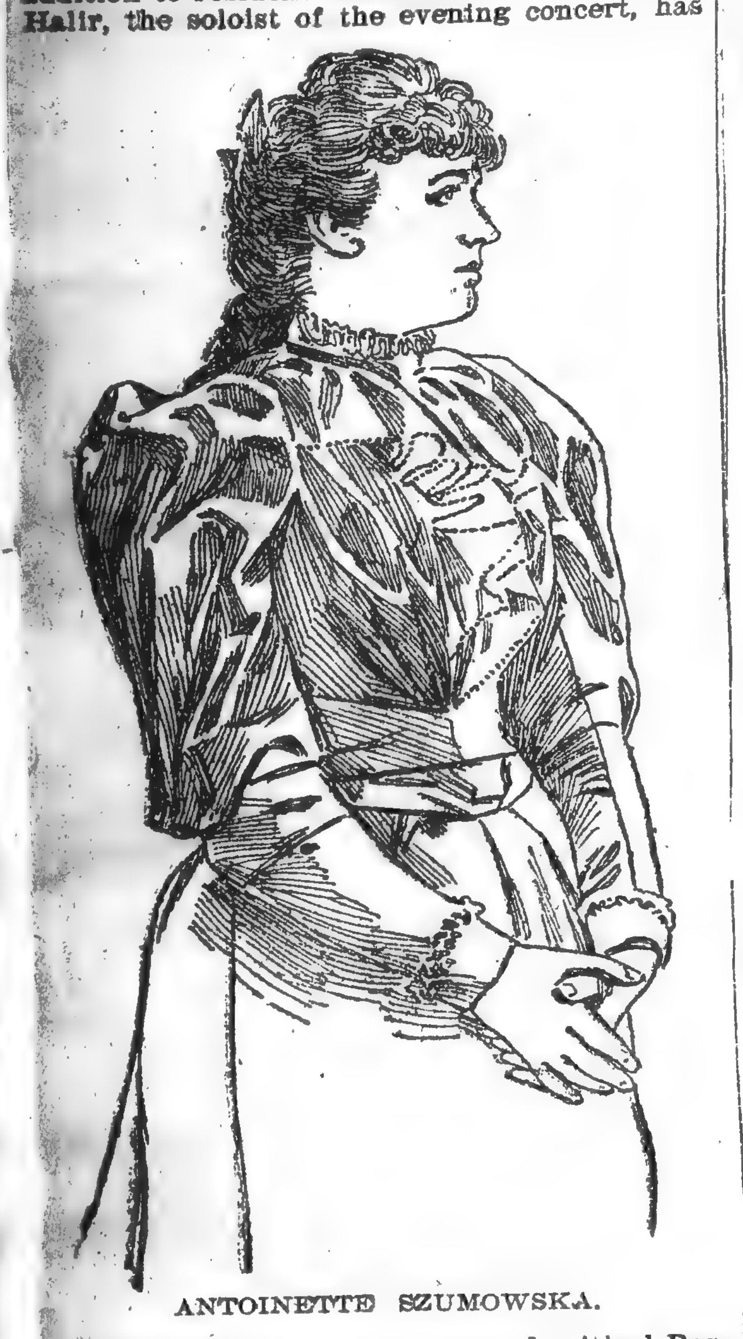
[59]

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SUNDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 6, 1896.

Two Fine Boston Symphony Programmes This Week, With Carl Halir, violinist, and Antoinette Szumowska, Pianist.

The chief event of the week musically will be the return of that greatest of orchestras, the Boston Symphony, for two concerts under the auspices of the Brooklyn institute. On Friday evening the second of a series of evening symphony concerts will be given with Carl Halir, a German violinist, who has recently come to America as a soloist. On Saturday afternoon the first of the series of orchestral matinees will be given with Antoinette Szumowska as the soloist. This is the concert for which Moriz Rosenthal, the astonishing pianist, was engaged, but his critical illness will prevent his apearing. The institute would hardly have better filled the place than by securing Mme. Szumokska. Charm has its place in piano playing no less than power and is capable of giving keener enjoyment, although it creates less sense of wonder. Mme. Szumowska has charm. It is the keynote of her playing. She is a pupil of Paderewski, the only one, it was said when she played in New York last year. At any rate she does not discredit her teacher. Since her last visit she has married Joseph Adamowski, the 'cellist, and may be counted a valuable addition to resident American musicians. Carl Halir, the soloist of the evening concert, has not been here long, but he turned critical Boston upside down the other night by his playing of the Beethoven concerto for violin which he will play. The reviewers fairly emptied their dictionaries of superlatives next day. The performance was characterized as "wonderfully beautiful for the dignity, the purity, taste and classic diginity of style that marked it at every point." Another critic, Louis C. Elson, said: "It was the true, classical, non sensational style of performance; it was Joachim's self that seemed to stand there in the person of his colleague. Altogether a most straightforward and musicianly presentation of the great concerto and a performance which was understood by the audience, for a great furor ensued both at the end of the first movement and at the completion of the work, which proved that Mr. Halir is given his true rank with the great violinists of the world, at least in Boston." It is to be hoped that all this is true, because it will take a great performance to redeem the dryness and dullness of parts of the Beethoven concerto. Of the programme but little need be said except to note that the Schubert symphony in C major, the one "of heavenly length," will be played on Friday evening, and that the seldom heard Mendelssohn symphony of Saturday afternoon suits admirably a programme which represents the gentler, more winning aspect of music. Here are the lists in full:



ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA.

Programme, Friday evening.

Overture—"Manfred" .... Schumann
Concerto for violin........................ Beethoven
Overture—"Carneval Romain".............. Berlioz
Symphony in C major, No. 9..............Schubert
Soloist, Mr. Carl Halir.

Matinee, Saturday, at 3.

Overture—"Sakuntala" .... Goldmark
Concerto for pianoforte in G minor, No. 2, op. 22 Saint Saens
Symphony in A major, No. 4 (Italian) Mendelssohn
Overture—"Gwendoline" .... Chabrier
(First time.)
Soloist, Mlle. Antoinette Szumowska.

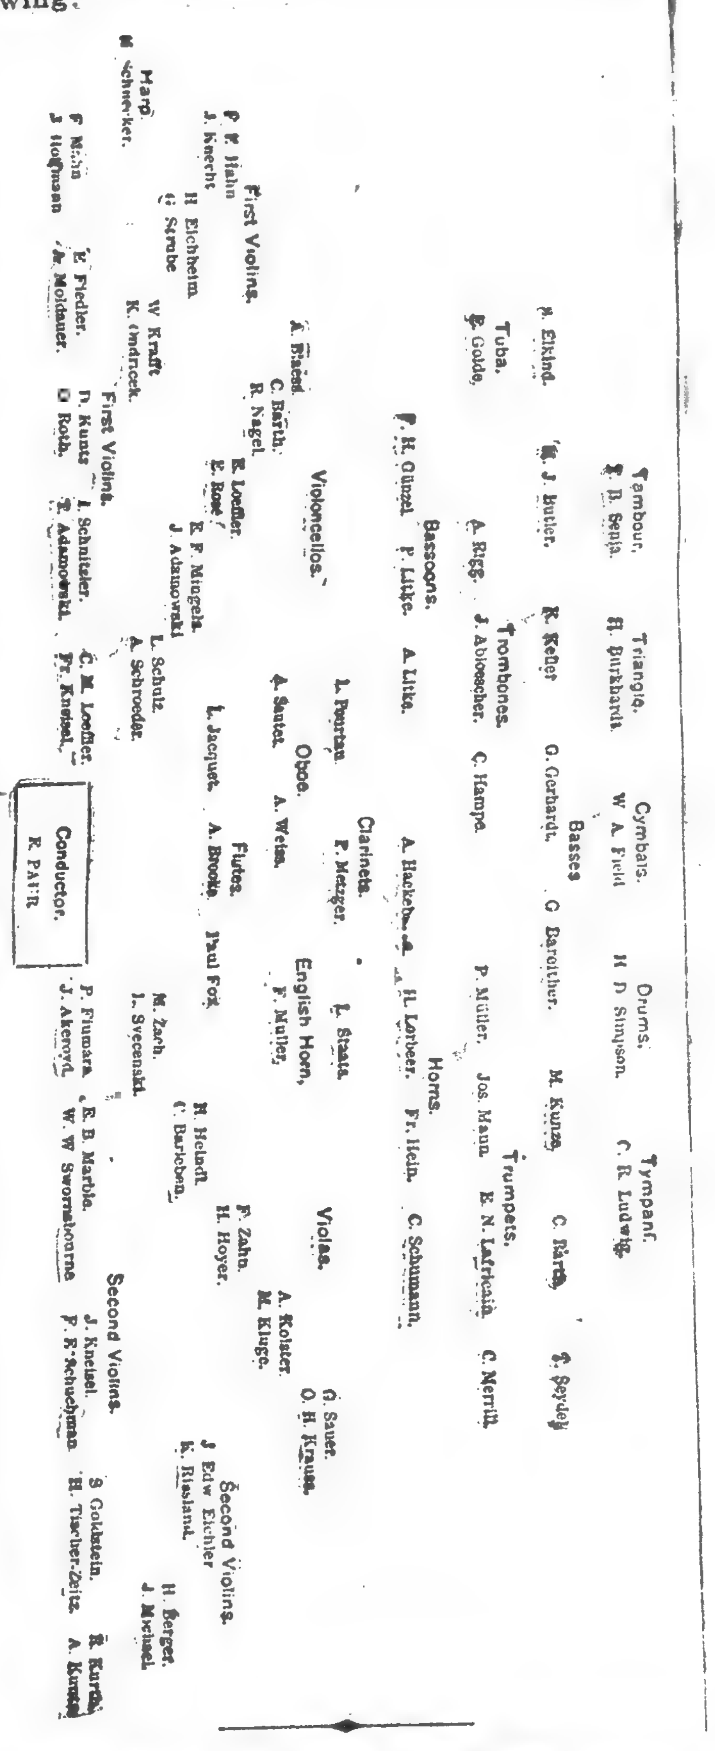
CONDUCTOR PAUR'S VIEWS

Concerning the Proper Seating of an Orchestra.

Emil Paur, now in his fourth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in an interview with an Eagle reporter, set forth his views on the seating of an orchestra, as follows:

"As the strings are acknowledged to be the fundamental basis of every orchestra, they should be so placed at the front and center of the stage as to be practically surrounded by the other instruments. As the flutes, clarinets, oboes and other wood wind instruments have a delicate tone, they should be grouped toward the front, between the first violins and violas, otherwise they will be easily overbalanced by the rest of the orchestra. Back of the wood wind instruments should come the brasses, and especial care should be taken to so place the French horns that the bell or opening of the instruments should be opposite and away from the other brass instruments. In th rear should come the double basses as the natural background of the orchestra. One fault in orchestral arrangement which cannot always be obviated, owing to [illegible] of the stage, is the undue elevation of the brass instruments, which gives them a too great prominence, in which event it is the especial function of the conductor to tone down these instruments to their proper ensemble effect. In considering in detail the subject of orchestral arrangement, due allowance should be made for the variable acoustics of different halls. Sometimes, though rarely, this difference is so marked as to necessitate a slight change in the seating of the orchestra, but in most cases the conductor maintains the same plan of arranging his forces."

The seating plan as carried out by the Boston Symphony orchestra is shown by the following:



The Press

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1896.

HALIR AT THE ACADEMY.

The Violinist Arouses Much Enthusiasm by His Magnificent Playing.

Another brilliant audience marked the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Academy of Music and was moved to great enthusiasm by the superb performance of Mr. Carl Halir, in Beethoven's concerts for the violin in D major. While Mr. Halir's playing was more or less the feature of the evening, the programme as a whole was an exceedingly effective one, opening with Schumann's picturesque overture to "Manfred" and concluding with Schubert's characteristic and beautiful symphony No. 9 in C major, and including, as it were, as an entrement of highly-spiced music Liszt's descriptive "Faust" music.

As the Symphony Orchestra ever interprets upon the highest level, the result was one of the best concerts Philadelphia has had given it by this great organization.

The masterful violin concerto of Beethoven, however, stands out as the chief memory of the evening, largely, of course, due to Mr. Halir's work, but the beauty of the orchestral rendering is not to be ignored. While possessing all the marks of Beethoven's greatness and some of his ruggedness, there are all through the concerto Mozart-like melodies and graces, and in the rondo the liveliness of Haydn. The solo parts for the violin are extremely difficult, even without Joachim's cadenzas, and yet this seems to be Mr. Halir's forte. From first phraze to final cadenza he rendered everything with the greatest poise, smoothness and utmost brilliancy, and in the more melodious passages, particularly the legende-like or ballad-like passages in the larghetto his playing had a delicacy and tenderness that was most delightful. Fortunately free from mannerisms, Mr. Halir easily ranks among the leading violinists of the day. He may not possess that deeper quality of insight that marked Ysaye's playing, his style verging more withal on the absoluteness of scholastic perfection, but although an artistic calmness, civil resoluteness and a straightforward manner are his characteristics, he has also the fire and such variety of temperament as made the concerto last night a thing of vital beauty. His tone in the tender passages was as pure as it was delicate, and in the broader movements it was large, firm and reserved, and yet in the rondo jocose and everywhere most graceful in phrasing. After the first movement with its flourishes and trills, and the Halir trill is the perfection of violin technique, there was much applause. This became an ovation after the exceedingly beautiful larghetto and the lively rondo had received so superb a reading, and the soloist was obliged to come out again and again.

After the intermission came Liszt's highly colored "Faust" music, which taxed the expression of the full orchestra. This Mr. Paur read with much verve, and then came Schubert's magnificent symphony. While magnificent as a whole, there is at times a wearisomeness, particularly in the second movement, which Mr. Paur's fine reading did not altogether remove. Still, the variety of effect and the color which the orchestra put into their performance made the symphony stand out, as it should, as one of the most interesting of compositions of this class.

Philadelphia Inquirer

TUESDAY - - - - - DECEMBER 8, 1896

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

First Appearance of a Great Violinist at the Academy Last Night.

The second concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Academy of Music last night to an audience that filled the auditorium. This was the program:

Robert Schumann, overture to "Manfred," Op. 115; Ludwig van Beethoven, concerto for violin, in D major, Op. 61, (Cadenzas by Josef Joachim); Franz Liszt, scene in the tavern (Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust;" Franz Schubert, Symphony No. 9, in C major; soloist, Mr. Carl Halir.

The Schuman overture to Byron's "Manfred," is by turns gloomy, passionate and tragic, and the composer has sought, by pathetic and constantly-modulating melody, to depict the turmoil, unrest and sorrow which filled the heart of the most striking of the poet's creations. Its rendition had a delightful individuality given to the varied themes, the theme for the violas and 'celli being rendered with a passion and verve that brought out all its beauties. There are also scattered through the work snatches of quaint instrumentation that are far beyond the conventional sonata form, and the orchestra seemed to grasp the composer's motive in the freest and most complete manner. The Liszt "Mephisto Waltz" pictures a scene in a village tavern, where a peasant wedding has taken place. Faust and Mephisto enter, and the latter taking a fiddle from one of the village musicians, plays a waltz tune, while all present dance. and he comments on love in a sardonic fashion. The introduction has a bright and rollicking atmosphere, and when the full orchestra breaks out into the maddening waltz strains, the effect is almost electrical. The piece served to illustrate the many-sided qualities of the orchestra and its aptitude for tone-painting of all kinds. Of the Schubert Symphony, which closed the program, criticisms have often been made on account of its great length, but it must be said that it exhibits wondrous fertility and imaginative power. The first movement is the most descriptive of the four, and there is a passage in it which has a peculiarly Scotch rhythm, and was delightfully given by the orchestra. Then again a semi-barbaric Moorish style seems to be dominant, and there is a strong reminder of that Beethoven fragment, the "Ruins of Athens." The orchestra appeared occasionally to lack animation in this work, and there was over-elaboration. The scherzo and the trio could have been bettered by less exaggeration of the tempo, but the tremendous climax, with which the symphony closes, was given with an effect that atoned for anything that was lacking elsewhere.

Much interest was felt in the appearance of Carl Halir, a violinist who was to make his first appearance in this city in the Beethoven concerto. He made an imposing figure when he stepped to the footlights, tall, massively built, swarthy as a Bohemian would be, and in movement as graceful as Sarasate. After the orchestra had played the first and second themes of the opening movement. the violin entered, and the first chords had scarcely been struck by the player when every one felt that there stood an artist pre-eminent. The simple themes were given a color as rich as that of an Oriental sunset; the fantasias were interpreted with the most marvelous freedom and spontaneityand embroidered with a figuration that was as delicate as gossamer. The bravura scale passages, the arpeggi and the ascending thrills had about them a wonderful delicacy and a melody that seemed to come from the very heart of a nightingale. The third movement is based on a peasant dance theme, and its mirth, its jollity and rustic abandon were thrown out by the player with a dash and impetuosity that set every nerve tingling. The refreshing animation of his playing, his emotional temperament and his power to depict everything that is tender, are qualities that mark him as a consummate artist. It must be said, too, that the orchestra helped to bring out the full beauties of the work. Nothing could have been more charming than the ritornella with which the first movement opens, the work of the tympani and then of the oboes, clarinets and bassoons. It was in the accompaniment to the concerto that the orchestra vindicated its claim to unapproachable excellence.

The New York Press

DAILY EDITION.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1896.

HALIR'S FRESH LAURELS

Violinist's Second Appearance More Successful Than His First.

Carl Halir, the violinist, made a second triumph here last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Metropolitan Opera House. He was heard to better advantage than he was at his first appearance here, and aroused storms of applause by his dazzling technique. He chose Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin, No. 2, in D major, and stupefied the audience by overcoming its almost innumerable difficulties as if it were mere child's play.

As was said in this paper on last Sunday, his playing appeals more to the head than to the heart. He bewilders; he handles the violin as Rosenthal does the piano—as if he knew not the meaning of difficulties. He is not lacking in feeling, by any means, but his technical ability and facility overshadow everything else about his playing.

The orchestra's programme comprised Berlioz's "Roman Carnival Overture," Liszt's tone-picture, "Scene in the Tavern" (mephisto waltz), from Lenau's "Faust" and Schumann's great symphony in C major.

GER
ELPHIA
DECEM R 8, 1896.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra—Halir—

Mr. Paur used mighty names to conjure with when he directed last evening's Boston Symphony Concert in the Academy of Music—no less names, in fact, than those of Beethoven, Schumann, Liszt and Schubert—but as if to show that he was not insensible to the claims of living musicians he introduced to Philadelphia Herr Carl Halir, a German violinist, who comes here with the prestige naturally accruing to a colleague and former pupil of Joachim. It was, to be sure, an ambitious night, and one well worthy of the fine audience, as the following programme will show:

Schumann...Overture to "Manfred," Op. 115
Beethoven...Concerto for Violin in D major, Op. 61.
(Cadenzas by Josef Joachim.)
Liszt...Scene in the Tavern ("Mephisto" Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust."
Schubert............Symphony No. 9, in C major

As the element of novelty always has claim to first consideration, even in so abstruse a thing as a symphony concert, it may be said at once that Carl Halir proved himself a violinist of distinction. His appearance, as he first stepped upon the stage, had about it none of the marks which are supposed to characterize (with the accent on the supposed) the professional wielder of the bow. There were no flowing locks, no airy negligé or no careful carelessness; on the contrary, the newcomer looked like nothing so much as a prosperous Teutonic merchant. When he attacked the allegro in the Beethoven concerto, however, it became quickly in evidence that Herr Halir was something more than this—that he was, in fact, a performer of attainment, with admirable bowing, fine tone and a polished execution. This impression was strengthened as he glided easily and gracefully over the many difficulties that hedge in this remarkable example of Beethoven's genius (difficulties which would appall the average violinist), and when he had finished and bowed his acknowledgments repeatedly to the applauding audience there was every reason to declare that Halir had the real artistic temperament. It must not be inferred from this that his playing approached the ideal, but of its finish, facility and refinement of expression not the slightest doubt remained. Here and there one missed an indefinable something in the performance (was it a little more vigor that was wanted, or a more distinct individuality?), but for all that his achievement was one of interest and brilliancy—and any musician will understand how much that means in connection with the Beethoven concerto. Herr Halir did not give an encore piece, although the house hinted strongly for one, and it would be unfair to make any attempt to define his exact rank among his brethren. This much at least seems certain: he is a violinist of authority rather than one of greatness, and while not likely to efface memories of a Sarasate or an Ysaye, he is an adept in his own graceful sphere. And when it comes to that, let it be remembered that Sarasates and Ysayes do not grow on the high roads and by-roads, to be plucked at by every concert goer.

The orchestra was, as usual, admirably responsive to the requirements of the programme, and under Mr. Paur's virile direction gave worthy presentation to Schumann's "Manfred" overture and the "Mephisto" waltz of Liszt. The last number was the marvellous C major symphony of Schubert, a work which would have sufficed to send the fame of the composer rolling down the ages had he never written another line of music. Schumann called it a "heavenly, long-drawn out symphony" which should never end, and described it enthusiastically as possessing "more than mere melody," and "something above sorrow and joy." "In listening to symphonies like this," he went on to say, "we are transported to a region where we never remember to have been before. Here we have, besides masterly power over the musical technicality of composition, life in all its phases, color in exquisite gradations, the minutest accuracy and fitness of expression, and permeating the whole work a spirit of romance such as we recognize in other works of Franz Schubert."

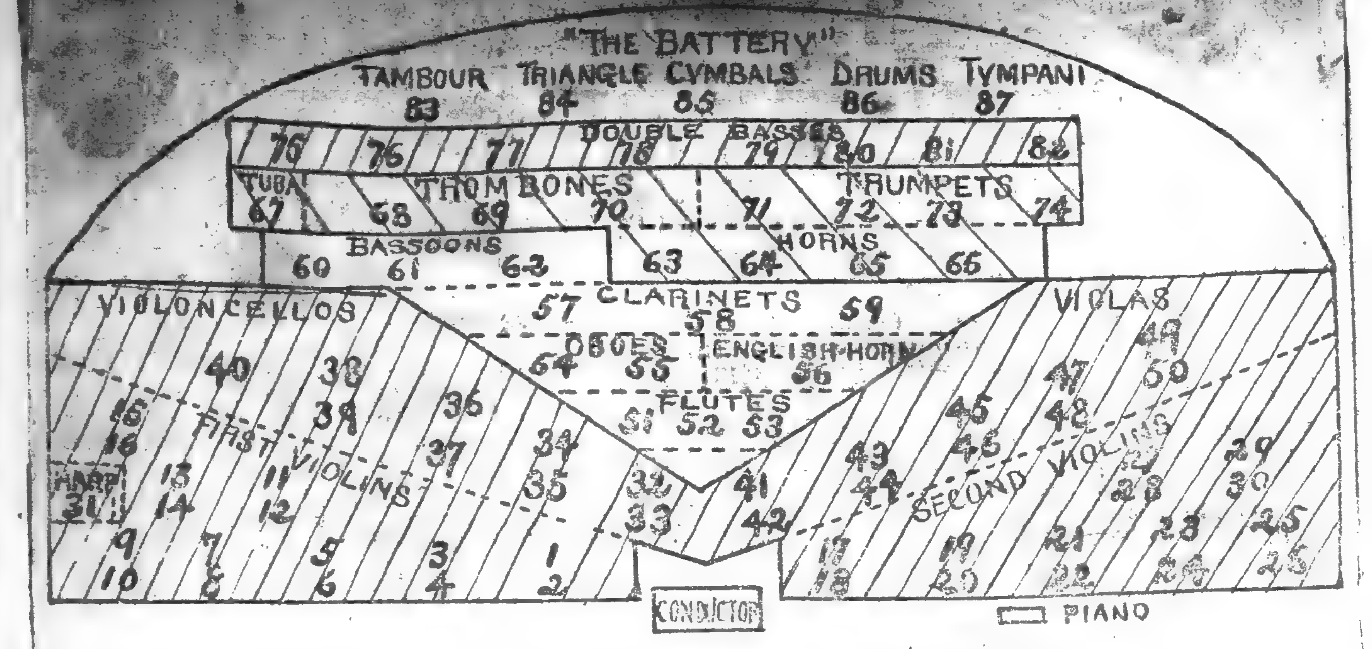
It is a curious fact that when Schubert turned over the score of this symphony to the Musik-Verein of Vienna the difficulties involved in its proper presentation seemed so great that the society in question did not venture to give it a public hearing until after the composer's death. It was first withdrawn, indeed, at Schubert's own request. A bit of history like this calls fresh attention to the ambitious scope of the work, and indirectly bears eloquent testimony to the fine efficiency of the orchestra which gave it such noble production last evening. For a noble revival it proved in every sense of the word, and there was liberal opportunity for even the uncritical ear to detect the many beauties of the symphony—its wonderful breadth of treatment, its poetic suggestiveness, and, above all, its humanity—for it is the latter quality that constitutes the real depth of the great C major. Had the performance come earlier in the evening, the symphony might have been enjoyed with even keener zest than it was, but all who stayed until its end were amply rewarded.

" " "
THE AMERICAN HEBREW of Dec 11/96

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Metropolitan Opera House on Thursday evening, with Mr. Carl Halir as soloist. The programme was as follows: Overture Carneval Romain, Berlioz; Concerto for Violin, Tschaikowky; Mephisto Waltz, Liszt; Symphony in C Major No. 2, Schumann. The selections were well performed as is usual with this excellent orchestra, and the music lovers who were on hand to applaud him, may once more thank Mr. Paur.

PHILADELPH[illegible] [illegible]EMBER 6.

HOW AN ORCHESTRA IS SEATED.



In this schematic diagram of the seating plan of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the various choirs are separated by heavy lines and indicated by shading, the lines slanting from right to left marking the "strings," the "wood wind" being left clear and the "brasses" marked by lines slant[illegible] from left to right. This printed plan is a little more rigid than the actual seating, as the performers are arranged somewhat along curved lines on the Academy stage, but there should be no trouble in identifying the various sections by the aid of the diagram. The orchestra is composed of the following musicians: CONDUCTOR, EMIL PAUR. FIRST VIOLINS, 1, C. M. Loeffler; 2, Franz Kneisel; 3, I. Schnitzler; 4, Timothy Adamowski; 5, D. Kuntz; 6, O. Roth; 7, F. Fiedler; 8, O. Moldauer; 9, F. Mahn; 10, J. Hoffman; 11, W. Kraft; 12, K. Ondricek; 13, H. Eichheim; 14, G. Strube; 15, F. E. Hahn; 16, J. Knecht. SECOND VIOLINS, 17, P. Fiumara; 18, J. Akeroyd; 19, E. B. Marble; 20, W. W. Swornsbourne; 21, J. Kneisel; 22, F. E. Schuman; 23, S. Goldstein; 24, H. Tischer-Zeitz; 25, R. Kurth; 26, A. Kuntz; 27, J. Edward Eichler; 28, K. Rissland; 29, H. Berger; 30, J. Michael. VIOLONCELLOS, 32, L. Schulz; 33, Alwin Schroeder; 34, E. F. Mingels; 35, J. Adamowski; 36, E. Loeffler; 37, E. Rose, 38, C. Barth; 39, R. Nagel; 40, A. Blaess. VIOLS, 21, M. Zach; 42, L. Svecenski; 43 H. Heindl; 44, C. Barleben; 45, F. Zahn; 46, H. Hoyer; 47, A. Kolster; 48, M. Kluge; 49, G. Sauer; 50, O. H. Krauss. FLUTES, 51, L. Jacquet; 52, A. Brooke; 53, Paul Fox. OBOES, 54, A. Sautet; 55, A. Weiss. ENGLISH HORN, 56, F. Muller. CLARINETS, 57, L. Portau; 58, P. Metzger; 59, L. Staats. BASSOONS, 60, I. H. Gunzel; 61, P. Litke; 62, A. Litke. HORNS, 63, A. Hackebarth; 64, H. Lorbeer; 65, Fr. Hein; 66, C. Schumann. TUBA, 67, E. Golde. TROMBONES, 68, A. Rigg; 69, J. Abloescher; 70, C. Hampe. TRUMPETS, 71, P. Müller; 72, Joseph Mann; 73, E. N. Lafricain; 74, C. Merrill. DOUBLE BASSES, 75, S. Elkind; 76, H. J. Butler; 77, K. Keller; 78, G. Gerhardt; 79, G. Bareither; 80, M. Kunze; 81, C. Barth; 82, T. Seydel. "THE BATTERY," 83 tambour, T. B. Senia; 84, triangle, H. Burkhardt; 85, cymbals, W. A. Field; 86, drums, H. D. Simpson; 87, tympani, C. R. Ludwig. The harp, 31, H. Schuecker. Summary, string, 58 instruments; wood wind, 12 instruments; brasses, 12 instruments; the battery, 5 performers.

The Symphony Concert.

To-morrow evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its second concert, presenting the following programme, with the noted violinist, Carl Halir, as the soloist: Robert Schumann, overture to "Manfred," Op. 115; Ludwig van Beethoven, concerto for violin, in D major, Op. 61; Franz Liszt, scene in tavern ("Mephisto Waltz"), from Lenau's "Faust;" Franz Schubert, Symphony No. 9, in C major. Owing to the interest that is taken in all orchestral music this year in Philadelphia, "The Press" prints a diagram of the seating plan of the orchestra, which will enable any one to identify the instrumental choirs and the individual performers with ease. It is interesting to watch how the various choirs voice the music and how composer and conductor play on the orchestra as if it were a great solo instrument, as it really is, and the greatest instrument the art of music has evolved. There is an art in its handling that can only be appreciated when the arrangement and the handling of the choirs are fully understood.

As has been well said of a great orchestra by Mr. Krehbiel, "Its range of expression is almost infinite. It can strike like a thunderbolt, or murmur like a zephyr. Its voices are multitudinous. Its register is coextensive with the theory of the modern piano-forte, reaching from the space immediately below the sixth added line under the bass staff to the ninth added line above the treble staff. These two extremes, which belong respectively to the bass tuba and piccolo-flute, are not at the command of every player, but they mark the boundaries of the orchestra in respect to pitch. The gravest note is almost as deep as any in which the ordinary human ear can detect pitch, and the acutest reaches the same extremity in the opposite direction." Of course, the "strings," violins, violas and double basses, these latter placed in the rear, make up the body and soul of the orchestra and represent two-thirds of its instrumental strength. The "wood-wind"—oboes, clarinets, English horn and bassoons, and the "brasses," horns, trombones, trumpets and tuba, complete the instruments of tune, the instruments of percussion, that mark rhythm and add noise, "the battery," being composed of tambour, triangle, cymbals, drums and tympani.

As to the seating arrangement of an orchestra, Paur, Thomas and Seidl differ but little. Paur and Thomas place the violas next to the second violins, while Seidl believes the violas gain in sonority if they are put behind the first violins, as then the F-holes of the instruments are turned toward the listeners. Mr. Paur, in speaking of the Boston Symphony arrangement, said to the musical editor of "The Press:" "The 'strings,' as the fundamental basis of every orchestra, should be so placed at the front and center of the stage so as to be practically surrounded by the other instruments. As the 'wood-wind' instruments have a delicate tone, they should be grouped toward the front, between the first violins and violas, otherwise they will be easily overbalanced by the rest of the orchestra. Back of the 'wood-wind' instruments should come the brasses, and especial care should be taken to so place the French horns that the bell or opening of the instruments should be opposite and away from the other brass instruments. In the rear should come the double basses as the natural background of the orchestra. One fault in orchestral arrangement which cannot always be obviated, owing to the construction of the stage, is the undue elevation of the brass instruments, which gives them a too great prominence, in which event it is the especial function of the conductor to tone down these instruments to their proper ensemble effect."

THE PHILADELPHIA RECORD, TUESDAY
DECEMBER 8, 1896

Carl Halir and the Boston Symphony Concert.

The feature of the second Boston Symphony concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening was the Philadelphia debut of Herr Carl Halir, Josef Joachim's most distinguished pupil on the violin and one worthy to stand at that illustrious German violinist's elbow. Most fittingly he played last night Beethoven's immortal concerto, with Joachim's cadenzas, and he interpreted the long and arduous number in the best spirit of his master. Herr Halir is one of the greatest classical violinists who has ever visited this city. Of kingly stature, his command of the bow is equally royal. His tones are pure and rich, and his trill beautiful. Nor, save for the sliding down the strings, is he afflicted with any of the showy tricks of the virtuoso. Armed with Joachim's famous "Red Strad," his bow threaded the intricate embroideries with a consummate skill, a real brilliancy of technique. As for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its thorough instrumental organization was emphatically revealed in its masterly rendition of Schubert's great Symphony in C major. The horns and the 'celli did splendid work, while the strings carried off the curious triplet finale in powerful style. The strange figures presented by 'cellists and violinists in struggling with these galloping figures made one sympathize in a degree with that merriment of Mendelssohn's orchestra which once brought the Symphony to grief. In regard to the unusual use of the trombones in this "Symphony for the Winds," although Schubert himself is said to have been worried about it, his mind would no doubt have been at peace had he lived to hear this peculiarly individual and exquisitely poetical master work. Herr Paur, who is frequently over-fantastic in his symphonic interpretations, caught the true color of this symphonic fantasie. In view of the approaching centennial celebration of the anniversary of Schubert's birth (in January next) the choice of this selection was highly appropriate.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1896.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

A Fine Performance by the Well-Drilled, Skilful Band.

The first brisk phrase, so promptly attacked and so neatly done, which came from the violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra dashed upon the ear with the invigorating sharpness of a gust of strong west wind or a splash of salt sea spray upon the face. Their concert began with Berlioz's sparkling overture, "Roman Carnival," which was followed by Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin in D major, after which came another number of extraordinary brilliancy, Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" from Lenau's "Faust," and as a second part of the programme was then given Schumann's Symphony in C major.

This, it will be seen, is a scheme in which the purely romantic and the ultra-brilliant are combined in equal measure. In all else but the symphony these qualities are evenly balanced in Schumann's great work—perhaps the weight predominates on the side of pensive sentiment. In general, however, the concert presented a most stimulating and enlivening effect, for, as their manner is, these skilful, well-drilled Bostonians improved every opportunity for making astounding presto scales in unison, startling climaxes, and every other sort of difficult execution that a virtuoso orchestra could possibly accomplish. The greatest wonder lay not perhaps either in display of mere technical cleverness, but in tasteful phrasing and the finesse of expression, such as must be given to that exquisitely beautiful bit in the slow movement of Schumann's symphony, where is found one of the most perfect examples of the trill as an element of beauty.

Herr Halir played Tschaikowsky's concerto with great precision and ability certainly, but with a minimum of imagination brought to its coloring, and in some sort narrowly therefore. His playing is like a low-studded room—one longs for arches and space and atmosphere when listening to it.

The [illegible]

FRIDAY, DEC[illegible], 1896.

NEW YORK.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

BRILLIANCY WAS THE KEYNOTE.

Metropolitan Opera House Filled by the Strains of Boston's Famous Orchestra.

Brilliancy was the keynote of the scheme of last evening's music, made at the Metropolitan Opera House by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme contained the names of Berlioz, Tschaikowsky, Liszt and Schumann, and to this very modern list was added Bach, the familiar gavotte in E being given as a recall number by the solo performer of the concert, Mr. Carl Halir.

The evening very aptly began with Berlioz's overture, "Carnival Romain," with its swirling saltarello and high-pitched, giddy excitement. The violin concerto by Tschaikowsky has been heard here before, and it has received more amiable and enthusiastic treatment than last night. Mr. Halir, who looks like an untamed Calmuck, nevertheless plays as befits a professor of bearded dignity and girth. His tone is absolutely devoid of sensuous quality, and in the half savage, Slavic, blood-stirring last movement of the concerto he only fiddled—just fiddled. It was very clean, careful and conscientious fiddling, but without a spark of temperament to fire the fuse and blow us all into dynamic ecstasy.

The work is very difficult, very ungrateful, and Halir tore up from the very roots the formidable octaves, double sixths and thirds, but it was all unlovely, uninspiring. The Bach encore he gave with earnestness, and I even caught a hint of a rubato. I know Halir and rubato are not at first thinkable, and it was all the more singular and creditable that his academic rigidity should relax in Bach. He was warmly received.

One of the most brilliant tone pictures Franz Liszt ever painted is his Mephisto Walzer. Better even than Berlioz and his famous "Ride to Hell in the Damnation of Faust," more satanic than Boito's "Iam the spirit that denies," infinitely superior to Gounod's well-fed, well-bred devil, is this devil in Lenau's "Faust," which Liszt has limned for us. Such a cynical, corrodingly evil, subtile fiend is it, and he lures you with the most lascivious valse in the world. Never have the accents of an infernal voluptuous passion been so sung—not even by Wagner in "Tristan and Isolde"! The second theme of this valse—A flat—is a carressing, syncopated sigh that makes thick the blood and blind the judgment. It is swooning, dangerous music, and even in the working out section the cleverness of Liszt's counterpoint does not obtrude itself or damage the integrity of the mood picture. It is fascinating music, and its decorative scheme courts comparison with Berlioz or Liszt. It was exquisitely played.

Schumann's symphony in C closed the evening. It was played as only it could be played by this orchestra. The scherzo, with its brace of trios, an uncomfortable nut for the theorists to crack, was delightfully given. The strings, those mellow marvels, the strings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra never sounded so luscious, so intense, as in the cantabile of the adagio. Superlatives were in order. Mr. Paur conducted, and when you closed your eyes it was all right, but when you opened them you saw Mr. Paur, and he is ever an unresolved modulation on legs, a suspension in a spiked coat. He attracts too much attention, but we forgive him. Is he not at the head of the best band in the land? It is a band of which we are never tempted to sing, after the bony manner of George Eliot, "O may I join the choir invisible." We have a visible angelic choir at these concerts—long may it continue to make music in New York!

J. H.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1896.

HERR CARL HALIR WAS THE SOLOIST.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Second Concert of Its Season at the Metropolitan.

Carl Halir was the soloist at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening. He chose as his number on this occasion a work of the modern school, Tschaikowsky's Second Violin Concerto, in D minor, but, for some reason or other, his playing of it was strikingly wanting in inspiration, freedom and breadth, with the possible exception of his work toward the close of the finale, which is a spirited movement of a distinctly Russian character. As a rule, however, Herr Halir played with an evident restraint that conveyed the impression to the hearer that he did not feel happy in his selection or en rapport with his audience. His tone was diminished and frequently untrue, all of which was the more disappointing after the finished and thoroughly satisfying style in which he played at Mr. Damrosch's Symphony concert on Friday and Saturday.

As an encore he gave the well known Bach gavotte without accompaniment, which would have sounded better if he had played it at his former appearance. The audience, however, was quite cordial in its applause.

The orchestral numbers—Berlioz's vividly picturesque "Roman Carnival," Liszt's furiously, diabolically, frolicsome "Mephisto Waltz" and Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C major—were rendered with all that artistic appreciation of the several composers' ideas for which this peerless band of musicians is famous. The dynamic effects, the light and shade, in the Berlioz and Liszt works were superb.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 12, 1896.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Orchestra Appears Again at the Academy of Music—Carl Halir as a Soloist.

Last night the second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at the Academy of Music. The attendance, in spite of the nearness of the holidays, was large, though a few vacant seats were to be seen here and there, and the listeners expressed their approval of the music with emphasis. No effort was made to beautify the stage or relieve the glare and bareness of it; yet the time must be when the sister arts will lend their charm to music and concert halls will be agreeable and comfortable, especially when the manager and patron of the concerts is an institute of science and arts. The orchestra was two or three men short, perhaps by reason of illness, perhaps because there were no Wagner numbers to require the full strength of the orchestra, but the organization was in fine shape, and Mr. Paur was in his customary good spirits. The leader showed again last night his aptitude as a Schumann leader, for he gave a splendid reading of the "Manfred" overture, as he had of the "Genoveva" overture at the prior concert. Now, let us have a little more of Schumann in these Brooklyn concerts. There has been quite too little of him of late, and too much of the late impressionistic school, or of the academic school that went a century before it. Schumann is in some respects the greatest of composers, and his "Manfred" is one of the most dramatic of his works. Mr. Paur has the true spirit of it; his interpretation was broad and forcible, yet sufficient in its feeling and delicacy; it was Byronic in the grandeur of its tragedy; it suggested those tremendous heights of rock and ice in which the incidents of the poem are laid; the horns seemed to call bleakly across far and lonesome peaks, and the listener felt the same absoluteness of abandon to the spirit of the scene as if he stood in truth in presence of the awful Alps. If Mr. Paur will give us the Schumann symphonies he will do a favor for the music lovers of the city, for he has proved his entire competence to do so.

It was a different sort of music and a different inspiring spirit that was heard in the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, although the intention of that composer was more serious than it has until recently had credit for being. We begin to know that his bizarrerie was individual, not assumed, and there are moments in his work of great dignity and power. In this overture are discovered an immense deal of spirit, an abounding gaiety and picturesqueness, a sense of multitude, and often a beauty of air that contrasts oddly enough with the awkward melodic inventions so common to this writer. The tarentelle goes at a tremendous pace, and, indeed, suggests the frenzy of one who is dancing the poison out of a tarantula bite. The symphony of the night was that of "heavenly length," the C major of Schubert—only one of the completed nine that is ever played. Is it possible that not a single movement in all the others is worthy of a hearing? In this, Mr. Paur and his band exhibited sympathy and understanding, though there were moments when the tone was coarse, and there were some novelties in the reading, especially in the suppression of the basses.

Carl Halir was solo performer. With such an orchestra and with such a literature of orchestral works to draw upon, the soloist is always more or less of an intruder, but the gallery has to be pacified with this recitation on a single instrument. It is easier to see how music is made by watching one person play or sing it than to follow the compexities of the great orchestra. Though the long D major concerto of Beethoven that Mr. Halir played is one of the three or four good concertos, it is not good when compared with the symphonies of the same author, nor as well worth listening to. As in all such cases the music it sacrificed at odd times to the musician, that he may be enabled to exhibit his cleverness; so it comes about that in all concertos there are barren and worthless moments when the performer is running scales up and down and playing turns and trills, and it is this artistic gingerbread that the gallery gulps down with the heartiest appetite. The cadenza of fifty bars or so, that Joachim tacked on to this piece and that bear the same relation to it that Colley Cibber's improvements do to Shakspeare, was rattled off in easy fashion and delighted those who like such things. Mr. Halir is, however, a fine player and a conscientious artist; so conscientious that he probably thought the Joachim flubdub a real part of the concerto, and therefore needful to be played. He has a fine, silver tone, bows freely, is extremely vivacious in his fingers, yet he subordinates his technic, so far as the piece requires, to the composer's meaning, so that his results are musical. In the larghetto, the only part of the concerto that has repose, the intonation was of much beauty and was free from the little burr so often heard in string playing. Mr. Halir was nervous when he appeared in New York, but not when he appeared in Brooklyn. He does not appear like one of the nervous kind, for he has the frame of an artilleryman and the head of a Hercules. The orchestra is to appear at the Academy again this afternoon in another bill. Its next visit will be in the latter part of January.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Next Wednesday the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at the Music Hall. The programme is the same that is to be given in New York on the following evening and includes: Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; concerts for violin, Tscharkowsky; "Scene in the Tavern," (Mephisto waltz,) from Lenau's "Faust," Liszt; symphony No. 2, in C major, Schuman. Tscharkowsky's compositions have met with such great approval in musical circles that it will be a specially welcome announcement to the admirers of this brilliant composer that his concerto for violin is to be played by Mr. Carl Halir, the soloist. Mr. Halir is regarded as the legitimate successor to Joachim, to whose position as the leading violin teacher at the Berlin Conservatory he has practically succeeded.

EVENING, DECEMBER 11, 1896.

THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Second Concert—Herr Carl Halir's Playing.

It is related of Hector Berlioz that he was so painfully appreciative of the beauty and significance of music that it nearly exhausted him even to listen to long symphonies, and that it cost him a tremendous expenditure of energy to follow his favorite operas. Nevertheless, there are few instances in his own compositions where he penetrates deeper than through the mere externals of his subjects. With a keen sense of what is obvious or decorative, or even characteristic in the outer form and manner of what he selects for musical exploitation, he generally misses its essence. So that one must look for brilliancy rather than depth, for the husk but not the kernel, in most of his works. For this reason one finds Berlioz in his most favorable light in such a composition as his "Roman Carnival" overture in A major, which began the programme of the Boston Symphony concert last night at the Metropolitan Opera House. The overture was written to be played before the second act of his opera "Benvenuto Cellini," and its chief theme is that of the "Saltarello," the dance dear to the hearts of the Italians. The lithe, quick, nervous energy of the Carnival spirit, with its alternations of languor, has been caught by the Frenchman in all its phases. The glow of torches, the crowds in the streets, the reckless gayety of the occasion, waked responsive appreciation in the heart of a man like Berlioz, and he made his overture fairly writhe with expressive recognition. The bizarre, the unpremeditated and the ingenious are emphasized in the work. Mr. Emil Paur and his men played it with skill and nerve. Another number of somewhat similar intent, though with deeper and less genial meaning, was played last night, Mr. Paur having chosen to perform the Liszt "Tavern Scene" from Lenau's "Faust." The less healthy tone of the Liszt work was made duly prominent, and the orchestra played the piece with strong effect.

The more weighty portion of the evening's entertainment was furnished by the Tschaikowsky violin concerto, No. 2, in D major, opus 35, and by Schumann's Second Symphony, in C major. Herr Carl Halir was the soloist in the first of these works, and gave his hearers more reason to applaud him than when he played at last week's Symphony concerts. Herr Halir is always reliable, and, barring one or two slight lapses in attacking high notes, his work was nearly what one would have had it. His tone was smooth, rich and full, and his phrasing admirable. The breath of life was the only thing lacking, and although during a good deal of the time there was something which by analogy might be termed artificial respiration, those who sought for any intense or vigorous exposition of what the Russian composer intended, were disappointed. The orchestra entered to a good degree into the Slavic spirit of the concerto, especially in the last movement.

It was reserved for Mr. Paur and his forces to distinguish themselves in the Schumann symphony. The romantic originality and fervor in which the work is steeped, and the wholesome, virile quality that Schumann's music possesses, were as color and atmosphere which Mr. Paur had closely under his control, and which he applied to his tone picture with discretion and nicety of judgment. His orchestra was with him, to a man, and the result was worthy of high praise. It is one of the best things Mr. Paur has done here.

The soloists at the remaining concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city will be Mme. Melba, Mme. Teresa Carreno, the pianist, and Mr. Ben Davies, tenor.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1896.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert for the season at the Metropolitan Opera House last night. Mr. Paur, the conductor, made no effort to compel public attention by novelty in any form. All the music had been heard repeatedly, and the solo performer, Herr Halir, was as familiar to the public as could possibly have been expected in the case of a foreign artist who has been less than two months in the country. He had been heard twice before at concerts of the Philharmonic Society, twice at meetings of the Symphony Society and once at a private concert of the Arion Club. He played Tschaikowsky's violin concerto, which we know from the sympathetic performances of Mr. Brodsky (whom Herr Halir strongly resembles physically and in some respects also artistically), and again won the admiration of his listeners by a reposefulness of manner and completeness of execution which proclaimed the master of his art. A gathering before which any musician might have played with pride rewarded him with a recall, and to satisfy an obviously honest desire for more he played the familiar gavotte from Bach's solo sonata in E major.

The orchestra's numbers were the overture "Carnaval Romain," by Berlioz; the "Mephisto Waltz," by Liszt, and Schumann's symphony in C major; and they were all played with a fine virtuosity, paired with equally fine musical feeling.

[illegible] 8, 1896.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Second Concert Last Night.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the accustomed direction of Mr. Emil Paur, gave its second concert for the season at the Academy of Music last night before the usual crowded and brilliant audience. Only four numbers appeared on the programme, and two of them—the "Manfred" overture of Schumann and Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz—were not especially attractive, but for all that the concert was such a feast of musical delight as no one need expect or desire to hear surpassed. It was so because the selections included Beethoven's great concerto for the violin and Schubert's glorious symphony in C major, No. 9, and because both compositions, than which there is nothing finer in the entire range of instrumental music, were interpreted in a manner than which it is impossible to conceive of anything finer.

Mr. Carl Halir, who played the concerto, did so with an easy mastery of its difficulties, and an appreciative apprehension of its meaning, which rendered his interpretation of it extraordinarily eloquent and impressive. He is a violinist of commanding authority and manifest distinction, with a self-assured, self-contained calmness and nobility of style which recalls the playing of Joseph Joachim as the writer remembers it twenty-five years ago. His command of the technique of the violin is absolute, and as he renders them, the most difficult passages seem easy. Thus his execution of the almost impracticable cadenza at the close of the first movement, with its double-stopping, rapid staccato bowing, and scale passages, as it seemed in every shift at once was a prodigious exhibition of virtuosity; but it was done with such an appearance of facility, with such an absence of the smallest suggestion of effort, that probably only the violinists in the audience had any adequate idea of what it meant.

Every one, however, could appreciate and enjoy the beauty of tone, the absolute accuracy of intonation, the brilliancy of bowing and the unfailingly artistic taste with which the concerto in its entirety was performed, and the hearty applause at its conclusion bespoke the general pleasure. Carl Halir is certainly a great violinist and a true artist. The orchestra part of the concerto was also played most exquisitely, with a due subordination to the soloist at the proper times, and a most effective self-assertion when the score required it.

The concert closed with a most superb performance of Schubert's lovely symphony in C major, a truly inspired composition, with a wealth of melody in it, which, as one listens, is a constant source of wonder, admiration and delight. The critics complain that it is not in strict form, and there are some who say that it is too long, and needs condensation. As it was played last night, any one who could say of it that it was too long, can have no music in his soul, while as to its defects of form, that may be left to the pedants to discuss.

Such as it is, the symphony is a creation of the rarest genius, and to hear it played as the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it last night is a pleasure and a privilege never to be forgotten. Mr. Paur has never done anything better.

The Times

TWELVE PAGES

PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 8, 1896.

Academy of Music.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was of more than common excellence. The chief works on the programme were the Beethoven violin concerto in D major, with Carl Halir as soloist, and Schubert's great C major symphony, together with the "Manfred" overture, which Mr. Paur did not make unusually interesting, and one of Liszt's programme scenes from "Faust," with the Mephisto waltz. The symphony was superbly played, not only with exactness and brilliancy of execution but with richness of color and a spirit and fervor and poetic appreciation that Mr. Paur has not often so finely displayed. This work alone, so fluent and free and brimful of spontaneous melody, and yet so sane and clear in ideas and development, was enough to make the concert notable. Of the beauty of the Beethoven concerto nothing need be said. Mr. Halir is the latest and the finest exponent we have had of the modern German violin school, with a method of the most exquisite refinement and purity, so smooth and dainty, yet so even and true, that it conveys the sense of absolute certainty and ease. At the same time the tone is small and rather hard and any suggestion of passion is extinguished, along with any intrusion of personal temperament. It is simply flawless execution. Whether this is the whole end of violin-playing need not be considered. What Mr. Halir has is of a value too extraordinary to make it necessary to discuss what he has not. He played the Joachim cadenzas. They are not beautiful, but they are difficult to the verge of impossibility, and he played them with as firm and light a touch and as perfect clarity as though they were the simplest exercises. And the orchestra played its great part in the concerto beautifully.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, DEC. 11, 18

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Second Concert of Its Season at the Metropolitan Opera House.

It is not necessary at this late day to say that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always welcome in New York. It is quite as much liked by the musical public here as it is at home, but because of our opera and our other musical attractions it does not fill so important a want in the aesthetic life of this community as in that of Boston. Of course, that must be the reason why the Metropolitan Opera House is not packed at every concert of this organization. It ought to be, no matter whether the personality and methods of the conductor, Emil Paur, are liked or not. The playing of the orchestra is always worth hearing, even when it is carrying out a conception that lacks elegance or grace.

Last night the most important work of the orchestra, in the second concert of its current season, was the performance of Schumann's symphony in C major. The composition wears like a work of genius, and its purely musical beauties make a strong impression upon even those who have not sufficiently acquainted themselves with Schumann's romantic ideals, his methods of self-expression, and the bearing of his personal history upon his compositions to appreciate its emotional content. It is true that this ought to be so, for an artwork to be successful must not stand by the prop of explanation. But there are strength, beauty, and the vigor of a very masculine vitality in every measure of this poetic composition, and such an orchestra as the Boston Symphony is essentially a Schumann orchestra.

It is a pity that Mr. Paur is not so well adapted to the task of Schumann interpretation as his instrumental company. He read the symphony sympathetically, indeed, and with splendid vigor; but there are grace and poetry in it which he did not always touch, though he certainly was successful with the crescendo of the strings in the slow movement. The orchestra covered itself with glory by the grand solidity and homogeneity of its tone, by its unanimity, its precision, and its opulence of color. The strings continue to be unequalled in purity and nobility of tone, while the wood choir has gained in smoothness, mellowness, and flexibility. The virtuosity of the orchestra was beautifully displayed in Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which was brilliantly delivered. The solos were admirably performed, and there was even a thrill of individuality in Mr. Schnecker's glissandi on the harp. The Berlioz "Carneval Romain" overture opened the concert, and that, too, was played well, though by no means as satisfactorily as the other two numbers.

The soloist of the entertainment was Carl Halir, the violinist, who essayed to display his romanticism through the medium of Tschaikowsky's second concerto, a very lovely work, which might be heard oftener without weariness. Mr. Halir's tone sounded larger last night than it has before, probably because of the greater intensity of his style. His performance was admirable in every way, and fully fixed his position as one of the most excellent violinists who have visited us. His intellectual grasp of the composition was masterful, and his emotional force all that could be desired. There was noticeable only a lack of relief to the continued intensity of his utterance, which kept the hearer constantly at full heart. But it was invigorating to listen to his performance of the last movement, which he played with a tremendous sweep of energy and a confidence that was commanding. His technics were notable. His staccato bowing fairly scintillated, and he rolled out difficult scale passages, double stopping, and dizzy leaps with consummate skill. Mr. Halir is a genuine artist, and he will be heard again with pleasure. He aroused the audience to enthusiasm last night, and after several recalls added to the programme a familiar gavotte of Bach, which he played at a rather unwise tempo, but with fine tone and spirit.

Dec. 6th

Boston Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place Wednesday evening at Music Hall, the soloist being Carl Halir, the successor of Joachim at the Berlin Conservatory. The program comprises selections from Berlioz, Tschaikowsky, Lenan, Liszt and Schumann. Mr. Halir's forceful and finished playing has excited complimentary comment from the Boston press. The sale of seats for this fine concert is now in progress at Albert's.

Academy of Music.
TWO DISTINCT PROGRAMMES.
Philharmonic Concerts
BY THE
BOSTON SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA.
MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
Friday Evening, December 11, 8:15
Carl Halir,
VIOLIN.
Saturday Matinee, December 12, 3:00.
Mme. Szumowska
PIANO.
Tickets at CHANDLER'S, 300 Fulton st, and at
BROOKLYN INSTITUTE, 502 Fulton st.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DEC. 12, 1896.

CARL HALIER AT THE SECOND NEW YORK SYMPHONY CONCERT.

As it seems Halier is very much in earnest in his endeavor to outline his artistic character, as a stylist of the classic, to our musical public. After having chosen the Beethoven Concerto for his debut he seconded it by the selection of the Eighth Concerto of Spohr (Gesangs-Scene) for his reappearance. This concerto like the Beethoven has, for the majority of violinists remained the Philosopher's Stone. Great is the temptation to play them in public for the prestige that even a good rendering affords, but alas, it is so difficult. Such is the spell, the magic fire, with which, as it were, Joachim has circumscribed these two Titan works and held the hosts of violinists in awe, for almost a quarter of a century. Even if Willy Burmester has assumed great liberties towards his old master Joachim, and has attempted to disclose to the musical world of England in his London press letters that Joachim had been dethroned as the standard classic of the violin and that like "Wotan" the world ruling spear had been shattered in his hands by Siegfried (Burmester). Nearly all of these more or less modern great virtuosi have tried their bow on Spohr, with results beautiful indeed, and yet, minus that hallowing gleam that spreads alike a dawn upon our presage of the divine measure and color. Halier brings us this purity, this matured firmness and the play of emotions has risen above the grasp of sensuality. The measures of the wonderful Spohr Concerto can develop through the medium of his instrument upon lines perfect and interlinking in the emotional color and intellectual inference. Halier has been pronounced here a cold and uninteresting player yet it is true that the peaks of high mounts penetrate into regions that seem cold to the dwellers of the valley; and to many, things out of reach to the ordinary are not pleasant to their comfort. But ever it will remain true that to enjoy the fruit of genius and work, it is necessary to attain to the plain of their growth.

The Evening Post.

New York, Friday, Dec. 11, 1896.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a delightful contrast to its predecessor of a few weeks ago. On that occasion the audience seemed to be bored, and glad when it was all over, whereas last evening everybody was kept interested to the last moment. The soloist, Herr Halir, did not, it is true, play so well as he usually does. There were at least two violinists in the orchestra who could have played the second Tchaikovsky concerto with bigger tone and more brilliant technique. Besides, some music-lovers are becoming horribly tired of this eternal solo fiddling at our concerts. They are beginning to ask, "If Donizetti's vocal fioriture are tiresome, silly, and vulgar, why is not the same true of violin gymnastics?" The piano is the only instrument on which fioriture are really artistic and delightful, provided they are harmonically varied and enriched with chords in arpeggio, as in the works of Chopin and Liszt.

Of the orchestral pieces the most interesting was Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," replete with a fascinating deviltry which the orchestra brought out splendidly. In Berlioz's "Roman Carnival," too, the Boston musicians displayed an amazing virtuosity and finish, and in Schumann's second symphony Mr. Paur worked up the climax of the last movement in a way that must be most cordially commended. Altogether, it was an interesting concert, and the audience was quite large and becomingly appreciative. It should be added that the Bach gavotte which Herr Halir played as an encore was utterly marred by the too fast tempo at which he took it. A gavotte, it is true, is a dance, but it is a dance of the more sedate kind which the last century cultivated before the modern waltz introduced the rapid-transit style of the terpsichorean art.

Dec. 3

MIDWEEK AMUSEMENT NOTES.

The second Boston Symphony concert, Emil Paur, director, will take place next Wednesday evening at the Music Hall, tickets for which are now on sale at Albert's. Carl Halir, the great violinist, will be the soloist of the occasion, and it will be his first appearance here. The concert programme has been announced as follows: Berlioz, overture, "Carnival Romain;" Tschaikowsky, concerto for violin; Liszt, "Mephisto Waltz;" Schumann, symphony in C major, No. 2.

THE MAIL AND EXPRESS.
Broadway and Fulton St., New York.
FRIDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 11, 1896.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Second Concert—Herr Carl Halir's Playing.

It is related of Hector Berlioz that he was so painfully appreciative of the beauty and significance of music that it nearly exhausted him even to listen to long symphonies, and that it cost him a tremendous expenditure of energy to follow his favorite operas. Nevertheless, there are few instances in his own compositions where he penetrates deeper than through the mere externals of his subjects. With a keen sense of what is obvious or decorative, or even characteristic in the outer form and manner of what he selects for musical exploitation, he generally misses its essence. So that one must look for brilliancy rather than depth, for the husk but not the kernel, in most of his works. For this reason one finds Berlioz in his most favorable light in such a composition as his "Roman Carnival" overture in A major, which began the programme of the Boston Symphony concert last night at the Metropolitan Opera House. The overture was written to be played before the second act of his opera "Benvenuto Cellini," and its chief theme is that of the "Saltarello," the dance dear to the hearts of the Italians. The lithe, quick, nervous energy of the Carnival spirit, with its alternations of languor, has been caught by the Frenchman in all its phases. The glow of torches, the crowds in the streets, the reckless gayety of the occasion, waked responsive appreciation in the heart of a man like Berlioz, and he made his overture fairly writhe with expressive recognition. The bizarre, the unpremeditated and the ingenious are emphasized in the work. Mr. Emil Paur and his men played it with skill and nerve. Another number of somewhat similar intent, though with deeper and less genial meaning, was played last night, Mr. Paur having chosen to perform the Liszt "Tavern Scene" from Lenau's "Faust." The less healthy tone of the Liszt work was made duly prominent, and the orchestra played the piece with strong effect.

The more weighty portion of the evening's entertainment was furnished by the Tschaikowsky violin concerto, No. 2, in D major, opus 35, and by Schumann's Second Symphony, in C major. Herr Carl Halir was the soloist in the first of these works, and gave his hearers more [illegible] applaud him than when he played at last week's Symphony concerts. Herr Halir is always reliable, and, barring one or two slight lapses in attacking high notes, his work was nearly what one would have had it. His tone was smooth, rich and full, and his phrasing admirable. The breath of life was the only thing lacking, and although during a good deal of the time there was something which by analogy might be termed artificial respiration, those who sought for any intense or vigorous exposition of what the Russian composer intended, were disappointed. The orchestra entered to a good degree into the Slavic spirit of the concerto, especially in the last movement.

It was reserved for Mr. Paur and his forces to distinguish themselves in the Schumann symphony. The romantic originality and fervor in which the work is steeped, and the wholesome, virile quality that Schumann's music possesses, were as color and atmosphere which Mr. Paur had closely under his control, and which he applied to his tone picture with discretion and nicety of judgment. His orchestra was with him, to a man, and the result was worthy of high praise. It is one of the best things Mr. Paur has done here.

The soloists at the remaining concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city will be Mme. Melba, Mme. Teresa Carreno, the pianist, and Mr. Ben Davies, tenor.

New-York Daily Tribune.
FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.
FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1896.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert for the season at the Metropolitan Opera House last night. Mr. Paur, the conductor, made no effort to compel public attention by novelty in any form. All the music had been heard repeatedly, and the solo performer, Herr Halir, was as familiar to the public as could possibly have been expected in the case of a foreign artist who has been less than two months in the country. He had been heard twice before at concerts of the Philharmonic Society, twice at meetings of the Symphony Society and once at a private concert of the Arion Club. He played Tschaikowsky's violin concerto, which we know from the sympathetic performances of Mr. Brodsky (whom Herr Halir strongly resembles physically and in some respects also artistically), and again won the admiration of his listeners by a reposefulness of manner and completeness of execution which proclaimed the master of his art. A gathering before which any musician might have played with pride rewarded him with a recall, and to satisfy an obviously honest desire for more he played the familiar gavotte from Bach's solo sonata in E major.

The orchestra's numbers were the overture "Carnaval Romain," by Berlioz; the "Mephisto Waltz," by Liszt, and Schumann's symphony in C major; and they were all played with a fine virtuosity, paired with equally fine musical feeling.

NOR[illegible]
PHILADELPHIA
DECEMBER 8, 1896.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Second Concert Last Night.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the accustomed direction of Mr. Emil Paur, gave its second concert for the season at the Academy of Music last night before the usual crowded and brilliant audience. Only four numbers appeared on the programme, and two of them—the "Manfred" overture of Schumann and Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz—were not especially attractive, but for all that the concert was such a feast of musical delight as no one need expect or desire to hear surpassed. It was so because the selections included Beethoven's great concerto for the violin and Schubert's glorious symphony in C major, No. 9, and because both compositions, than which there is nothing finer in the entire range of instrumental music, were interpreted in a manner than which it is impossible to conceive of anything finer.

Mr. Carl Halir, who played the concerto, did so with an easy mastery of its difficulties, and an appreciative apprehension of its meaning, which rendered his interpretation of it extraordinarily eloquent and impressive. He is a violinist of commanding authority and manifest distinction, with a self-assured, self-contained calmness and nobility of style which recalls the playing of Joseph Joachim as the writer remembers it twenty-five years ago. His command of the technique of the violin is absolute, and as he renders them, the most difficult passages seem easy. Thus his execution of the almost impracticable cadenza at the close of the first movement, with its double-stopping, rapid staccato bowing, and scale passages, as it seemed in every shift at once was a prodigious exhibition of virtuosity; but it was done with such an appearance of facility, with such an absence of the smallest suggestion of effort, that probably only the violinists in the audience had any adequate idea of what it meant.

Every one, however, could appreciate and enjoy the beauty of tone, the absolute accuracy of intonation, the brilliancy of bowing and the unfailingly artistic taste with which the concerto in its entirety was performed, and the hearty applause at its conclusion bespoke the general pleasure. Carl Halir is certainly a great violinist and a true artist. The orchestra part of the concerto was also played most exquisitely, with a due subordination to the soloist at the proper times, and a most effective self-assertion when the score required it.

The concert closed with a most superb performance of Schubert's lovely symphony in C major, a truly inspired composition, with a wealth of melody in it, which, as one listens, is a constant source of wonder, admiration and delight. The critics complain that it is not in strict form, and there are some who say that it is too long, and needs condensation. As it was played last night, any one who could say of it that it was too long, can have no music in his soul, while as to its defects of form, that may be left to the pedants to discuss.

Such as it is, the symphony is a creation of the rarest genius, and to hear it played as the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it last night is a pleasure and a privilege never to be forgotten. Mr. Paur has never done anything better.

The Times
TWELVE PAGES
PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 8, 1896.

Academy of Music.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was of more than common excellence. The chief works on the programme were the Beethoven violin concerto in D major, with Carl Halir as soloist, and Schubert's great C major symphony, together with the "Manfred" overture, which Mr. Paur did not make unusually interesting, and one of Liszt's programme scenes from "Faust," with the Mephisto waltz. The symphony was superbly played, not only with exactness and brilliancy of execution but with richness of color and a spirit and fervor and poetic appreciation that Mr. Paur has not often so finely displayed. This work alone, so fluent and free and brimful of spontaneous melody, and yet so sane and clear in ideas and development, was enough to make the concert notable. Of the beauty of the Beethoven concerto nothing need be said. Mr. Halir is the latest and the finest exponent we have had of the modern German violin school, with a method of the most exquisite refinement and purity, so smooth and dainty, yet so even and true, that it conveys the sense of absolute certainty and ease. At the same time the tone is small and rather hard and any suggestion of passion is extinguished, along with any intrusion of personal temperament. It is simply flawless execution. Whether this is the whole end of violin-playing need not be considered. What Mr. Halir has is of a value too extraordinary to make it necessary to discuss what he has not. He played the Joachim cadenzas. They are not beautiful, but they are difficult to the verge of impossibility, and he played them with as firm and light a touch and as perfect clarity as though they were the simplest exercises. And the orchestra played its great part in the concerto beautifully.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, FRIDAY, DEC. 11, 1896.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Second Concert of Its Season at the Metropolitan Opera House.

It is not necessary at this late day to say that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always welcome in New York. It is quite as much liked by the musical public here as it is at home, but because of our opera and our other musical attractions it does not fill so important a want in the aesthetic life of this community as in that of Boston. Of course, that must be the reason why the Metropolitan Opera House is not packed at every concert of this organization. It ought to be, no matter whether the personality and methods of the conductor, Emil Paur, are liked or not. The playing of the orchestra is always worth hearing, even when it is carrying out a conception that lacks elegance or grace.

Last night the most important work of the orchestra, in the second concert of its current season, was the performance of Schumann's symphony in C major. The composition wears like a work of genius, and its purely musical beauties make a strong impression upon even those who have not sufficiently acquainted themselves with Schumann's romantic ideals, his methods of self-expression, and the bearing of his personal history upon his compositions to appreciate its emotional content. It is true that this ought to be so, for an art-work to be successful must not stand by the prop of explanation. But there are strength, beauty, and the vigor of a very masculine vitality in every measure of this poetic composition, and such an orchestra as the Boston Symphony is essentially a Schumann orchestra.

It is a pity that Mr. Paur is not so well adapted to the task of Schumann interpretation as his instrumental company. He read the symphony sympathetically, indeed, and with splendid vigor; but there are grace and poetry in it which he did not always touch, though he certainly was successful with the crescendo of the strings in the slow movement. The orchestra covered itself with glory by the grand solidity and homogeneity of its tone, by its unanimity, its precision, and its opulence of color. The strings continue to be unequalled in purity and nobility of tone, while the wood choir has gained in smoothness, mellowness, and flexibility. The virtuosity of the orchestra was beautifully displayed in Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which was brilliantly delivered. The solos were admirably performed, and there was even a thrill of individuality in Mr. Schnecker's glissandi on the harp. The Berlioz "Carneval Romain" overture opened the concert, and that, too, was played well, though by no means as satisfactorily as the other two numbers.

The soloist of the entertainment was Carl Halir, the violinist, who essayed to display his romanticism through the medium of Tschaikowsky's second concerto, a very lovely work, which might be heard oftener without weariness. Mr. Halir's tone sounded larger last night than it has before, probably because of the greater intensity of his style. His performance was admirable in every way, and fully fixed his position as one of the most excellent violinists who have visited us. His intellectual grasp of the composition was masterful, and his emotional force all that could be desired. There was noticeable only a lack of relief to the continued intensity of his utterance, which kept the hearer constantly at full heart. But it was invigorating to listen to his performance of the last movement, which he played with a tremendous sweep of energy and a confidence that was commanding. His technics were notable. His staccato bowing fairly scintillated, and he rolled out difficult scale passages, double stopping, and dizzy leaps with consummate skill. Mr. Halir is a genuine artist, and he will be heard again with pleasure. He aroused the audience to enthusiasm last night, and after several recalls added to the programme a familiar gavotte of Bach, which he played at a rather unwise tempo, but with fine tone and spirit.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place Wednesday evening at Music Hall, the soloist being Carl Halir, the successor of Joachim at the Berlin Conservatory. The program comprises selections from Berlioz, Tschaikowsky, Lenan, Liszt and Schumann. Mr. Halir's forceful and finished playing has excited complimentary comment from the Boston press. The sale of seats for this fine concert is now in progress at Albert's.

Academy of Music.
TWO DISTINCT PROGRAMMES.
Philharmonic Concerts
BY THE
BOSTON SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA.
MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
Friday Evening, December 11, 8:15
Carl Halir,
VIOLIN.
Saturday Matinee, December 12, 3:00.
Mme. Szumowska
PIANO.
Tickets at CHANDLER'S, 300 Fulton st, and at
BROOKLYN INSTITUTE, 502 Fulton st.

American Art Journal.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DEC. 12, 1896.

CARL. HALIER AT THE SECOND NEW YORK SYMPHONY CONCERT.

As it seems Halier is very much in earnest in his endeavor to outline his artistic character, as a stylist of the classic, to our musical public. After having chosen the Beethoven Concerto for his debut he seconded it by the selection of the Eighth Concerto of Spohr (Gesangs-Scene) for his reappearance. This concerto like the Beethoven has, for the majority of violinists remained the Philosopher's Stone. Great is the temptation to play them in public for the prestige that even a good rendering affords, but alas, it is so difficult. Such is the spell, the magic fire, with which, as it were, Joachim has circumscribed these two Titan works and held the hosts of violinists in awe, for almost a quarter of a century. Even if Willy Burmester has assumed great liberties towards his old master Joachim, and has attempted to disclose to the musical world of England in his London press letters that Joachim had been dethroned as the standard classic of the violin and that like "Wotan" the world ruling spear had been shattered in his hands by Siegfried (Burmester). Nearly all of these more or less modern great virtuosi have tried their bow on Spohr, with results beautiful indeed, and yet, minus that hallowing gleam that spreads alike a dawn upon our presage of the divine measure and color. Halier brings us this purity, this matured firmness and the play of emotions has risen above the grasp of sensuality. The measures of the wonderful Spohr Concerto can develop through the medium of his instrument upon lines perfect and interlinking in the emotional color and intellectual inference. Halier has been pronounced here a cold and uninteresting player yet it is true that the peaks of high mounts penetrate into regions that seem cold to the dwellers of the valley; and to many, things out of reach to the ordinary are not pleasant to their comfort. But ever it will remain true that to enjoy the fruit of genius and work, it is necessary to attain to the plain of their growth.

The Evening Post.
New York, Friday, Dec. 11, 1896.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a delightful contrast to its predecessor of a few weeks ago. On that occasion the audience seemed to be bored, and glad when it was all over, whereas last evening everybody was kept interested to the last moment. The soloist, Herr Halir, did not, it is true, play so well as he usually does. There were at least two violinists in the orchestra who could have played the second Tchaikovsky concerto with bigger tone and more brilliant technique. Besides, some music-lovers are becoming horribly tired of this eternal solo fiddling at our concerts. They are beginning to ask, "If Donizetti's vocal fioriture are tiresome, silly, and vulgar, why is not the same true of violin gymnastics?" The piano is the only instrument on which fioriture are really artistic and delightful, provided they are harmonically varied and enriched with chords in arpeggio, as in the works of Chopin and Liszt.

Of the orchestral pieces the most interesting was Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," replete with a fascinating deviltry which the orchestra brought out splendidly. In Berlioz's "Roman Carnival," too, the Boston musicians displayed an amazing virtuosity and finish, and in Schumann's second symphony Mr. Paur worked up the climax of the last movement in a way that must be most cordially commended. Altogether, it was an interesting concert, and the audience was quite large and becomingly appreciative. It should be added that the Bach gavotte which Herr Halir played as an encore was utterly marred by the too fast tempo at which he took it. A gavotte, it is true, is a dance, but it is a dance of the more sedate kind which the last century cultivated before the modern waltz introduced the rapid-transit style of the terpsichorean art.

Dec 3

MIDWEEK AMUSEMENT NOTES.

The second Boston Symphony concert, Emil Paur, director, will take place next Wednesday evening at the Music Hall, tickets for which are now on sale at Albert's. Carl Halir, the great violinist, will be the soloist of the occasion, and it will be his first appearance here. The concert programme has been announced as follows: Berlioz, overture, "Carnival Romain;" Tschaikowsky, concerto for violin; Liszt, "Mephisto Waltz;" Schumann, symphony in C major, No. 2.

[61]

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra showed the usual large attendance, the usual brilliant but painful illumination, and the usual exceedingly classical programme. There was a time when Mr. Paur used to condescend a bit, and give his less learned listeners something that they could understand and enjoy, but such is not the case this winter. The programme of last night was everything that the most finical musician could have desired, the lightest number being Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," given with the lusty vigor which is as much a part of Mr. Paur as his faithful adherence to tradition. We say Mr. Paur advisedly, because the famous Boston Orchestra has for a time become his and his alone, and there is little to remind us that once upon a time an imaginative conductor inspired poetry as well as correctness. But it is a magnificent band now and for all time, and the manner in which it met the aggressive difficulties of the Schubert Symphony, brushing them aside like so many cobwebs, as a full test of its nerve and endurance. The symphony, No. 9, in C major, was given in all its "heavenly length," which both its friends and enemies will remember is very long indeed. In fact, before its finale, the audience began to melt away, apparently not agreeing with Schumann's enthusiastic estimate, which summed up the office of this symphony as revealing "something more than mere fine melody, mere ordinary joy and sorrow, such as music has already expressed in a hundred ways." At the end of the evening, with eyes tired from the light and head heavy with the Academy's ventilation, it is more difficult to delight in its manifold beauties than when the attention is fresher. Yet it would be unfortunate to have that inspired Andante overtaken by the fate of Schumann's Overture to "Manfred; whose tragic intensity was sadly interfered with by the bustle of belated guests. It is probably a fact that no matter what the hour, or how "precisely" it be advertised, there will always be a certain set of people who must come late; 7:45 is just as good as 8:15 so far as they are concerned—they will always be on hand fifteen minutes afterwards. It seemed a pity, in the finest of all Schumann's orchestral writings, to miss one note or the slightest effect, so beautiful it is in its unforced pathos, its deep, resistless pain. Hadow has well said that "from the first note to the last it is as magnificent as an Alpine storm, sombre, wild, impetuous, echoing from peak to peak with the shock of thunder clouds and the clamor of the driving wind."

The life and gaiety of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival Overture," based upon the Saltarello, proves that the crusty Parisian got something out of Italy, if he did pronounce its wine a "thick, oily drug," its Mardi Gras jollity only "rough horseplay," and the populace a "collection of thieves and vagabonds who had not even the merit of looking picturesque." The Overture formed a refreshing and delightful interlude between the Schubert Symphony and the Beethoven Concerto, which introduced to Brooklyn, Carl Halir and his violin. It is not easy for those who have felt the magnetism of Ysaye, and known the luscious sweetness of his tones, to fall victims to such a violinist as Halir. An admirable musician, with a calm, sure, even tone, and a superior technique, he undoubtedly is; a virtuoso, and one who reverences his art, doing no mean or questionable thing; yet with all his excellent qualities, and they are many, he cannot inspire a thrill. Wherein this particular power lies, it is difficult for the layman to explain, yet its possession conquers not only the music but the world.

The first matinee of the Boston Symphony Society, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute, is this afternoon in progress at the Academy, with the following programme: Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala"; Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony; Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline"; and Saint-Saens concerto for pianoforte in G minor, with Antoinette Szumowska at the piano.

Herald 11/29

Wednesday evening, December 9, is the date of the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its series at Music Hall, and the progromme, which is a fac simile of the one to be given in New York the following evening, is as follows:

Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz.

Concerto for violin, Tschaikowsky.

Scene in the Tavern (Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust," Liszt.

Symphony No.2, in C major, Schumann.

The prevailing sentiment in musical circles today is that too much of Tschaikowsky's music cannot be heard, and it will be a specially welcome announcement to the admirers of this brilliant composer that this concerto for violin is to be played by Mr. Carl Halir, the soloist. Mr. Halir is today regarded as the legitimate successor of Joachim, to whose position as the leading violin teacher at the Conservatory he has practically

---

Editorial. Brooklyn Eagle Sunday, Dec 13

The Musical Season.

"When music, heavenly maid, was young," she never could have kept the pace that is being required of her in Brooklyn in this pre-holiday season. It takes trained muscles and well developed wind to keep up with the rush of concerts which this town has seen and is seeing. And it is not quantity alone, but quality as well that marks the activity of the Brooklyn season. The Boston Symphony orchestra has just given two concerts of noble mold and has introduced the fine and workmanlike violinist, Halir, and the charming pianist, Szumowska to this public. This week the Seidl society will follow with an equally admirable orchestral programme and with a solo artist about whom public curiosity increases with every fresh appearance that he makes in the neighborhood—Bronislaw Huberman, the little violinist, who if half that report says of him is true, has a man's head and an artist's soul in a boy's body. We shall know more about him after Tuesday night, but there is no question that he is worth going to hear. Then on Monday Brooklyn will have the best string quartet in the world—the Kneisel quartet, of whose work the town has only recently risen to a proper appreciation. No more beautiful chamber concerts can be heard in the world than those of these artists and on Monday afternoon they are to play a new quartet by Dvorak, as well as old favorites. No musician will undervalue that announcement and the general musical public should not do so. On Tuesday night there will be a chamber concert at Wissner hall by the Jeane Franko trio, a new organization of competent musicians.

These announcements will serve as samples of the quality of music which the public is called upon to digest. These highest musical events are flanked by so many others of local origin, of less pressing artistic importance, but of pleasing aspect, that to number them would be like reading the Homeric catalogue of ships. Our unequaled Apollo club and many other singing and musical societies of earnest endeavor and good repute contribute their share toward the musical banquet. By the end of the season the man or woman who has eaten something from every course may well pray to go off into a solitude which even the thrush or the lark cannot invade. But it is not yet the end of the season, and each fresh concert seems an added charm. So let the fiddlers scrape and the singers sing while the audiences listen, refine their tastes and learn what a vast fund of melody and harmony there is in the world. It is an experience that make a man better and puts him in harmony with the Christmas season.

News Dec. 5

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Paur Tells How to Seat an Orchestra.

The second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts for this season will be given next Wednesday night at Music Hall. Mr. Carl Halir, violinist, will be the soloist. Mr. Emil Paur will conduct. The programme will be as follows:

Hector Berlioz—Overture—"The Roman Carnival," in A major, Op. 9.

Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky—Concerto for violin, No. 2, in D major, Op. 35.

Franz Liszt—Scene in the Tavern (Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust."

Intermission.

Robert Schumann—Symphony No. 2, in C major, Op. 61.

Mr. Emil Paur, now in his fourth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a recent interview for The News, set forth his views on the seating of an orchestra as follows:

"As the strings are acknowledged to be the fundamental basis of every orchestra, they should be so placed at the front and centre of the stage as to be practically surrounded by the other instruments. As the flutes, clarinets, oboes and other wood wind instruments have a delicate tone, they should be grouped toward the front, between the first violins and violas, otherwise they will be easily overbalanced by the rest of the orchestra.

"Back of the wood wind instruments should come the brasses, and especial care should be taken to so place the French horns that the bell or opening of the instruments should be opposite and away from the other brass instruments. In the rear should come the double basses as the natural background of the orchestra.

"One fault in orchestral arrangement which cannot always be obviated, owing to the construction of the stage, is the undue elevation of the brass instruments, which gives them too much prominence, in which event it is the especial function of the conductor to tone down these instruments to their proper ensemble effect.

"In considering in detail the subject of orchestral arrangement due allowance should be made for the variable acoustics of different halls. Sometimes, though rarely, this difference is so marked as to necessitate a slight change in the seating of the orchestra, but in most cases the conductor maintains the same plan of arranging his forces."

Bklyn Eagle Dec 13

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A matinee was given at the Academy of Music yesterday, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in the Brooklyn Institute course. The attendance, though not as large as at the performance on the preceding night, was fair, and a good bill was provided, while the inevitable soloist proved to be one of unusual distinction and ability. Goldmark's picturesque and romantic overture to "Sakentala," the best thing he has written, was the opening number, and the closing piece was Emmanuel Chabrier's "Gwendoline" overture, in which sound runs riot and Wagner is out-Wagnered, yet with sane and beautiful moments and an imposing wealth of instrumentation, the dynamic effects of the thing being prodigious. Chabrier is liable to be charged not merely with borrowing the Wagner style, but some of his themes are a pretty close suggestion of others in "Die Walkyrie." Between the two came the "Italian" symphony of Mendelssohn, a work seldom played nowadays, and which never had much of the Italian spirit, unless it might be in its whirling tarantelle at the last, but which is melodious and interesting. In orchestration it suffers by contrast with such colorful opulences as the Goldmark and Chabrier overtures.

Antoinette Szumowska, pianist, appeared in the second Saint-Saens concerto and surprised everyone. She is a wonderful and delightful player, with many of the best traits of her some time master, Paderewski, and a personal charm and interest that seem to attach to the cultivated Polack wherever found. She is a well appearing blonde, with a winning smile and a simple manner. No woman who has played in this country, not even Essipoff, has surpassed her in force, brilliancy, clearness of tone and sentiment. The concerto was one of the few possible good agencies for her appearance, for, while it is plentifully loaded with ornament, the piano part is integral, and the instrument is sometimes made to do a proper service in accompanying the orchestra. There are few nonsense passages that stand out in the bare and tiresome way that cadenzas in violin concertos are apt to do. Moreover, there are a real grace and beauty in the work. The artist was dashing, gay, sentimental or fierce, as occasion needed. Her principal charm lies in the richness and fullness of her tone. It is resonant and organlike, and her pedaling makes clean harmonic separations. Her physical strength, too, is remarkable, though it did not carry the climaxes in her crescendos quite to the point where they might startle or command. The great commendation of her work is that it is pleasant to hear her.

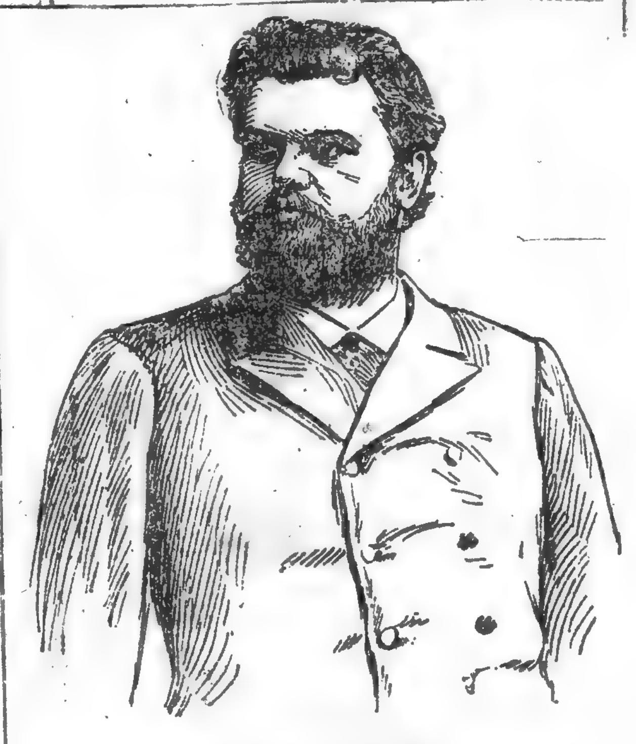
Dec. 6th

Second Symphony Concert.

The four selections announced for the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its series at Music Hall next Wednesday, offer a variety which should suit all tastes. The programme begins with the brilliant overture by Berlioz, "The Roman Carnival," offering ample opportunity for the great variety of orchestral effects so noticeable in all Berlioz's compositions.

The soloist number of Mr. Carl Halir will be Tscharkowsky's concerto for violin. Then comes the "Scene in the Tavern" (Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust," by Liszt. The programme closes with Schumenn's beautiful symphony No. 2 in C major.

The soloist will be Mr. Carl Halir, the German virtuoso and teacher, who is regarded as the legitimate successor of Panchin, to whose position as the leading violin teacher at the Berlin Conservatory he has practically succeeded. Mr. Halir made his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the second concert of the series in Providence, R. I., last Wednesday, and scored a hit. Seats can now be secured at Al-



CARL HALIR.

Herald

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA | HALIR

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Second Concert, Wednesday Evening, Dec. 9, at 8.15.

PROGRAMME:

Berlioz, Overture, "Carnival Romain;" Tschaikowsky, Concerto for Violin; Liszt, "Mephisto Waltz;" Schumann, Symphony in C major, No. 2.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's.

F. R. COMEE, Asst. Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

News Nov. 28

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Features of the Programme—Halir to Be the Soloist.

The four selections announced for the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its series at Music Hall on Wednesday evening, December 9, offer a variety which should suit all tastes. The programme begins with the brilliant overture by Berlioz, "The Roman Carnival," offering ample opportunity for the great variety of orchestral effects so noticeable in all of Berlioz's compositions.

The solo number will be Tschaikowsky's concerto for the violin. Then comes the "Scene in the Tavern" (Mephisto Waltz) from Lenau's "Faust," by Liszt. The programme closes with Schumann's beautiful Symphony No. 2 in C major.

The soloist will be Mr. Carl Halir, the German virtuoso and teacher, who is regarded as the legitimate successor of Joachim, to whose position as the leading violin teacher at the Berlin Conservatory he has practically succeeded. Mr. Halir made his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the second concert of the series in Providence, R. I., last Wednesday evening, and scored a hit.

Every Saturday

Boston Symphony—Second Concert.

Herr Carl Halir, the celebrated violin virtuoso, is to play here. At the second Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert at Music Hall, next Wednesday night, the famous German artist is to be the soloist. His fame has preceded him, and if the criticisms of him in New York and Boston are to be credited, he excels Wilhelmy and follows closely in technique and brilliant execution the wonderful Paganini. Mr. Halir will give as his principal number Tschiskowsky's concerto for violin. The program is somewhat lighter than that of the first concert. It opens with the brilliant overture by Berlioz, "The Roman Carnival," which, while descriptive in character, affords an excellent opportunity to bring out the most effective work of the orchestra. After Halir's number is the "Scene in the Tavern" (Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust" by Liszt; the last number will be Schumann's beautiful Symphony No. 2 in C major, thus giving a variated style of composition calculated to please various musical tastes. The box sheet is now open at Alberts, 13 North Charles street.

American 11/20 96

Boston Symphony Coming.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its second concert in the series at Music Hall for Wednesday evening, December 9. The program will be as follows: Berlioz, overture, "The Roman Carnival;" Tschaikowsky, concerto for violin; Liszt, scene in the tavern (Mephisto waltz) from Lenau's "Faust"; Schumann, symphony No. 2, in C major. The soloist, Mr. Carl Halir, is regarded as the legitimate successor of Joachim, to whose position as the leading violin teacher at the Berlin Conservatory he has practically succeeded. At his first appearance with the orchestra, in the second of the series of concerts given in Providence, R. I., last Wednesday evening, Mr. Halir was allowed that most unusual compliment in a symphony concert, an encore, and the Providence Journal, of the following morning, spoke of his playing as "impeccable upon every side, and at once delicate, forceful and finished, displaying the ripe and complete artist."

Boston Symphony Concert.

At the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wednesday evening, December 9, in its series at the Music Hall, Mr. Carl Halir will be the soloist. The prevailing sentiment in musical circles today is that too much of Tschaikowsky's music cannot be heard, and it will be a specially welcome announcement to the admirers of this brilliant composer that this concerto for violin is to be played by Mr. Carl Halir, who is today regarded as the legitimate successor of Joachim, to whose position as the leading violin teacher at the Berlin Conservatory he has practically succeeded. The programme is as follows: Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; concerto for violin, Tschaikowsky; scene in the tavern (Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust," Liszt; symphony No. 2, in C major, Schumann.

Music Hall.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. | HALIR.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Second Concert WEDNESDAY EVENING, December 9, at 8.15.

PROGRAMME.

Berlioz, Overture, "Carnaval Romain;" Tschaikowsky, Concerto for Violin; Liszt, "Mephisto Waltz;" Schumann, Symphony in C major, No. 2.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's.

C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

F. R. COMEE, Asst. Mgr.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

~~Standard Union~~ Dec 12

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra showed the usual large attendance, the usual brilliant but painful illumination, and the usual exceedingly classical programme. There was a time when Mr. Paur used to condescend a bit, and give his less learned listeners something that they could understand and enjoy, but such is not the case this winter. The programme of last night was everything that the most finical musician could have desired, the lightest number being Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," given with the lusty vigor which is as much a part of Mr. Paur as his faithful adherence to tradition. We say Mr. Paur advisedly, because the famous Boston Orchestra has for a time become his and his alone, and there is little to remind us that once upon a time an imaginative conductor inspired poetry as well as correctness. But it is a magnificent band now and for all time, and the manner in which it met the aggressive difficulties of the Schubert Symphony, brushing them aside like so many cobwebs, as a full test of its nerve and endurance. The symphony, No. 9, in C major, was given in all its "heavenly length," which both its friends and enemies will remember is very long indeed. In fact, before its finale, the audience began to melt away, apparently not agreeing with Schumann's enthusiastic estimate, which summed up the office of this symphony as revealing "something more than mere fine melody, mere ordinary joy and sorrow, such as music has already expressed in a hundred ways." At the end of the evening, with eyes tired from the light and head heavy with the Academy's ventilation, it is more difficult to delight in its manifold beauties than when the attention is fresher. Yet it would be unfortunate to have that inspired Andante overtaken by the fate of Schumann's Overture to "Manfred; whose tragic intensity was sadly interfered with by the bustle of belated guests. It is probably a fact that no matter what the hour, or how "precisely" it be advertised, there will always be a certain set of people who must come late; 7:45 is just as good as 8:15 so far as they are concerned—they will always be on hand fifteen minutes afterwards. It seemed a pity, in the finest of all Schumann's orchestral writings, to miss one note or the slightest effect, so beautiful it is in its unforced pathos, its deep, resistless pain. Hadow has well said that "from the first note to the last it is as magnificent as an Alpine storm, sombre, wild, impetuous, echoing from peak to peak with the shock of thunder clouds and the clamor of the driving wind."

The life and gaiety of Berlioz's "Roman Carnival Overture," based upon the Saltarello, proves that the crusty Parisian got something out of Italy, if he did pronounce its wine a "thick, oily drug," its Mardi Gras jollity only "rough horseplay," and the populace a "collection of thieves and vagabonds who had not even the merit of looking picturesque." The Overture formed a refreshing and delightful interlude between the Schubert Symphony and the Beethoven Concerto, which introduced to Brooklyn, Carl Halir and his violin. It is not easy for those who have felt the magnetism of Ysaye, and known the luscious sweetness of his tones, to fall victims to such a violinist as Halir. An admirable musician, with a calm, sure, even tone, and a superior technique, he undoubtedly is; a virtuoso, and one who reverences his art, doing no mean or questionable thing; yet with all his excellent qualities, and they are many, he cannot inspire a thrill. Wherein this particular power lies, it is difficult for the layman to explain, yet its possession conquers not only the music but the world.

The first matinee of the Boston Symphony Society, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute, is this afternoon in progress at the Academy, with the following programme: Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala"; Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony; Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline"; and Saint-Saens concerto for pianoforte in G minor, with Antoinette Szumowska at the piano.

News Nov. 29

Wednesday evening, December 9, is the date of the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its series at Music Hall, and the progromme, which is a fac simile of the one to be given in New York the following evening, is as follows:

Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz.

Concerto for violin, Tschaikowsky.

Scene in the Tavern (Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust," Liszt.

Symphony No.2, in C major, Schumann.

The prevailing sentiment in musical circles today is that too much of Tschaikowsky's music cannot be heard, and it will be a specially welcome announcement to the admirers of this brilliant composer that this concerto for violin is to be played by Mr.Carl Halir, the soloist. Mr. Halir is today regarded as the legitimate successor of Joachim, to whose position as the leading violin teacher at the Berlin Conservatory he has practically succeeded.

Editorial. Brooklyn Eagle Sunday, Dec 13

The Musical Season.

"When music, heavenly maid, was young," she never could have kept the pace that is being required of her in Brooklyn in this pre-holiday season. It takes trained muscles and well developed wind to keep up with the rush of concerts which this town has seen and is seeing. And it is not quantity alone, but quality as well that marks the activity of the Brooklyn season. The Boston Symphony orchestra has just given two concerts of noble mold and has introduced the fine and workmanlike violinist, Halir, and the charming pianist, Szumowska to this public. This week the Seidl society will follow with an equally admirable orchestral programme and with a solo artist about whom public curiosity increases with every fresh appearance that he makes in the neighborhood—Bronislaw Huberman, the little violinist, who if half that report says of him is true, has a man's head and an artist's soul in a boy's body. We shall know more about him after Tuesday night, but there is no question that he is worth going to hear. Then on Monday Brooklyn will have the best string quartet in the world—the Kneisel quartet, of whose work the town has only recently risen to a proper appreciation. No more beautiful chamber concerts can be heard in the world than those of these artists and on Monday afternoon they are to play a new quartet by Dvorak, as well as old favorites. No musician will undervalue that announcement and the general musical public should not do so. On Tuesday night there will be a chamber concert at Wissner hall by the Jeane Franko trio, a new organization of competent musicians.

These announcements will serve as samples of the quality of music which the public is called upon to digest. These highest musical events are flanked by so many others of local origin, of less pressing artistic importance, but of pleasing aspect, that to number them would be like reading the Homeric catalogue of ships. Our unequaled Apollo club and many other singing and musical societies of earnest endeavor and good repute contribute their share toward the musical banquet. By the end of the season the man or woman who has eaten something from every course may well pray to go off into a solitude which even the thrush or the lark cannot invade. But it is not yet the end of the season, and each fresh concert seems an added charm. So let the fiddlers scrape and the singers sing while the audiences listen, refine their tastes and learn what a vast fund of melody and harmony there is in the world. It is an experience that make a man better and puts him in harmony with the Christmas season.

News Dec 5

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Paur Tells How to Seat an Orchestra.

The second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts for this season will be given next Wednesday night at Music Hall. Mr. Carl Halir, violinist, will be the soloist. Mr. Emil Paur will conduct. The programme will be as follows:

Hector Berlioz—Overture—"The Roman Carnival," in A major, Op. 9.

Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky — Concerto for violin, No. 2, in D major, Op. 35.

Franz Liszt—Scene in the Tavern (Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust."

Intermission.

Robert Schumann—Symphony No. 2, in C major, Op. 61.

Mr. Emil Paur, now in his fourth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a recent interview for The News, set forth his views on the seating of an orchestra as follows:

"As the strings are acknowledged to be the fundamental basis of every orchestra, they should be so placed at the front and centre of the stage as to be practically surrounded by the other instruments. As the flutes, clarinets, oboes and other wood wind instruments have a delicate tone, they should be grouped toward the front, between the first violins and violas, otherwise they will be easily overbalanced by the rest of the orchestra.

"Back of the wood wind instruments should come the brasses, and especial care should be taken to so place the French horns that the bell or opening of the instruments should be opposite and away from the other brass instruments. In the rear should come the double basses as the natural background of the orchestra.

"One fault in orchestral arrangement which cannot always be obviated, owing to the construction of the stage, is the undue elevation of the brass instruments, which gives them too much prominence, in which event it is the especial function of the conductor to tone down these instruments to their proper ensemble effect.

"In considering in detail the subject of orchestral arrangement due allowance should be made for the variable acoustics of different halls. Sometimes, though rarely, this difference is so marked as to necessitate a slight change in the seating of the orchestra, but in most cases the conductor maintains the same plan of arranging his forces."

Bklyn Eagle. Dec 15

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A matinee was given at the Academy of Music yesterday, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in the Brooklyn Institute course. The attendance, though not as large as at the performance on the preceding night, was fair, and a good bill was provided, while the inevitable soloist proved to be one of unusual distinction and ability. Goldmark's picturesque and romantic overture to "Sakentala," the best thing he has written, was the opening number, and the closing piece was Emmanuel Chabrier's "Gwendoline" overture, in which sound runs riot and Wagner is out-Wagnered, yet with sane and beautiful moments and an imposing wealth of instrumentation, the dynamic effects of the thing being prodigious. Chabrier is liable to be charged not merely with borrowing the Wagner style, but some of his themes are a pretty close suggestion of others in "Die Walkyrie." Between the two came the "Italian" symphony of Mendelssohn, a work seldom played nowadays, and which never had much of the Italian spirit, unless it might be in its whirling tarantelle at the last, but which is melodious and interesting. In orchestration it suffers by contrast with such colorful opulences as the Goldmark and Chabrier overtures.

Antoinette Szumowska, pianist, appeared in the second Saint-Saens concerto and surprised everyone. She is a wonderful and delightful player, with many of the best traits of her some time master, Paderewski, and a personal charm and interest that seem to attach to the cultivated Polack wherever found. She is a well appearing blonde, with a winning smile and a simple manner. No woman who has played in this country, not even Essipoff, has surpassed her in force, brilliancy, clearness of tone and sentiment. The concerto was one of the few possible good agencies for her appearance, for, while it is plentifully loaded with ornament, the piano part is integral, and the instrument is sometimes made to do a proper service in accompanying the orchestra. There are few nonsense passages that stand out in the bare and tiresome way that cadenzas in violin concertos are apt to do. Moreover, there are a real grace and beauty in the work. The artist was dashing, gay, sentimental or fierce, as occasion needed. Her principal charm lies in the richness and fullness of her tone. It is resonant and organlike, and her pedaling makes clean harmonic separations. Her physical strength, too, is remarkable, though it did not carry the climaxes in her crescendos quite to the point where they might startle or command. The great commendation of her work is that it is pleasant to hear her.

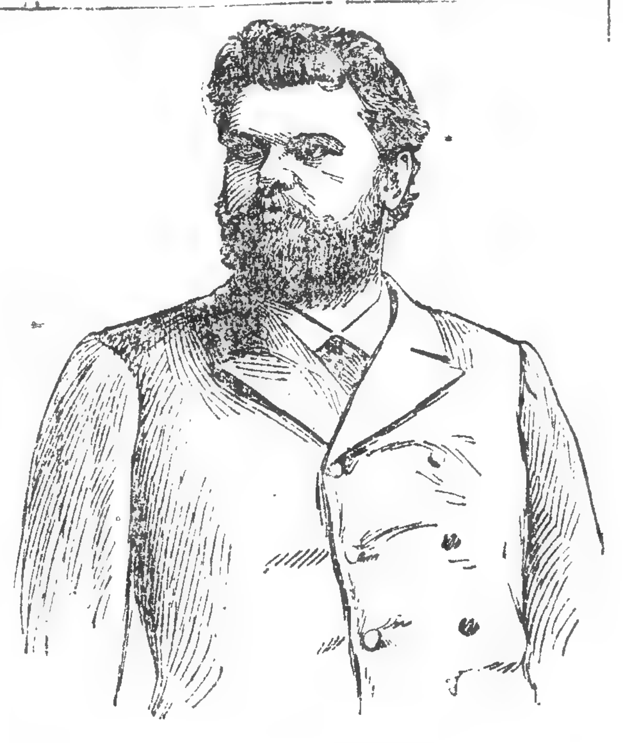
[illegible]

Second Symphony Concert.

The four selections announced for the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its series at Music Hall next Wednesday, offer a variety which should suit all tastes. The programme begins with the brilliant overture by Berlioz, "The Roman Carnival," offering ample opportunity for the great variety of orchestral effects so noticeable in all Berlioz's compositions.

The soloist number of Mr. Carl Halir will be Tscharkowsky's concerto for violin. Then comes the "Scene in the Tavern" (Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust," by Liszt. The programme closes with Schumenn's beautiful symphony No. 2 in C major.

The soloist will be Mr. Carl Halir, the German virtuoso and teacher, who is regarded as the legitimate successor of Panchin, to whose position as the leading violin teacher at the Berlin Conservatory he has practically succeeded. Mr. Halir made his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the second concert of the series in Providence, R. I., last Wednesday, and scored a hit. Seats can now be secured at Al-



CARL HALIR.

News

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA | HALIR

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Second Concert, Wednesday Evening, Dec. 9, at 8.15.

PROGRAMME:

Berlioz, Overture, "Carnival Romain;" Tschaikowsky, Concerto for Violin; Liszt, "Mephisto Waltz;" Schumann, Symphony in C major, No. 2.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's.

F. R. COMEE, Asst. Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

News Nov. 28

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Features of the Programme—Halir to Be the Soloist.

The four selections announced for the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its series at Music Hall on Wednesday evening, December 9, offer a variety which should suit all tastes. The programme begins with the brilliant overture by Berlioz, "The Roman Carnival," offering ample opportunity for the great variety of orchestral effects so noticeable in all of Berlioz's compositions.

The solo number will be Tschaikowsky's concerto for the violin. Then comes the "Scene in the Tavern" (Mephisto Waltz) from Lenau's "Faust," by Liszt. The programme closes with Schumann's beautiful Symphony No. 2 in C major.

The soloist will be Mr. Carl Halir, the German virtuoso and teacher, who is regarded as the legitimate successor of Joachim, to whose position as the leading violin teacher at the Berlin Conservatory he has practically succeeded. Mr. Halir made his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the second concert of the series in Providence, R. I., last Wednesday evening, and scored a hit.

[illegible]

Boston Symphony—Second Concert

Herr Carl Halir, the celebrated violin virtuoso, is to play here. At the second Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert at Music Hall, next Wednesday night, the famous German artist is to be the soloist. His fame has preceded him, and if the criticisms of him in New York and Boston are to be credited, he excels Wilhelmy and follows closely in technique and brilliant execution the wonderful Paganini. Mr. Halir will give as his principal number Tschiskowsky's concerto for violin. The program is somewhat lighter than that of the first concert. It opens with the brilliant overture by Berlioz, "The Roman Carnival," which, while descriptive in character, affords an excellent opportunity to bring out the most effective work of the orchestra. After Halir's number is the "Scene in the Tavern" (Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust" by Liszt; the last number will be Schumann's beautiful Symphony No. 2 in C major, thus giving a variated style of composition calculated to please various musical tastes. The box sheet is now open at Alberts, 13 North Charles street.

[illegible]

Boston Symphony Coming.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its second concert in the series at Music Hall for Wednesday evening, December 9. The program will be as follows: Berlioz, overture, "The Roman Carnival;" Tschaikowsky, concerto for violin; Liszt, scene in the tavern (Mephisto waltz) from Lenau's "Faust"; Schumann, symphony No. 2, in C major. The soloist, Mr. Carl Halir, is regarded as the legitimate successor of Joachim, to whose position as the leading violin teacher at the Berlin Conservatory he has practically succeeded. At his first appearance with the orchestra, in the second of the series of concerts given in Providence, R. I., last Wednesday evening, Mr. Halir was allowed that most unusual compliment in a symphony concert, an encore, and the Providence Journal, of the following morning, spoke of his playing as "impeccable upon every side, and at once delicate, forceful and finished, displaying the ripe and complete artist."

Boston Symphony Concert.

At the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wednesday evening, December 9, in its series at the Music Hall, Mr. Carl Halir will be the soloist. The prevailing sentiment in musical circles today is that too much of Tschaikowsky's music cannot be heard, and it will be a specially welcome announcement to the admirers of this brilliant composer that this concerto for violin is to be played by Mr. Carl Halir, who is today regarded as the legitimate successor of Joachim, to whose position as the leading violin teacher at the Berlin Conservatory he has practically succeeded. The programme is as follows: Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; concerto for violin, Tschaikowsky; scene in the tavern (Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust," Liszt; symphony No. 2, in C major, Schumann.

Music Hall.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, | HALIR.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Second Concert WEDNESDAY EVENING, December 9, at 8.15.

PROGRAMME.

Berlioz, Overture, "Carnaval Romain;" Tschaikowsky, Concerto for Violin; Liszt, "Mephisto Waltz;" Schumann, Symphony in C major, No. 2.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's.

C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

F. R. COMEE, Asst. Mgr.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1896.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last Thursday night in the Metropolitan Opera House. We append the program, particularly commending its make-up. All symphonic concert programs should be prepared in this fashion. The tonality and time beat of every movement are indicated.

Overture, the Roman Carnival, in A major, op. 9	Hector Berlioz
Concerto for violin, No. 2, in D major, op. 35	Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky
Allegro moderato	4-4
Canzonetta, andante, G minor	3-4
Finale, allegro vivacissimo, D major	2-4
Scene in the Tavern, Mephisto waltz, from Lenau's Faust	Franz Liszt
Symphony No. 2, in C major, op. 61	Robert Schumann
Sostenuto assai, C major	6-4
Allegro, ma non troppo, C major	3-4
Scherzo, allegro vivace, C major	2-4
Trio I., G major	2-4
Trio II., C major	2-4
Adagio espressivo, C minor	2-4
Allegro molto vivace, C major	2-2

Soloist, Mr. Carl Halir.

As may be seen, brilliancy is the keynote of this scheme, which aptly begins with the Berlioz overture and its swirling saltarello and giddy excitement. The violin concerto has been heard here before, and it has received more amiable and enthusiastic treatment than on this occasion. Mr. Halir, who looks like an untamed Calmuck, nevertheless plays like a schoolmaster. His tone is absolutely devoid of sensuous quality, and in the half savage, Slavic blood stirring last moment he only fiddled, just fiddled. It was not always clean fiddling, and it was without the spark of temperament to fire the fuse and blow us all into dynamic ecstasy.

The work is difficult and somewhat ungrateful. Halir tore up from the very roots the formidable octaves, double thirds and sixths, but it was all unlovely, uninspiring. He played as an encore piece Bach's familiar gavot in E, and played it very fast.

Have we not had enough of Mr. Halir, for this season at least?

One of the most brilliant tone pictures that Franz Liszt ever painted is his Mephisto Walzer. Better even than Berlioz and his famous Ride to Hell in the Damnation of Faust, more satanic than Boito's I Am the Spirit that Denies, infinitely superior to Gounod's well-fed, well-bred devil, is this fiend in Lenau's Faust whom Liszt has musically limned for us. Such a cynical, corrodingly evil, subtile demon is he, and he lures you on with the most lascivious pulse in the world!

Never have the accents of an infernal voluptuous passion been so sung, not even by Wagner in Tristan and Isolde. The second theme of this valse is a caressing, syncopated sigh that makes riotous the blood and blind the judgment. It is swooning and dangerous music and even in the working out section the ingenuity of Liszt's counterpoint does not obtrude itself nor damage the integrity of the mood picture, while its decorative scheme courts comparison with Berlioz or Wagner.

It was exquisitely read by Mr. Paur and his men.

The symphony was played as it only could be played by this orchestra. The scherzo with its brace of trios, an uncomfortable nut for the purists to crack, was delightfully given. The strings, those mellow marvels, the strings of the band from Boston, never sounded so luscious, so intense as in the cantabile. The trills were superlatively fine. It is an orchestra of which you are never ~~tempted~~, after the bony manner of George Eliot, to sing "Oh, may I join the choir invisible," for have we not an angelical choir, a visible choir at the concerts of this organization?

Mr. Paur conducted with unusual power and precision.

The Independent

130 FULTON STREET.

NEW YORK, December 17, 1896.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was in its finest form on Thursday night. One of our newspapers had lately advertised for a sort of sealed proposals in the way of a new motto to be descriptive of the salient merit of its pages. Perhaps the Bostonians might do the same thing, and gain thereby if not any useful enthusiasm, a good deal of condensed applause for a band incomparable. The Symphony Orchestra within a year has done more than maintain its standard under Mr. Paur. It has managed a thing that at first seemed ungraciously in hazard. It has actually made of Mr. Paur a new conductor good enough to be its leader. To the present associating of such an organization under such care as is his vastly improved kind, nobody should object. The program of this concert included Schumann's Symphony in C, the violin concerto of Tschaikovsky, with Mr. Carl Halir as soloist, and a magnificent example of the Orchestra's virtuosity in playing one of Liszt's "Episodes in Lenau's 'Faust'"—the wild waltz that Mephistopheles is supposed to be playing in the inn. The whole concert was admirable. We must get our finest musical concert performances as well as our recipes for baked beans from Boston. Apropos of the Liszt selection it might not be an unwelcome idea to the public for one of our local conductors to revive the companion number to it, which Mr. Thomas used frequently to give—the somber "Nächtliche Zug."

From Vogue
17 December
1896.

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

THE second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Metropolitan Opera House, on Thursday, 10 Dec. Herr Halir was the soloist.

The programme was one of the most uninteresting ones, unless the hearer happened to be an enthusiastic admirer of Berlioz and Liszt, which I am not. Already last week, Mr. Damrosch gave us a rather powerful dose of Berlioz, and it was fortunate that Mr. Paur was not quite so liberal. Nevertheless, we were glad when the Roman Carnival was over.

Herr Halir then performed Tschaikowski's concerto for violin, op. 35. Much as I admire—nay, love Tschaikowski, I am not so blind as to admire his poor works; and the concerto is certainly among this master's poorest productions. Occasionally a fine passage is heard, but seldom sustained. The long cadenza for the solo instrument is one of the most flagrant violations of good taste to be found in all music. Such ugly and perfectly meaningless tone-combinations grate upon the ear. In the finale (allegro vivacissimo) the composer not only becomes commonplace but so inartistic as almost to deserve the epithet "vulgar." All during the performance I asked myself: "Is this the author of the immortal Pathétique or the Marche Slave?"

Whether the poor quality of the work he performed affected Herr Halir's playing I do not know; certain it is that the eminent violinist was a great disappointment. The previous Saturday at the Symphony concert he had played brilliantly. I have not yet forgotten his rendering of Saint-Saen's Rondo Capriccioso. But in the Tschaikowski concerto his intonation was often very uncertain, and several double stops far from pure. Nevertheless, the audience demanded an encore; Herr Halir than played Bach's well-known Gavotte, without accompaniment. This number was rendered delightfully and also with perfect intonation.

Liszt's Mephisto Waltz is one of the ugliest compositions I am acquainted with. The very opening chords—those diabolical fifths in 'celli and basses set my teeth on edge. This composition is a faithful reproduction of Lenau's poetry. Liszt with evident interest reproduces every line of Lenau's disgusting Scene in the Tavern. If music could be immoral Liszt's Mephisto Waltz certainly might be called so. As it is, the composer has succeeded in heaping dissonances upon dissonances, and chosen his instruments so as to produce a painful effect by the prominence of the ugliest intervals. Hanslick strikes the nail on the head when he says:

"Liszt simply inverts all natural laws of music; and being unable to create what is beautiful, he purposely invents what is ugly." (Concerte, p. 78.)

I do not go so far as to banish the ugly from art. Far from it. But I do object when it is carried beyond all bounds.

The very opening chords of Schumann's beautiful symphony (No. 2, C major, op. 61) sent a thrill of delight through every hearer. The spell was broken, and once more we gave ourselves up to the charms of real music.

What can I say of the performance of this programme? Instead of searching for new superlatives, I will say at once that all the works were played as only the Boston Symphony Orchestra can play them. What a pity that most of the works performed were so unworthy of the efforts made!

After the concert I discussed the programme with a great conductor, and expressed my strong dislike of the Mephisto Waltz. He smiled, and said I had not heard it to best advantage. Quoting a few passages he expressed his opinion that they should have been "rendered in a more diabolical manner." (hätten noch verteufelter gespielt werden müssen.) For the moment I was speechless. When I had recovered sufficiently, I told him that I would not forget what he had said, and would keep at a safe distance from any concert hall where the Mephisto Waltz might be performed by him.

[illegible]

Es[illegible]

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 21, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A modern programme of Berlioz, Dvorak and Rubinstein, chiefly interesting in its first number. Berlioz's "Carnaval Romaine" overture received a splendid performance. It is one of the composer's clearest works, and is full of life and of local color.

The English horn solo was played in a manner that calls for enthusiastic praise, and the wild rush of chromatics preceding the entrance of the Saltarello was given with electrifying effect. The festive ending, the bold jumps of the Saltarello, were well caught up and the work had, on this occasion, its very best Boston performance.

Now followed that sterling artist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder in a violoncello concerto. Mr. Schroeder was heard at his very best in Steinert Hall a few days ago (why didn't they dedicate that beautiful hall by singing "Im tiefen Keller sitz' ich hier?") where evry nuance of his rich tone was garnered up in a way that was impossible in Music Hall, yet he made a very great success in spite of this difficulty and of the fact that the work which he played was not one to grow enthusiastic over.

It was a new concerto by Dvorak, the last which he wrote in America. Possibly the composer was taking leave of his American ideas in this concerto for it has some themes which remind of his "New World" symphony; or do they have negroes as well as seacoasts in Bohemia?

The first movement had a masterly contrast of themes, but a degree of reiteration of their figures in the development that was irritating. The composition began in the old-fashioned manner, the orchestra announcing the themes before the solo instrument was permitted to enter, always an awkward matter for the artist.

Spite of the ingenuity of development displayed, there seemed to be a lack of continuity, matters were not homogeneous, the movement seemed to consist of shreds and patches of thought. These are the impressions of a first hearing; possibly another performance might bring forth subtile relationships which were not apparent, yet we do not long for an opportunity of a second hearing.

The Adagio was expressive and seemed to be the best movement of the concerto. There were some sharp contrasts between melancholy and fury, but these did not seem forced or artificial. The flute was made prominent in both this and in the first movement, and was admirably played in duet work with the chief instrument. There was also a dialogue between oboe and 'cello in the adagio which was romantic and effective.

There was also a monologue for the 'cello in which Mr. Schroeder displayed all that rich tone and sympathetic quality which makes him so worthy an artist. This movement was heartily applauded, and its plaintive thoughts were not too abstruse to be fully understood even on a first hearing.

The finale began with a march-like rhythm, but the quick-step soon changed to melancholy. A Czech takes to melancholy as easily as a Teuton to beer. There was much reiteration here and Dvorak clung to his figures as a drowning man to straws. Finally a soliloquy on the violoncello led to a very brusque and dissonant end.

It was not a grateful work for the soloist, yet Mr. Schroeder did so well with his passages that there was abundance of enthusiasm and recalls at the end. The critic cannot judge how much of this was personal, yet cannot imagine that the Finale would of itself awaken great applause.

If Rubinstein had been able to sustain the nobility of the first movement through the following movements of his "Ocean" symphony, one could have pardoned him for extending the work to seven movements; as it is, one feels that he is squeezing the lemon after it is dry. The performance of Saturday was similar to the one given by Gericke some years ago, presenting six movements, of which the first and second, and fifth and sixth were the original ones, the third and fourth having been added in a revised version, the "Storm" movement only being omitted.

The critic would be happier if a reversed process of revision were to take place with this symphony and it were to be shortened to the length of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," only the first and second movements being retained.

The first movement is the most glorious work ever inspired by water. Calling to mind the "Hebrides" overture, the "Calm Sea, and Happy Voyage" overture, the flow of the "Rheingold" waves, one must acknowledge that the grandeur of the ocean, the surge of the waves, has reached its truest musical voice in this number. One might take for its motto the words of Walt Whitman:—

"Today a rude and brief recitative
Of ships sailing the seas,
Each with its special flag or ship-signal.
Of unnamed heroes in the ships,
Of waves, spreading and spreading, far as the eye can reach.
Of dashing spray and the winds piping and blowing,
And out of these a chant for the sailors of all nations,
Fitful like a surge."

It was a noble performance, too, lofty, powerful and majestic. Every one of the great climaxes was broadly given—a grand interpretation of a great movement.

The second movement is somewhat weaker, yet the beautiful melody of the violins supported by harp ripples as flowing as the "Rheingold" wave-figure, made a fitting impression.

Now came a degree of prolixity, as movement followed movement. The long sustained note of the andante was a proper suggestion of immensity, but it also suggested a plagiarism from Mendelssohn's "Becalmed at Sea" introduction in which the sustained A of the violins makes the same impression and in the same way.

Some playful touches in the scherzo intimate the recreations on shipboard during the second dog-watch, and the muted tones of the horn (the ugliest tone-color of the orchestra) might intimate seasickness or some other secret sorrow coming to light.

The end with its chorale-like hymn of Thanksgiving was quite welcome after the great length of the work. Judging by the inordinate prolixity, Rubinstein must have made his ocean trips on a very slow boat.

Louis C. Elson.

[illegible]

MONDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighth symphony concert was as follows:

Berlioz: Overture to "Le Carnaval Romain," opus, 9.
Dvorak: Concerto for Violoncello, in B minor, opus 104. (First time in Boston.)
Rubinstein: Symphony No. 2, in C major, "Ocean," opus. 42. (Second version.)

Those among the audience who did not know the "Ocean" symphony in all its various versions must have been considerably mystified last Saturday evening. The analysis of the symphony printed in the programme-books was made from the first version—in four movements; the symphony was played according to the second version—in six movements; and a little paster on the programme-page set forth what purported to be the second version, but was really no known version at all—that is, in five movements. As the order of the several movements in these three different versions did not tally, the uninitiated listener was left considerably in doubt as to what he was hearing at any given moment.

But, upon the whole, why play the "Ocean" symphony at all? Especially when we all heard it in its most terrible third version—in seven movements—two years ago. Some of us have hardly recovered from that infliction yet. The more one hears the work, the weaker and more tiresome it seems; of all its seven movements, the first and the scherzo of the second version seem the only ones it is worth while to keep. And even these are not of the sort one cares to hear often; as for the others, they are children of dullness and ennui. We have seldom been bored with music as we were with this symphony last Saturday evening.

Berlioz's "Carnaval romain" is another matter; here all is life and sparkle; it is perhaps the most thoroughly brilliant thing the composer ever wrote. And what a wealth of at once gorgeous and tender coloring there is in the introduction. The overture was played in the orchestra's best style and made an immense impression.

The new Dvorak 'celo concerto is a work which, like many other things by Dvorak, leaves one in no little doubt after the first hearing. When heard for the first time, it sounds almost too good to be true; one fears that many of the delicious moments in it will not wear well and will show some weakness with time. We have said before that Dvorak, like Beethoven, in the warmness of his heart, often verges dangerously upon the commonplace; unlike Beethoven, he does not invariably stop at verging upon it. In hearing a work of his for the first time, you are continually in doubt whether what sounds so beautiful and soulful will turn out to be pure gold in the end, or will merely be relegated to the domain of Franz Abt or Kücken on better acquaintance. So with this 'cello concerto: we have seldom been so pleasurably moved by a new work of its kind, and yet we cannot help a suspicion that it is not all in fast colors. Is its warmth of sentiment nobly human and genuine, or is it mere sentimentality? We cannot, for the life of us, tell as yet. One thing, however, we are tolerably sure of: it is a masterpiece of instrumental coloring. In spite of the fulness of the scoring, the 'cello part comes well to the surface when it has anything vital to say; and even in the virtuoso passage-work it is sufficiently audible for all truly musical purposes. Except Mr. Loeffler's admirable fantasia—played here by Mr. Schroeder some years ago—we know nothing for 'cello and orchestra in which the solo instrument and accompaniment are played off against each other with such perfect skill.

One feature of this concerto has unfortunately been made the basis of a rather amusing misunderstanding. It was stated in the programme-book for last Saturday evening's concert that, in writing this concerto, Dr. Dvorak had had the assistance of Mr. Schroeder for much of the virtuoso passage-work, and that Mr. Schroeder had written many of such passages himself. An esteemed contemporary hereupon declares that Mr. Schroeder was an important collaborator on the composition, and that more than half the glory belongs properly to him. This is making a rather stupendous mountain out of a modest molehill. In seeking Mr. Schroeder's aid, Dr. Dvorak did only what every intelligent composer does, when writing a concerto for an instrument on which he himself is not a virtuoso; he got Mr. Schroeder to help him in the ornamental passage-work, to insure its being technically well written for the instrument; just as Brahms got Joachim to help him in his violin concerto. There is probably not an idea, a progression, a bit of form, development, or coloring in the whole concerto that originated with Mr. Schroeder—whose well-known modesty was probably shocked enough at finding himself raised to the imposing level of collaborator and sharer in glory.

In one way, though, he can fairly share the glory: by his admirable playing of the solo part. Mr. Schroeder has always played well since he came to Boston, generally superbly; but last Saturday evening he fairly outdid himself. He richly deserved the warm and hearty applause he got.

The next programme is: Handel, overture in D; Gluck, selections from ballet-music in "Don Juan;" Bizet, suite, "Jeu d'Enfants;" Humperdinck, two selections from music to the fairy tale, "The Children of the King;" Haydn, symphony. The public rehearsal comes on Thursday afternoon, instead of on Friday.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1896.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last Thursday night in the Metropolitan Opera House. We append the program, particularly commending its make-up. All symphonic concert programs should be prepared in this fashion. The tonality and time beat of every movement are indicated.

Overture, the Roman Carnival, in A major, op. 9……Hector Berlioz
Concerto for violin, No. 2, in D major, op. 35……Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky
  Allegro moderato……4-4
  Canzonetta, andante, G minor……3-4
  Finale, allegro vivacissimo, D major……2-4
Scene in the Tavern, Mephisto waltz, from Lenau's Faust……Franz Liszt
Symphony No. 2, in C major, op. 61……Robert Schumann
  Sostenuto assai, C major……6-4
  Allegro, ma non troppo, C major……3-4
  Scherzo, allegro vivace, C major……2-4
  Trio I., G major……2-4
  Trio II., C major……2-4
  Adagio espressivo, C minor……2-4
  Allegro molto vivace, C major……2-2
Soloist, Mr. Carl Halir.

As may be seen, brilliancy is the keynote of this scheme, which aptly begins with the Berlioz overture and its swirling saltarello and giddy excitement. The violin concerto has been heard here before, and it has received more amiable and enthusiastic treatment than on this occasion. Mr. Halir, who looks like an untamed Calmuck, nevertheless plays like a schoolmaster. His tone is absolutely devoid of sensuous quality, and in the half savage, Slavic blood stirring last moment he only fiddled, just fiddled. It was not always clean fiddling, and it was without the spark of temperament to fire the fuse and blow us all into dynamic ecstasy.

The work is difficult and somewhat ungrateful. Halir tore up from the very roots the formidable octaves, double thirds and sixths, but it was all unlovely, uninspiring. He played as an encore piece Bach's familiar gavot in E, and played it very fast.

Have we not had enough of Mr. Halir, for this season at least?

One of the most brilliant tone pictures that Franz Liszt ever painted is his Mephisto Walzer. Better even than Berlioz and his famous Ride to Hell in the Damnation of Faust, more satanic than Boito's I Am the Spirit that Denies, infinitely superior to Gounod's well-fed, well-bred devil, is this fiend in Lenau's Faust whom Liszt has musically limned for us. Such a cynical, corrodingly evil, subtile demon is he, and he lures you on with the most lascivious pulse in the world!

Never have the accents of an infernal voluptuous passion been so súng, not even by Wagner in Tristan and Isolde. The second theme of this valse is a caressing, syncopated sigh that makes riotous the blood and blind the judgment. It is swooning and dangerous music and even in the working out section the ingenuity of Liszt's counterpoint does not obtrude itself nor damage the integrity of the mood picture, while its decorative scheme courts comparison with Berlioz or Wagner.

It was exquisitely read by Mr. Paur and his men.

The symphony was played as it only could be played by this orchestra. The scherzo with its brace of trios, an uncomfortable nut for the purists to crack, was delightfully given. The strings, those mellow marvels, the strings of the band from Boston, never sounded so luscious, so intense as in the cantabile. The trills were superlatively fine. It is an orchestra of which you are never tempted, after the bony manner of George Eliot, to sing "Oh, may I join the choir invisible," for have we not an angelical choir, a visible choir at the concerts of this organization?

Mr. Paur conducted with unusual power and precision.

The Independent

130 FULTON STREET,

NEW YORK, December 17, 1896.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was in its finest form on Thursday night. One of our newspapers had lately advertised for a sort of sealed proposals in the way of a new motto to be descriptive of the salient merit of its pages. Perhaps the Bostonians might do the same thing, and gain thereby if not any useful enthusiasm, a good deal of condensed applause for a band incomparable. The Symphony Orchestra within a year has done more than maintain its standard under Mr. Paur. It has managed a thing that at first seemed ungraciously in hazard. It has actually made of Mr. Paur a new conductor good enough to be its leader. To the present associating of such an organization under such care as is his vastly improved kind, nobody should object. The program of this concert included Schumann's Symphony in C, the violin concerto of Tschaikovsky, with Mr. Carl Halir as soloist, and a magnificent example of the Orchestra's virtuosity in playing one of Liszt's "Episodes in Lenau's 'Faust'"—the wild waltz that Mephistopheles is supposed to be playing in the inn. The whole concert was admirable. We must get our finest musical concert performances as well as our recipes for baked beans from Boston. Apropos of the Liszt selection it might not be an unwelcome idea to the public for one of our local conductors to revive the companion number to it, which Mr. Thomas used frequently to give—the somber "Nächtliche Zug."

From Vogue
17 December
1896.

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

THe second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Metropolitan Opera House, on Thursday, 10 Dec. Herr Halir was the soloist.

The programme was one of the most uninteresting ones, unless the hearer happened to be an enthusiastic admirer of Berlioz and Liszt, which I am not. Already last week, Mr. Damrosch gave us a rather powerful dose of Berlioz, and it was fortunate that Mr. Paur was not quite so liberal. Nevertheless, we were glad when the Roman Carnival was over.

Herr Halir then performed Tschaikowski's concerto for violin, op. 35. Much as I admire—nay, love Tschaikowski, I am not so blind as to admire his poor works; and the concerto is certainly among this master's poorest productions. Occasionally a fine passage is heard, but seldom sustained. The long cadenza for the solo instrument is one of the most flagrant violations of good taste to be found in all music. Such ugly and perfectly meaningless tone-combinations grate upon the ear. In the finale (allegro vivacissimo) the composer not only becomes commonplace but so inartistic as almost to deserve the epithet "vulgar." All during the performance I asked myself: "Is this the author of the immortal Pathétique or the Marche Slave?"

Whether the poor quality of the work he performed affected Herr Halir's playing I do not know; certain it is that the eminent violinist was a great disappointment. The previous Saturday at the Symphony concert he had played brilliantly. I have not yet forgotten his rendering of Saint-Saen's Rondo Capriccioso. But in the Tschaikowski concerto his intonation was often very uncertain, and several double stops far from pure. Nevertheless, the audience demanded an encore; Herr Halir than played Bach's well-known Gavotte, without accompaniment. This number was rendered delightfully and also with perfect intonation.

Liszt's Mephisto Waltz is one of the ugliest compositions I am acquainted with. The very opening chords—those diabolical fifths in 'celli and basses set my teeth on edge. This composition is a faithful reproduction of Lenau's poetry. Liszt with evident interest reproduces every line of Lenau's disgusting Scene in the Tavern. If music could be immoral Liszt's Mephisto Waltz certainly might be called so. As it is, the composer has succeeded in heaping dissonances upon dissonances, and chosen his instruments so as to produce a painful effect by the prominence of the ugliest intervals. Hanslick strikes the nail on the head when he says:

> "Liszt simply inverts all natural laws of music; and being unable to create what is beautiful, he purposely invents what is ugly." (Concerte, p. 78.)

I do not go so far as to banish the ugly from art. Far from it. But I do object when it is carried beyond all bounds.

The very opening chords of Schumann's beautiful symphony (No. 2, C major, op. 61) sent a thrill of delight through every hearer. The spell was broken, and once more we gave ourselves up to the charms of real music.

What can I say of the performance of this programme? Instead of searching for new superlatives, I will say at once that all the works were played as only the Boston Symphony Orchestra can play them. What a pity that most of the works performed were so unworthy of the efforts made!

After the concert I discussed the programme with a great conductor, and expressed my strong dislike of the Mephisto Waltz. He smiled, and said I had not heard it to best advantage. Quoting a few passages he expressed his opinion that they should have been "rendered in a more diabolical manner." (hätten noch verteufelter gespielt werden müssen.) For the moment I was speechless. When I had recovered sufficiently, I told him that I would not forget what he had said, and would keep at a safe distance from any concert hall where the Mephisto Waltz might be performed by him.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 21, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A modern programme of Berlioz, Dvorak and Rubinstein, chiefly interesting in its first number. Berlioz's "Carnaval Romaine" overture received a splendid performance. It is one of the composer's clearest works, and is full of life and of local color.

The English horn solo was played in a manner that calls for enthusiastic praise, and the wild rush of chromatics preceding the entrance of the Saltarello was given with electrifying effect. The festive ending, the bold jumps of the Saltarello, were well caught up and the work had, on this occasion, its very best Boston performance.

Now followed that sterling artist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder in a violoncello concerto. Mr. Schroeder was heard at his very best in Steinert Hall a few days ago (why didn't they dedicate that beautiful hall by singing "Im tiefen Keller sitz' ich hier?") where evry nuance of his rich tone was garnered up in a way that was impossible in Music Hall, yet he made a very great success in spite of this difficulty and of the fact that the work which he played was not one to grow enthusiastic over.

It was a new concerto by Dvorak, the last which he wrote in America. Possibly the composer was taking leave of his American ideas in this concerto for it has some themes which remind of his "New World" symphony; or do they have negroes as well as seacoasts in Bohemia?

The first movement had a masterly contrast of themes, but a degree of reiteration of their figures in the development that was irritating. The composition began in the old-fashioned manner, the orchestra announcing the themes before the solo instrument was permitted to enter, always an awkward matter for the artist.

Spite of the ingenuity of development displayed, there seemed to be a lack of continuity, matters were not homogeneous, the movement seemed to consist of shreds and patches of thought. These are the impressions of a first hearing; possibly another performance might bring forth subtile relationships which were not apparent, yet we do not long for an opportunity of a second hearing.

The Adagio was expressive and seemed to be the best movement of the concerto. There were some sharp contrasts between melancholy and fury, but these did not seem forced or artificial. The flute was made prominent in both this and in the first movement, and was admirably played in duet work with the chief instrument. There was also a dialogue between oboe and 'cello in the adagio which was romantic and effective.

There was also a monologue for the 'cello in which Mr. Schroeder displayed all that rich tone and sympathetic quality which makes him so worthy an artist. This movement was heartily applauded, and its plaintive thoughts were not too abstruse to be fully understood even on a first hearing.

The finale began with a march-like rhythm, but the quick-step soon changed to melancholy. A Czech takes to melancholy as easily as a Teuton to beer. There was much reiteration here and Dvorak clung to his figures as a drowning man to straws. Finally a soliloquy on the violoncello led to a very brusque and dissonant end.

It was not a grateful work for the soloist, yet Mr. Schroeder did so well with his passages that there was abundance of enthusiasm and recalls at the end. The critic cannot judge how much of this was personal, yet cannot imagine that the Finale would of itself awaken great applause.

If Rubinstein had been able to sustain the nobility of the first movement through the following movements of his "Ocean" symphony, one could have pardoned him for extending the work to seven movements; as it is, one feels that he is squeezing the lemon after it is dry. The performance of Saturday was similar to the one given by Gericke some years ago, presenting six movements, of which the first and second, and fifth and sixth were the original ones, the third and fourth having been added in a revised version, the "Storm" movement only being omitted.

The critic would be happier if a reversed process of revision were to take place with this symphony and it were to be shortened to the length of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony,"' only the first and second movements being retained.

The first movement is the most glorious work ever inspired by water. Calling to mind the "Hebrides" overture, the "Calm Sea, and Happy Voyage" overture, the flow of the "Rheingold" waves, one must acknowledge that the grandeur of the ocean, the surge of the waves, has reached its truest musical voice in this number. One might take for its motto the words of Walt Whitman:—

"Today a rude and brief recitative
Of ships sailing the seas,
Each with its special flag or ship-signal.
Of unnamed heroes in the ships,
Of waves, spreading and spreading, far as the eye can reach.
Of dashing spray and the winds piping and blowing,
And out of these a chant for the sailors of all nations,
Fitful like a surge."

It was a noble performance, too, lofty, powerful and majestic. Every one of the great climaxes was broadly given—a grand interpretation of a great movement.

The second movement is somewhat weaker, yet the beautiful melody of the violins supported by harp ripples as flowing as the "Rheingold" wave-figure, made a fitting impression.

Now came a degree of prolixity, as movement followed movement. The long sustained note of the andante was a proper suggestion of immensity, but it also suggested a plagiarism from Mendelssohn's "Becalmed at Sea" introduction in which the sustained A of the violins makes the same impression and in the same way.

Some playful touches in the scherzo intimate the recreations on shipboard during the second dog-watch, and the muted tones of the horn (the ugliest tone-color of the orchestra) might intimate seasickness or some other secret sorrow coming to light.

The end with its chorale-like hymn of Thanksgiving was quite welcome after the great length of the work. Judging by the inordinate prolixity, Rubinstein must have made his ocean trips on a very slow boat.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighth symphony concert was as follows:

Berlioz: Overture to "Le Carnaval Romain," opus, 9.
Dvorak: Concerto for Violoncello, in B minor, opus. 104. (First time in Boston.)
Rubinstein: Symphony No. 2, in C major, "Ocean," opus. 42. (Second version.)

Those among the audience who did not know the "Ocean" symphony in all its various versions must have been considerably mystified last Saturday evening. The analysis of the symphony printed in the programme-books was made from the first version—in four movements; the symphony was played according to the second version—in six movements; and a little paster on the programme-page set forth what purported to be the second version, but was really no known version at all—that is, in five movements. As the order of the several movements in these three different versions did not tally, the uninitiated listener was left considerably in doubt as to what he was hearing at any given moment.

But, upon the whole, why play the "Ocean" symphony at all? Especially when we all heard it in its most terrible third version—in seven movements—two years ago. Some of us have hardly recovered from that infliction yet. The more one hears the work, the weaker and more tiresome it seems; of all its seven movements, the first and the scherzo of the second version seem the only ones it is worth while to keep. And even these are not of the sort one cares to hear often; as for the others, they are children of dullness and ennui. We have seldom been bored with music as we were with this symphony last Saturday evening.

Berlioz's "Carnaval romain" is another matter; here all is life and sparkle; it is perhaps the most thoroughly brilliant thing the composer ever wrote. And what a wealth of at once gorgeous and tender coloring there is in the introduction. The overture was played in the orchestra's best style and made an immense impression.

The new Dvorak 'celo concerto is a work which, like many other things by Dvorak, leaves one in no little doubt after the first hearing. When heard for the first time, it sounds almost too good to be true; one fears that many of the delicious moments in it will not wear well and will show some weakness with time. We have said before that Dvorak, like Beethoven, in the warmness of his heart, often verges dangerously upon the commonplace; unlike Beethoven, he does not invariably stop at verging upon it. In hearing a work of his for the first time, you are continually in doubt whether what sounds so beautiful and soulful will turn out to be pure gold in the end, or will merely be relegated to the domain of Franz Abt or Kücken on better acquaintance. So with this 'cello concerto: we have seldom been so pleasurably moved by a new work of its kind, and yet we cannot help a suspicion that it is not all in fast colors. Is its warmth of sentiment nobly human and genuine, or is it mere sentimentality? We cannot, for the life of us, tell as yet. One thing, however, we are tolerably sure of: it is a masterpiece of instrumental coloring. In spite of the fulness of the scoring, the 'cello part comes well to the surface when it has anything vital to say; and even in the virtuoso passage-work it is sufficiently audible for all truly musical purposes. Except Mr. Loeffler's admirable fantasia—played here by Mr. Schroeder some years ago—we know nothing for 'cello and orchestra in which the solo instrument and accompaniment are played off against each other with such perfect skill.

One feature of this concerto has unfortunately been made the basis of a rather amusing misunderstanding. It was stated in the programme-book for last Saturday evening's concert that, in writing this concerto, Dr. Dvorak had had the assistance of Mr. Schroeder for much of the virtuoso passage-work, and that Mr. Schroeder had written many of such passages himself. An esteemed contemporary hereupon declares that Mr. Schroeder was an important collaborator on the composition, and that more than half the glory belongs properly to him. This is making a rather stupendous mountain out of a modest molehill. In seeking Mr. Schroeder's aid, Dr. Dvorak did only what every intelligent composer does, when writing a concerto for an instrument on which he himself is not a virtuoso; he got Mr. Schroeder to help him in the ornamental passage-work, to insure its being technically well written for the instrument; just as Brahms got Joachim to help him in his violin concerto. There is probably not an idea, a progression, a bit of form, development, or coloring in the whole concerto that originated with Mr. Schroeder—whose well-known modesty was probably shocked enough at finding himself raised to the imposing level of collaborator and sharer in glory.

In one way, though, he can fairly share the glory: by his admirable playing of the solo part. Mr. Schroeder has always played well since he came to Boston, generally superbly; but last Saturday evening he fairly outdid himself. He richly deserved the warm and hearty applause he got.

The next programme is: Handel, overture in D; Gluck, selections from ballet-music in "Don Juan;" Bizet, suite, "Jeu d'Enfants;" Humperdinck, two selections from music to the fairy tale, "The Children of the King;" Haydn, symphony. The public rehearsal comes on Thursday afternoon, instead of on Friday.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. C., NO. 173.

SUNDAY, DEC. 20, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Dvorak Concerto for 'Cello in B Minor the Novelty.

Opening Allegro Its Best Portion—Performance of Mr. Schroeder, the Soloist, Characterized by Ease in Execution—Brilliant Rendering of the Berlioz Overture.

The programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last night consisted of:

Overture, "The Roman Carnival"......Berlois
Concerto for violoncello, in B minor, op. 104..............................Dvorak
Ocean Symphony (second version)....Rubinstein

Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the soloist, and the novelty of the concert was the 'cello concerto, which was given here for the first time. It is scarcely a work that will add to its composer's reputation. According to the programme book, it was one of the last compositions written by Dr. Dvorak before leaving the United States, and this would seem to be borne out by the fact that there is much in the first movement that recalls the American symphony and the American quartet, while the composer was under the influence of what he imagined to be our national negro melodies.

There is little in it that is spontaneous in effect, and is, on the whole, dry and labored, not to say tiresome. Its most interesting feature is its orchestration, which is often rich, and almost always piquant and charming. There are long stretches of mere commonplace, and much of groping after something that is rarely, if ever, reached. The solo part is frequently clouded by the instrumentation and kept in a secondary place, and more frequently reduced to ineffective "passage work."

The opening allegro is the best portion of the concerto, but it is lengthened out until it becomes at last dull. The adagio has a pretty principal theme, but it is lacking in originality and has something of the effect of trite cheapness. The final is uninteresting and perfunctory generally. In fact, Dr. Dvorak seems to have composed the work when he had little if anything important to say, and, as a consequence, "ran emptyings," and ran them too long.

Unless the 'cello is written for judiciously as well as skilfully its tone speedily becomes monotonous. It is heard at its best in broad, singing themes, but of these Dvorak has been sparing, while he has been more than generous in bravura that means nothing, and in addition fails to prove effective.

The work taxes the technique of the performer severely, for it abounds in difficulties, but these were fully met by Mr. Schroeder, whose performance was characterized throughout by that pure classic taste, refinement of style, beauty of phrasing, tunefulness and smoothness and ease in execution that are always delightful qualities in his playing. Especially graceful in expression and broadly artistic in sentiment was his interpretation of the adagio, and the worth of his rendering of the concerto as a whole was fittingly rewarded by the appreciative and prolonged applause and the many stormy recalls that followed the close of his efforts.

The Berlioz overture, still remarkable in its fiery brilliancy and in the splendor, effectiveness, and even novelty of its instrumentation, received a splendid reading at the hands of Mr. Paur and a glorious performance by the orchestra. It is difficult to recall when it has been given here with the rhythmic swing, the vigorous emphasis and the dazzling effects of light and shade that distinguished its presentation last night. It was one of Mr. Paur's most marked successes of the season thus far.

The "Ocean" symphony, though doubtless Rubenstein's greatest orchestral work, does not hold its own very well. Though on its first appearance it was hailed as a masterpiece, its themes now appear to be exceedingly slight and over-elaborated, and its sentiment to be somewhat bombastic. That its composer was enamored of it is evidenced by the fact that he extended its original four movements to seven. Nevertheless, it appears to be going the way of many of Rubinstein's larger compositions for the orchestra, by reason of the disproportion in them of tinsel to pure gold.

The opening movement was given with immense fervor, and this set the pace for the interpretation and performance, which were, in all essentials, admirable, but the primal glory of the work has faded.

A delightful and model programme has been arranged for the next concert. It is: Overture, Handel (first time); ballet music from "Don Juan," Gluck (first time); suite, "Children's Play," Bizet (first time); two selections from "The Children of the King," Humperdinck (first time); symphony, Haydn. The next public rehearsal will take place on Thursday afternoon.

BOSTON [illegible]

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1896.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Dvorak's 'Cello Concerto the One Novelty.

The program of the eighth Symphony Concert, given last evening in Music Hall, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "Roman Carnival"........Berlioz
Concerto for Violoncello, in B minor, Op. 104..................................Dvorak
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 2, in C major, "Ocean"..
Rubinstein

I.—Allegro.
II.—Allegro.
III.—Adagio.
IV.—Scherzo; Presto.
V.—Adagio; Allegro con fuoco.

The overture of Berlioz was played brilliantly; and with this performance pleasure ended.

Dvorák's 'cello concerto was produced for the first time at a concert of the London Philharmonic Society, March 19, 1896. Leo Stern played the solo part and the composer conducted. The first performance in Germany was at Würzburg in October when Hugo Becker was the soloist.

I confess I see no excuse in this enlightened age for a 'cello concerto, unless the concerto be very short and of two strongly contrasted movements. The instrument is not well adapted to a work of long breath. There is a sweet cantabile, and then comes the bravura described by no less an authority than Hanslick as a chasing of flies up and down the strings. Now a little of this goes a great way. Add to this the inevitable monotony due to the sombre quality of the instrument.

Dvorák in this concerto, as in other late works of his, has run emptyings. His themes are for the most part ultra-sentimental, or vulgar; his development of them is gilded padding; the whole effect is one of insincerity rather than the naïveté, that was truly one of his distinguishing characteristics before he wrote under contract for English audiences and English publishers. The second movement, an adagio ma non troppo, will undoubtedly be popular, and the 'cellist will reap a harvest of applause, but the music is neither lofty nor of real sensuous beauty; and we have a right to expect better things from the Bohemian. There are passages in the concerto that sound as though they were thought of originally for the alleged Negro Symphony, and were rejected; but rejected with care, saved for future use. As a whole, the work is dull, and no brilliancy of orchestration can remove the impression of dullness. Even brilliancy itself is often dull. Another sign of Dvorák's failing powers in his interminable good-by to a theme. He pumps its hands; he will not let it go, although they may be standing on a wind-swept corner.

Mr. Schroeder displayed his fine, sanely-controlled tone and his sure, unostentatious technique, and was rewarded therefor liberally by the audience. His task was an onerous one; but he accomplished it with as much conscientiousness and heart as though he were laboring in the service of a kind master.

"Ocean, thou mighty monster" might serve as a motto for Rubinstein's Symphony. This symphony is indeed a monstrous thing—especially in length. In the first movement there is the roll of the waves, there is the suspicion of creaking cordage, there is the smell of brine. But, as after the first few days at sea, then comes the monotony of the voyage; and in Music Hall last night there was no diverting shovel-board, nor was the program-book a sufficient substitute for a novel crammed with incident. Stay, the entr' acte, entitled "Art Culture" was well worth reading.

* * *

SUNDAY, DEC. 20, 1896.

Eighth Symphony Concert.

Alwin Schroeder was the soloist at the symphony performances of Friday and Saturday, and there was something a little unusual about the program inasmuch as he appeared in a selection which he helped to compose. The work was Antonin Dvorak's concerto for violoncello in B minor, one of the last compositions written by him while in this country. In most of the bravura passages for the solc instrument he had the assistance of Mr Schroeder, and, indeed, many of these were written entirely by the latter. Perhaps Mr Schroeder entered a little more into the spirit of the work on this account when he appeared before a Boston audience. At any rate he scored a great success, and doubtless the applause was intended for Mr Schroeder the composer as well as for the soloist.

The concert opened with Hector Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture, not a very heavy work or one too severely classical, but certainly very musical and enjoyable. The little moonlight dance movement in the main body of the overture was given with a fairy-like delicacy little short of perfection.

The concerto was of course the second number, and as Mr Schroeder walked from his accustomed place in the orchestra he was given a hearty round of applause. It was in the first movement that the soloist seemed to make his greatest success. This embraced a great deal of very difficult passage work, giving the player an opportunity to show his marvelous control of the cello. But there was also in this movement, and especially in the cantilena, much that was purely musical and well adapted to bring out that characteristic of the cello that makes it most lovable, the singing quality, the long-drawn, vibrant tones, so like the human voice. Mr Schroeder is a master of this tone as well as of the technical difficulties of the instrument, and held the closest attention of his hearers as only an artist can do. The notable feature of the second movement was the playing of the melody by the solo instrument against counter-phrases in the wood winds and then the latter taking up the melody and the cello furnishing the accompaniment.

The third movement is a brilliant and elaborately developed rondo, in fact it seems a trifle over-developed, or at least the movement would be improved by pruning, for it is a little too long, though this was less noticeable on account of the superb playing of Mr Schroeder. At the close the soloist was rewarded with round after round of applause, concertmaster Franz Kneisel leading in paying tribute to his brother musician, and director Paur giving him his hand as he came forward for the third or fourth time to bow his acknowledgments. It was no perfunctory applause but a sincere and spontaneous expression of approval that must have been very gratifying to the painstaking and ambitious musician.

Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony was a fitting close to a fine program. This was first given in Boston in 1873. It was afterward changed and lengthened a great deal by the composer and in its extended form was given in this city two years ago. The present performance, however, was of the work in its original form of four movements. The ocean in all its phases is portrayed. There is the calmness of the summer sea in the peaceful rippling of the first violins with the accompanying soft murmur of the wood-winds and the basses, and there is the thunder of the storm when the sea is aroused, when deep calleth unto deep and the great waves break on the shore with a mighty boom. There is the sudden gathering of the storm and its gradual sullen ebbing away to a monotonous murmur as the thunder dies in the distance. The work is well interpreted, though in some of the difficult passages there was a trifling inaccuracy of attack on the part of the first violins which seemed to annoy Mr Paur more than it did the audience.

Next week's rehearsal and concert, the former to be given Thursday, will be devoted almost entirely to new music, the program including selections by Handel, Gluck, Bizet and Humperdinck.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 20.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the eighth Symphony concert, given in Music Hall on Saturday evening, is:

Overture, "Roman Carnival"............Berlioz
Concerto for violoncello, B minor, op. 104, ... Dvorak
Symphony No. 2, C minor, op. 42.....Rubinstein
Soloist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

The programme informs us that the concerto "was one of the last compositions written by Dr. Dvorak before leaving the United States," and "in much of the bravura passage work for the solo instrument he had the assistance of Mr. Alwin Schroeder, who, indeed, wrote many of the passages himself." There is a certain dreariness about the work, a solemn heaviness that weighs on the spirit, despite some most taking and brilliant pages, and many of the themes are suggestive of commonplace, despite the elaborate ornamentation with which they are encrusted. Judging from one hearing, the chief interest of the work is intellectual, and not emotional, born of knowledge and not of feeling; the slow movement, perhaps, being an exception. There is no suggestion of spontaneity, no decision born of conviction; ideas are developed to the point of weariness, and the development is more interesting than the ideas. The slow movement is the most attractive portion of the work, but it would have been more effective if it were not merged in the one tone color that pervades the entire work. Nothing but praise is due to Mr. Schroeder; the concerto gave him ample opportunity to show his mastery of technique and to display his fine art taste. He played honestly, simply and with dignity, absorbed in his work to the forgetfulness of self, and he won a well deserved triumph. The large, flowing, smooth style in which the slow movement was played was particularly praiseworthy, and nothing could have been more brilliant and satisfactory than his reading of the finale.

It is almost needless to write anything about Mr. Paur and his orchestra, for nothing new can be said in the way of praise. Attention, however, may be called to the noble manner in which the Rubinstein symphony was interpreted, and to the brilliancy, dash and high finish that distinguished the reading of the Berlioz overture.

The concert to be given next week includes the name of Handel, Gluck, Bizet, Humperdinck and Haydn.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 20, 1896.

The seventh symphony programme must necessarily be dismissed somewhat curtly today. It began with the familiar "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, which, being brilliantly played, stirred the listeners with its busy bustle, charmed them with its romance, and aroused them again with the swift vitality of its conclusion. The last number was the "Ocean" symphony of Rubinstein, presented according to its original arrangement, and as usual creating interest and giving pleasure. For admit as one may its author's genius and his mastery of expression as displayed in many pages of the enlarged and extended score, one can hardly help feeling that it is too long and often too ponderous for aesthetic enjoyment, although it always repays the scholar's or the artist's consideration. But in the simpler primary form there is as much as the hearer can comfortably receive and profitably digest, and its four movements stand out individually, with their pictures of the restless, stormy or tranquil sea, the sadness of the great void and the careless buoyancy of them who go down to it in ships.

Between these numbers was set the novelty, which was Dvorak's B minor concerto for violoncello, opus 104, composed only a little while before he left America for home. It is a work full of matter, and is too detailed and intricate to be entirely taken in at one hearing or described offhand. Thematic material is nobly supplied and ingeniously developed, often along quite new lines. In the first movement the prominent motives are a short, sharply-marked, gypsy-like phrase and a softer, longer melody of romantic cast. In the second a devotional subject is chief, while in the finale are three themes, of which the first has almost a martial swing. Chief characteristics of the work are its dignity and concentration. The rich, noble lower register of the 'cello is much considered and the solo part has breadth, fullness and earnestness. There is a plenty of display too; but the performer has no mere cadensa to dazzle with, although he must use his best skill in giving clarity and precision to the brilliant and elaborate developments assigned him. The orchestral score is very ingenious and elegant, some of the combinations for the 'cello with the wind instruments being as effective as they are novel. This portion is also affluent in subordinate, but still important, comments and episodes, which stand quite apart and yet do not seem irrelevant. The allegros have their times of repose and reflection, and the finale, after recalling in its moods the opening movement, ends in large, grave and melting measures.

Mr. Schroeder played the concerto to perfection. His tone was ever beautiful, his sustained passages simple and deep, and his execution wonderfully distinct and nice, fairly rivalling the delivery of a violin. We have never heard him to finer advantage in any respect.

The next programme is: Handel, overture, (first time); Gluck, Selection from Ballet Music to "Don Juan," (first time); Bizet, Suite, "Jeu d'Enfants," (first time); Humperdinck, Two Selections from the Music to the Fairy Tale, "The Children of the King," (first time); Haydn, Symphony.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. C., NO. 173.
SUNDAY, DEC. 20, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Dvorak Concerto for 'Cello in B Minor the Novelty.

Opening Allegro Its Best Portion—Performance of Mr. Schroeder, the Soloist, Characterized by Ease in Execution—Brilliant Rendering of the Berlioz Overture.

The programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last night consisted of:

Overture, "The Roman Carnival".......Berloiz
Concerto for violoncello, in B minor, op. 104..................................Dvorak
Ocean Symphony (second version)....Rubinstein

Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the soloist, and the novelty of the concert was the 'cello concerto, which was given here for the first time. It is scarcely a work that will add to its composer's reputation. According to the programme book, it was one of the last compositions written by Dr. Dvorak before leaving the United States, and this would seem to be borne out by the fact that there is much in the first movement that recalls the American symphony and the American quartet, while the composer was under the influence of what he imagined to be our national negro melodies.

There is little in it that is spontaneous in effect, and is, on the whole, dry and labored, not to say tiresome. Its most interesting feature is its orchestration, which is often rich, and almost always piquant and charming. There are long stretches of mere commonplace, and much of groping after something that is rarely, if ever, reached. The solo part is frequently clouded by the instrumentation and kept in a secondary place, and more frequently reduced to ineffective "passage work."

The opening allegro is the best portion of the concerto, but it is lengthened out until it becomes at last dull. The adagio has a pretty principal theme, but it is lacking in originality and has something of the effect of trite cheapness. The final is uninteresting and perfunctory generally. In fact, Dr. Dvorak seems to have composed the work when he had little if anything important to say, and, as a consequence, "ran emptyings," and ran them too long.

Unless the 'cello is written for judiciously as well as skilfully its tone speedily becomes monotonous. It is heard at its best in broad, singing themes, but of these Dvorak has been sparing, while he has been more than generous in bravura that means nothing, and in addition fails to prove effective.

The work taxes the technique of the performer severely, for it abounds in difficulties, but these were fully met by Mr. Schroeder, whose performance was characterized throughout by that pure classic taste, refinement of style, beauty of phrasing, tunefulness and smoothness and ease in execution that are always delightful qualities in his playing. Especially graceful in expression and broadly artistic in sentiment was his interpretation of the adagio, and the worth of his rendering of the concerto as a whole was fittingly rewarded by the appreciative and prolonged applause and the many stormy recalls that followed the close of his efforts.

The Berlioz overture, still remarkable in its fiery brilliancy and in the splendor, effectiveness, and even novelty of its instrumentation, received a splendid reading at the hands of Mr. Paur and a glorious performance by the orchestra. It is difficult to recall when it has been given here with the rhythmic swing, the vigorous emphasis and the dazzling effects of light and shade that distinguished its presentation last night. It was one of Mr. Paur's most marked successes of the season thus far.

The "Ocean" symphony, though doubtless Rubenstein's greatest orchestral work, does not hold its own very well. Though on its first appearance it was hailed as a masterpiece, its themes now appear to be exceedingly slight and over-elaborated, and its sentiment to be somewhat bombastic. That its composer was enamored of it is evidenced by the fact that he extended its original four movements to seven. Nevertheless, it appears to be going the way of many of Rubinstein's larger compositions for the orchestra, by reason of the disproportion in them of tinsel to pure gold.

The opening movement was given with immense fervor, and this set the pace for the interpretation and performance, which were, in all essentials, admirable, but the primal glory of the work has faded.

A delightful and model programme has been arranged for the next concert. It is: Overture, Handel (first time); ballet music from "Don Juan," Gluck (first time); suite, "Children's Play," Bizet (first time); two selections from "The Children of the King," Humperdinck (first time); symphony, Haydn. The next public rehearsal will take place on Thursday afternoon.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1896.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Dvorak's 'Cello Concerto the One Novelty.

The program of the eighth Symphony Concert, given last evening in Music Hall, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "Roman Carnival".........Berlioz
Concerto for Violoncello, in B minor, Op. 104..................................Dvorak
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 2, in C major, "Ocean".. Rubinstein
I.—Allegro.
II.—Allegro.
III.—Adagio.
IV.—Scherzo; Presto.
V.—Adagio; Allegro con fuoco.

The overture of Berlioz was played brilliantly; and with this performance pleasure ended.

Dvorák's 'cello concerto was produced for the first time at a concert of the London Philharmonic Society, March 19, 1896. Leo Stern played the solo part and the composer conducted. The first performance in Germany was at Würzburg in October when Hugo Becker was the soloist.

I confess I see no excuse in this enlightened age for a 'cello concerto, unless the concerto be very short and of two strongly contrasted movements. The instrument is not well adapted to a work of long breath. There is a sweet cantabile, and then comes the bravura described by no less an authority than Hanslick as a chasing of flies up and down the strings. Now a little of this goes a great way. Add to this the inevitable monotony due to the sombre quality of the instrument.

Dvorák in this concerto, as in other late works of his, has run emptyings. His themes are for the most part ultra-sentimental, or vulgar; his development of them is gilded padding; the whole effect is one of insincerity rather than the naïveté, that was truly one of his distinguishing characteristics before he wrote under contract for English audiences and English publishers. The second movement, an adagio ma non troppo, will undoubtedly be popular, and the 'cellist will reap a harvest of applause, but the music is neither lofty nor of real sensuous beauty; and we have a right to expect better things from the Bohemian. There are passages in the concerto that sound as though they were thought of originally for the alleged Negro Symphony, and were rejected; but rejected with care, saved for future use. As a whole, the work is dull, and no brilliancy of orchestration can remove the impression of dullness. Even brilliancy itself is often dull. Another sign of Dvorák's failing powers in his interminable good-by to a theme. He pumps its hands; he will not let it go, although they may be standing on a wind-swept corner.

Mr. Schroeder displayed his fine, sanely-controlled tone and his sure, unostentatious technique, and was rewarded therefor liberally by the audience. His task was an onerous one; but he accomplished it with as much conscientiousness and heart as though he were laboring in the service of a kind master.

"Ocean, thou mighty monster" might serve as a motto for Rubinstein's Symphony. This symphony is indeed a monstrous thing—especially in length. In the first movement there is the roll of the waves, there is the suspicion of creaking cordage, there is the smell of brine. But, as after the first few days at sea, then comes the monotony of the voyage; and in Music Hall last night there was no diverting shovel-board, nor was the program-book a sufficient substitute for a novel crammed with incident. Stay, the entr' acte, entitled "Art Culture" was well worth reading.

* * *

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, DEC. 20, 1896.

Eighth Symphony Concert.

Alwin Schroeder was the soloist at the symphony performances of Friday and Saturday, and there was something a little unusual about the program inasmuch as he appeared in a selection which he helped to compose. The work was Antonin Dvorak's concerto for violoncello in B minor, one of the last compositions written by him while in this country. In most of the bravura passages for the solo instrument he had the assistance of Mr Schroeder, and, indeed, many of these were written entirely by the latter. Perhaps Mr Schroeder entered a little more into the spirit of the work on this account when he appeared before a Boston audience. At any rate he scored a great success, and doubtless the applause was intended for Mr Schroeder the composer as well as for the soloist.

The concert opened with Hector Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture, not a very heavy work or one too severely classical, but certainly very musical and enjoyable. The little moonlight dance movement in the main body of the overture was given with a fairy-like delicacy little short of perfection.

The concerto was of course the second number, and as Mr Schroeder walked from his accustomed place in the orchestra he was given a hearty round of applause. It was in the first movement that the soloist seemed to make his greatest success. This embraced a great deal of very difficult passage work, giving the player an opportunity to show his marvelous control of the cello. But there was also in this movement, and especially in the cantilena, much that was purely musical and well adapted to bring out that characteristic of the cello that makes it most lovable, the singing quality, the long-drawn, vibrant tones, so like the human voice. Mr Schroeder is a master of this tone as well as of the technical difficulties of the instrument, and held the closest attention of his hearers as only an artist can do. The notable feature of the second movement was the playing of the melody by the solo instrument against counter-phrases in the wood winds and then the latter taking up the melody and the cello furnishing the accompaniment.

The third movement is a brilliant and elaborately developed rondo, in fact it seems a trifle over-developed, or at least the movement would be improved by pruning, for it is a little too long, though this was less noticeable on account of the superb playing of Mr Schroeder. At the close the soloist was rewarded with round after round of applause, concertmaster Franz Kneisel leading in paying tribute to his brother musician, and director Paur giving him his hand as he came forward for the third or fourth time to bow his acknowledgments. It was no perfunctory applause but a sincere and spontaneous expression of approval that must have been very gratifying to the painstaking and ambitious musician.

Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony was a fitting close to a fine program. This was first given in Boston in 1873. It was afterward changed and lengthened a great deal by the composer and in its extended form was given in this city two years ago. The present performance, however, was of the work in its original form of four movements. The ocean in all its phases is portrayed. There is the calmness of the summer sea in the peaceful rippling of the first violins with the accompanying soft murmur of the wood-winds and the basses, and there is the thunder of the storm when the sea is aroused, when deep calleth unto deep and the great waves break on the shore with a mighty boom. There is the sudden gathering of the storm and its gradual sullen ebbing away to a monotonous murmur as the thunder dies in the distance. The work is well interpreted, though in some of the difficult passages there was a trifling inaccuracy of attack on the part of the first violins which seemed to annoy Mr Paur more than it did the audience.

Next week's rehearsal and concert, the former to be given Thursday, will be devoted almost entirely to new music, the program including selections by Handel, Gluck, Bizet and Humperdinck.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 20.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the eighth Symphony concert, given in Music Hall on Saturday evening, is:

Overture, "Roman Carnival"............Berlioz
Concerto for violoncello, B minor, op. 104, ... Dvorak
Symphony No. 2, C minor, op. 42.....Rubinstein
Soloist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

The programme informs us that the concerto "was one of the last compositions written by Dr. Dvorak before leaving the United States," and "in much of the bravura passage work for the solo instrument he had the assistance of Mr. Alwin Schroeder, who, indeed, wrote many of the passages himself." There is a certain dreariness about the work, a solemn heaviness that weighs on the spirit, despite some most taking and brilliant pages, and many of the themes are suggestive of commonplace, despite the elaborate ornamentation with which they are encrusted. Judging from one hearing, the chief interest of the work is intellectual, and not emotional, born of knowledge and not of feeling; the slow movement, perhaps, being an exception. There is no suggestion of spontaneity, no decision born of conviction; ideas are developed to the point of weariness, and the development is more interesting than the ideas. The slow movement is the most attractive portion of the work, but it would have been more effective if it were not merged in the one tone color that pervades the entire work. Nothing but praise is due to Mr. Schroeder; the concerto gave him ample opportunity to show his mastery of technique and to display his fine art taste. He played honestly, simply and with dignity, absorbed in his work to the forgetfulness of self, and he won a well deserved triumph. The large, flowing, smooth style in which the slow movement was played was particularly praiseworthy, and nothing could have been more brilliant and satisfactory than his reading of the finale.

It is almost needless to write anything about Mr. Paur and his orchestra, for nothing new can be said in the way of praise. Attention, however, may be called to the noble manner in which the Rubinstein symphony was interpreted, and to the brilliancy, dash and high finish that distinguished the reading of the Berlioz overture.

The concert to be given next week includes the name of Handel, Gluck, Bizet, Humperdinck and Haydn.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 20, 1896.

The seventh symphony programme must necessarily be dismissed somewhat curtly today. It began with the familiar "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz, which, being brilliantly played, stirred the listeners with its busy bustle, charmed them with its romance, and aroused them again with the swift vitality of its conclusion. The last number was the "Ocean" symphony of Rubinstein, presented according to its original arrangement, and as usual creating interest and giving pleasure. For admit as one may its author's genius and his mastery of expression as displayed in many pages of the enlarged and extended score, one can hardly help feeling that it is too long and often too ponderous for aesthetic enjoyment, although it always repays the scholar's or the artist's consideration. But in the simpler primary form there is as much as the hearer can comfortably receive and profitably digest, and its four movements stand out individually, with their pictures of the restless, stormy or tranquil sea, the sadness of the great void and the careless buoyancy of them who go down to it in ships.

Between these numbers was set the novelty, which was Dvorak's B minor concerto for violoncello, opus 104, composed only a little while before he left America for home. It is a work full of matter, and is too detailed and intricate to be entirely taken in at one hearing or described offhand. Thematic material is nobly supplied and ingeniously developed, often along quite new lines. In the first movement the prominent motives are a short, sharply-marked, gypsy-like phrase and a softer, longer melody of romantic cast. In the second a devotional subject is chief, while in the finale are three themes, of which the first has almost a martial swing. Chief characteristics of the work are its dignity and concentration. The rich, noble lower register of the 'cello is much considered and the solo part has breadth, fullness and earnestness. There is a plenty of display too; but the performer has no mere cadensa to dazzle with, although he must use his best skill in giving clarity and precision to the brilliant and elaborate developments assigned him. The orchestral score is very ingenious and elegant, some of the combinations for the 'cello with the wind instruments being as effective as they are novel. This portion is also affluent in subordinate, but still important, comments and episodes, which stand quite apart and yet do not seem irrelevant. The allegros have their times of repose and reflection, and the finale, after recalling in its moods the opening movement, ends in large, grave and melting measures.

Mr. Schroeder played the concerto to perfection. His tone was ever beautiful, his sustained passages simple and deep, and his execution wonderfully distinct and nice, fairly rivalling the delivery of a violin. We have never heard him to finer advantage in any respect.

The next programme is: Handel, overture, (first time); Gluck, Selection from Ballet Music to "Don Juan," (first time); Bizet, Suite, "Jeu d'Enfants," (first time); Humperdinck, Two Selections from the Music to the Fairy Tale, "The Children of the King," (first time); Haydn, Symphony.

[illegible]

MONDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1896.

The Symphony.

Sixteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; eighth concert, Mr. Alwin Schroeder, soloist. Programme:

Overture to "The Roman Carnival"..... ....Hector Berlioz
Concerto for Violincello, in B minor..... ....Antonin Dvorak
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 2, in C major, "Ocean".. ....Anton Rubinstein
(Original version.)

The 'cello concerto was a great disappointment, chiefly because it was undeniably dull. Writings for this instrument, which is surely going out of fashion for solo performances, must possess two properties at least—beauty and clearness. Neither of these has Dvorak expressed in the present work. The few themes are commonplace and trivial, and over the whole is a species of orchestration that blurs and conceals the tone of the 'cello in a really remarkable way. When it appears with any distinctness, as in rapid passages in the upper strings, it sounds thin and wiry. We scarcely think Mr. Schroeder is to blame for this acidity of tone, for he has proven himself a 'cellist of much ability. The fact is that Dvorak has not at all succeeded in writing a characteristic piece for the instrument.

But if the living Dvorak is gradually forcing us to say that his day seems to be declining, the dead Berlioz, once jeered at, is making his place in the realms of lasting music more secure at every hearing. The nobility and splendor of conception of this "Roman Carnival" overture, the perfect clarity, yet wondrous richness of its instrumentation, and the subtlety of its climaxes never produced a finer effect than at this last concert. Nor has the work ever been better played. It was as exciting as if it had never been heard before.

Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony has much in it to admire, and also considerable to grow weary over. There is sea enough in the first movement, which has always received unstinted praise. The andante has a theme of much beauty, well elaborated, but thereafter is music machine made and long drawn out. The work was given a fine reading and performance. Poorly played it would be intolerable.

W. D. QUINT.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1896.

The program of the eighth Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Overture, Roman Carnival..................................Berlioz
Concerto for 'cello in B minor.................. ....Dvorák
(First time in Boston.)
Ocean Symphony..................................Rubinstein
(Second version.)

This concert was, on the whole, a dull one, although Mr. Schroeder's artistry was displayed constantly in the concerto, and the performance of the orchestra was fully up to its high standard. Undisturbed pleasure ceased with the final chord of the overture.

I fail to see any excuse for the composition of a 'cello concerto in these days. A piece with a suave andante, followed by an allegro for display of agility, may serve the purpose of solo players, but a 'cello concerto of conventional length is an abomination of desolation. For the tone of the instrument, even when the 'cello rests between the legs of the accomplished Mr. Schroeder, soon cloys, and in bravura passages the hearer tires quickly of the sound of flies chased up and down the strings.

Dvorák seems in this concerto to have used material that was proposed for his alleged negro symphony. The themes are either sentimental or trivial, and the padding in the development is gilded by orchestral means. The "naïveté," which some still delight in, is to be found, but it is insincerity, or tired indifference, rather than the true naïveté in his earlier works, before he knew anything about the Birmingham Festival or had learned how easily English audiences were pleased.

The statement was made a fortnight ago that the original version of Rubinstein's Ocean symphony would be played. Last night the program bore a pasted slip, "second version;" but there were five movements played. At least I suppose they were, for I heard only the first one, and even that sounded strangely old fashioned. The Roman Carnival overture of Berlioz was first played here in 1857, and last night it sounded as fresh and surprising as though it were in manuscript and produced as a novelty. Laforgue once spoke of the always respectable sea. I fear that the first movement of the Ocean symphony is best described as "respectable."

The public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place on Thursday afternoon, December 24, because of Christmas Day falling on Friday this year.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 27, 1896.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Novelties by Humperdinck, Bizet, and Even Gluck and Handel Played Last Night in Music Hall by the Symphony Orchestra Under Mr. Paur.

The program of the ninth Symphony concert was as follows:

Selections from the ballet "Don Juan"..Gluck
Arranged by Hermann Kretzschmar.
(First time in Boston.)
1. Overture, allegro pomposo, D major.
Andante grazioso, D major.
Trio, D minor.
2. Brillante, A major.
Allegretto, D major.
Allegretto risoluto.
Allegretto tranquillo, A major.
Alegretto, F major.
3. Grazioso, Andantino, A major, Menuet.
4. Finale, larghetto, D minor.
Allegro non troppo, D minor.
Symphony in C minor (B. & H., No. 9) Haydn
Selections from the music to "King's Children" ....Humperdinck
(First time in Boston).
1. Introduction to Act III.
"Ruined and Dead."
"Fiddler's Last Song."
2. Introduction to Act II.
"The Feast of Hella."
"Children's Dance."
Little Suite, "Children's Games," Op. 22. Bizet.
(First time in Boston.)
1. March, "Trumpets and Drums."
2. Berceuse, "The Doll."
3. Impromptu, "The Top."
4. Duo, "Little Husband, Little Wife."
5. Galop, "The Ball."
Overture No. 1, in D major...........Handel
Arranged by Franz Wullner.
(First time in Boston.)

The music of Gluck's ballet has more than a historical interest, for the andante grazioso and the menuet preceded by the pizzicato passages are of real beauty. There was also an opportunity given for learning the value of a trombone when it enters for the first time and with a special purpose. We are accustomed today to such liberal use of all known instruments when the ultra-modern composer wishes to express a simple thought, that the sobriety of Gluck's orchestration is refreshing, and the thought arises, "Have we really in certain ways made such a marvelous advance in music?"

I speak of the character of this ballet in "About Music" this morning, and it is not necessary to refer to it here. There are many pictures to be found in the books on costume and dancing which give us a better idea of the ballets of the 18th century than we can find in learned disquisitions on the stage of that period. The music may seem formal to this generation, but these tunes are not as stiff as the costumes of the dancers who gained and squandered vast sums, heated the blood of the gilded youth, and set kings by the ears.

This is the music that suited the dance when it was something more than a zenith-defying kick and a display of intimate laces. No doubt the ballet of that period would seem to us a slow and formal thing; but much of Gluck's music to "Don Juan" is still fresh and lovely.

⁂

Humperdinck's music to "Königskinder" is theatre music. When it is transferred to the concert hall, some explanation of the play which it accompanies and illustrates and enhances should be given to the audience. "Verdorben-gestorben"—"Spielmann's letzer Gesang"—"Hellafest"—"Kinder-Reigen"—These words appear in the program book; but to what purpose?

The story of the drama for which Humperdinck wrote these preludes is told this morning in "About Music." Now, although it is the day after the fair, let me describe the character of these pieces. I am indebted largely for this description to the admirable program books prepared by Friedrich Brandes for the Symphony concerts of the Dresden Royal Opera Orchestra. Mr. Paur reversed the order of the preludes.

The prelude to Act III. opens with mournful, lonesome chords given to the wood-wind, while the English horn and the first horn sound the "Lamentation" motiv, which, short and incisive, appears in various forms throughout the prelude. These chords are repeated by other wind instruments. The idea of this tone-picture is desolation, the desolation of the wintry forest and the exiled children wandering, hungry and cold. The oboe sings in mournful recollection of the short happiness known in love. The violins take up the song of grief. The children are dead; they lie in each other's arms. The loyal fiddler finds them and pronounces their elegy. There are hints of the two former motivs which interrupt the dirge of the horns. Then follows the apotheosis.

The prelude to Act II. tells of the rejoicing expectation at Hellabrunn, as the people await their ruler. There is dancing. A child's rattle is heard. The town children enter and dance the "Rosenringel," the theme of which is given first by the clarinet; at the end the children's simple tune is sung in frenzy by the whole orchestra.

Of course, we know this music only as concert music. We are not able to judge of its effectiveness in the theatre. As concert-music without dramatic association, it seems to me to be chiefly interesting on account of its orchestration, which is fully in the manner of Wagner. Outside of this sumptuous orchestration, I find little of worth or interest. The slow movement reminds one of the building up of the "Tristan" prelude, and if there is any choice between the two preludes to acts of "Königskinder," the slow movement is the one to be preferred.

But Humperdinck makes his little fishes talk like whales.

Now Bizet's suite "Jeux des [illegible]" suggests children and their games, and his refined and telling orchestration is more effective—as absolute orchestral music—than the Wagnerian copy by Humperdinck. The funny pomp of the March is characteristic; so is the sweetness and simplicity of "The Doll." In the capricious "Top" there is not a measure that is not truly musical. "Little Husband, Little Wife" was exaggerated by the strings. Look at the score! See how pretty and subdued is the melody given to the first violins. As is too often the case of late, there was incongruous, preposterous passion, as though the boy and girl were erotic hero and heroine in one of Massenet's pornographic novels. Nor was the final galop played with the necessary brilliancy and dash. The rhythm was logy.

A delightful little suite, and Mr. Paur is to be thanked for producing it, even at this late day, when it is 23 years old.

⁂

The overture by Handel sounded like unto 250 or 300 other pieces by the pious and industrious composer. His wig in this piece was of most formidable proportions, and he shook it constantly.

Nor was the symphony by Haydn a rare delight. Much of it was decidedly boresome. And I should like to hear a vivace or an allegro of Haydn or Mozart led at the proper pace by Mr. Paur. The slow allegro was a wonderful wild-fowl at first but acquaintance with it turns it into a very featherless absurd thing.

PHILIP HALE.

Singular Omissions in Symphony Program.

Mr. William F. Apthorp, in his program book of the 26th, makes this reference to the selections from the music to "King's Children," by Engelbert Humperdinck: "I have unfortunately been unable to find out anything about the history of this work."

⁂

"Königskinder" ("King's Children") is the title of a stage piece, "a German fairy tale," in three acts, by Ernst Rosmer, which is the pseudonym of Elsa Bernstein, who lives at Munich and is the daughter of Heinrich Porges, conductor, composer, pianist, pamphleteer, and ferocious Wagnerite. This piece is published by S. Fischer, Berlin.

Late in 1895 it was announced that Humperdinck was writing music for this play, and there was promise of a performance in the early spring at Munich.

In June, 1896, it was announced that Humperdinck had finished the music, and that the production of the complete work would be at Munich in the fall or winter of this year. I can find no record of the production of the complete work at Munich or elsewhere.

But the two orchestral excerpts—prelude to Act II. and prelude to Act III.—were first produced at a concert of the Bach Society at Heidelberg, June 2, 1896. The composer conducted.

They were played that same month at Cologne under the lead of the conductor. They were played at Frankfort Oct. 7; at Berlin, Oct. 12 (Nikisch); at Leipsic, Nov. 5 (Nikisch).

The first production in America of any portion of the work was at the Montauk Theatre, Brooklyn, Nov. 22, when the prelude to Act II. was played at a concert of the Brooklyn Saengerbund conducted by Mr. Louis Koemmenich.

In Germany the selections are played in their regular order. Mr. Paur reversed this order.

⁂

Now what is the story of "Königskinder"? It is a simple fairy tale.

Act I.—A King's son finds at the house of a witch in the forest a goose maid, who is the daughter of a King. He loves her, and he would take her away with him; but a magic spell keeps her in the wood. It is a minstrel, who, appearing with the spear-bearing citizens of Hellabrun at the house of the witch in order to seek her advice concerning the choice of a King, looses the spell and rescues the Princess.

Act II.—The people of Hellabrun, trusting the speech of the witch, await at the twelfth stroke of the clock their King or Queen. The King's son is living among them as a despised beggar; he has hired himself out as a swineherd. Only the daughter of the broommaker knows his princely station. The clock is striking; it is high noon; the city gate is open wide; the sun bursts through the clouds; the goosemaid enters, accompanied by the minstrel. The folk stare, speechless. But the Prince rushes impetuously with a great shout and holds the beloved one in his arms. There is mocking laughter; there is tumult; beaten with sticks and stones, the Prince is thrown outside the gate.

Act III.—It is the dead of winter. The exiled children wander in the forest. The loyal fiddler and a flock of children, among them the daughter of the broommaker, search for them. At last they find them: "united in love, starved and frozen in the winter snow. Ruined! Dead!" The living kneel, and the minstrel sings his last song and plays his last tune, and breaks his fiddle in pieces.

⁂

"Dann brech' ich meine Fiedel entzwei" runs the text.

Therefore Mr. Apthorp's translation of "Spielmann" by "piper" is erroneous.

These two preludes are published by Max Brockhaus, Leipsic.

⁂

Nor does the program-book of the 26th give the origin of Bizet's suite "Jeux d'Enfants."

Colonne in 1873 founded the Sunday concerts which are now given at the Châtelet. Interested in young French composers, he asked Bizet for an unpublished work for the first concert.

Bizet's "Jeux d'Enfants," [illegible] pieces for piano, four-hands, had been published by Durand-Schoenewerk. He orchestrated of these pieces Nos. 2, 3, 6, 11, 12. These were first played at the first Colonne concert, at the Odéon, March 2, 1873. The first production in London was, I believe, in 1883.

⁂

Nor does the program-book of Dec. 26 give the scenario of Gluck's ballet "Don Juan." Jahn's "Mozart," Vol. IV., p. 345 (the edition of 1856-59), explains it as follows:

Scene I. Don Juan serenades Donna Anna, who opens her door for him. Her uncle surprises them. Don Juan rushes into the street and kills him.

Scene II. Great feast at the house of Don Juan. Donna Anna is present and she dances with him a pas de deux. The Statue appears and drives away the guests. At the end of a short visit, the Statue invites Don Juan to supper. Don Juan accepts and escorts him to the door. The guests return, but they are again frightened. Don Juan makes up his mind to visit the Statue, for his servant in spite of threats refuses to accompany him.

Scene III. The Mausoleum. The Statue tries in every way to induce Don Juan to repent. He finally hurls him into the nether world.

Scene IV. Don Juan in hell is tortured by the demons. In vain he seeks to escape. In vain he seeks to overpower them. He gives up all endeavor and is consumed by flames.

It will be observed that the librettist of this ballet saw Donna Anna with sinister eyes, as did Hoffman in his wondrous tale entitled "Don Juan."

⁂

The following poem by Post Wheeler, entitled "The Mad Musician," appeared in the Christmas Lotus.

A harp would I—a harp whose touch,
In sunlight, star-fire, glamoured dusk,
Would prick my senses fine as musk,
Whose voice would charm me overmuch.

It must be strung all cunningly,
Its cords fine-wove and music-mad,
Like her dark hair that made me glad
To singing when I wound it free.

Its frame a marvel would I make,
Fair-formed and rounded as is best,
Like the full curves that formed her breast
To thrill such cadence when she spake.

On harp-deft-fashioned tone to tone,
Ah, me, what music would I dare!
Whose strings were twist of her rich hair,
And its frame carved of her breastbone.

This poem recalls "L'Archet," by Charles Cros: how the beloved woman begged her lover to make his fiddle bow out of her blonde long hair, so that other women might be charmed when he went about seeking alms and playing his Cremona violin.

And it also recalls "The Cruel Sister," that old and dismal ballad:

He made a harp of her breast-bone,
Binnorie, O Binnorie;
Whose sounds would melt a heart of stone;
By the bonny mill dams of Binnorie.

The strings he framed of her yellow hair,
Binnorie, O, Binnorie—
Whose notes made sad the listening ear;
By the bonny mill dams of Binnorie.

⁂

The following excerpt is from a London newspaper:

Like Benjamin Franklin, who is credited with the authorship of the proverb, Albert Mee has had to pay dearly for his whistle. He is a musical mariner, and although his duties as master of the gallant tug Marmion keep him for long hours on the bridge as his vessel braves the dangers of the Thames, he does not neglect his instrumental studies. Upon the solo whistle he has attained some proficiency. He knows to a nicety how to regulate the valve so as to produce the greatest possible number of variations of tone from the one note which the siren was constructed to emit. To play "The Lass That Loved a Sailor," is his one ambition, and he has already succeeded in executing many cacophonous sounds of the class popularly known as "barnyard imitations." He can make the whistle of the Marmion either crow like a Gargantuan rooster or chirp like a gigantic sparrow. Unfortunately his musical progress has been suddenly checked by Mr. Vaughan at Bow Street, who has imposed upon him a fine of £1 and costs for an offence described as "unlawfully signaling," in contravention of the by-laws of the Thames Conservators. He was practising assiduously near the Temple Pier, in the middle of October, selecting the time and place because he knew that the Long Vacation had not yet expired, when word reached him that steps would be taken to discourage his further "cock-a-doodle-dooing." He had forgotten that there was such a body as the Bar Musical Society, nor did he realize that the pursuit of his hobby was distracting several of Her Majesty's Judges in their chambers. Complaint had often been made before—among others by the Lord Chief Justice himself—and now one of the whistling coons of the river had been caught in flagrante delicto. Steamers are, it seems, supplied with whistles as aids to navigation, and not for orchestral purposes, a fact that other skippers will do well to bear in mind as they pass the Temple Pier.

PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Traveler

MONDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1896.

The Symphony.

Sixteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; eighth concert, Mr. Alwin Schroeder, soloist. Programme:

Overture to "The Roman Carnival".... ....Hector Berlioz
Concerto for Violincello, in B minor.... ....Antonin Dvorak
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 2, in C major, "Ocean".. ....Anton Rubinstein
(Original version.)

The 'cello concerto was a great disappointment, chiefly because it was undeniably dull. Writings for this instrument, which is surely going out of fashion for solo performances, must possess two properties, at least—beauty and clearness. Neither of these has Dvorak expressed in the present work. The few themes are commonplace and trivial, and over the whole is a species of orchestration that blurs and conceals the tone of the 'cello in a really remarkable way. When it appears with any distinctiness, as in rapid passages in the upper strings, it sounds thin and wiry. We scarcely think Mr. Schroeder is to blame for this acidity of tone, for he has proven himself a 'cellist of much ability. The fact is that Dvorak has not at all succeeded in writing a characteristic piece for the instrument.

But if the living Dvorak is gradually forcing us to say that his day seems to be declining, the dead Berlioz, once jeered at, is making his place in the realms of lasting music more secure at every hearing. The nobility and splendor of conception of this "Roman Carnival" overture, the perfect clarity, yet wondrous richness of its instrumentation, and the subtlety of its climaxes never produced a finer effect than at this last concert. Nor has the work ever been better played. It was as exciting as if it had never been heard before.

Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony has much in it to admire, and also considerable to grow weary over. There is sea enough in the first movement, which has always received unstinted praise. The andante has a theme of much beauty, well elaborated, but thereafter is music machine made and long drawn out. The work was given a fine reading and performance. Poorly played it would be intolerable.

W. D. QUINT.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1896.

The program of the eighth Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Overture, Roman Carnival..Berlioz
Concerto for 'cello in B minor........................ ....Dvorák
(First time in Boston.)
Ocean Symphony..Rubinstein
(Second version.)

This concert was, on the whole, a dull one, although Mr. Schroeder's artistry was displayed constantly in the concerto, and the performance of the orchestra was fully up to its high standard. Undisturbed pleasure ceased with the final chord of the overture.

I fail to see any excuse for the composition of a 'cello concerto in these days. A piece with a suave andante, followed by an allegro for display of agility, may serve the purpose of solo players, but a 'cello concerto of conventional length is an abomination of desolation. For the tone of the instrument, even when the 'cello rests between the legs of the accomplished Mr. Schroeder, soon cloys, and in bravura passages the hearer tires quickly of the sound of flies chased up and down the strings.

Dvorák seems in this concerto to have used material that was proposed for his alleged negro symphony. The themes are either sentimental or trivial, and the padding in the development is gilded by orchestral means. The "naïveté," which some still delight in, is to be found, but it is insincerity, or tired indifference, rather than the true naïveté in his earlier works, before he knew anything about the Birmingham Festival or had learned how easily English audiences were pleased.

The statement was made a fortnight ago that the original version of Rubinstein's Ocean symphony would be played. Last night the program bore a pasted slip, "second version;" but there were five movements played. At least I suppose they were, for I heard only the first one, and even that sounded strangely old fashioned. The Roman Carnival overture of Berlioz was first played here in 1857, and last night it sounded as fresh and surprising as though it were in manuscript and produced as a novelty. Laforgue once spoke of the always respectable sea. I fear that the first movement of the Ocean symphony is best described as "respectable."

The public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place on Thursday afternoon, December 24, because of Christmas Day falling on Friday this year.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 27, 1896.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Novelties by Humperdinck, Bizet, and Even Gluck and Handel Played Last Night in Music Hall by the Symphony Orchestra Under Mr. Paur.

The program of the ninth Symphony concert was as follows:

Selections from the ballet "Don Juan"..Gluck
Arranged by Hermann Kretzschmar.
(First time in Boston.)
1. Overture, allegro pomposo, D major.
Andante grazioso, D major.
Trio, D minor.
2. Brillante, A major.
Allegretto, D major.
Allegretto risoluto.
Allegretto tranquillo, A major.
Alegretto, F major.
3. Grazioso, Andantino, A major, Menuet.
4. Finale, larghetto, D minor.
Allegro non troppo, D minor.
Symphony in C minor (B. & H., No. 9) Haydn
Selections from the music to "King's Children" ....Humperdinck
(First time in Boston).
1. Introduction to Act III.
"Ruined and Dead."
"Fiddler's Last Song."
2. Introduction to Act II.
"The Feast of Hella."
"Children's Dance."
Little Suite, "Children's Games," Op. 22. Bizet.
(First time in Boston.)
1. March, "Trumpets and Drums."
2. Berceuse, "The Doll."
3. Impromptu, "The Top."
4. Duo, "Little Husband, Little Wife."
5. Galop, "The Ball."
Overture No. 1, in D major...........Handel
Arranged by Franz Wullner.
(First time in Boston.)

The music of Gluck's ballet has more than a historical interest, for the andante grazioso and the menuet preceded by the pizzicato passages are of real beauty. There was also an opportunity given for learning the value of a trombone when it enters for the first time and with a special purpose. We are accustomed today to such liberal use of all known instruments when the ultra-modern composer wishes to express a simple thought, that the sobriety of Gluck's orchestration is refreshing, and the thought arises, "Have we really in certain ways made such a marvelous advance in music?"

I speak of the character of this ballet in "About Music" this morning, and it is not necessary to refer to it here. There are many pictures to be found in the books on costume and dancing which give us a better idea of the ballets of the 18th century than we can find in learned disquisitions on the stage of that period. The music may seem formal to this generation, but these tunes are not as stiff as the costumes of the dancers who gained and squandered vast sums, heated the blood of the gilded youth, and set kings by the ears.

This is the music that suited the dance when it was something more than a zenith-defying kick and a display of intimate laces. No doubt the ballet of that period would seem to us a slow and formal thing; but much of Gluck's music to "Don Juan" is still fresh and lovely.

* * *

Humperdinck's music to "Königskinder" is theatre music. When it is transferred to the concert hall, some explanation of the play which it accompanies and illustrates and enhances should be given to the audience. "Verdorben-gestorben"—"Spielmann's letzer Gesang"—"Hellafest"—"Kinder-Reigen"—These words appear in the program book; but to what purpose?

The story of the drama for which Humperdinck wrote these preludes is told this morning in "About Music." Now, although it is the day after the fair, let me describe the character of these pieces. I am indebted largely for this description to the admirable program books prepared by Friedrich Brandes for the Symphony concerts of the Dresden Royal Opera Orchestra. Mr. Paur reversed the order of the preludes.

The prelude to Act III. opens with mournful, lonesome chords given to the wood-wind, while the English horn and the first horn sound the "Lamentation" motiv, which, short and incisive, appears in various forms throughout the prelude. These chords are repeated by other wind instruments. The idea of this tone-picture is desolation, the desolation of the wintry forest and the exiled children wandering, hungry and cold. The oboe sings in mournful recollection of the short happiness known in love. The violins take up the song of grief. The children are dead; they lie in each other's arms. The loyal fiddler finds them and pronounces their elegy. There are hints of the two former motivs which interrupt the dirge of the horns. Then follows the apotheosis.

The prelude to Act II. tells of the rejoicing expectation at Hellabrunn, as the people await their ruler. There is dancing. A child's rattle is heard. The town children enter and dance the "Rosenringel," the theme of which is given first by the clarinet; at the end the children's simple tune is sung in frenzy by the whole orchestra.

Of course, we know this music only as concert music. We are not able to judge of its effectiveness in the theatre. As concert-music without dramatic association, it seems to me to be chiefly interesting on account of its orchestration, which is fully in the manner of Wagner. Outside of this sumptuous orchestration, I find little of worth or interest. The slow movement reminds one of the building up of the "Tristan" prelude, and if there is any choice between the two preludes to acts of "Königskinder," the slow movement is the one to be preferred.

But Humperdinck makes his little fishes talk like whales.

Now Bizet's suite "Jeux des Enfants" suggests children and their games, and his refined and telling orchestration is more effective—as absolute orchestral music—than the Wagnerian copy by Humperdinck. The funny pomp of the March is characteristic; so is the sweetness and simplicity of "The Doll." In the capricious "Top" there is not a measure that is not truly musical. "Little Husband, Little Wife" was exaggerated by the strings. Look at the score! See how pretty and subdued is the melody given to the first violins. As is too often the case of late, there was incongruous, preposterous passion, as though the boy and girl were erotic hero and heroine in one of Massenet's pornographic novels. Nor was the final galop played with the necessary brilliancy and dash. The rhythm was logy.

A delightful little suite, and Mr. Paur is to be thanked for producing it, even at this late day, when it is 23 years old.

* * *

The overture by Handel sounded like unto 250 or 300 other pieces by the pious and industrious composer. His wig in this piece was of most formidable proportions, and he shook it constantly.

Nor was the symphony by Haydn a rare delight. Much of it was decidedly boresome. And I should like to hear a vivace or an allegro of Haydn or Mozart led at the proper pace by Mr. Paur. The slow allegro was a wonderful wild-fowl at first but acquaintance with it turns it into a very featherless absurd thing.

PHILIP HALE.

Singular Omissions in Symphony Program.

Mr. William F. Apthorp, in his program book of the 26th, makes this reference to the selections from the music to "King's Children," by Engelbert Humperdinck: "I have unfortunately been unable to find out anything about the history of this work."

* * *

"Königskinder" ("King's Children") is the title of a stage piece, "a German fairy tale," in three acts, by Ernst Rosmer, which is the pseudonym of Elsa Bernstein, who lives at Munich and is the daughter of Heinrich Porges, conductor, composer, pianist, pamphleteer, and ferocious Wagnerite. This piece is published by S. Fischer, Berlin.

Late in 1895 it was announced that Humperdinck was writing music for this play, and there was promise of a performance in the early spring at Munich.

In June, 1896, it was announced that Humperdinck had finished the music, and that the production of the complete work would be at Munich in the fall or winter of this year. I can find no record of the production of the complete work at Munich or elsewhere.

But the two orchestral excerpts—prelude to Act II. and prelude to Act III.—were first produced at a concert of the Bach Society at Heidelberg, June 2, 1896. The composer conducted.

They were played that same month at Cologne under the lead of the conductor. They were played at Frankfort Oct. 7; at Berlin, Oct. 12 (Nikisch); at Leipsic, Nov. 5 (Nikisch).

The first production in America of any portion of the work was at the Montauk Theatre, Brooklyn, Nov. 22, when the prelude to Act II. was played at a concert of the Brooklyn Saengerbund conducted by Mr. Louis Koemmenich.

In Germany the selections are played in their regular order. Mr. Paur reversed this order.

* * *

Now what is the story of "Königskinder"? It is a simple fairy tale.

Act I.—A King's son finds at the house of a witch in the forest a goose maid, who is the daughter of a King. He loves her, and he would take her away with him; but a magic spell keeps her in the wood. It is a minstrel, who, appearing with the spear-bearing citizens of Hellabrun at the house of the witch in order to seek her advice concerning the choice of a King, looses the spell and rescues the Princess.

Act II.—The people of Hellabrun, trusting the speech of the witch, await at the twelfth stroke of the clock their King or Queen. The King's son is living among them as a despised beggar; he has hired himself out as a swineherd. Only the daughter of the broommaker knows his princely station. The clock is striking; it is high noon; the city gate is open wide; the sun bursts through the clouds; the goosemaid enters, accompanied by the minstrel. The folk stare, speechless. But the Prince rushes impetuously with a great shout and holds the beloved one in his arms. There is mocking laughter; there is tumult; beaten with sticks and stones, the Prince is thrown outside the gate.

Act III.—It is the dead of winter. The exiled children wander in the forest. The loyal fiddler and a flock of children, among them the daughter of the broommaker, search for them. At last they find them: "united in love, starved and frozen in the winter snow. Ruined! Dead!" The living kneel, and the minstrel sings his last song and plays his last tune, and breaks his fiddle in pieces.

* * *

"Dann brech' ich meine Fiedel entzwei" runs the text.

Therefore Mr. Apthorp's translation of "Spielmann" by "piper" is erroneous.

These two preludes are published by Max Brockhaus, Leipsic.

* * *

Nor does the program-book of the 26th give the origin of Bizet's suite "Jeux d'Enfants."

Colonne in 1873 founded the Sunday concerts which are now given at the Châtelet. Interested in young French composers, he asked Bizet for an unpublished work for the first concert. Now Bizet's "Jeux d'Enfants," [illegible] pieces for piano, four-hands, had just been published by Durand-Schoenewerk. He orchestrated of these pieces Nos. 2, 3, 6, 11, 12. These were first played at the first Colonne concert, at the Odéon, March 2, 1873. The first production in London was, I believe, in 1883.

* * *

Nor does the program-book of Dec. 26 give the scenario of Gluck's ballet "Don Juan." Jahn's "Mozart," Vol. IV., p. 345 (the edition of 1856-59), explains it as follows:

Scene I. Don Juan serenades Donna Anna, who opens her door for him. Her uncle surprises them. Don Juan rushes into the street and kills him.

Scene II. Great feast at the house of Don Juan. Donna Anna is present and she dances with him a pas de deux. The Statue appears and drives away the guests. At the end of a short visit, the Statue invites Don Juan to supper. Don Juan accepts and escorts him to the door. The guests return, but they are again frightened. Don Juan makes up his mind to visit the Statue, for his servant in spite of threats refuses to accompany him.

Scene III. The Mausoleum. The Statue tries in every way to induce Don Juan to repent. He finally hurls him into the nether world.

Scene IV. Don Juan in hell is tortured by the demons. In vain he seeks to escape. In vain he seeks to overpower them. He gives up all endeavor and is consumed by flames.

It will be observed that the librettist of this ballet saw Donna Anna with sinister eyes, as did Hoffman in his wondrous tale entitled "Don Juan."

* * *

The following poem by Post Wheeler, entitled "The Mad Musician," appeared in the Christmas Lotus.

A harp would I—a harp whose touch,
In sunlight, star-fire, glamoured dusk,
Would prick my senses fine as musk,
Whose voice would charm me overmuch.

It must be strung all cunningly,
Its cords fine-wove and music-mad,
Like her dark hair that made me glad
To singing when I wound it free.

Its frame a marvel would I make,
Fair-formed and rounded as is best,
Like the full curves that formed her breast
To thrill such cadence when she spake.

On harp deft-fashioned tone to tone,
Ah, me, what music would I dare!
Whose strings were twist of her rich hair,
And its frame carved of her breastbone.

This poem recalls "L'Archet," by Charles Cros: how the beloved woman begged her lover to make his fiddle bow out of her blonde long hair, so that other women might be charmed when he went about seeking alms and playing his Cremona violin.

And it also recalls "The Cruel Sister," that old and dismal ballad:

He made a harp of her breast-bone,
Binnorie, O Binnorie;
Whose sounds would melt a heart of stone;
By the bonny mill dams of Binnorie.

The strings he framed of her yellow hair,
Binnorie, O, Binnorie—
Whose notes made sad the listening ear;
By the bonny mill dams of Binnorie.

* * *

The following excerpt is from a London newspaper:

Like Benjamin Franklin, who is credited with the authorship of the proverb, Albert Mee has had to pay dearly for his whistle. He is a musical mariner, and although his duties as master of the gallant tug Marmion keep him for long hours on the bridge as his vessel braves the dangers of the Thames, he does not neglect his instrumental studies. Upon the solo whistle he has attained some proficiency. He knows to a nicety how to regulate the valve so as to produce the greatest possible number of variations of tone from the one note which the siren was constructed to emit. To play "The Lass That Loved a Sailor," is his one ambition, and he has already succeeded in executing many cacophonous sounds of the class popularly known as "barnyard imitations." He can make the whistle of the Marmion either crow like a Gargantuan rooster or chirp like a gigantic sparrow. Unfortunately his musical progress has been suddenly checked by Mr. Vaughan at Bow Street, who has imposed upon him a fine of £1 and costs for an offence described as "unlawfully signaling," in contravention of the by-laws of the Thames Conservators. He was practising assiduously near the Temple Pier, in the middle of October, selecting the time and place because he knew that the Long Vacation had not yet expired, when word reached him that steps would be taken to discourage his further "cock-a-doodle-dooing." He had forgotten that there was such a body as the Bar Musical Society, nor did he realize that the pursuit of his hobby was distracting several of Her Majesty's Judges in their chambers. Complaint had often been made before—among others by the Lord Chief Justice himself—and now one of the whistling coons of the river had been caught in flagrante delicto. Steamers are, it seems, supplied with whistles as aids to navigation, and not for orchestral purposes, a fact that other skippers will do well to bear in mind as they pass the Temple Pier.

PHILIP HALE.

[illegible]
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 28, 1896.

Selections from Gluck's Ballet of Don Juan at Symphony Concert.

If the programme of Saturday night taught anything it inculcated the lesson that one school of music does not abolish another; there may be faults in a musical system, yet the best products of that system will live in spite of the defects of form or style of expression if the touch of genius be in them. Therefore the selections from Gluck's ballet of "Don Juan" were more than merely interesting, spite of the formal tripartite shape which too often was evident, and a degree of repetition which modern radicals would scarcely tolerate.

It was interesting, of course, to note how Gluck had influenced Mozart in the Don Juan subject; there was a minuet which was certainly a close relative of the famous dance in the castle as given in the opera. There was a coquettish dancer, too, in this music of Gluck's, a species of Zerlina who foreshadowed "Batti, Batti," and a clownish Massetto, who would not be conciliated. It was a delightful lesson in the evolution of a famous subject. But, beyond all interesting comparisons, there was the fire of genius heating the dead embers of formalism. "Facilis descensus Averni" is not quite a true proverb when it comes to depicting the journey in notes.

Berlioz took us along that gruesome path in "The Ride to Hades," and invoked everything from piccolo to gong to help impress the picture. Gluck, with an orchestra that is to Berlioz's as a fishing schooner to an Atlantic steamship, makes an impression scarcely less dramatic. The baleful touches are all present, the lights burn blue, and the Don goes to his sulphur bath with as much artistic success as in Mozart's own opera.

When one bears in mind that this score was composed before Gluck became a reformer, at the time when he had just made the acquaintance of Di Calzabigi, who was to help him in breaking the fetters in which Metastasio was binding the opera, one can better understand why it was that the composer became the father of the dramatic school. Handel might sneer as much as he pleased at his early products—"He knows no more of counterpoint than my cook," said he—but dramatic instinct will always outweigh contrapuntal knowledge.

The fiery performance of the work garnered up every bit of its intensity, and there was much applause at its end. The oboe part being an especially prominent one in this composition, a word of praise may be spoken as to its steady performance.

Haydn's Symphony in C minor received a powerful and virile performance, for Mr. Paur does not believe in giving this composer's works as if they were orchestral sugar-water, but it was not advantageously placed; coming after Gluck's instrumentation, in the same general vein, it had a touch of sameness. Yet the violoncello solo in the trio of the minuet, and the dainty changes to minor of the chief theme in the Andante, were appreciated points. The caprice of the second movement was very gracefully given.

Humperdinck's new opera of "The King's Children" has not yet had its first performance, although the two excerpts given last night are already upon the repertoire of the European concert halls. The transposition of the numbers from their operatic position might mystify the auditor as to the outcome of the sorrowful tale, but made a better contrast for concert purposes. The picture presented by the slow movement is exactly that worded by Heine in his "Tragoedie":—

"Sie sind gewandert hin und her,
Sie haben gehabt weder Glueck noch Stern.
Sie sind gestorben,—verdorben."

("They wandered helpless to and fro,
They found nor luck nor guiding star.
They died at last, united,—blighted.")

And the picture was a most earnest and sombre one, in all the eloquence of the Wagnerian school, yet by no means a copy of Wagner. We have often expressed the opinion that there can be no true Wagnerian school, yet the engrafting of the simple tenderness of the folk-song upon the rich orchestration which the Bayreuth master has taught, may become the manner of the near future. Of course, there was plenty of pathos depicted and upon the pathetic instrument,—the oboe.

Evil was portrayed upon the muted horns which gave forth their baleful tones with strong effect. There was rich scoring throughout, especially did the deeper wind instruments give the gloom requisite for the subject. Occasionally one would meet with a touch frankly Wagnerian, as for example the picturing of suspense upon the kettle-drums, by soft, irregular strokes, and the playing of the minstrel's last melody (a violin, not a pipe melody, by the way) gave opportunity for some of the high harmonics upon the instrument, a la Wagner, while harp, horn, and violins in highest positions gave the regular Wagnerian, ecstatic, celestial ending.

The city festival, which here came after the death of the children, had a most effective march, but one could not but deem it a little inflated, as if Barnum had arrived with a three-ring show. The The dance of the children which began in simplicity ended with titanic power. It was said of Sheridan that he made the servants talk as brightly as the princes, in his plays; one can say of Humperdinck that he sometimes makes his children become Nibelung heroes.

After this festive preamble, the audience were, metaphorically, admitted to the Christmas tree, for to follow the children's dance and festival with a children's suite by Bizet ("Jeu d'Enfants") was clearly a musical presentation of "the Compliments of the Season." An orchestral suite made from a set of piano pieces, not at all ambitious but a perfect omelette souffle of music, a dainty trifle as dessert to a musical meal, every note of the little work seemed to be heartily enjoyed by everyone.

The trumpet did some excellent playing in the first number and the contrabasses gave a jolly buffoonery to the proceedings. The slumber-song gave the muted violins their innings and they played most sweetly. "The Top" was a very brief bit of musical humor, very charming in its way. "The Ball" was Offenbachian, heartily wild and spicy. Only in the "Petit Mari, Petite Femme" was there an exaggeration of sentiment; if the children playing "Husband and Wife" had been Tristan and Isolde, or Romeo and Juliet, they [illegible] scarcely have been more passion- [illegible]. The whole work was not [illegible] "concert" dignity, but as al- [illegible], it was our musical Christ- [illegible]

[illegible] done some [illegible] work, among other things "The Messiah," "Israel in Egypt," etc., etc. Several of his compositions have been heard in Boston before and have been freely applauded. He seems a composer of considerable promise although it is a pity that he knows so much counterpoint. His general motto seems to be "when in doubt, play trumpets," and there was much trumpeting during the number (excellently played, too, with a ringing, incisive style that was inspiring) and some very brilliant fugue-playing on the strings.

The composer should follow the example set by our resident writers and avoid the fugue; the fugato is less wearing upon the composer and more readily understood by the audience. It was a mistake also not to give the work a definite title; if, for example, he had called the work "An American Overture," the pompous and brassy first movement might have pictured our senate, and the intricate fugal passages the tangle they get things into. But, even as it is, the work is a worthy one, and we hope that Mr. Paur will give us more new compositions by Mr. Haendel in the near future.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. C., NO. 180.

SUNDAY, DEC. 27, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Christmas Programme and a Very Charming One.

Contrasts Between the Old and the New—Four Novelties for Local Lovers of Music—Bizet's Little Suite, "Children's Games," an Exquisite Dainty—New High Trumpets.

For last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Paur arranged a Christmas programme, and a very charming one it was, in its contrasts between the old and the new, with Handel, Gluck and Haydn representing the former, and Bizet and Humperdinck the latter. The music was:

Selections from "Don Juan"............Gluck
Symphony, C-minor, No. 9, B. & H.....Haydn
Selections from "The King's Children....
............................Humperdinck
Little suite, "Children's Games"........Bizet
Overture, No. 1, D-major..............Handel

These, excepting the symphony, were all new to Boston. The Gluck music is from a ballet written on the same subject as Mozart's opera. It consists of four numbers, arranged in suite form by Herman Kretzschmar and published last year. The original orchestration is retained, the only additions to the score being some expression marks by the adapter. While the music is extremely simple, it is full of charm, and a minuet is especially graceful and melodious. The best part, however, is the last number, the opening movement of which depicts the visit of the statue to Don Juan, and is powerfully dramatic, and the finale illustrating the libertine's punishment and descent into hell. This is of curious interest by way of contrast with Mozart's treatment of the same subjects, the superiority, of course, lying with the younger master. This ballet was composed during Gluck's stay in Vienna, from 1755 to 1761, when he was writing divertissements, airs for comedies, comic operettas and other trifles for the palaces of Laxenburg and Schoenbrunn, and making failure after failure. Little if any of the music he wrote during this period has survived. It was 10 or 12 years later that he emerged from this production of "pot-boilers" with "Iphigenie en Aulide," and stood forth a great master. The music played last night has nothing to distinguish it from the conventionalities of the period in which it was written. Of the Gluck in the "Orpheus" ballet music there is not a trace, save in the two movements just referred to, and of these the closing movement was transferred to "Orpheus."

The Humperdinck selections consisted of the introduction to act 3 and the introduction to act 2 of his opera, "The King's Children." Both are very like his "Hansel and Gretel" music; in fact, for any variation there is in style and treatment, they might be pages out of that very score. The orchestration is very Wagnerian, very rich in color, and very fine in the sympathy it manifests with the characteristic timbres of the various instruments and their most telling effects in combinations. The melodies are flowing and pleasing, but the thickly elaborate instrumentation at length palls for very lack of diversity in color. The performance of these selections was of exceptional beauty and finish.

The bright, particular gems of the novelties were the five Bizet numbers. The cradle song, entitled "The Doll," is a lovely little melody, fascinatingly scored, and with an exquisite daintiness of tone color. A remarkable bit of effect was one of the briefest of impromptus, named "The Top," in which the motion of the toy in spinning is suggested with a piquant playfulness of orchestration as original as it is airy and delightful. The fourth movement, "Little Husband, Little Wife," a plaintively tender duet between the first violins and the 'cellos, is another delicious bit of simplicity. These are all the veriest trifles, but they are of a nature that shows the true artist, working in a conscientiously artistic spirit, and emphasizing in almost every bar a strongly individualized master in his art. The suite was read and played with surpassing finish.

The Handel overture, reinstrumented by Franz Wullner, is not of very notable interest, and Mr. Wullner has done no great service to it by modernizing the score.

A striking feature in the performance was the first hearing here of some high trumpets, or, rather, cornets, manufactured expressly to meet the trying demands made by the trumpet parts of the instrumental music of Bach and Handel, especially the former. They are the only instruments of their kind in this country, and were imported by a prominent music lover here for a similar use to that to which they were devoted last night, and with such impressive effect.

The Haydn symphony received that treatment which Mr. Paur accords the composer, with invariably fine and satisfying results.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Fidelio," Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte, Schytte; symphonic poem, "Wallenstein," Smetana; symphony No. 3, Brahms. Mr. George W. Proctor is to be the soloist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 27, 1896.

It was quite a Christmasy programme which Mr. Paur provided for the ninth in the present Symphony series. Not in the choice of music having distinctive or specific relations with that sacred but festive season; but in the light-hearted, genial, ingenuous and simple character of most of the numbers. Even the symphony itself claimed no motionlessly bound attention, being that one of Haydn in C minor, known sometimes as No. 9, which might almost be rated as a symphony in miniature. For it is only some twenty minutes in length, and its movements seem to be quite content with just showing how much might be done with their attractive and clear-cut themes if one only set about utilizing them to the full possibility. And this holds in spite of the fact that Haydn did less country-dancing and more counterpointing in the animated last movement that was often his wont. It should be noted that the trio of the minuet, which is an ornate and pleasant 'cello solo, was deliciously played by Mr. Schroeder.

And the rest of the programme — which was wisely contained within less than an hour and a half — was new, and exceedingly entertaining. But the audience — true Boston to the core — seemed to feel very much in doubt whether it ought to be pleased by what was confessedly juvenile in spirit, and applauded rather doubtfully and timidly things which a ready continental audience, whether of Germans or Italians, would have heartily welcomed and bidden good speed to. The beginning was made with Hermann Kretzschmar's arrangement into a suite of four numbers of the overture and about ten other movements from Gluck's ballet of "Don Juan." Of these only the finale, which the composer subsequently incorporated into the Inferno music of his "Orfeo," was known, but the others might well look for further acquaintance. They not only show those peculiar qualities of clearness, proportion, grace, happy harmony and flowing measure which distinguished Gluck, but they also present a sequence which passes naturally to the intensely and dramatically furious conclusion.

Several selections from Humperdinck's incidental music to the legend of "The King's Children" were also given, including a melancholy scene called "Ruined and Dead," and some lively numbers fitted for the children's festivals. The composer's devotion to Wagner, less pronounced perhaps than in his "Hansel and Gretel," still showed strongly at first; but more freedom and natural gaiety developed as the numbers went on.

There was also a delicious little suite by Bizet, called "Children's Games," and as dainty and fanciful, as unpretending and true, as appreciative and adaptive, as if its author had not possessed the passion of "Carmen," the brilliancy of "The Pearl Fishers," or the hot, leaping life of the "Arlesienne." There were "Trumpets and Drums," a "Doll" and a "Top" movement, and others suggestive of a love-duet of manikins and a jolly little dance. The oddity of the spinning, reeling, tumbling top, the cheery thump of the march and the miniature sentiment of the duet, did manage to prevail with the listeners and touch them up to applause.

A Handel overture, No. 1, in D major, came last, and presented a short, pompous introduction, and a friged allegro of much force and splendor.

The programme was thoroughly well played, and it did one's heart good to see Mr. Paur's merry, contented face when some of the neat little points came sharp and shining.

On Saturday next there will be played Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture; Schytte's pianoforte concerto, with Mr. George W. Proctor as the soloist; Smetana's "Wallenstein" poem, and Brahms's third symphony.

Howard Malcom Ticknor.

Gazette.

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 27.

The Kneisel Quartet.

The interest in the third concert of the Kneisel Quartet centred in a new work by Mr. G. W. Chadwick, Quartet, E minor, No. 4. The work is not an attractive one of its kind, and there is no evidence that it owed its existence to inspiration. Just what the work means, it is impossible to say; it may be that Mr. Chadwick is writing American music on Drovak's theory of a negro-tune basis, but Ireland and Scotland come in for an equal share of his attention. The themes are not suggestive of originality, and strangely enough, they are inadequately developed, with no logical sequence, no clearness of expression born of conviction. Then there is a monotony, a sameness of coloring, that is trying to the nerves, and there are no rare technical merits that bring solace in the midst of pain, nothing but brevity, which in the present case is not the soul of wit. Mr. Chadwick has done far better work, and it is to be regretted that he allowed the quartet to leave his study table.

Another feature in the programme was Saint-Saen's septet for piano, trumpet and strings, op. 65. The interpretation of this delightful work was sadly marred by the indiscretions of Mr. Burmeister, who played the piano part, and converted a septet, or tried to convert it, into a piano solo. Despite a tradition sacred to the Kneisel Quartet, Mr. Burmeister should remember that in chamber music, it is barbarous to exalt one instrument at the expense of all the others, whether the instrument be first violin or piano. Mr. Burmeister ill-treated the piano as well as the composer, he pounded it, thumped it and tortured it; he almost completely neglected the intentions of the composer; he stifled the other instruments in an ocean of noise, and he forgot to give to his art any trace of delicacy, fitness or taste.

[illegible]

Novelties [illegible] at the Symphony Concert.

Four of the five numbers on the symphony program last week were given for the first time in this city. The novelties were Kretzschmar's arrangements of ballet music from Gluck's "Don Juan," selections from Humperdinck's "King's Children," Bizet's suite, "Children's Games," and Handel's overture, No. 1, in D major, arranged by Franz Wullner. Haydn's C-minor symphony completed the program. The Haydn number received sympathetic treatment, the fortissimo phrases of the earlier movements being smoothly given and with the necessary vigor. The intermediate themes and the slower passages were played with a tenderness and delicacy of expression thoroughly in harmony with the requirements of the score, and Mr Schroeder's cello work in the trio was wholly good. The finale went brilliantly.

The selections from Gluck's "Don Juan" ballet music illustrate a succession of scenes made familiar in Mozart's opera, "Don Giovanni," and the highly contrasted writings. The opening themes are a blending of the stately with the jovial, these being supplemented by a curious figuration for strings and the oboe. The second movement foreshadows the impending fate of the don, the music growing more sedate in character. After a brief bit of merrymaking and serenading comes the finale or fourth movement, with the don's descent into hades.

The second part of the ballet was admirably performed, the strings in particular singing in beautiful unison with the flutes and horns in the earlier passages. The almost strident phrases were played with precision by the whole band. In the pizzicato movement the strings presented the dance rhythms with vivacity and delicate tonality, and the retribution that befel the Lothario was vividly and musically illustrated in the final movement.

The Humperdinck number is in two parts, one entitled "Ruined and Dead," the second representing a festival, or dance of children. The first part is effectively scored, as a whole, but without any particular musical value, although a melody is quite skilfully introduced and interwoven with a somber theme. A pleasing dance movement of a simple nature comprises the second movement. The music suggests a combination of the grewsome and the juvenile such as was heard in Humperdinck's "Hansel and Gretel," and recalls the author's previous work in many instances. The orchestra was efficient, and gave a satisfactory interpretation of the selection.

"Children's Games," the Bizet number, belongs to the whimsical order of writings, such as the Haydn "Kinder" symphony, and is a pretty little bit of musical humor. The "top-spinning" movement, very picturesque and also very short, was the most laughable, but the beauty of the fourth movement, a tender little duet between "little husband and little wife," called forth the heartiest appreciation, the work of the strings being notably good, even for the Boston symphony men.

The majestic prelude of the Handel overture was grandly set forth and the runs and supplementary mutations clearly and dexterously surmounted. The free trumpet figures were harmonious as a rule, and the 'cellos and double-basses also did their work well. The soloist at this week's concert will be Mr George W. Proctor. The following program will be performed: Beethoven, overture, "Fidelio;" Schytte, concerto for pianoforte; Smetana, symphonic poem, "Wallenstein;" Brahms, symphony No. 3.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 28, 1896.

Selections from Gluck's Ballet of Don Juan at Symphony Concert.

If the programme of Saturday night taught anything it inculcated the lesson that one school of music does not abolish another; there may be faults in a musical system, yet the best products of that system will live in spite of the defects of form or style of expression if the touch of genius be in them. Therefore the selections from Gluck's ballet of "Don Juan" were more than merely interesting, spite of the formal tripartite shape which too often was evident, and a degree of repetition which modern radicals would scarcely tolerate.

It was interesting, of course, to note how Gluck had influenced Mozart in the Don Juan subject; there was a minuet which was certainly a close relative of the famous dance in the castle as given in the opera. There was a coquettish dancer, too, in this music of Gluck's, a species of Zerlina who foreshadowed "Batti, Batti," and a clownish Massetto, who would not be concilated. It was a delightful lesson in the evolution of a famous subject. But, beyond all interesting comparisons, there was the fire of genius heating the dead embers of formalism. "Facilis descensus Averni" is not quite a true proverb when it comes to depicting the journey in notes.

Berlioz took us along that gruesome path in "The Ride to Hades," and invoked everything from piccolo to gong to help impress the picture. Gluck, with an orchestra that is to Berlioz's as a fishing schooner to an Atlantic steamship, makes an impression scarcely less dramatic. The baleful touches are all present, the lights burn blue, and the Don goes to his sulphur bath with as much artistic success as in Mozart's own opera.

When one bears in mind that this score was composed before Gluck became a reformer, at the time when he had just made the acquaintance of Di Calzabigi, who was to help him in breaking the fetters in which Metastasio was binding the opera, one can better understand why it was that the composer became the father of the dramatic school. Handel might sneer as much as he pleased at his early products—"He knows no more of counterpoint than my cook," said he—but dramatic instinct will always outweigh contrapuntal knowledge.

The fiery performance of the work garnered up every bit of its intensity, and there was much applause at its end. The oboe part being an especially prominent one in this composition, a word of praise may be spoken as to its steady performance.

Haydn's Symphony in C minor received a powerful and virile performance, for Mr. Paur does not believe in giving this composer's works as if they were orchestral sugar-water, but it was not advantageously placed; coming after Gluck's instrumentation, in the same general vein, it had a touch of sameness. Yet the violoncello solo in the trio of the minuet, and the dainty changes to minor of the chief theme in the Andante, were appreciated points. The caprice of the second movement was very gracefully given.

Humperdinck's new opera of "The King's Children" has not yet had its first performance, although the two excerpts given last night are already upon the repertoire of the European concert halls. The transposition of the numbers from their operatic position might mystify the auditor as to the outcome of the sorrowful tale, but made a better contrast for concert purposes. The picture presented by the slow movement is exactly that worded by Heine in his "Tragoedie":—

"Sie sind gewandert hin und her,
Sie haben gehabt weder Glueck noch Stern.
Sie sind gestorben,—verdorben."

("They wandered helpless to and fro,
They found nor luck nor guiding star.
They died at last, united,—blighted.")

And the picture was a most earnest and sombre one, in all the eloquence of the Wagnerian school, yet by no means a copy of Wagner. We have often expressed the opinion that there can be no true Wagnerian school, yet the engrafting of the simple tenderness of the folk-song upon the rich orchestration which the Bayreuth master has taught, may become the manner of the near future. Of course, there was plenty of pathos depicted and upon the pathetic instrument,—the oboe.

Evil was portrayed upon the muted horns which gave forth their baleful tones with strong effect. There was rich scoring throughout, especially did the deeper wind instruments give the gloom requisite for the subject. Occasionally one would meet with a touch frankly Wagnerian, as for example the picturing of suspense upon the kettle-drums, by soft, irregular strokes, and the playing of the minstrel's last melody (a violin, not a pipe melody, by the way) gave opportunity for some of the high harmonics upon the instrument, a la Wagner, while harp, horn, and violins in highest positions gave the regular Wagnerian, ecstatic, celestial ending.

The city festival, which here came after the death of the children, had a most effective march, but one could not but deem it a little inflated, as if Barnum had arrived with a three-ring show. The The dance of the children which began in simplicity ended with titanic power. It was said of Sheridan that he made the servants talk as brightly as the princes in his plays; one can say of Humperdinck that he sometimes makes his children become Nibelung heroes.

After this festive preamble, the audience were, metaphorically, admitted to the Christmas tree, for to follow the children's dance and festival with a children's suite by Bizet ("Jeu d'Enfants") was clearly a musical presentation of "the Compliments of the Season." An orchestral suite made from a set of piano pieces, not at all ambitious but a perfect omelette souffle of music, a dainty trifle as dessert to a musical meal, every note of the little work seemed to be heartily enjoyed by everyone.

The trumpet did some excellent playing in the first number and the contrabasses gave a jolly buffoonery to the proceedings. The slumber-song gave the muted violins their innings and they played most sweetly. "The Top" was a very brief bit of musical humor, very charming in its way. "The Ball" was Offenbachian, heartily wild and spicy. Only in the "Petit Mari, Petite Femme" was there an exaggeration of sentiment; if the children playing at "Husband and Wife" had been Tristan and Isolde, or Romeo and Juliet, they could scarcely have been more passionate and intense. The whole work was not of "symphony-concert" dignity, but as already intimated, it was our musical Christ-del, played "for the first time in Boston," is indeed a novelty. This composer has done some excellent work, among other things "The Messiah," "Israel in Egypt," etc., etc. Several of his compositions have been heard in Boston before and have been freely applauded. He seems a composer of considerable promise although it is a pity that he knows so much counterpoint. His general motto seems to be "when in doubt, play trumpets," and there was much trumpeting during the number (excellently played, too, with a ringing, incisive style that was inspiring) and some very brilliant fugue-playing on the strings.

---

The composer should follow the example set by our resident writers and avoid the fugue; the fugato is less wearing upon the composer and more readily understood by the audience. It was a mistake also not to give the work a definite title; if, for example, he had called the work "An American Overture," the pompous and brassy first movement might have pictured our senate, and the intricate fugal passages the tangle they get things into. But, even as it is, the work is a worthy one, and we hope that Mr. Paur will give us more new compositions by Mr. Haendel in the near future.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. C., NO. 180.
SUNDAY, DEC. 27, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Christmas Programme and a Very Charming One.

Contrasts Between the Old and the New—Four Novelties for Local Lovers of Music—Bizet's Little Suite, "Children's Games," an Exquisite Dainty—New High Trumpets.

For last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Paur arranged a Christmas programme, and a very charming one it was, in its contrasts between the old and the new, with Handel, Gluck and Haydn representing the former, and Bizet and Humperdinck the latter. The music was:

Selections from "Don Juan"..............Gluck
Symphony, C-minor, No. 9, B. & H.....Haydn
Selections from "The King's Children....
..............................Humperdinck
Little suite, "Children's Games".........Bizet
Overture, No. 1, D-major...............Handel

These, excepting the symphony, were all new to Boston. The Gluck music is from a ballet written on the same subject as Mozart's opera. It consists of four numbers, arranged in suite form by Herman Kretzschmar and published last year. The original orchestration is retained, the only additions to the score being some expression marks by the adapter. While the music is extremely simple, it is full of charm, and a minuet is especially graceful and melodious. The best part, however, is the last number, the opening movement of which depicts the visit of the statue to Don Juan, and is powerfully dramatic, and the finale illustrating the libertine's punishment and descent into hell. This is of curious interest by way of contrast with Mozart's treatment of the same subjects, the superiority, of course, lying with the younger master. This ballet was composed during Gluck's stay in Vienna, from 1755 to 1761, when he was writing divertissements, airs for comedies, comic operettas and other trifles for the palaces of Laxenburg and Schoenbrunn, and making failure after failure. Little if any of the music he wrote during this period has survived. It was 10 or 12 years later that he emerged from this production of "pot-boilers" with "Iphigenie en Aulide," and stood forth a great master. The music played last night has nothing to distinguish it from the conventionalities of the period in which it was written. Of the Gluck in the "Orpheus" ballet music there is not a trace, save in the two movements just referred to, and of these the closing movement was transferred to "Orpheus."

The Humperdinck selections consisted of the introduction to act 3 and the introduction to act 2 of his opera, "The King's Children." Both are very like his "Hansel and Gretel" music; in fact, for any variation there is in style and treatment, they might be pages out of that very score. The orchestration is very Wagnerian, very rich in color, and very fine in the sympathy it manifests with the characteristic timbres of the various instruments and their most telling effects in combinations. The melodies are flowing and pleasing, but the thickly elaborate instrumentation at length palls for very lack of diversity in color. The performance of these selections was of exceptional beauty and finish.

The bright, particular gems of the novelties were the five Bizet numbers, The cradle song, entitled "The Doll," is a lovely little melody, fascinatingly scored, and with an exquisite daintiness of tone color. A remarkable bit of effect was one of the briefest of impromptus, named "The Top," in which the motion of the toy in spinning is suggested with a piquant playfulness of orchestration as original as it is airy and delightful. The fourth movement, "Little Husband, Little Wife," a plaintively tender duet between the first violins and the 'cellos, is another delicious bit of simplicity. These are all the veriest trifles, but they are of a nature that shows the true artist, working in a conscientiously artistic spirit, and emphasizing in almost every bar a strongly individualized master in his art. The suite was read and played with surpassing finish.

The Handel overture, reinstrumented by Franz Wullner, is not of very notable interest, and Mr. Wullner has done no great service to it by modernizing the score.

A striking feature in the performance was the first hearing here of some high trumpets, or, rather, cornets, manufactured expressly to meet the trying demands made by the trumpet parts of the instrumental music of Bach and Handel, especially the former. They are the only instruments of their kind in this country, and were imported by a prominent music lover here for a similar use to that to which they were devoted last night, and with such impressive effect.

The Haydn symphony received that treatment which Mr. Paur accords the composer, with invariably fine and satisfying results.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Fidelio," Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte, Schytte; symphonic poem, "Wallenstein," Smetana; symphony No. 3, Brahms. Mr. George W. Proctor is to be the soloist.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 27, 1896.

It was quite a Christmasy programme which Mr. Paur provided for the ninth in the present Symphony series. Not in the choice of music having distinctive or specific relations with that sacred but festive season; but in the light-hearted, genial, ingenuous and simple character of most of the numbers. Even the symphony itself claimed no motionlessly bound attention, being that one of Haydn in C minor, known sometimes as No. 9, which might almost be rated as a symphony in miniature. For it is only some twenty minutes in length, and its movements seem to be quite content with just showing how much might be done with their attractive and clear-cut themes if one only set about utilizing them to the full possibility. And this holds in spite of the fact that Haydn did less country-dancing and more counterpointing in the animated last movement that was often his wont. It should be noted that the trio of the minuet, which is an ornate and pleasant 'cello solo, was deliciously played by Mr. Schroeder.

And the rest of the programme — which was wisely contained within less than an hour and a half — was new, and exceedingly entertaining. But the audience — true Boston to the core — seemed to feel very much in doubt whether it ought to be pleased by what was confessedly juvenile in spirit, and applauded rather doubtfully and timidly things which a ready continental audience, whether of Germans or Italians, would have heartily welcomed and bidden good speed to. The beginning was made with Hermann Kretzschmar's arrangement into a suite of four numbers of the overture and about ten other movements from Gluck's ballet of "Don Juan." Of these only the finale, which the composer subsequently incorporated into the Inferno music of his "Orfeo," was known, but the others might well look for further acquaintance They not only show those peculiar qualities of clearness, proportion, grace, happy harmony and flowing measure which distinguished Gluck, but they also present a sequence which passes naturally to the intensely and dramatically furious conclusion.

Several selections from Humperdinck's incidental music to the legend of "The King's Children" were also given, including a melancholy scene called "Ruined and Dead," and some lively numbers fitted for the children's festivals. The composer's devotion to Wagner, less pronounced perhaps than in his "Hansel and Gretel," still showed strongly at first; but more freedom and natural gaiety developed as the numbers went on.

There was also a delicious little suite by Bizet, called "Children's Games," and as dainty and fanciful, as unpretending and true, as appreciative and adaptive, as if its author had not possessed the passion of "Carmen," the brilliancy of "The Pearl Fishers," or the hot, leaping life of the "Arlesienne." There were "Trumpets and Drums," a "Doll" and a "Top" movement, and others suggestive of a love-duet of manikins and a jolly little dance. The oddity of the spinning, reeling, tumbling top, the cheery thump of the march and the miniature sentiment of the duet, did manage to prevail with the listeners and touch them up to applause.

A Handel overture, No. 1, in D major, came last, and presented a short, pompous introduction, and a friged allegro of much force and splendor.

The programme was thoroughly well played, and it did one's heart good to see Mr Paur's merry, contented face when some of the neat little points came sharp and shining.

On Saturday next there will be played Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture; Schytte's pianoforte concerto, with Mr. George W. Proctor as the soloist; Smetana's "Wallenstein" poem, and Brahms's third symphony.

Howard Malcom Ticknor.

Gazett

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 27.

The Kneisel Quartet.

The interest in the third concert of the Kneisel Quartet centred in a new work by Mr. G. W. Chadwick, Quartet, E minor, No. 4. The work is not an attractive one of its kind, and there is no evidence that it owed its existence to inspiration. Just what the work means, it is impossible to say; it may be that Mr. Chadwick is writing American music on Drovak's theory of a negro-tune basis, but Ireland and Scotland come in for an equal share of his attention. The themes are not suggestive of originality, and strangely enough, they are inadequately developed, with no logical sequence, no clearness of expression born of conviction. Then there is a monotony, a sameness of coloring, that is trying to the nerves, and there are no rare technical merits that bring solace in the midst of pain, nothing but brevity, which in the present case is not the soul of wit. Mr. Chadwick has done far better work, and it is to be regretted that he allowed the quartet to leave his study table.

Another feature in the programme was Saint-Saen's septet for piano, trumpet and strings, op. 65. The interpretation of this delightful work was sadly marred by the indiscretions of Mr. Burmeister, who played the piano part, and converted a septet, or tried to convert it, into a piano solo. Despite a tradition sacred to the Kneisel Quartet, Mr. Burmeister should remember that in chamber music, it is barbarous to exalt one instrument at the expense of all the others, whether the instrument be first violin or piano. Mr. Burmeister ill-treated the piano as well as the composer, he pounded it, thumped it and tortured it; he almost completely neglected the intentions of the composer; he stifled the other instruments in an ocean of noise, and he forgot to give to his art any trace of delicacy, fitness or taste.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, DEC. 27, 1896.

Novelties Played at the Symphony Concert.

Four of the five numbers on the symphony program last week were given for the first time in this city. The novelties were Kretzschmar's arrangements of ballet music from Gluck's "Don Juan," selections from Humperdinck's "King's Children," Bizet's suite, "Children's Games," and Handel's overture, No. 1, in D major, arranged by Franz Wullner. Haydn's C-minor symphony completed the program. The Haydn number received sympathetic treatment, the fortissimo phrases of the earlier movements being smoothly given and with the necessary vigor. The intermediate themes and the slower passages were played with a tenderness and delicacy of expression thoroughly in harmony with the requirements of the score, and Mr Schroeder's cello work in the trio was wholly good. The finale went briliantly.

The selections from Gluck's "Don Juan" ballet music illustrate a succession of scenes made familiar in Mozart's opera, "Don Giovanni," and the highly contrasted writings. The opening themes are a blending of the stately with the jovial, these being supplemented by a curious figuration for strings and the oboe. The second movement foreshadows the impending fate of the don, the music growing more sedate in character. After a brief bit of merrymaking and serenading comes the finale or fourth movement, with the don's descent into hades.

The second part of the ballet was admirably performed, the strings in particular singing in beautiful unison with the flutes and horns in the earlier passages. The almost strident phrases were played with precision by the whole band. In the pizzicato movement the strings presented the dance rhythms with vivacity and delicate tonality, and the retribution that befel the Lothario was vividly and musically illustrated in the final movement.

The Humperdinck number is in two parts, one entitled "Ruined and Dead," the second representing a festival, or dance of children. The first part is effectively scored, as a whole, but without any particular musical value, although a melody is quite skilfully introduced and interwoven with a somber theme. A pleasing dance movement of a simple nature comprises the second movement. The music suggests a combination of the grewsome and the juvenile such as was heard in Humperdinck's "Hansel and Gretel," and recalls the author's previous work in many instances. The orchestra was efficient, and gave a satisfactory interpretation of the selection.

"Children's Games," the Bizet number, belongs to the whimsical order of writings, such as the Haydn "Kinder" symphony, and is a pretty little bit of musical humor. The "top-spinning" movement, very picturesque and also very short, was the most laughable, but the beauty of the fourth movement, a tender little duet between "little husband and little wife," called forth the heartiest appreciation, the work of the strings being notably good, even for the Boston symphony men.

The majestic prelude of the Handel overture was grandly set forth and the runs and supplementary mutations clearly and dexterously surmounted. The free trumpet figures were harmonious as a rule, and the 'cellos and double-basses also did their work well. The soloist at this week's concert will be Mr George W. Proctor. The following program will be performed: Beethoven, overture, "Fidelio;" Schytte, concerto for pianoforte; Smetana, symphonic poem, "Wallenstein;" Brahms, symphony No. 3.

POST,

Democratic Paper

ENGLAND.

DECEMBER 27, 1896.

Publishing Company.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

[illegible] patrons might feel that they [illegible] surfeited with music last night, for the selections played represented several schools, and of the five numbers on the programme, four had never before been heard in this city. By far the most interesting was the suite by Bizet and styled "Children's Games." It is in five movements, all very brief but thoroughly descriptive. The first movement is based on a march theme, in which the snare drum and trumpets predominate; the second movement is a berceuse, and is entitled "The Doll." It introduces a simple little melody, developed largely by the muted strings; the third is entitled "The Top," and the first brisk whizz and the increasing hum are picturesquely suggested. The fourth is a quaint piece of orchestral construction, and illustrates a duet between "Little Husband, Little Wife," as the programme puts it, by means of the violins and cellos. The fifth is a rushing galop, daintily developed and played with much spirit and dash. The whole suite is thoroughly novel, and there is little repetition, which largely accounted for the measure of enjoyment which the audience experienced.

The selections from the music to Humperdinck's "King's Children" is a curious piece of work. The portions heard last night were the introductions to Acts III. and II. That to Act III. is melancholy to the last degree. There are but two themes, but they are repeated to a degree bordering on monotony. The selection is rather suggestive of the fire-charm music in "Die Walkure." The Act II. music, however, is of a very different character. The music consists of several variations on a pretty dance theme and admirably offsets the other introduction. It is evident they are intended to be descriptive, but in neither case is the object made clear. A portion of the "Hansel and Gretel" music by this same composer was heard here last season, and as concert music proved very entertaining. Those played last night, however, will scarcely enhance the popularity of Humperdinck in these parts.

Gluck was represented on the programme by selections from his ballet "Don Juan," arranged by Hermann Kretzschmar. As played last night there are four divisions, all descriptive of the festival, with its attendant dance and love in its various moods. As might be expected with music of this sort, it is light and frothy, and it was fittingly placed at the beginning of the programme. The music is always stately, never commonplace, and is often dramatic. It was beautifully played, and its many beauties were charmingly brought out. In general contrast to this number was the overture by Handel, arranged by Franz Wullner and placed at the end of the programme. It was heavy, dull and of a dignified order, not a selection which one would care to listen to soon again. The symphony was Haydn's No. 9, rather short, but full of beauty and always enjoyable.

At the concert next week George W. Proctor will play a concerto by Schytte, and the symphony will be Brahms's No. 3.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the ninth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Gluck: Selections from the Ballet, "Don Juan," arranged by Hermann Kretzschmar.
(First time in Boston).
Haydn: Symphony in C minor (B. & H., No. 9).
Humperdinck: Selections from Music to "Königskinder."
(First time in Boston).
Bizet: Petite Suite, "Jeu d'Enfants," opus 22.
(First time in Boston).
Handel: Overture in D major, arranged by Franz Wüllner.
(First time in Boston).

It may well be questioned whether it was worth while to play so much of Kretzschmar's suite from Gluck's "Don Juan." The final Larghetto and Allegro in D minor—the latter of which Gluck used again as the "Dance of Furies" in his "Orpheus"—are great music; the Allegro is even strong enough to hold up its head after having been made the model for countless melodramatic scenes of stress and terror in the cheap incidental music to cheap sensational dramas. But the earlier numbers in this suite of four movements sound pretty weak and childish nowadays; if we are ever lucky enough to have a series of classical concerts with small orchestra in a small hall in Boston, it may be well to revive some of this old music now and then; but in the Music Hall it is dull and tedious.

Haydn's C minor symphony shines among its companions in the "great twelve" (written for Salomon in London) by the rather grim seriousness and dramatic force of its first and last movements; one feels that here Haydn had a prophetic glimpse of a more modern symphonic point of view, and had perhaps caught a suggestion from the Finale of Mozart's "Jupiter." The "Jupiter" was written in 1778, and this symphony of Haydn's in 1791. It is an admirable work, full of life, vigor and beauty. It was excellently well played, Mr. Schroeder making some exceedingly beautiful effects in his 'cello solo in the Trio of the Minuet.

The two selections from Humperdinck's music to Rosmer's "Königskinder"—Introductions to Acts II. and III.—seemed to us pretty dull and dreary. The tragic Introduction to the third act seems little more than diluted Wagner, while, in the Introduction to the second, one is not overjoyed to recognize something of that too, too naif Humperdinck of the "Humoreske," played here some years ago by Mr. Nikisch. For one thing, however, the Introduction to Act. III. is wonderfully scored, and quite in the Wagner style.

Bizet's little suite of children's pieces is a bright bit of champagne-froth, but none the less charming for its frothiness. It has all Bizet's cleverness and esprit. It was charmingly played—save that we cannot think Mr. Paur right in throwing so much maturity of feeling and even passion into the little "Petit mari, petite femme" duet—and evidently much enjoyed by the audience.

And then came Handel and put all the rest in his pocket! That overture of his made us think of what Mendelssohn wrote to Moscheles: "That's where I admire Handel's glorious style; when he brings up his kettle-drums and trumpets towards the end, and thumps and batters away to his heart's content, as if he meant to knock you down, no mortal can remain unmoved." Here is genius, if ever it was anywhere! Wüllner's additions to the score seem all in good taste, though it would take minute study to test the exact quality of the musicianship displayed in them. The performance was splendid.

Upon the whole, the programme was more enjoyable than one would have expected from reading it. Seventeen movements, thirteen of which were new, looked like a rather terrifying list; but the concert was even shorter than usual, and no one seemed tired by it. Still this is merely a negative result, and we doubt if many in the audience found themselves particularly inspired and edified by it. There were too many lollipops!

The next programme is: Beethoven, overture to "Fidelio," opus 72; Eduard Schütt, pianoforte concerto No. 2, in F minor, opus 47 (new); Smetana, symphonic poem, "Wallenstein" (new); Brahms, symphony No. 3, in F major, opus 90. Mr. George W. Proctor will be the pianist.

The Boston [illegible]

MONDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY.

A Whole Programme Full of Novelties, Ancient and Modern.

Sixteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; ninth concert. The programme:
Selection from the ballet "Don Juan"......von Gluck
Arranged by Hermann Kretzschmar.
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony in C minor (B. & H., No. 9....Haydn
Selections from the music to "King's Children ....Humperdinck
(First time in Boston.)
Little suite, "Children's Games," op. 22.........Bizet
(First time in Boston.)
Overture No. 1, in D major..............Handel
Arranged by Franz Wullner.
(First time in Boston.)

Such a feast of "first times" has never been known in Mr. Paur's time, and the very excellent part of it was that all were worth listening to, and some were of great beauty and attractiveness. The antipodes of music were well represented; the whole history of orchestration is included between the lovely and classic simplicity of Gluck and the purple richness of Humperdinck. And there is a deal of suggestiveness involved, for we know that with all his apparent bareness of instrumentation the already ancient Gluck will yet live years, and perhaps centuries, after the intensely fin de siecle Humperdinck. Music is not unlike the dress of woman. Fashions change, but the inherently beautiful and artistic never dies, and can be found recurring again and again as the years roll on.

The ballet music of "Don Juan" is mostly refined and fascinating. Particularly graceful is the minuet, with its very expressive trio in C major. The last movement shows all of Gluck's power, which for his day, was wonderfully effective and elaborate. The "Descent to Hell," better known as the dance of the furies in "Orpheus," is masterly in its tremendous energy and fiery abandon. The whole work was played with impeccable precision and beauty.

After the Hayddn C minor symphony, which, to tell the truth, is not a thing of unmixed delight, came the music of today—Humperdinck's preludes for the fairy play, "The Children of the King." From the first sound of the mournful theme in the slow movement, the thing that strikes one most is the great fertility of invention in the scoring. It is full and richly ornamented without any of that cloudiness which often brings to naught the ambitious orchestration of the young moderns. And the most salient point is the close resemblance of the whole piece, both slow and rapid movements, to "Hansel and Gretel." Apparently Humperdinck has not yet emerged from his second "manner"— his first may be said to have been represented by his "Musical Joke," which was so derided at these concerts a few years ago. Perhaps he is not great enough to be accredited with "manners," but of that, time will tell. Enough to say that the selections just heard were very charming and musicianly.

Another work that gave great pleasure by reason of its airy invention and supreme loveliness of expression, was the Bizet suite, "Children's Games." To think that the world should have lost a man who was just writing such things as this! Each movement is a gem in its way, and perfectly in the gay and effervescent style proper to childhood. Nothing could be more delicate and full of realism than the tiny movement depicting the winding and spinning of a top. Mr. Paur is to be thanked for bringing such a lovely work before the people.

The Handel overture is eminently Handelian, without possessing any particular marks of genius. No doubt the old master could have turned off a dozen such in a week. It was solidly and well played.

Musical Courier
Dec 30th

To Sell Boston's Famous Organ.

BOSTON, Mass., December 21.

THE great Boston Music Hall organ, once the most famous instrument of its kind in the country, and larger than almost any organ now in use in the world, is to be sold. For the past dozen years the pipes and mechanical couplings have been stored in a shed, and now they are to be offered for sale, in the hope that the great instrument, in some new location, may once more take its place among the foremost examples of the organ builder's art.

When the big Music Hall of Boston was finished in 1852 a musical festival was held to celebrate the event, and the proceeds, $920, became the nucleus of a fund to buy an organ for the building. This sum was gradually increased until in 1853 the contract was awarded to a German firm. The instrument finally arrived, after a three months' passage, in a sailing vessel from Rotterdam, in March, 1863, and was first heard in public on October 31 of that year. The total cost of the organ was $60,000, and its weight was about 70 tons. It was 47 feet wide, 18 feet deep, and 70 feet high. In addition to a full assortment of mechanical couplers the organ possessed 89 speaking stops, with 5,474 pipes, distributed over four manuals, just about the size of the great organ now at St. Bartholomew's Church, New York.

The organ was removed from Music Hall in 1884, after several seasons of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there, because it interfered with the acoustic properties of the auditorium, besides taking up too much room. It is now awaiting a purchaser.

HOME JOURNAL

A PAPER OF TO-DAY

SATURDAY, JANUARY 2, 1897.

GEORGE W. PROCTOR, the pianist, who will perform with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall to-night the second pianoforte concerto by Schutt, was born in Boston twenty-three years ago.

—o—

For two years he was a pupil of John Alden, then for three years of Carl Faelten, and he has but quite recently returned from abroad where for four years he was private pupil of Theodore Leschetizky.

—o—

Considerable interest was manifested in his appearance at the Boston Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday evening, and quite a number of well-known musical people from Boston attended the concert in order to hear him perform Mendelssohn's G-minor concerto.

—o—

While the scope and comprehensiveness of young Proctor's technique could not adequately be judged by this single performance, he demonstrated beyond cavil that he will rank in the near future with some of the very ablest pianists who have appeared in this vicinity. The technical virtuosity to be exhibited with Mendelssohn's opus 25 is quite limited as compared with that of one of the Saint-Saens, Grieg, Brahms or Schutt concertos. Nevertheless Mr. Proctor made a masterly showing with the Mendelssohn work, which he played beyond the reach of any finite faultfinding.

—o—

Mr. George Nowell and Mr. Proctor are probably the ablest representatives of Leschetizky in this vicinity.

—o—

It is not from such pianists and teachers as these that one hears so much about the Leschetizky method.

—o—

"I have no method," said Leschetizky to young Proctor.

—o—

Any musician can appreciate what that means.

—o—

Von Bülow said the same.

—o—

Beware of the pianoforte or vocal teacher who has very considerable to say about method.

—o—

"Strong fingers and a flexible wrist are my chief requirements of a pianist," says Leschetizky.

—o—

Judging from what he accomplished with the Mendelssohn concerto at Sanders Theatre, Thursday evening, young Proctor will create something of a sensation with the Schutt concerto in Music Hall to-night.

—o—

ON POST,
Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
DECEMBER 27, 1896.
Post Publishing Company.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Symphony patrons might feel that they were surfeited with music last night, for the selections played represented several schools, and of the five numbers on the programme, four had never before been heard in this city. By far the most interesting was the suite by Bizet and styled "Children's Games." It is in five movements, all very brief but thoroughly descriptive. The first movement is based on a march theme, in which the snare drum and trumpets predominate; the second movement is a berceuse, and is entitled "The Doll." It introduces a simple little melody, developed largely by the muted strings; the third is entitled "The Top," and the first brisk whizz and the increasing hum are picturesquely suggested. The fourth is a quaint piece of orchestral construction, and illustrates a duet between "Little Husband, Little Wife," as the programme puts it, by means of the violins and cellos. The fifth is a rushing galop, daintily developed and played with much spirit and dash. The whole suite is thoroughly novel, and there is little repetition, which largely accounted for the measure of enjoyment which the audience experienced.

The selections from the music to Humperdinck's "King's Children" is a curious piece of work. The portions heard last night were the introductions to Acts III. and II. That to Act III. is melancholy to the last degree. There are but two themes, but they are repeated to a degree bordering on monotony. The selection is rather suggestive of the fire-charm music in "Die Walkure." The Act II. music, however, is of a very different character. The music consists of several variations on a pretty dance theme and admirably offsets the other introduction. It is evident they are intended to be descriptive, but in neither case is the object made clear. A portion of the "Hansel and Gretel" music by this same composer was heard here last season, and as concert music proved very entertaining. Those played last night, however, will scarcely enhance the popularity of Humperdinck in these parts.

Gluck was represented on the programme by selections from his ballet "Don Juan," arranged by Hermann Kretzschmar. As played last night there are four divisions, all descriptive of the festival, with its attendant dance and love in its various moods. As might be expected with music of this sort, it is light and frothy, and it was fittingly placed at the beginning of the programme. The music is always stately, never commonplace, and is often dramatic. It was beautifully played, and its many beauties were charmingly brought out. In general contrast to this number was the overture by Handel, arranged by Franz Wullner and placed at the end of the programme. It was heavy, dull and of a dignified order, not a selection which one would care to listen to soon again. The symphony was Haydn's No. 9, rather short, but full of beauty and always enjoyable.

At the concert next week George W. Proctor will play a concerto by Schytte, and the symphony will be Brahms's No. 3.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the ninth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Gluck: Selections from the Ballet, "Don Juan," arranged by Hermann Kretzschmar.
(First time in Boston).
Haydn: Symphony in C minor (B. & H., No. 9).
Humperdinck: Selections from Music to "Königskinder."
(First time in Boston).
Bizet: Petite Suite, "Jeu d'Enfants," opus 22.
(First time in Boston).
Handel: Overture in D major, arranged by Franz Wüllner.
(First time in Boston).

It may well be questioned whether it was worth while to play so much of Kretzschmar's suite from Gluck's "Don Juan." The final Larghetto and Allegro in D minor—the latter of which Gluck used again as the "Dance of Furies" in his "Orpheus"—are great music; the Allegro is even strong enough to hold up its head after having been made the model for countless melodramatic scenes of stress and terror in the cheap incidental music to cheap sensational dramas. But the earlier numbers in this suite of four movements sound pretty weak and childish nowadays; if we are ever lucky enough to have a series of classical concerts with small orchestra in a small hall in Boston, it may be well to revive some of this old music now and then; but in the Music Hall it is dull and tedious.

Haydn's C minor symphony shines among its companions in the "great twelve" (written for Salomon in London) by the rather grim seriousness and dramatic force of its first and last movements; one feels that here Haydn had a prophetic glimpse of a more modern symphonic point of view, and had perhaps caught a suggestion from the Finale of Mozart's "Jupiter." The "Jupiter" was written in 1778, and this symphony of Haydn's in 1791. It is an admirable work, full of life, vigor and beauty. It was excellently well played, Mr. Schroeder making some exceedingly beautiful effects in his 'cello solo in the Trio of the Minuet.

The two selections from Humperdinck's music to Rosmer's "Königskinder"—Introductions to Acts II. and III.—seemed to us pretty dull and dreary. The tragic Introduction to the third act seems little more than diluted Wagner, while, in the Introduction to the second, one is not overjoyed to recognize something of that too, too naif Humperdinck of the "Humoreske," played here some years ago by Mr. Nikisch. For one thing, however, the Introduction to Act. III. is wonderfully scored, and quite in the Wagner style.

Bizet's little suite of children's pieces is a bright bit of champagne-froth, but none the less charming for its frothiness. It has all Bizet's cleverness and esprit. It was charmingly played—save that we cannot think Mr. Paur right in throwing so much maturity of feeling and even passion into the little "Petit mari, petite femme" duet—and evidently much enjoyed by the audience.

And then came Handel and put all the rest in his pocket! That overture of his made us think of what Mendelssohn wrote to Moscheles: "That 's where I admire Handel's glorious style; when he brings up his kettle-drums and trumpets towards the end, and thumps and batters away to his heart's content, as if he meant to knock you down, no mortal can remain unmoved." Here is genius, if ever it was anywhere! Wüllner's additions to the score seem all in good taste, though it would take minute study to test the exact quality of the musicianship displayed in them. The performance was splendid.

Upon the whole, the programme was more enjoyable than one would have expected from reading it. Seventeen movements, thirteen of which were new, looked like a rather terrifying list; but the concert was even shorter than usual, and no one seemed tired by it. Still this is merely a negative result, and we doubt if many in the audience found themselves particularly inspired and edified by it. There were too many lollipops!

The next programme is: Beethoven, overture to "Fidelio," opus 72; Eduard Schütt, pianoforte concerto No. 2, in F minor, opus 47 (new); Smetana, symphonic poem, "Wallenstein" (new); Brahms, symphony No. 3, in F major, opus 90. Mr. George W. Proctor will be the pianist.

The Boston Traveler
MONDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY.

A Whole Programme Full of Novelties, Ancient and Modern.

Sixteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; ninth concert. The programme:
Selection from the ballet "Don Juan" ....von Gluck
Arranged by Hermann Kretzschmar.
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony in C minor (B. & H., No. 9....Haydn
Selections from the music to "King's Children ....Humperdinck
(First time in Boston.)
Little suite, "Children's Games," op. 22.. ....Bizet
(First time in Boston.)
Overture No. 1, in D major..............Handel
Arranged by Franz Wullner.
(First time in Boston.)

Such a feast of "first times" has never been known in Mr. Paur's time, and the very excellent part of it was that all were worth listening to, and some were of great beauty and attractiveness. The antipodes of music were well represented; the whole history of orchestration is included between the lovely and classic simplicity of Gluck and the purple richness of Humperdinck. And there is a deal of suggestiveness involved, for we know that with all his apparent bareness of instrumentation the already ancient Gluck will yet live years, and perhaps centuries, after the intensely fin de siecle Humperdinck. Music is not unlike the dress of woman. Fashions change, but the inherently beautiful and artistic never dies, and can be found recurring again and again as the years roll on.

The ballet music of "Don Juan" is mostly refined and fascinating. Particularly graceful is the minuet, with its very expressive trio in C major. The last movement shows all of Gluck's power, which for his day, was wonderfully effective and elaborate. The "Descent to Hell," better known as the dance of the furies in "Orpheus," is masterly in its tremendous energy and fiery abandon. The whole work was played with impeccable precision and beauty.

After the Hayddn C minor symphony, which, to tell the truth, is not a thing of unmixed delight, came the music of today—Humperdinck's preludes for the fairy play, "The Children of the King." From the first sound of the mournful theme in the slow movement, the thing that strikes one most is the great fertility of invention in the scoring. It is full and richly ornamented without any of that cloudiness which often brings to naught the ambitious orchestration of the young moderns. And the most salient point is the close resemblance of the whole piece, both slow and rapid movements, to "Hansel and Gretel." Apparently Humperdinck has not yet emerged from his second "manner"— his first may be said to have been represented by his "Musical Joke," which was so derided at these concerts a few years ago. Perhaps he is not great enough to be accredited with "manners," but of that, time will tell. Enough to say that the selections just heard were very charming and musicianly.

Another work that gave great pleasure by reason of its airy invention and supreme loveliness of expression, was the Bizet suite, "Children's Games." To think that the world should have lost a man who was just writing such things as this! Each movement is a gem in its way, and perfectly in the gay and effervescent style proper to childhood. Nothing could be more delicate and full of realism than the tiny movement depicting the winding and spinning of a top. Mr. Paur is to be thanked for bringing such a lovely work before the people.

The Handel overture is eminently Handelian, without possessing any particular marks of genius. No doubt the old master could have turned off a dozen such in a week. It was solidly and well played.

Musical Courier
Dec 30t

To Sell Boston's Famous Organ.

BOSTON, Mass., December 21.

THE great Boston Music Hall organ, once the most famous instrument of its kind in the country, and larger than almost any organ now in use in the world, is to be sold. For the past dozen years the pipes and mechanical couplings have been stored in a shed, and now they are to be offered for sale, in the hope that the great instrument, in some new location, may once more take its place among the foremost examples of the organ builder's art.

When the big Music Hall of Boston was finished in 1852 a musical festival was held to celebrate the event, and the proceeds, $920, became the nucleus of a fund to buy an organ for the building. This sum was gradually increased until in 1853 the contract was awarded to a German firm. The instrument finally arrived, after a three months' passage, in a sailing vessel from Rotterdam, in March, 1863, and was first heard in public on October 31 of that year. The total cost of the organ was $60,000, and its weight was about 70 tons. It was 47 feet wide, 18 feet deep, and 70 feet high. In addition to a full assortment of mechanical couplers the organ possessed 89 speaking stops, with 5,474 pipes, distributed over four manuals, just about the size of the great organ now at St. Bartholomew's Church, New York.

The organ was removed from Music Hall in 1884, after several seasons of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there, because it interfered with the acoustic properties of the auditorium, besides taking up too much room. It is now awaiting a purchaser.

HOME JOURNAL
A PAPER OF TO-DAY
SATURDAY, JANUARY 2, 1897.

GEORGE W. PROCTOR, the pianist, who will perform with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall to-night the second pianoforte concerto by Schutt, was born in Boston twenty-three years ago.

—o—

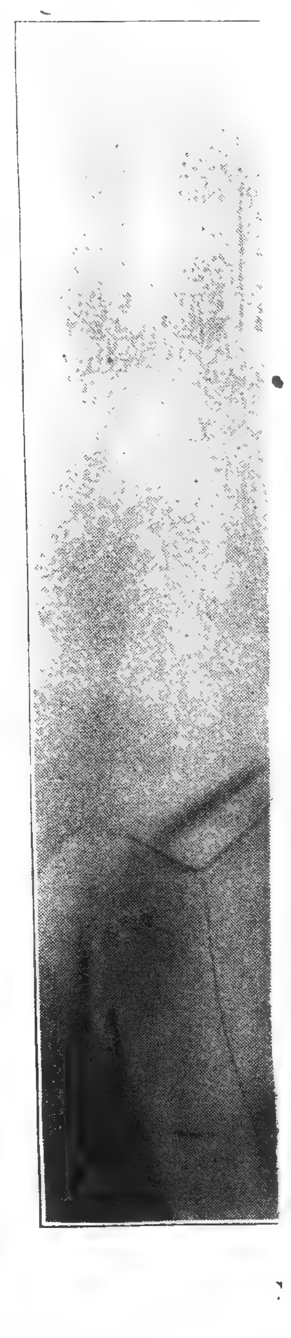
For two years he was a pupil of John Alden, then for three years of Carl Faelten, and he has but quite recently returned from abroad where for four years he was private pupil of Theodore Leschetizky.

—o—

Considerable interest was manifested in his appearance at the Boston Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday evening, and quite a number of well-known musical people from Boston attended the concert in order to hear him perform Mendelssohn's G-minor concerto.

—o—

While the scope and comprehensiveness of young Proctor's technique could not adequately be judged by this single performance, he demonstrated beyond cavil that he will rank in the near future with some of the very ablest pianists who have appeared in this vicinity. The technical virtuosity to be exhibited with Mendelssohn's opus 25 is quite limited as compared with that of one of the Saint-Saens, Grieg, Brahms or Schutt concertos. Nevertheless Mr. Proctor made a masterly showing with the Mendelssohn work, which he played beyond the reach of any finite faultfinding.



—o—

Mr. George Nowell and Mr. Proctor are probably the ablest representatives of Leschetizky in this vicinity.

—o—

It is not from such pianists and teachers as these that one hears so much about the Leschetizky method.

—o—

"I have no method," said Leschetizky to young Proctor.

—o—

Any musician can appreciate what that means.

—o—

Von Bülow said the same.

—o—

Beware of the pianoforte or vocal teacher who has very considerable to say about method.

—o—

"Strong fingers and a flexible wrist are my chief requirements of a pianist," says Leschetizky.

—o—

Judging from what he accomplished with the Mendelssohn concerto at Sanders Theatre, Thursday evening, young Proctor will create something of a sensation with the Schutt concerto in Music Hall tonight.

—o—

[67]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1896.

The program of the ninth Symphony concert (December 26) was as follows:

Selections from the ballet Don Juan .... Gluck
Ouverture.
Brillante.
Grazioso.
Finale, Larghetto—Allegro non troppo.
Arranged by Hermann Kretzschmar.
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony in C minor (B. & H., No. 9) .... Haydn
Selections from the music to Königskinder .... Humperdinck
Introduction to Act III.
Verdorben—gestorben, Langsam.
Spielmann's letzter Gesang.
Introduction to Act II.
Hellafest, Kinder Reigen.
(First time in Boston.)
Petite suite, Jeux d'Enfants .... Bizet
Marche (Trompette et Tambour).
Berceuse (La Poupée).
Impromptu (La Toupie).
Duo (Petit mari, petite femme).
Galop (Le Bal).
(First time in Boston.)
Overture, No. 1, in D major .... Händel
Maestoso—Allegro.
Arranged by Franz Wüllner.
(First time in Boston.)

Here are four novelties, and concerning the origin of the excerpts from Königskinder and Bizet's suite the program said not a word, although there was a learned disquisition on the theory of Mahillon.

I believe one of the Humperdinckian preludes was given in Brooklyn last November, but I have not seen in THE MUSICAL COURIER any story of the nature of this drama with incidental music.

Königskinder, a German fairy tale in three acts, is by Ernst Rosmer, whose real name is Elsa Bernstein, who is the daughter of our old friend Heinrich Porges, of Munich.

Humperdinck finished the music in May, 1896, but I can find no record of a performance of the complete work at Munich, although announcements of a performance there have been made from time to time.

The first performance of these excerpts was at a concert of the Bach Society at Heidelberg, June 2, 1896, when the composer led. Other performances were at Cologne, June —; Berlin, October 12; Leipsic, November 5.

This is the story:

Act I.—A king's son finds at the house of a forest witch a goosemaid, the daughter of a king. He loves her and would fain take her away, but she is bound by a spell. It is a minstrel, a fiddler, who, appearing with citizens of Hellabrun at the house of the witch, in order to gain advice from her concerning the choice of a ruler, looses the spell and rescues the princess.

Act II. The people of Hellabrun, trusting the witch, await at noon their king or queen. The king's son is living among them, despised, a beggar; he has hired himself out as a swineherd. Only the daughter of the broom maker knows his princely station. The clock is striking; it is high noon; the city gate is open wide; the sun bursts through the clouds; the goosemaid enters, accompanied by the fiddler. The people stare, speechless. But the Prince rushes toward her with a shout and holds her in his arms. There is mockery; there is fierce laughter; there is tumult. Beaten with sticks and stones, the Prince is thrown outside the gate.

Act III.—It is the dead of winter. The exiled children wander in the forest. The loyal fiddler and a flock of children, among them the daughter of the broom maker, search for them. At last they find them: "united in love, starved and frozen in the winter snow. Ruined! Dead!" The living kneel, and the minstrel sings his last song and plays his last tune, and breaks his fiddle in pieces.

"Dann brech' ich meine Fiedel entzwei," runs the text.

Therefore Mr. Apthorp's translation of "Spielmann" by "piper" is here incorrect.

This music is theatre music. In the theatre it may be effective. In the concert hall the chief interest is in the orchestration, which is Wagnerian in its scheme and sumptuousness. Outside of this orchestration I find little of worth. The prelude to Act III. in its development reminds one of the Tristan prelude, and the Klage motiv is very Tristanian.

As these pieces will undoubtedly be played at orchestral concerts in the United States the following description of them, which I have translated freely from Mr. Brandes' admirable program books of the Dresden Symphony concerts, may be of interest to your readers:

The prelude to Act III. opens with mournful, lonesome chords given to the woodwind, while the English horn and the first horn sound the Lamentation motiv, which, short and incisive, appears in various forms throughout the prelude. These chords are repeated by other wind instruments. The idea of this tone picture is desolation, the desolation of the wintry forest and the exiled children wandering, hungry and cold. The oboe sings in mournful recollection of the short happiness known in love. The violins take up the song of grief. The children are dead; they lie in each other's arms. The loyal fiddler finds them and pronounces their elegy. There are hints of the two former motivs which interrupt the dirge of the horns. Then follows the apotheosis.

The prelude to Act II. tells of the rejoicing expectation at Hellabrunn, as the people await their ruler. There is dancing. A child's rattle is heard. The town children enter and dance the Rosenringel, the theme of which is given first by the clarinet; at the end the children's simple tune is sung in frenzy by the whole orchestra.

⁂

Nor did Mr. Apthorp concern himself with the origin of Bizet's Jeux d'Enfants. Colonne in 1873 founded the Sunday concerts which are now given at the Châtelet. Interested in young French composers, he asked Bizet for an unpublished work for the first concert. Now Bizet's Jeux d'Enfants, twelves pieces for piano, four hands, had just been published by Durand-Schoenewerk. He orchestrated of these pieces Nos. 2, 3, 6, 11, 12. These were first played at the first Colonne concert, at the Odéon, March 2, 1873.

Bizet's suite suggests children and their games. His children speak in simple language, while the children of Humperdinck have megaphonic voices and stride in a legendary mist. Characteristic is the funny pomp of the March, the sweet simplicity of the Doll. The Top is a delightful bit of musical fancy and skill. Little Husband, Little Wife was spoiled by exaggeration in the performance. The poor things were turned into erotic lovers in one of Massenet's pornographic operas. Nor was the galop played with the necessary lightness and brilliancy.

⁂

The overture of Händel wore a tremendous wig, and it shook powder throughout the hall. It sounded like unto 250 or 300 other pieces by this industrious and pious composer.

The Haydn symphony was a good deal of a bore. Mr. Paur, who is enamored of the slow allegro, coquetted with Haydn's frankness, and succeeded in ruining it.

There are charming movements in the old ballet music of Gluck. You know the Donna Anna of his ballet opened the door to Don Juan, and even after the death of her stern protector she danced a pas de deux with the betrayer and assassin at the great feast at his house. She is the Donna Anna seen by Hoffmann in his wild tale.

This is the music that suited the dance when it was something more than a zenith-defying kick and a display of intimate laces.

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 3.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the 10th Symphony concert given in Music Hall last evening was:

Overture, "Fidelio," E major.......... Beethoven
Concerto for Pianoforte No. 2, in F minor, op. 47 .... Edward Schutt
Symphonic Poem, "Wallenstein's Camp" .... Smetana
Symphony No. 3, F major................ Brahms
Solist, Mr. George W. Proctor.

Much interest was felt in the appearance of Mr. G. W. Proctor, but the piece selected gave him but few opportunities to demonstrate his talents. The concerto is trivial in idea and over-elaborate in development, as if one should utter commonplaces in grandiloquent words; there are suggestions, unconscious, of course, of Grieg, Mendelssohn, Chopin and other composers, and generally a large amount of elaborate display, springing from and leading to nothing. The work is one of many recent examples of a composer who has nothing valuable to say, but writes simply because it is his business or profession. In the work under consideration, Mr. Schutt is content to take the most trivial subject for his theme, hammer it out to the fracture point of thinness and then conceal its inherent worthlessness with pretentious, meaningless ornaments. The elaborately embossed pasteboard helmet rests on neither a living or a dead skull, but surrounds emptiness. At its best, the work suggests nothing higher than salon music; at times it has a characterless prettiness and a graceful sentimentality; there is a suggestion of dignity that develops into bombast and a hinting earnestness that turns out to be triviality in masquerade. It is a pale, weak, sickly and unsatisfactory concerto, giving no convincing reason why it should have been written, occupying no place in the world of high art and possessing not a trace of originality in its sins of omission and of commission. In struggling against the noise of the orchestra, the protests of the piano are unheard, and the situation of the pianist suggests a shipwrecked mariner wasting his calls for help against the billows of a tempest-tossed ocean. From all the evidence that it was possible to gather, one may venture to assert that Mr. Proctor is well equipped in the way of technique, that he plays with taste, artistic feeling, sincerity and directness, and that there is no trace of the amateur in his work. To correctly estimate the height and degree of his talents is impossible under the given conditions; one can only record the impression that the work of the young artist is full of promise and defer detailed criticism to a future occasion.

The Smetana symphonic poem was heard at this concert for the first time in Boston, and there cannot be too many works given by reputable composers, even though they are not of the highest worth. Musical education means the hearing of the new as well as the old, and Mr. Paur's exertions in this direction cannot be too highly praised. Having heard this symphonic poem, one is content never to hear it again. It is good, solid work in its way, but its way is an old-fashioned and hopelessly obsolete way. There are fire, vigor and passion in the work. The color is laid on boldly, without wiggling; the master is in grim earnest, but in his enthusiasm he kicks over rusty armor, and it rattles hollowly. Wallenstein's camp is safer in the hands of the poet than of the composer, as are all things in which definite action takes the place of vague imaginings.

The soloist for the next concert is Mr. C. M. Loeffler, who will play his Divertimento for Violin and Orchestra, in A, op. 9.

[illegible]al Paper of the State.

[illegible]e Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 4, 1897.

A New Pianist at the Symphony Concert Saturday.

The concert of Saturday began with a rather conservative performance of Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture, by no means the best of the four different overtures which the composer wrote at different times for his single opera. The tempo seemed to drag a little at times, but the work was interpreted with all possible clearness and received considerable applause.

The chief feature of the concert was the appearance of a new pianist, a resident of Boston, and a young man who received the greater part of his musical education here.

When Mr. G. W. Proctor left Boston some years ago, his teacher, Mr. Carl Faelton, of the New England Conservatory, had already brought him well into the domain of advanced piano-work. Since that time he has been hard at work in Vienna under Leschitizky, and the fruits of his labors were offered to his own city for the first time at this concert.

The concerto at first chosen was by Schytte, the Dane, but this was finally changed for the second piano concerto of Schuett, the Viennese, the intimate friend of Mr. Proctor's teacher, Leschitizky. It is not a very great work; it has the modern romantic tendencies without having a spark of Schumann's breadth.

The composer starts his work with mighty thoughts and then begins to stagger perceptibly under his load; instead of sustained power, therefore, one obtains only spasmodic effort. Occasionally some charming stretches are attained, as in the theme of the second movement, but never a broad homogeneity.

The first movement started with gigantic power, but very soon began to fritter itself away on the development of an unimportant figure which had but little to say for itself in spite of all its ingenious transformations. The coda wound up with a fury for which there seemed no adequate cause.

The second movement placed Mr. Schuett upon his native heath,—the light romantic school,—and presented a charming theme which was freely varied by piano and orchestra. The hypercritic might find the movement a little below concerto dignity and more akin to drawing-room music of poetic tendencies, but it achieved what it evidently set out to do, and was attractive from first to last.

The third movement was likewise unambitious save in the technical field. Instead of attempting a large form which would require development of themes, the composer employed a species of song-form with trio, in which melody pure and simple might rule, and in which a series of short pictures rather than one large one was demanded. The composer succeeded therefore in what he attempted, and displayed the pianist (and his own gift of melody) without climbing any Olympian heights or adding a standard concerto to the world's repertoire.

Mr. Proctor, who was very favorably received, began in good style, exhibiting breadth and clearness in the first movement. He also was refined and poetic in the second movement, but in the finale he seemed to be fatigued and could not balance against the orchestra. There was some indistinctness in the final coda and a lame, inconsequential ending.

It is always hazardous, and frequently unjust, to form a judicial opinion at the first hearing of any artist; a debut is beset with so many hindrances that it is often not a full and fair trial. It would be impossible, for example, to state definitely whether Mr. Proctor lacked breadth of thought in the finale, or whether there was too slight a physique to bear the muscular strain, or whether there was nervousness present. If he can play sustainedly as he did in the first movement he will very soon entitle himself to a place among our leading American pianists.

He was abundantly applauded, being recalled four times at the close of the work, and one can unhesitatingly say that there is abundant promise in this newest pianist

It is many years since the Philharmonic Orchestra, in the days when the Boston Symphony was not, gave a performance of Rheinberger's "Wallenstein Symphony;" at this concert another setting of the Wallenstein subject was presented which seemed more aglow with genius than the Munich Kapellmeister's setting. Smetana's "Wallenstein's Camp" was a tone-picture that could be understood without reading Schiller's tragedy.

The wild revelry that precedes the entrance of the Capuchin, and a little hint of the sermon where the soldiery try to kill him and the two Croats protect him, may be discerened by the lively imagination, but for all practical purposes the details of the German play can be set aside and the picture taken as a portrayal of the Duke of Friedland's camp in the Thirty years' war, with all its wild soldiery and its ferocious and tumultous revelry. Evening, night and morning are expressively depicted, and the work becomes as effective a military picture as a Detaille or a De Neuville canvas.

It seemed a little exaggerated in the performance, however. Mr. Paur must beware of the extremes of force which are possible of production with his large band. The work began with a dynamite explosion that caused timid auditors to cling to their seats, and it ended with a series of detonations that seemed out of place anywhere except in a deaf and dumb asylum.

There were, however, many delightful touches between these uproars; the folk-dances picturing the rough delights of the camp in the evening, were excellently given and had a charm of their own. After this there came a theme on trombones and bass tuba that will not be rivalled even on the day of judgment for power. It is pleasant to note that there are no symptoms of lung disease in this department of our orchestra.

Then came the mysterious pizzicato passages and the theme on the muted violins that showed the unruly camp hushed to slumber. The fanfares of trumpets (excellently played) were fitting heralds of the morning and of the marching out of the troops There were fragments of national melody interspersed in this part of the picture, and the march itself was of inter [illegible] an exception of th[illegible] quiet an ending to [illegible] sical programme. [illegible] felt something of this [illegible] casion; accustomed to being forc[illegible] ed out with clashes and crashes, [illegible] were ushered out on tiptoe, in [illegible] possible manner.

The work was superbly read [illegible] Paur, who has given us the be[illegible] tations of Brahms that Boston [illegible] received. As to the symphony itself it scarcely seems to the reviewer as great a work as its predecessor and successor [illegible] has, of course, some touches that make [illegible] worthy of the greatest living symphonist; the subordinate theme of the first movement is beautiful enough to make the reputation of any composer, but the [illegible] movement is not comparable in [illegible] with the similar movements in [illegible] or fourth symphonies by the same composer. Hans Richter, after his first examination of this symphony, called it the "Heroic" symphony of Brahms, and this may apply in some degree to the first and last movements, and there is a fur[illegible] connection between these two in the [illegible] pearance of a thought of the first [illegible] ment in the coda of the finale, a procedure which Brahms learned from Beethoven.

The short movement which takes the place of a Scherzo is altogether a charming one, and Brahms, knowing that he lacked the Mendelssohnian playfulness, was wise in substituting a shorter movement, an intermezzo, for the full Scherzo.

The finale belongs to Brahms' great movements, but after all its strife of themes the gentle end with muted strings and sustained chords like sighs is very unexpected, and while making a fitting end to the symphony it became rather an anti-climax regarded as ending to the entire programme.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 3, 1897.

Tenth Symphony Concert.

The 10th of this season's Symphony concerts attracted the usual large gatherings to Music hall Friday afternoon and last evening. Mr George W. Proctor was the soloist, and the following enjoyable program was presented under Mr Paur's direction:

Ludwig van Beethoven,
Overture to "Fidelio," in E major, op. 72
Eduard Schutt,
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in F minor, op. 47.
(First time in Boston.)
Bedrich Smetana,
Symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp"
(First time in Boston.)
Johannes Brahms,
Symphony No. 3, in F major, op. 90

Mr Proctor is a young pianist who has recently returned from Europe, where he went to complete his musical studies. Much interest was felt in his appearance at the Symphony concert, as his playing had been highly praised by several prominent local musicians and also because it is understood that he is, in a way, the protege of a noted Boston society leader. The audience welcomed him cordially and after his performance recalled him repeatedly.

He played a concerto in F minor by Eduard Schutt, a composition not before heard here. It is an interesting and scholarly work, verly elaborately scored and giving rather unusual prominence to the orchestra. Opportunities for the soloist to display his virtuosity are not lacking, but, on the whole, it is not a composition to be highly recommended for selection by a young pianist for first performance before a strange audience.

Mr Proctor is unquestionably a musician of much natural ability, who has evidently had the advantage of the best instruction, and it may be predicted with confidence that he will win for himself an enviable position in the ranks of American pianists. He plays with much expression, his touch is sure and clear, if not always brilliant, and his command of technique seems equal to all ordinary requirements. He is not an especially forceful player, and it would have been more considerate on Mr Paur's part had he lessened the volume of tone created by his orchestra in several passages.

The other novelty on the program was a symphonic poem by Bedrich Smetana, entitled "Wallenstein's Camp." Its poetic theme is the first part of Schiller's Wallenstein trilogy, and has been treated by the composer in a free and fanciful style and with results that are exceedingly pleasing and picturesque. The scoring is elaborate and the composition is a fine example of descriptive music. There is much noise and blaring of brass, but all is suggestive of the turmoil of old-time camp life. It was played with splendid spirit and fine effect by the orchestra.

Mr Paur gave an admirable reading of Brahm's F major symphony, to the evident delight of that portion of the audience who claim to have no difficulty in comprehending the meaning of the German master. There are certainly many beauties in this score that are more clearly revealed than are the gems in several other works by this composer, but the average audience would welcome less repetition and elaboration of unattractive details. The "Fidelio" overture in E major was also superbly played by the orchestra. The overture is rarely given and its performance yesterday was very welcome.

The program announced for the next symphony concert is as follows: Overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; divertimento for violin and orchestra in A, op. 9, Loeffler; overture, scherzo, notturno and wedding march from the "Midsummernight's Dream" music, Mendelssohn; symphony, Mozart. Soloist, Mr C. M. Loeffler.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1896.

The program of the ninth Symphony concert (December 26) was as follows:

Selections from the ballet Don Juan ....Gluck
  Ouverture.
  Brillante.
  Grazioso.
  Finale, Larghetto—Allegro non troppo.
    Arranged by Hermann Kretzschmar.
    (First time in Boston.)
Symphony in C minor (B. & H., No. 9)..........................Haydn
Selections from the music to Königskinder............Humperdinck
  Introduction to Act III.
    Verdorben—gestorben, Langsam.
    Spielmann's letzter Gesang.
  Introduction to Act II.
    Hellafest, Kinder Reigen.
    (First time in Boston.)
Petite suite, Jeux d'Enfants .... Bize
  Marche (Trompette et Tambour).
  Berceuse (La Poupée).
  Impromptu (La Toupie).
  Duo (Petit mari, petite femme).
  Galop (Le Bal).
    (First time in Boston.)
Overture, No. 1, in D major....................................Händel
  Maestoso—Allegro.
    Arranged by Franz Wüllner.
    (First time in Boston.)

Here are four novelties, and concerning the origin of the excerpts from Königskinder and Bizet's suite the program said not a word, although there was a learned disquisition on the theory of Mahillon.

I believe one of the Humperdinckian preludes was given in Brooklyn last November, but I have not seen in THE MUSICAL COURIER any story of the nature of this drama with incidental music.

Königskinder, a German fairy tale in three acts, is by Ernst Rosmer, whose real name is Elsa Bernstein, who is the daughter of our old friend Heinrich Porges, of Munich.

Humperdinck finished the music in May, 1896, but I can find no record of a performance of the complete work at Munich, although announcements of a performance there have been made from time to time.

The first performance of these excerpts was at a concert of the Bach Society at Heidelberg, June 2, 1896, when the composer led. Other performances were at Cologne, June —; Berlin, October 12; Leipsic, November 5.

This is the story:

Act I.—A king's son finds at the house of a forest witch a goosemaid, the daughter of a king. He loves her and would fain take her away, but she is bound by a spell. It is a minstrel, a fiddler, who, appearing with citizens of Hellabrun at the house of the witch, in order to gain advice from her concerning the choice of a ruler, looses the spell and rescues the princess.

Act II. The people of Hellabrun, trusting the witch, await at noon their king or queen. The king's son is living among them, despised, a beggar; he has hired himself out as a swineherd. Only the daughter of the broom maker knows his princely station. The clock is striking; it is high noon; the city gate is open wide; the sun bursts through the clouds; the goosemaid enters, accompanied by the fiddler. The people stare, speechless. But the Prince rushes toward her with a shout and holds her in his arms. There is mockery; there is fierce laughter; there is tumult. Beaten with sticks and stones, the Prince is thrown outside the gate.

Act III.—It is the dead of winter. The exiled children wander in the forest. The loyal fiddler and a flock of children, among them the daughter of the broom maker, search for them. At last they find them: "united in love, starved and frozen in the winter snow. Ruined! Dead!" The living kneel, and the minstrel sings his last song and plays his last tune, and breaks his fiddle in pieces.

"Dann brech' ich meine Fiedel entzwei," runs the text.

Therefore Mr. Apthorp's translation of "Spielmann" by "piper" is here incorrect.

This music is theatre music. In the theatre it may be effective. In the concert hall the chief interest is in the orchestration, which is Wagnerian in its scheme and sumptuousness. Outside of this orchestration I find little of worth. The prelude to Act III. in its development reminds one of the Tristan prelude, and the Klage motiv is very Tristanian.

As these pieces will undoubtedly be played at orchestral concerts in the United States the following description of them, which I have translated freely from Mr. Brandes' admirable program books of the Dresden Symphony concerts, may be of interest to your readers:

The prelude to Act III. opens with mournful, lonesome chords given to the woodwind, while the English horn and the first horn sound the Lamentation motiv, which, short and incisive, appears in various forms throughout the prelude. These chords are repeated by other wind instruments. The idea of this tone picture is desolation, the desolation of the wintry forest and the exiled children wandering, hungry and cold. The oboe sings in mournful recollection of the short happiness known in love. The violins take up the song of grief. The children are dead; they lie in each other's arms. The loyal fiddler finds them and pronounces their elegy. There are hints of the two former motivs which interrupt the dirge of the horns. Then follows the apotheosis.

The prelude to Act II. tells of the rejoicing expectation at Hellabrunn, as the people await their ruler. There is dancing. A child's rattle is heard. The town children enter and dance the Rosenringel, the theme of which is given first by the clarinet; at the end the children's simple tune is sung in frenzy by the whole orchestra.

* * *

Nor did Mr. Apthorp concern himself with the origin of Bizet's Jeux d'Enfants. Colonne in 1873 founded the Sunday concerts which are now given at the Châtelet. Interested in young French composers, he asked Bizet for an unpublished work for the first concert. Now Bizet's Jeux d'Enfants, twelves pieces for piano, four hands, had just been published by Durand-Schoenewerk. He orchestrated of these pieces Nos. 2, 3, 6, 11, 12. These were first played at the first Colonne concert, at the Odéon, March 2, 1873.

Bizet's suite suggests children and their games. His children speak in simple language, while the children of Humperdinck have megaphonic voices and stride in a legendary mist. Characteristic is the funny pomp of the March, the sweet simplicity of the Doll. The Top is a delightful bit of musical fancy and skill. Little Husband, Little Wife was spoiled by exaggeration in the performance. The poor things were turned into erotic lovers in one of Massenet's pornographic operas. Nor was the galop played with the necessary lightness and brilliancy.

* * *

The overture of Händel wore a tremendous wig, and it shook powder throughout the hall. It sounded like unto 250 or 300 other pieces by this industrious and pious composer.

The Haydn symphony was a good deal of a bore. Mr. Paur, who is enamored of the slow allegro, coquetted with Haydn's frankness, and succeeded in ruining it.

There are charming movements in the old ballet music of Gluck. You know the Donna Anna of his ballet opened the door to Don Juan, and even after the death of her stern protector she danced a pas de deux with the betrayer and assassin at the great feast at his house. She is the Donna Anna seen by Hoffmann in his wild tale.

This is the music that suited the dance when it was something more than a zenith-defying kick and a display of intimate laces.

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 3.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the 10th Symphony concert given in Music Hall last evening was:

Overture, "Fidelio," E major..........Beethoven
Concerto for Pianoforte No. 2, in F minor, op. 47 ....Edward Schutt
Symphonic Poem, "Wallenstein's Camp".........Smetana
Symphony No. 3, F major.................Brahms
Solist, Mr. George W. Proctor.

Much interest was felt in the appearance of Mr. G. W. Proctor, but the piece selected gave him but few opportunities to demonstrate his talents. The concerto is trivial in idea and over-elaborate in development, as if one should utter commonplaces in grandiloquent words; there are suggestions, unconscious, of course, of Grieg, Mendelssohn, Chopin and other composers, and generally a large amount of elaborate display, springing from and leading to nothing. The work is one of many recent examples of a composer who has nothing valuable to say, but writes simply because it is his business or profession. In the work under consideration, Mr. Schutt is content to take the most trivial subject for his theme, hammer it out to the fracture point of thinness and then conceal its inherent worthlessness with pretentious, meaningless ornaments. The elaborately embossed pasteboard helmet rests on neither a living or a dead skull, but surrounds emptiness. At its best, the work suggests nothing higher than salon music; at times it has a characterless prettiness and a graceful sentimentality; there is a suggestion of dignity that develops into bombast and a hinting earnestness that turns out to be triviality in masquerade. It is a pale, weak, sickly and unsatisfactory concerto, giving no convincing reason why it should have been written, occupying no place in the world of high art and possessing not a trace of originality in its sins of omission and of commission. In struggling against the noise of the orchestra, the protests of the piano are unheard, and the situation of the pianist suggests a shipwrecked mariner wasting his calls for help against the billows of a tempest-tossed ocean. From all the evidence that it was possible to gather, one may venture to assert that Mr. Proctor is well equipped in the way of technique, that he plays with taste, artistic feeling, sincerity and directness, and that there is no trace of the amateur in his work. To correctly estimate the height and degree of his talents is impossible under the given conditions; one can only record the impression that the work of the young artist is full of promise and defer detailed criticism to a future occasion.

The Smetana symphonic poem was heard at this concert for the first time in Boston, and there cannot be too many works given by reputable composers, even though they are not of the highest worth. Musical education means the hearing of the new as well as the old, and Mr. Paur's exertions in this direction cannot be too highly praised. Having heard this symphonic poem, one is content never to hear it again. It is good, solid work in its way, but its way is an old-fashioned and hopelessly obsolete way. There are fire, vigor and passion in the work. The color is laid on boldly, without wiggling; the master is in grim earnest, but in his enthusiasm he kicks over rusty armor, and it rattles hollowly. Wallenstein's camp is safer in the hands of the poet than of the composer, as are all things in which definite action takes the place of vague imaginings.

The soloist for the next concert is Mr. C. M. Loeffler, who will play his Divertimento for Violin and Orchestra, in A, op. 9.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 4, 1897.

A New Pianist at the Symphony Concert Saturday.

The concert of Saturday began with a rather conservative performance of Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture, by no means the best of the four different overtures which the composer wrote at different times for his single opera. The tempo seemed to drag a little at times, but the work was interpreted with all possible clearness and received considerable applause.

The chief feature of the concert was the appearance of a new pianist, a resident of Boston, and a young man who received the greater part of his musical education here.

When Mr. G. W. Proctor left Boston some years ago, his teacher, Mr. Carl Faelton, of the New England Conservatory, had already brought him well into the domain of advanced piano-work. Since that time he has been hard at work in Vienna under Leschitizky, and the fruits of his labors were offered to his own city for the first time at this concert.

The concerto at first chosen was by Schytte, the Dane, but this was finally changed for the second piano concerto of Schuett, the Viennese, the intimate friend of Mr. Proctor's teacher, Leschitizky. It is not a very great work; it has the modern romantic tendencies without having a spark of Schumann's breadth.

The composer starts his work with mighty thoughts and then begins to stagger perceptibly under his load; instead of sustained power, therefore, one obtains only spasmodic effort. Occasionally some charming stretches are attained, as in the theme of the second movement, but never a broad homogeneity.

The first movement started with gigantic power, but very soon began to fritter itself away on the development of an unimportant figure which had but little to say for itself in spite of all its ingenious transformations. The coda wound up with a fury for which there seemed no adequate cause.

The second movement placed Mr. Schuett upon his native heath,—the light romantic school,—and presented a charming theme which was freely varied by piano and orchestra. The hypercritic might find the movement a little below concerto dignity and more akin to drawing-room music of poetic tendencies, but it achieved what it evidently set out to do, and was attractive from first to last.

The third movement was likewise unambitious save in the technical field. Instead of attempting a large form which would require development of themes, the composer employed a species of song-form with trio, in which melody pure and simple might rule, and in which a series of short pictures rather than one large one was demanded. The composer succeeded therefore in what he attempted, and displayed the pianist (and his own gift of melody) without climbing any Olympian heights or adding a standard concerto to the world's repertoire.

Mr. Proctor, who was very favorably received, began in good style, exhibiting breadth and clearness in the first movement. He also was refined and poetic in the second movement, but in the finale he seemed to be fatigued and could not balance against the orchestra. There was some indistinctness in the final coda and a lame, inconsequential ending.

It is always hazardous, and frequently unjust, to form a judicial opinion at the first hearing of any artist; a debut is beset with so many hindrances that it is often not a full and fair trial. It would be impossible, for example, to state definitely whether Mr. Proctor lacked breadth of thought in the finale, or whether there was too slight a physique to bear the muscular strain, or whether there was nervousness present. If he can play sustainedly as he did in the first movement he will very soon entitle himself to a place among our leading American pianists.

He was abundantly applauded, being recalled four times at the close of the work, and one can unhesitatingly say that there is abundant promise in this newest pianist

It is many years since the Philharmonic Orchestra, in the days when the Boston Symphony was not, gave a performance of Rheinberger's "Wallenstein Symphony;" at this concert another setting of the Wallenstein subject was presented which seemed more aglow with genius than the Munich Kapellmeister's setting. Smetana's "Wallenstein's Camp" was a tone-picture that could be understood without reading Schiller's tragedy.

The wild revelry that precedes the entrance of the Capuchin, and a little hint of the sermon where the soldiery try to kill him and the two Croats protect him, may be discerened by the lively imagination, but for all practical purposes the details of the German play can be set aside and the picture taken as a portrayal of the Duke of Friedland's camp in the Thirty years' war, with all its wild soldiery and its ferocious and tumultous revelry. Evening, night and morning are expressively depicted, and the work becomes as effective a military picture as a Detaille or a De Neuville canvas.

It seemed a little exaggerated in the performance, however. Mr. Paur must beware of the extremes of force which are possible of production with his large band. The work began with a dynamite explosion that caused timid auditors to cling to their seats, and it ended with a series of detonations that seemed out of place anywhere except in a deaf and dumb asylum.

There were, however, many delightful touches between these uproars; the folk-dances picturing the rough delights of the camp in the evening, were excellently given and had a charm of their own. After this there came a theme on trombones and bass tuba that will not be rivalled even on the day of judgment for power. It is pleasant to note that there are no symptoms of lung disease in this department of our orchestra.

Then came the mysterious pizzicato passages and the theme on the muted violins that showed the unruly camp hushed to slumber. The fanfares of trumpets (excellently played) were fitting heralds of the morning and of the marching out of the troops. There were fragments of national melody interspersed in this part of the picture, and the march itself was of interesting, semi-barbaric style.

The Brahms third sym[illegible] lowed was oddly placed, [illegible] used to make a rule of end[illegible] programme with a symphony ("the [illegible] of a masterpiece ought not to be disturbed by anything following it," said he) made an exception of this work as having too quiet an ending to form a climax to a musical programme. The audience must have felt something of this thought on this occasion; accustomed to being forcibly turned out with clashes and crashes, here they were ushered out on tiptoe, in the gentlest possible manner.

The work was superbly read by Mr. Paur, who has given us the best interpretations of Brahms that Boston has ever received. As to the symphony itself it scarcely seems to the reviewer as great a work as its predecessor and successor. It has, of course, some touches that make it worthy of the greatest living symphonist; the subordinate theme of the first movement is beautiful enough to make the reputation of any composer, but the slow movement is not comparable in beauty with the similar movements in the second or fourth symphonies by the same composer. Hans Richter, after his first examination of this symphony, called it the "Heroic" symphony of Brahms, and this may apply in some degree to the first and last movements, and there is a further connection between these two in the reappearance of a thought of the first movement in the coda of the finale, a procedure which Brahms learned from Beethoven.

The short movement which takes the place of a Scherzo is altogether a charming one, and Brahms, knowing that he lacked the Mendelssohnian playfulness, was wise in substituting a shorter movement, an intermezzo, for the full Scherzo.

The finale belongs to Brahms' great movements, but after all its strife of themes the gentle end with muted strings and sustained chords like sighs is very unexpected, and while making a fitting end to the symphony it became rather an anticlimax regarded as ending to the entire programme.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 3, 1897.

Tenth Symphony Concert.

The 10th of this season's Symphony concerts attracted the usual large gatherings to Music hall Friday afternoon and last evening. Mr George W. Proctor was the soloist, and the following enjoyable program was presented under Mr Paur's direction:

Ludwig van Beethoven,
  Overture to "Fidelio," in E major, op. 72
Eduard Schutt,
  Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in F minor, op. 47.
  (First time in Boston.)
Bedrich Smetana,
  Symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp"
  (First time in Boston.)
Johannes Brahms,
  Symphony No. 3, in F major, op. 90

Mr Proctor is a young pianist who has recently returned from Europe, where he went to complete his musical studies. Much interest was felt in his appearance at the Symphony concert, as his playing had been highly praised by several prominent local musicians and also because it is understood that he is, in a way, the protege of a noted Boston society leader. The audience welcomed him cordially and after his performance recalled him repeatedly.

He played a concerto in F minor by Eduard Schutt, a composition not before heard here. It is an interesting and scholarly work, verly elaborately scored and giving rather unusual prominence to the orchestra. Opportunities for the soloist to display his virtuosity are not lacking, but, on the whole, it is not a composition to be highly recommended for selection by a young pianist for first performance before a strange audience.

Mr Proctor is unquestionably a musician of much natural ability, who has evidently had the advantage of the best instruction, and it may be predicted with confidence that he will win for himself an enviable position in the ranks of American pianists. He plays with much expression, his touch is sure and clear, if not always brilliant, and his command of technique seems equal to all ordinary requirements. He is not an especially forceful player, and it would have been more considerate on Mr Paur's part had he lessened the volume of tone created by his orchestra in several passages.

The other novelty on the program was a symphonic poem by Bedrich Smetana, entitled "Wallenstein's Camp." Its poetic theme is the first part of Schiller's Wallenstein trilogy, and has been treated by the composer in a free and fanciful style and with results that are exceedingly pleasing and picturesque. The scoring is elaborate and the composition is a fine example of descriptive music. There is much noise and blaring of brass, but all is suggestive of the turmoil of old-time camp life. It was played with splendid spirit and fine effect by the orchestra.

Mr Paur gave an admirable reading of Brahm's F major symphony, to the evident delight of that portion of the audience who claim to have no difficulty in comprehending the meaning of the German master. There are certainly many beauties in this score that are more clearly revealed than are the gems in several other works by this composer, but the average auditor would welcome less repetition and elaboration of unattractive details. The "Fidelio" overture in E major was also superbly played by the orchestra. This overture is rarely given and its performance yesterday was very welcome.

The program announced for the next symphony concert is as follows: Overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; divertimento for violin and orchestra in A, op. 9, Loeffler; overture, scherzo, notturno and wedding march from the "Midsummernight's Dream" music, Mendelssohn; symphony, Mozart. Soloist, Mr C. M. Loeffler.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 3, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY, ETC.

Mr Paur began his tenth Symphony programme with that one of Beethoven's many overtures to "Fidelio" which bears the name of the opera, while the others form a little group of "Leonores." It is only less well known than the greatest favorite and most intense of all, the Leonore No. 3. It was very well played, and then the programme passed on to its first novelty, which was a pianoforte concerto by Edward Schutt, which appears on a first hearing as a rather abnormal, unequal and unsatisfying composition. In its tentative and experimental fashions it often suggests those wandering, groping, irresolute pages of Brahms's, in which that composer seems to be trying to solve some problem of his own proposing—always about to reach a perfect conclusion, and never quite getting there. Fancy there are and strength, a smart display of command over the orchestra and a use of the keyboard which at least implies a certain satisfaction in the exhibition of brilliant technical resources and acquirements. The first movement is various things by turns and nothing long; it storms without apparent reason and subsides for no evident cause; it has beautiful bits and ugly passages, and it alternates violent "tutti" with fragmentary sallies for a solo violin or some other isolated instrument. The second movement has a pretty flavor, but it is about as substantial as a meringue. and has that manner—so hard to define and so easy to recognize—which makes it sound more like an improvisation of ear-pleasing and nerve-soothing nothingness. If it have a purpose, it conceals it well, and if it represents any ordered serious thought it fails to convey it. The last movement is the most satisfactory as music; but chiefly, we fancy, because it announces itself as a lively, assertive kind of a tarantella, and sticks to that quite consistently and keeps it up at high pace to the very end. There is certainly cleverness in the work; but to us it appears far more like a fantasia elaborated into three movements, than like a concerto, even of the highest and least responsible nature.

The solo pianist was Mr. George W. Proctor, about whose personality and preparation it would have been pleasant to receive some information. But, as usual, when the programme-book was consulted for the intelligence it is its duty to furnish, it was silent from idleness or ignorance, and the audience must needs wait for the Sunday papers to give them in extenso the facts which the official organ of the concert had been unable to discover,—these being chiefly that the player is a Cambridge young man who has been studying abroad for some years with the encouragement and backing of a distinguished society dame. Mr. Proctor is a young man who did not seem tolack confidence and who played courageously and vigorously. He evidently understood that his part had been constructed as much for show purposes as for anything else, and he pushed it brilliantly and firmly to the front. His technique is decided and clear, and he was ready and positive in the difficult and showy ornamentation which so much abounded, and also smooth and proportionate when there was a chance for a little legato. The concert does not call for much temperamental interest, but Mr. Proctor gave promise of warmth, earnestness and concentration in music requiring such better qualities than even his marked Lesketizky style can alone demonstrate.

Another novelty followed, being Smetana's posthumous orchestral poem of "Wallenstein's Camp," in which one could take some solid interest. It seems to depict the hurly-burly of the busy bivouac; the evening songs and dances, their music shot across by the call of trumpet or roll of drum; the falling of night and silence; the invigorating reveille, the assembly and the ordering of marching ranks. It proved to be diversified, true in suggestion, grasped with vigor and wrought out with poetical as well as vital touch. Now a soft melody came from a violin or clarinet or flute, and now the splendor of trumpets soared and searched, and the clangor of the whole orchestra burst out. There was some real, indisputable noise in it, but this came revantly and became that portion of the tone-picture in which it appeared.

Last on the programme was the third symphony of Brahms, which is in many respect his most agreeable one, but which illustrates—particularly in the second movement—that indeternateness of which we have spoken just above. The reading was conservative and good.

For next week this programme is announced: Cherubini, overture, "Anacreon;" Loeffler, Divertimento for violin and orchestra in A, Op. 9; Mendelssohn, Overture, Scherzo, Notturno, and Wedding March from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music; Mozart, Symphony. Soloist, Mr. Loeffler.

[illegible]

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CL, NO. 3.

SUNDAY, JAN. 3, 1897.

Pianist Proctor's Debut at the Symphony Concert.

Heard Last Evening in Schutt's Concerto No. 2 in F Minor—"Wallenstein's Camp" the Other Novelty on Programme—Miss Foltz in "Bohemian Girl" at the Castle Square.

The programme for the concert last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall was:

Overture, "Fidelio"....................Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2; F minor..Schutt
Symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp"..
Smetana
Brahms
Symphony No. 3..........................

The soloist was Mr. George W. Proctor. Of the concerto which he selected for his Boston debut there is not much to be said in the way of warm commendation. It was given here for the first time, and is singularly uninteresting. It says nothing new, is without individuality of style, and oscillates between blustering pretentiousness and weak conventionality. Now it is Chopin, now Mendelssohn; it is flecked by Schumann and flavored by Rubinstein.

Its themes are commonplace, its brilliancy is cheap tinsel, and what of dignity it has is hollow bombast. Here it suggests that it might have been manufactured laboriously by Leschetitzky, and there it follows meekly along the line of Grieg. It is everything by starts and nothing long. Such strength as it possesses lies in the instrumentation rather than in the piano part; and, furthermore, the orchestra predominates to the extent of throwing the soloist quite into the background, particularly in the brief slow movement.

In the finale alone does the piano come into due prominence. This is a species of tarantella, not without a certain inspiriting "go"; but it is of the salon-music order, and generally cheap in effect. In fact, the concerto is exceedingly thin, poverty-stricken in invention, dwelling garrulously on empty trivialities to an almost exasperating extent. The solo part is abundant in difficulties that tax the technique of the performer to the utmost, but they mean nothing and lead nowhere.

It would have been more satisfying to have heard Mr. Proctor in a work that offered him a better opportunity to display the finer qualities of style in regard to expression and depth of sentiment. As it was, he had little else to do than to make manifest the ability of his fingers and the power of his wrist. He seems to have studied hard and faithfully, and he plays with ease, smoothness and intelligence. He does not abuse the piano, his touch is musical, his technique is fluent and clean-cut, and he bears himself with a modesty that is exceedingly winning. The impression made by him was very favorable, and he received three or four very hearty recalls.

He was unfortunate in his selection of this concerto, but despite this drawback he made it clear that he is a young man of marked talent, and he will doubtless emphasize this more forcibly when he is heard in music that gives him a wider and more varied scope for its display than did this concerto of mere finger exercises.

The other novelty on the programme was the Smetana symphonic poem, which is manifestly pure programme music, whose meaning is not quite clear without a descriptive analysis. It is immensely fiery, and, except in its short, mysterious andante, is, for the most part, a drum and trumpet frenzy. The finale is a perfect tempest of brass, four trumpets blaring through it with tremendously effective fanfares.

The opening movement, evidently intended to depict the turbulence of camp life, is the most elaborate portion of the work, and the strings are ingeniously used in a species of perpetual motion against the themes given out by the wind instruments. The movement, however, is extended to too great a length for the slight subjects with which it deals, and there are repetitions that might be omitted with advantage.

The work, however, overflows with life, and is never dull, the attention being constantly kept on the alert. It is true that there is much of sound and fury signifying nothing, and startling as noise pure and simple. It was played with stirring spirit, the trumpeters going through their arduous lip-tearing and lung-exhausting task with remarkable endurance. The work was well worth the hearing as an example of a prolific and able composer of whom little was known until the recent unearthing of his music, but it is questionable if it will add anything to the fame earned by him in his other productions.

The "Fidelio" overture was splendidly read and played. Of the familiar Brahms symphony, of which the first movement still remains the most delightful and edifying portion, there is nothing new to be said, save that Mr. Paur gave a beautiful reading of it and that it was performed faultlessly.

At the next concert will be given Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture; Divertimento for violin and orchestra, by E. M. Loeffler; the overture, scherzo, nocturne and wedding march from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, and a symphony by Mozart. Mr. Loeffler is to be the soloist.

BOSTON JOURNAL.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 3, 1897.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Smetana's "Wallenstein's Lager" Played Here for the First Time—Debut of Mr. George W. Proctor in a New Piano Concerto.

The program of the Symphony concert last night in Music Hall, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "Fidelio"..............Beethoven
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in F minor,
op. 47..............................Schuett
1. Allegro risoluto.
2. Andante tranquillo.
3. Allegro vivace.
(First time in Boston.)
Symphonic Poem, "Wallenstein's Lager"
Smetana
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 3, in F major, op. 90..Brahms

The program-book said that "Wallenstein's Camp" belongs to Smetana's "posthumous works."

Smetana was conductor of the Philharmonic Society in Gothenberg, Sweden, from 1858 to 1861. While he was occupying this position, he wrote at least two symphonic poems, "Richard III." (1858) and "Wallenstein's Lager" (1859), the year of his first wife's death."

This piece is remarkable, first of all for its refreshing honesty. There is here no striving for effect, no coquetting with the audience. The man says his say very frankly; he gives his idea in music of Schiller's play, and if the trumpets and drums and cymbals annoy the sensitive, the composer is, at least, faithful to his subject. It must be said that in the performance, Mr. Paur did not always observe the due proportion that should exist between percussion instruments and the rest of the orchestra. There was one general fortissimo in which only cymbals and drums were heard; but the composer had no such intention. Nor was Mr. Paur happy in his conception of the trombone and tuba recitatives.

Mr. Apthorp says, "Rheinberger, too, has some reference to the preaching Capuchin in the Lager movement (scherzo) of his Wallenstein symphony." "Has some reference" is good. Rheinberger includes this sermon in his title to the scherzo.

⁂

Mr. George W. Proctor made his début here in a concerto that was not worth the playing. Schütt, the author of two piano concertos, a piano trio, "Poesiés d' Automne," "Carnaval Mignon," a serenade for strings, variations for two pianos, small pieces for piano, songs, and a comic opera, "Signor Formica" (Vienna 1892), was first made known to us here in concert by his suite for violin and piano, which was played Dec. 26, 1894, by Messrs. T. Adamowski and Arthur Whiting.

The concerto heard last night was first played by Schütt to Leschetitzky and other invited artists, and then at the fourth Philharmonic concert in Vienna in January, 1896. The work calls for little attention. The talent of Schütt lies in piquant harmonies and capricious rhythms in miniature; for in pieces of long breath he displays neither cohesion nor force. The concerto does not hang together. There are a few agreeable moments, as the second theme in the first movement. The prettiness of the second movement is conventional. The finale is thankless and drearily vulgar. The orchestration is bombastic and flippant.

Mr. Proctor has no doubt piano-talent. He displayed taste at times, and he was sincere in the performance of a most insincere work. His technique is as yet imperfectly developed, as was seen and heard in his full chords which were without resonance. The first thing for him to do is to loosen the stiffness of his arms and wrists. His tone is at present without marked color; and he made no decided impression of individuality. It is only fair to say that he was handicapped by the concerto; but on the other hand he gave last night no adequate reason for his appearance at a Symphony concert; unless one of the objects of these concerts is to furnish young pianists an opportunity of displaying in public what they have not learned as well as learned in study abroad.

⁂

The respectable overture to "Fidelio" was played in a sufficiently respectable fashion, and in the first movement of Brahms's noble symphony, Mr. Paur showed a singular idea of the meaning of "allegro con brio." Why not reverse the case occasionally, Mr. Paur, and give us a lively adagio?

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 3, 1897.

Copyright, 1896. Post Publishing Company.

PROCTOR AT HIS PIANO.

At the Symphony concert last night the soloist was a very youthful virtuoso—quite a baby lion, in fact, compared with the great artists, like Paderewski, for instance. But he is ours. He is George W. Proctor, a Charlestown boy, and those who know him tell wonderful stories of his devotion to his art, his untiring practice. Sleep four hours and play four hours, some of his admirers give as his rule of work; but that's only rumor. For the last few concerts he has had a seat in the right balcony, not beyond the reach of a famous society leader, who is said to take a deep and helpful interest in his talent and his ambition. Last Thursday he played at Cambridge, but as if somewhat daunted by the magnificence of the setting—orchestra and audience—for his performance. Friday he played with more sureness and vigor, and last night he emphasized his success.

He might have had a more interesting number than Schuett's concerto No. 2, in F minor, Op. 47. The first movement is quite uninteresting at first hearing, but the second is better. In this second movement there is only one theme, a fact which does not help to relieve the impression of monotony given in the first movement. The third movement, combining the characteristics of scherzo and trio, gave wide scope for expression, and Proctor responded well, being nimbleness and jaunty grace itself in the tarantella, and softening to tenderness and melody in the slower part of the movement. He was heartily applauded, and acknowledged his welcome with a bow that suggested the retiring—would you say awkward?—student, rather than a society man, or even a baby lion.

That concerto was the second number on the programme. Beethoven's overture to Fidelio led the concert. This overture contains none of the musical subjects of the opera itself, although written by the same composer. In fact, this is the fourth overture written for this opera after successive failures in production. The one played usually nowadays is the one called Leonore No. 3.

After the piano concerto came Smetana's "Wallenstein's Lager," a symphonic poem. This is programme music—that is, the music is intended to suggest successive ideas connected with the title. The opening measures are gay and rollicking, more and more noisy, with a very clear suggestion—to one who had received a hint what to expect—of the festivities of evening in camp. Horns and trumpet calls give reminders of stern and picturesque duty that cannot be forgotten even in revelry. Dance figures come into prominence, and the same phrases broaden into heavy suggestions of the not too serious figure of the Capuchin monk preaching in the camp at night. Then comes the rhythm of a contra-dance, which quiets soon as the camp sinks to rest. The plucking strings accompanying gruesome minor strains suggest the lonesome fancies of midnight, thoughts of the fatal morrow. Then comes silence and dreamless forgetfulness. The trumpets hint at returning sunlight and the day breaks with a call to arms; then the war-like music of a march, and three kinds of drums, with cymbals, triangle and plenty of bang, develop the military idea through all the noise that Wallenstein could have asked for.

The last number was Brahms's Symphony No. 3, in F major, op. 90. In the first movement the second theme is very reminiscent—tuneful and catchy. The old-fashioned repeat of the first part is given for this movement, which is very long, but enjoyable throughout. The second movement has beautiful harmony for the 'celli. The last two movements were rich in musical material. The scoring for this symphony introduced, besides the usual orchestral instruments, a double bassoon—an instrument which is about twice the size of a bassoon and sounds twice as funny—by itself.

The concert next week will include Cherubini's overture "Anacreon"; the overture, the Wedding March, and two other numbers from Mendelssohn's music for "Midsummer Night's Dream"; a symphony by Mozart; and a "Divertimento" for violin and orchestra, by Loeffler, the violin player, who ranks next to Kneisel in the Symphony Orchestra.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 3, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY, ETC.

Mr Paur began his tenth Symphony programme with that one of Beethoven's many overtures to "Fidelio" which bears the name of the opera, while the others form a little group of "Leonores." It is only less well known than the greatest favorite and most intense of all, the Leonore No. 3. It was very well played, and then the programme passed on to its first novelty, which was a pianoforte concerto by Edward Schutt, which appears on a first hearing as a rather abnormal, unequal and unsatisfying composition. In its tentative and experimental fashions it often suggests those wandering, groping, irresolute pages of Brahms's, in which that composer seems to be trying to solve some problem of his own proposing—always about to reach a perfect conclusion, and never quite getting there. Fancy there are and strength, a smart display of command over the orchestra and a use of the keyboard which at least implies a certain satisfaction in the exhibition of brilliant technical resources and acquirements. The first movement is various things by turns and nothing long; it storms without apparent reason and subsides for no evident cause; it has beautiful bits and ugly passages, and it alternates violent "tutti" with fragmentary sallies for a solo violin or some other isolated instrument. The second movement has a pretty flavor, but it is about as substantial as a meringue. and has that manner—so hard to define and so easy to recognize—which makes it sound more like an improvisation of ear-pleasing and nerve-soothing nothingness. If it have a purpose, it conceals it well, and if it represents any ordered serious thought it fails to convey it. The last movement is the most satisfactory as music; but chiefly, we fancy, because it announces itself as a lively, assertive kind of a tarantella, and sticks to that quite consistently and keeps it up at high pace to the very end. There is certainly cleverness in the work; but to us it appears far more like a fantasia elaborated into three movements, than like a concerto, even of the highest and least responsible nature.

The solo pianist was Mr. George W. Proctor, about whose personality and preparation it would have been pleasant to receive some information. But, as usual, when the programme-book was consulted for the intelligence it is its duty to furnish, it was silent from idleness or ignorance, and the audience must needs wait for the Sunday papers to give them in extenso the facts which the official organ of the concert had been unable to discover,—these being chiefly that the player is a Cambridge young man who has been studying abroad for some years with the encouragement and backing of a distinguished society dame. Mr. Proctor is a young man who did not seem tolack confidence and who played courageously and vigorously. He evidently understood that his part had been constructed as much for show purposes as for anything else, and he pushed it brilliantly and firmly to the front. His technique is decided and clear, and he was ready and positive in the difficult and showy ornamentation which so much abounded, and also smooth and proportionate when there was a chance for a little legato. The concert does not call for much temperamental interest, but Mr. Proctor gave promise of warmth, earnestness and concentration in music requiring such better qualities than even his marked Lesketizky style can alone demonstrate.

Another novelty followed, being Smetana's posthumous orchestral poem of "Wallenstein's Camp," in which one could take some solid interest. It seems to depict the hurly-burly of the busy bivouac; the evening songs and dances, their music shot across by the call of trumpet or roll of drum; the falling of night and silence; the invigorating reveille, the assembly and the ordering of marching ranks. It proved to be diversified, true in suggestion, grasped with vigor and wrought out with poetical as well as vital touch. Now a soft melody came from a violin or clarinet or flute, and now the splendor of trumpets soared and searched, and the clangor of the whole orchestra burst out. There was some real, indisputable noise in it, but this came revantly and became that portion of the tone-picture in which it appeared.

Last on the programme was the third symphony of Brahms, which is in many respect his most agreeable one, but which illustrates—particularly in the second movement—that indeternateness of which we have spoken just above. The reading was conservative and good.

For next week this programme is announced: Cherubini, overture, "Anacreon;" Loeffler, Divertimento for violin and orchestra in A, Op. 9; Mendelssohn, Overture, Scherzo, Notturno, and Wedding March from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music; Mozart, Symphony. Soloist, Mr. Loeffler.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CI., NO. 3.

SUNDAY, JAN. 3, 1897.

Pianist Proctor's Debut at the Symphony Concert.

Heard Last Evening in Schutt's Concerto No. 2 in F Minor—"Wallenstein's Camp" the Other Novelty on Programme—Miss Foltz in "Bohemian Girl" at the Castle Square.

The programme for the concert last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall was:

Overture, "Fidelio"................Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2; F minor..Schutt
Symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp"..
Smetana
Symphony No. 3......................Brahms

The soloist was Mr. George W. Proctor. Of the concerto which he selected for his Boston debut there is not much to be said in the way of warm commendation. It was given here for the first time, and is singularly uninteresting. It says nothing new, is without individuality of style, and oscillates between blustering pretentiousness and weak conventionality. Now it is Chopin, now Mendelssohn; it is flecked by Schumann and flavored by Rubinstein.

Its themes are commonplace, its brilliancy is cheap tinsel, and what of dignity it has is hollow bombast. Here it suggests that it might have been manufactured laboriously by Leschetitzky, and there it follows meekly along the line of Grieg. It is everything by starts and nothing long. Such strength as it possesses lies in the instrumentation rather than in the piano part; and, furthermore, the orchestra predominates to the extent of throwing the soloist quite into the background, particularly in the brief slow movement.

In the finale alone does the piano come into due prominence. This is a species of tarantella, not without a certain inspiriting "go"; but it is of the salon-music order, and generally cheap in effect. In fact, the concerto is exceedingly thin, poverty-stricken in invention, dwelling garrulously on empty trivialities to an almost exasperating extent. The solo part is abundant in dufficulties that tax the technique of the performer to the utmost, but they mean nothing and lead nowhere.

It would have been more satisfying to have heard Mr. Proctor in a work that offered him a better opportunity to display the finer qualities of style in regard to expression and depth of sentiment. As it was, he had little else to do than to make manifest the ability of his fingers and the power of his wrist. He seems to have studied hard and faithfully, and he plays with ease, smoothness and intelligence. He does not abuse the piano, his touch is musical, his technique is fluent and clean-cut, and he bears himself with a modesty that is exceedingly winning. The impression made by him was very favorable, and he received three or four very hearty recalls.

He was unfortunate in his selection of this concerto, but despite this drawback he made it clear that he is a young man of marked talent, and he will doubtless emphasize this more forcibly when he is heard in music that gives him a wider and more varied scope for its display than did this concerto of mere finger exercises.

The other novelty on the programme was the Smetana symphonic poem, which is manifestly pure programme music, whose meaning is not quite clear without a descriptive analysis. It is immensely fiery, and, except in its short, mysterious andante, is, for the most part, a drum and trumpet frenzy. The finale is a perfect tempest of brass, four trumpets blaring through it with tremendously effective fanfares.

The opening movement, evidently intended to depict the turbulence of camp life, is the most elaborate portion of the work, and the strings are ingeniously used in a species of perpetual motion against the themes given out by the wind instruments. The movement, however, is extended to too great a length for the slight subjects with which it deals, and there are repetitions that might be omitted with advantage.

The work, however, overflows with life, and is never dull, the attention being constantly kept on the alert. It is true that there is much of sound and fury signifying nothing, and startling as noise pure and simple. It was played with stirring spirit, the trumpeters going through their arduous lip-tearing and lung-exhausting task with remarkable endurance. The work was well worth the hearing as an example of a prolific and able composer of whom little was known until the recent unearthing of his music, but it is questionable if it will add anything to the fame earned by him in his other productions.

The "Fidelio" overture was splendidly read and played. Of the familiar Brahms symphony, of which the first movement still remains the most delightful and edifying portion, there is nothing new to be said, save that Mr. Paur gave a beautiful reading of it and that it was performed faultlessly.

At the next concert will be given Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture; Divertimento for violin and orchestra, by E. M. Loeffler; the overture, scherzo, nocturne and wedding march from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, and a symphony by Mozart. Mr. Loeffler is to be the soloist.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 3, 1897.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Smetana's "Wallenstein's Lager" Played Here for the First Time —Debut of Mr. George W. Proctor in a New Piano Concerto.

The program of the Symphony concert last night in Music Hall, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "Fidelio"...............Beethoven
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in F minor, op. 47..............................Schuett
1. Allegro risoluto.
2. Andante tranquillo.
3. Allegro vivace.
(First time in Boston.)
Symphonic Poem, "Wallenstein's Lager"
Smetana
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 3, in F major, op. 90..Brahms

The program-book said that "Wallenstein's Camp" belongs to Smetana's "posthumous works."

Smetana was conductor of the Philharmonic Society in Gothenberg, Sweden, from 1858 to 1861. While he was occupying this position, he wrote at least two symphonic poems, "Richard III." (1858) and "Wallenstein's Lager" (1859), the year of his first wife's death."

This piece is remarkable, first of all for its refreshing honesty. There is here no striving for effect, no coquetting with the audience. The man says his say very frankly; he gives his idea in music of Schiller's play, and if the trumpets and drums and cymbals annoy the sensitive, the composer is, at least, faithful to his subject. It must be said that in the performance, Mr. Paur did not always observe the due proportion that should exist between percussion instruments and the rest of the orchestra. There was one general fortissimo in which only cymbals and drums were heard; but the composer had no such intention. Nor was Mr. Paur happy in his conception of the trombone and tuba recitatives.

Mr. Apthorp says, "Rheinberger, too, has some reference to the preaching Capuchin in the Lager movement (scherzo) of his Wallenstein symphony." "Has some reference" is good. Rheinberger includes this sermon in his title to the scherzo.

⁂

Mr. George W. Proctor made his début here in a concerto that was not worth the playing. Schütt, the author of two piano concertos, a piano trio, "Poesiés d' Automne," "Carnaval Mignon," a serenade for strings, variations for two pianos, small pieces for piano, songs, and a comic opera, "Signor Formica" (Vienna 1892), was first made known to us here in concert by his suite for violin and piano, which was played Dec. 26, 1894, by Messrs. T. Adamowski and Arthur Whiting.

The concerto heard last night was first played by Schütt to Leschetitzky and other invited artists, and then at the fourth Philharmonic concert in Vienna in January, 1896. The work calls for little attention. The talent of Schütt lies in piquant harmonies and capricious rhythms in miniature; for in pieces of long breath he displays neither cohesion nor force. The concerto does not hang together. There are a few agreeable moments, as the second theme in the first movement. The prettiness of the second movement is conventional. The finale is thankless and drearily vulgar. The orchestration is bombastic and flippant.

Mr. Proctor has no doubt piano-talent. He displayed taste at times, and he was sincere in the performance of a most insincere work. His technique is as yet imperfectly developed, as was seen and heard in his full chords which were without resonance. The first thing for him to do is to loosen the stiffness of his arms and wrists. His tone is at present without marked color; and he made no decided impression of individuality. It is only fair to say that he was handicapped by the concerto; but on the other hand he gave last night no adequate reason for his appearance at a Symphony concert; unless one of the objects of these concerts is to furnish young pianists an opportunity of displaying in public what they have not learned as well as learned in study abroad.

⁂

The respectable overture to "Fidelio" was played in a sufficiently respectable fashion, and in the first movement of Brahms's noble symphony, Mr. Paur showed a singular idea of the meaning of "allegro con brio." Why not reverse the case occasionally, Mr. Paur, and give us a lively adagio?

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 3, 1897.
Copyright, 1896, Post Publishing Company.

PROCTOR AT HIS PIANO.

At the Symphony concert last night the soloist was a very youthful virtuoso—quite a baby lion, in fact, compared with the great artists, like Paderewski, for instance. But he is ours. He is George W. Proctor, a Charlestown boy, and those who know him tell wonderful stories of his devotion to his art, his untiring practice. Sleep four hours and play four hours, some of his admirers give as his rule of work; but that's only rumor. For the last few concerts he has had a seat in the right balcony, not beyond the reach of a famous society leader, who is said to take a deep and helpful interest in his talent and his ambition. Last Thursday he played at Cambridge, but as if somewhat daunted by the magnificence of the setting—orchestra and audience—for his performance. Friday he played with more sureness and vigor, and last night he emphasized his success.

He might have had a more interesting number than Schuett's concerto No. 2, in F minor, Op. 47. The first movement is quite uninteresting at first hearing, but the second is better. In this second movement there is only one theme, a fact which does not help to relieve the impression of monotony given in the first movement. The third movement, combining the characteristics of scherzo and trio, gave wide scope for expression, and Proctor responded well, being nimbleness and jaunty grace itself in the tarantella, and softening to tenderness and melody in the slower part of the movement. He was heartily applauded, and acknowledged his welcome with a bow that suggested the retiring—would you say awkward?—student, rather than a society man, or even a baby lion.

That concerto was the second number on the programme. Beethoven's overture to Fidelio led the concert. This overture contains none of the musical subjects of the opera itself, although written by the same composer. In fact, this is the fourth overture written for this opera after successive failures in production. The one played usually nowadays is the one called Leonore No. 3.

After the piano concerto came Smetana's "Wallenstein's Lager," a symphonic poem. This is programme music—that is, the music is intended to suggest successive ideas connected with the title. The opening measures are gay and rollicking, more and more noisy, with a very clear suggestion—to one who had received a hint what to expect—of the festivities of evening in camp. Horns and trumpet calls give reminders of stern and picturesque duty that cannot be forgotten even in revelry. Dance figures come into prominence, and the same phrases broaden into heavy suggestions of the not too serious figure of the Capuchin monk preaching in the camp at night. Then comes the rhythm of a contra-dance, which quiets soon as the camp sinks to rest. The plucking strings accompanying gruesome minor strains suggest the lonesome fancies of midnight, thoughts of the fatal morrow. Then comes silence and dreamless forgetfulness. The trumpets hint at returning sunlight and the day breaks with a call to arms; then the war-like music of a march, and three kinds of drums, with cymbals, triangle and plenty of bang, develop the military idea through all the noise that Wallenstein could have asked for.

The last number was Brahms's Symphony No. 3, in F major, op. 90. In the first movement the second theme is very reminiscent—tuneful and catchy. The old-fashioned repeat of the first part is given for this movement, which is very long, but enjoyable throughout. The second movement has beautiful harmony for the 'celli. The last two movements were rich in musical material. The scoring for this symphony introduced, besides the usual orchestral instruments, a double bassoon—an instrument which is about twice the size of a bassoon and sounds twice as funny—by itself.

The concert next week will include Cherubini's overture "Anacreon"; the overture, the Wedding March, and two other numbers from Mendelssohn's music for "Midsummer Night's Dream"; a symphony by Mozart; and a "Divertimento" for violin and orchestra, by Loeffler, the violin player, who ranks next to Kneisel in the Symphony Orchestra.

THE EVENING BULLETIN

THURSDAY, JANUARY 7, 1897.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Excellent Orchestral Programme with Mme. Januschowsky, Soloist.

The third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at Infantry Hall. Either the musical appetite of the community was sharpened by the absence, in December, of the usual monthly treat, or else there was last night a dearth of counter attractions, for an audience of unusual size was present. Those who attended had the pleasure of listening to a programme which, at least so far as its strictly instrumental features were concerned, was one of the most attractive ever presented here. Two of the numbers were novelties, and very welcome ones they proved. As one of these was the symphony, the chief feature of the concert, the programme was practically made to assume an unwonted air of newness. Though we never tire of hearing the familiar works of the great masters played by this superb orchestra, it cannot be denied that a new dish once in a while adds zest to the feast and lends a needed fillip to the taste of the musical epicure.

The full programme was as follows:

Overture, Scherzo, Notturno, and Wedding March, from "Midsummer Night's Dream" music .... Mendelssohn
Recitative, "Crudele? Ah no, moi bene!" and Aria, "Non mi dir, bell' idol mio," from Act II., Scene 13 .... Mozart
Little Suite, "Children's Games," Op. 22 .... Bizet
(First time at these concerts.)
I. March (Trumpets and Drums): Allegretto moderato (C minor).
II. Berceuse (The Doll): Andantino quasi Andante (B major).
III. Impromptu (The Top): Allegro vivo (A minor).
IV. Duo (Little Husband, Little Wife): Andantino (B-flat major).
V. Galop (The Ball): Presto (A major).
Aria, "Adriano," from "Rienzi" ...... Wagner
Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Op. 36 .... Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky
(First time at these concerts.)
I. Andante sostenuto (F minor).
Moderato con anima, Movimento di Valse (F minor).
II. Andantino in modo di canzona (B-flat minor).
III. Scherzo, "Pizzicato ostinato:" Allegro (F major).
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco (F major).

The overture and selections from the incidental music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream" put every one in a happy frame of mind at the start. History relates that Mendelssohn composed the overture—by no means the least attractive of the numbers—at the early age of 17. The fact is thoroughly well authenticated, or one might be pardoned for having doubts, even at this day when the field of music is fairly overrun with infant prodigies of certain and uncertain ages. These latter-day youth, however, exploit themselves chiefly as performers. We do not find them, like Mendelssohn, Mozart, and others of the olden time, composing master-works long ere their beards are grown. It does not follow that the faculty of musical invention has degenerated, but rather that modern methods of training are deficient as compared with the severity and comprehensiveness of the old school.

Nothing that Mendelssohn ever did in after years surpasses—hardly equals—this overture in the freshness and originality of its conception. And yet the most wonderful thing about it is the firm, sure grasp of the technic of composition, the intimate knowledge displayed of the possibilities of instrumentation, in short, the skillful handling by the workman of his tools. This is not a heaven-presented gift to anybody, young or old; it is acquired, and acquired only, by long and hard study under competent masters.

The other numbers, composed some 15 years later, compare well with the overture, and the whole set is one of the most charming bits of "programme music" in existence. All were delightfully played, though Mr. Paur, like nearly everybody else, takes the notturno at a pace too fast to adequately express all that the music contains of dream-like beauty and lingering charm.

Madame Georgine von Januschowsky, prima donna soprano, was liberally applauded for her singing of the "Letter Aria" from Mozart's "Don Giovanni." Madame Januschowsky has been a leading performer in grand opera for a number of years, both in this country and in Europe. In her singing she displays, as would naturally be expected, the poise and the style of a finished artist, though her voice is not of the most pleasing quality and displays unmistakably the wear and tear of exacting roles. It is no longer fresh, nor can it accomplish climax without forcing. Her second selection was uninteresting. The Wagner of "Rienzi" was by no means the Wagner of the "Ring" and "Parsifal." At the time of the earlier opera the composer had not "found himself;" the musical cosmos was to him without form and void, productive of incoherent and mis-shapen things which his muse as yet lacked the power to fashion and control.

Bizet's suite, "Children's Games," is a most charming and delicate bit of fancy, extraordinarily well carried out. It is by no means music for children, but rather for the appreciation of the connoisseur. Each of the five short movements is a little gem of cunning and suggestive orchestration to which its prefixed title merely affords a hint for imagination to follow. The suite was delightfully played, cordially received, and its appearance on any future programme will be most welcome.

The concert closed with Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, which, with the Bizet suite, formed the two novelties of the evening. None of the modern writers possess a stronger individuality than the great Russian composer, and this symphony bears all the ear marks of his peculiar style. The abundant cross-rythms and syncopations, the daring harmonies and surprising modulations, the fiery energy born of his Cossack blood, the lovely bits of melody that spring up in the most unexpected places, the violent contrasts, the barbarous discords, and the hand of the master who can weld all these incongruous elements into a coherent and impressive art work are all to be found in this one symphony. Detailed criticism is impossible upon the first hearing. Impressions only can be recorded, and by these, which are often not the worst guide, it must be pronounced a work worthy of the composer's fame. The four movements are well contrasted and full of interest. Especially original in character and treatment are the scherzo with its whirling pizzicato, and the finale with its terrific swing and rush and startling harmonies. It was remarkably well played, as indeed was every number on the programme.

The next concert takes place on the evening of Wednesday, Feb. 10, with a soloist to be announced later.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 7, 1897.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Excellent Orchestral Programme with Mme. Januschowsky, Soloist.

The third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at Infantry Hall. Either the musical appetite of the community was sharpened by the absence, in December, of the usual monthly treat, or else there was last night a dearth of counter attractions, for an audience of unusual size was present. Those who attended had the pleasure of listening to a programme which, at least so far as its strictly instrumental features were concerned, was one of the most attractive ever presented here. Two of the numbers were novelties, and very welcome ones they proved. As one of these was the symphony, the chief feature of the concert, the programme was practically made to assume an unwonted air of newness. Though we never tire of hearing the familiar works of the great masters played by this superb orchestra, it cannot be denied that a new dish once in a while adds zest to the feast and lends a needed fillip to the taste of the musical epicure.

The full programme was as follows:

Overture, Scherzo, Notturno, and Wedding March, from "Midsummer Night's Dream" music .... Mendelssohn
Recitative, "Crudele? Ah no, moi bene!" and Aria, "Non mi dir, bell' idol mio," from Act II., Scene 13 .... Mozart
Little Suite, "Children's Games," Op. 22 .... Bizet
(First time at these concerts.)
I. March (Trumpets and Drums): Allegretto moderato (C minor).
II. Berceuse (The Doll): Andantino quasi Andante (B major).
III. Impromptu (The Top): Allegro vivo (A minor).
IV. Duo (Little Husband, Little Wife): Andantino (B-flat major).
V. Galop (The Ball): Presto (A major).
Aria, "Adriano," from "Rienzi" ...... Wagner
Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Op. 36 .... Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky
(First time at these concerts.)
I. Andante sostenuto (F minor).
Moderato con anima, Movimento di Valse (F minor).
II. Andantino in modo di canzona (B-flat minor).
III. Scherzo, "Pizzicato ostinato:" Allegro (F major).
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco (F major).

The overture and selections from the incidental music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream" put every one in a happy frame of mind at the start. History relates that Mendelssohn composed the overture—by no means the least attractive of the numbers—at the early age of 17. The fact is thoroughly well authenticated, or one might be pardoned for having doubts, even at this day when the field of music is fairly overrun with infant prodigies of certain and uncertain ages. These latter-day youth, however, exploit themselves chiefly as performers. We do not find them, like Mendelssohn, Mozart, and others of the olden time, composing master-works long ere their beards are grown. It does not follow that the faculty of musical invention has degenerated, but rather that modern methods of training are deficient as compared with the severity and comprehensiveness of the old school.

Nothing that Mendelssohn ever did in after years surpasses—hardly equals—this overture in the freshness and originality of its conception. And yet the most wonderful thing about it is the firm, sure grasp of the technic of composition, the intimate knowledge displayed of the possibilities of instrumentation, in short, the skillful handling by the workman of his tools. This is not a heaven-presented gift to anybody, young or old; it is acquired, and acquired only, by long and hard study under competent masters.

The other numbers, composed some 15 years later, compare well with the overture, and the whole set is one of the most charming bits of "programme music" in existence. All were delightfully played, though Mr. Paur, like nearly everybody else, takes the notturno at a pace too fast to adequately express all that the music contains of dream-like beauty and lingering charm.

Madame Georgine von Januschowsky, prima donna soprano, was liberally applauded for her singing of the "Letter Aria" from Mozart's "Don Giovanni." Madame Januschowsky has been a leading performer in grand opera for a number of years, both in this country and in Europe. In her singing she displays, as would naturally be expected, the poise and the style of a finished artist, though her voice is not of the most pleasing quality and displays unmistakably the wear and tear of exacting roles. It is no longer fresh, nor can it accomplish climax without forcing. Her second selection was uninteresting. The Wagner of "Rienzi" was by no means the Wagner of the "Ring" and "Parsifal." At the time of the earlier opera the composer had not "found himself;" the musical cosmos was to him without form and void, productive of incoherent and mis-shapen things which his muse as yet lacked the power to fashion and control.

Bizet's suite, "Children's Games," is a most charming and delicate bit of fancy, extraordinarily well carried out. It is by no means music for children, but rather for the appreciation of the connoisseur. Each of the five short movements is a little gem of cunning and suggestive orchestration to which its prefixed title merely affords a hint for imagination to follow. The suite was delightfully played, cordially received, and its appearance on any future programme will be most welcome.

The concert closed with Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, which, with the Bizet suite, formed the two novelties of the evening. None of the modern writers possess a stronger individuality than the great Russian composer, and this symphony bears all the ear marks of his peculiar style. The abundant cross-rythms and syncopations, the daring harmonies and surprising modulations, the fiery energy born of his Cossack blood, the lovely bits of melody that spring up in the most unexpected places, the violent contrasts, the barbarous discords, and the hand of the master who can weld all these incongruous elements into a coherent and impressive art work are all to be found in this one symphony. Detailed criticism is impossible upon the first hearing. Impressions only can be recorded, and by these, which are often not the worst guide, it must be pronounced a work worthy of the composer's fame. The four movements are well contrasted and full of interest. Especially original in character and treatment are the scherzo with its whirling pizzicato, and the finale with its terrific swing and rush and startling harmonies. It was remarkably well played, as indeed was every number on the programme.

The next concert takes place on the evening of Wednesday, Feb. 10, with a soloist to be announced later.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 4, 1897.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the tenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: "Overture to "Fidelio," in E major, opus 72.
Eduard Schütt: Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in F minor, opus 47.
(First time in Boston.)
Smetana: Symphonic Poem, "Wallenstein's Lager."
(First time in Boston).
Brahms: Symphony No. 3, in F major, opus 90.
Mr. George W. Proctor was the pianist.

The "Fidelio" overture was admirably played; excellent tempi, fine fire and vigor of accent, grand effect! Perhaps Mr. Paur may be induced some time to give also the companion "small overture" to the great opera, the "Leonore" (so-called) No. 1. It would be listened to with pleasure.

Smetana's "Wallenstein's Lager" seems, as far as one can judge from one hearing, about the liveliest symphonic poem we have yet heard by this composer. It is evidently a thing of little depth and wellnigh infinite noise; but it has dash, go and freshness to it; it well reflects the brilliancy of the picture of motley, rough-and-tumble camp life found in Schiller's play—that wonderful "play that is no play," in which Schiller has done some of his most sparkling writing. After all, the composition is little else than Meyerbeer revived and out-Meyerbeered; even to that characteristic play of triplets on an organ-point, one recognizes Meyerbeer's style in it. But there is no little freshness of melodic invention in the work, no little picturesque color; and it is carried through with great dash. There is a fanfare for four trumpets in it that is one of the most brilliant things of the sort we know. It was capitally played.

Brahms's great F major symphony seems greater than ever! The playing of the first movement, though generally full of fire, left something to be desired in point of showing forth clearly the full meaning of the music. One of the most—perhaps the most—striking points in the movement was so slurred over as to be wellnigh lost to the ear. This was that nearly omnipresent counter-theme which so pertinaciously dogs the steps of the first theme, the minor counter-theme to the major theme. That its presence should be vaguely felt, rather than clearly detected, in the opening measures for wind instruments is excusable; indeed, it were hard to tell whether this vagueness lay in Brahms's intention, or is the result of a miscalculation in his scoring of the passage. But from the point (beginning with the third measure) where this counter-theme appears in the bass against the major first theme in the violins, it seems to us that there can be little doubt that it must be impressed upon the ear as firmly as the first theme itself; and here the scoring—giving the counter-theme to the basses, double-bassoon and third trombone—makes this clearness of exposition perfectly easy. We know that two diametrically opposed arguments have been brought forward about the rendering of this passage. Mr. Gericke, frightened at the terrific cross-relation between the A-flat of the counter-theme and the A-natural of the theme, used to try to tone it down by making the counter-theme as inconspicuous as possible. But this did not really tone it down in the least; it merely made the passage sound like bad harmony. Mr. Nikisch, on the other hand, argued that, if the strange cross-relation were to be "saved," it could be so only by letting the ear perceive as quickly and clearly as possible that it was the result of the quasi-dramatic opposition of two distinct melodies—the one in F major and the other in F minor; so he laid enormous stress upon the counter-theme, making it stand forth distinctly from beneath the harmony. It seems to us that Mr. Gericke's idea in this matter is fundamentally weak and futile; that Mr. Nikisch's is the only sensible one. Mr. Paur followed the Gericke plan; not only was the melodic outline of this counter-theme not apparent in the bass, but the ear had difficulty in grasping it when it came in immediately afterward in the horns, bassoons and clarinets; acute listening could detect it the next time in the flutes, oboes and trumpet, but one had to listen hard for it! Now a good part of the gist of the whole movement lies in the haunting persistency of this minor counter-theme; if you do not hear it, it might as well have not been there. Perhaps, too, it might have been well to pay a little more attention to Brahms's indication, "passionato" in playing the major first theme—especially toward the end, just before the subsidiary sets in. With these two exceptions, the movement was well played. The second movement went admirably; but we could have stood the third, Poco Allegretto, a thought slower. The wonderful burst from F minor to F major near the close of the finale was more effectively done than it was two years ago; still we do not think the possibilities of this thrice-beautiful passage have been quite exhausted yet.

In selecting the Schütt concerto for his first appearance in Boston Mr. Proctor showed no little of the generous enthusiasm of youth. For we hardly know a work of its kind in which the solo instrument is so hardly treated—in fact, so ill-treated—by the orchestra. If a composer has ideas which can only be expressed in such orchestration as that, he should not write pianoforte concertos. The score is not remarkably full, not so full as that of some other modern concertos; but the scoring, the instrumentation, is so thick and heavy that one wonders how any pianist could expect even a modern concert-grand to cut through it. Even in places where the instrumentation is lighter and more transparent, the composer seems to have taken delight in putting in a tinkling triangle or some other infernal machine, to prevent your hearing what the pianoforte has to say. Mr. Schütt is forty years old, and this is his second concerto; so he has not the excuse of extreme youth; but the scoring of this concerto is—as Matthew Arnold said of a certain letter of Shelley's—"worse than stupid, it is bete!" More is the pity, for the composition itself has much to recommend it; it is worked out with excellent skill, and though the thematic material is not particularly distinguished, it is not dull.

[illegible] the pianoforte with that un[illegible]se that has to be born in a man[illegible] he plays like every inch a pianist[illegible]chnique leaves, as far as we could see, nothing to be desired, and he plays not only fluently but really brilliantly. Luckily there are some few stretches of unaccompanied work in the concerto; and in these he showed that he could phrase gracefully and with fine musical instinct. How deep down his musical nature reaches, the music gave no means of judging. But that he has a keen sense for effectiveness was quite evident. His success with the audience was unquestioned; the applause was loud and long, and he was recalled several times at the end.

The next programme is: Cherubini, overture to "Anacréon," opus 241; Loeffler, divertimento for violin and orchestra, in A major, opus 9; Mendelssohn, overture, scherzo, notturno, and wedding march from "Midsummer Night's Dream," opus 21 and 61; Mozart, symphony to be announced. Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the violinist.

The Boston Traveler

TUESDAY, JANUARY 5, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY.

George W. Proctor Plays a New Concerto by Schuett—A Smetana Novelty.

Sixteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; tenth concert. Mr. George W. Proctor, soloist.
The programme:
"Fidelio" Overture .... Beethoven
Pianoforte concerto in F minor .... Schuett
Symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp" .... Smetana
Symphony No. 3, F major .... Brahms

A considerable interest, some of it not entirely inspired by the musical side, attended the first appearance at these concerts of the young pianist, Mr. George W. Proctor. He chose a new concerto by Schuett, and thereby evaded the necessity of being placed in any certain category as a player. Of the superficial style of his work, of his technique and method it is of course not difficult to judge, but of the real essence of the man, his musical depth and instinct, it is not possible to express any settled conviction, as it would have been had he chosen to invite criticism with one of the standard works well known through the interpretation of great artists. Furthermore, this Schuett concerto is of small account musically. It patters along from beginning to end in an unoffending way enough, and with occasional spots of beauty, but the light is seemingly borrowed from other lamps, and not impressively at that. The tarantella of the last movement is the best portion of the work, for here the piano and the orchestra are well and clearly balanced one against the other, and there is a sort of brilliancy in the solo part. As a whole, however, the work is disjointed and almost trivial.

It may fairly be said that Mr. Proctor did exceedingly well with the concerto. He seems to have a poetic mind and a good amount of what may be termed musical imagination. His fingers are fairly obedient to his thought, and refinement and elegance mark his playing. His touch is delicate, but his technique, or more strictly speaking, that portion of it which appears in rapid passages, is not fully satisfactory. Decidedly he lacks power and abandon, for the last movement of the concerto was played least well; on the other hand, the slight andante was given with genuine feeling and beauty of tone.

"Wallenstein's Camp" shows the genuine Smetana, thorough and hearty Czech that he was. When he wishes to depict a scene with soldierly roughness and bruin-like play he knows where to get his effects. The tremendous blasts of the brasses, the roll of drums, the shriek of wood-wind and the general clatter of everything are all served up with little finesse, but vigorous force and fine coloring. Through the entire tumult, broken here and there by sombre night effects and a touch of the Capuchin's sermon to the wild warriors, there is no touch of bombast or of unmeaning noise. The picture is vivid, and it is interesting. The work was played brilliantly, the appalling difficulties of the trumpet quartet being surmounted with splendid finish, but there seemed to be a somewhat uneven shading of dynamics on the part of Mr. Paur.

The Brahms symphony No. 3 is particularly academic—to use again the well-worn word that has been made a tag for the works of the great man of Vienna. It is certainly one of the least inspiriting of the four, and its lifeless finale makes it unfitted for a position at the end of a programme. It was played with much beauty, however. The "Fidelio" overture produced no unusual effect.

W. D. QUINT.

Telegram

THURSDAY, JANUARY 7, 1897.

Overture, scherzo, notturno and wedding march from "Midsummer Night's Dream," music..................Mendelssohn
Recitative, "Crudele? Ah, no, mio bene!" and aria, "Non mi dir, bell idol mio," from "Don Giovanni"..................Mozart
Little Suite, "Children's Games," Op. 22 .... Bizet
I. March, "Trumpeter and Drummer"—C minor.
II. Berceuse, "The Doll"—B major.
III. Impromptu, "The Top"—A minor.
IV. Duo, "Little Husband, Little Wife"—B flat major.
V. Galop, "The Ball"—A major. (First time at these concerts.)
Aria, "Adriano" from "Rienzi"......Wagner
Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36 .... Tschaikowsky
I. Andante sostenuto, F minor, 3-4. Moderato con anima, movimento di valse, F minor, 9-8.
II. Andantino in modo di canzona, B flat minor, 2-4.
III. Scherzo, pizzicato obstinato, allegro, F major, 2-4.
IV. Finale, allegro con fuoco, F major, 4-4.
Soloist, Mme. Georgine von Januschowsky.

The program offered last evening at the third of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts at Infantry hall was far the most brilliant of the series thus far and very seldom exceeded in beauty at any concert given by the great organization in this city. Conductor Paur was not only at his best but the audience behind him was the finest of the season, not alone in point of numbers but in the the amount of enthusiasm shown after each number. The weakest point in the program was the soloist, Mme. Georgine von Januschowsky, but it may have been due to the fact that too much was expected. Her voice was strong but lacked clearness, being rather of the quality demanded for grand opera than that of a concert soloist. The first selection, Mozart's recitative and aria from "Don Giovanni" it must be said did not do Mme. Januschowsky justice as was shown when she took up the Wagnerian aria from "Rienzi." She was recalled several times after the latter performance but there was not the spontaneous outburst of applause that indicates entire satisfaction on the part of the audience.

Of the orchestral portion of the concert, too great praise can not be given. From the first to the last, it was wonderfully finished, at times holding the audience almost breathless by reason of its fiery and frenzied development followed at once by passages of the most tranquil nature. More than that it was a program that was sufficiently varied to suit everybody. It afforded amusement as well as it did the most exquisite harmony. The opening number was full of reminiscences for the wedding march was so familiar to nearly everybody that it could not but recall days that are past. Yet there were very few, if any, who ever heard the grand old march performed with such magnificence as it was last evening. The little suite by "Bizet" was so playful that the audience laughed with glee at its curious composition. In the hands of any other organization than one so well trained as the symphony, the five movements would probably have appeared ridiculous but after hearing them last evening, it is not doubted in the least that the Boston Symphony orchestra would render any one of the popular songs of the day in a manner that would carry an audience into a whirlwind of applause.

The symphony which ended the program was one of those compositions which only a masterhand could put together. At times it seemed as though a long continuance of certain movements would stir the listeners to applause in the very midst of the performance, it being a positive relief when they were ended. Every resource of the modern orchestra was taxed to the utmost and every demand was met with characteristic excellence, bringing to a grand close a concert which will be long remembered.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 10.

Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening with the following programme:

Overture, "Anacreon"..................Cherubini
Divertimento, violin and orchestra, A minor op. 9..............................C. M. Loeffler
Overture, Scherzo, Wedding March, from "Midsummer Night's Dream"...Mendelssohn
Symphony E flat major..................Mozart
Soloist, C. M. Loeffler.

This very attractive programme was given with delightful effect by the Symphony Orchestra; the Cherubini overture was interpreted with rare spirit and fire, and nothing could have been more gracefully effective than the reading of the Mendelssohn selections. Mr. Loeffler's Divertimento improves by repetition; it is a most musicianly work, and everywhere gives evidence of high thought as well as rare knowledge. It is a work of the head rather than of the heart, and sometimes the musical problems presented have a certain obscurity that allows them to be solved in various ways, but where nothing definite is intended this is a merit rather than a fault. It is a brilliant, richly colored work in the impressionistic style; indistinct in outline and in meaning, but impressive from its technical skill, its daring and bold artistic dash. Mr. Loeffler played it like the finished, conscientious artist he is; with largeness of style, boldness of contrast and with exquisite grace. He was particularly admirable in the third movement, when his technical skill had full opportunity to display itself; but his higher artistic instinct was more in evidence in the eglogue, which is the most pleasing portion of the work.

The novelties announced for the next concert are Dittersdorf's Symphony in C major, and Mme. Eames, who will sing two arias.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 10, 1897.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler's Success as Composer and Violinist—Mr.

The program of the 11th Symphony concert given in Music Hall last evening was as follows:

Overture to "Anacreon"...................Cherubini
Divertimento for Violin and Orchestra, in A minor, op. 9..........................Loeffler
Overture, Scherzo, Notturno and Wedding March from "Midsummer Night's Dream," op. 21 and 61..........Mendelssohn
Symphony in E flat major (B. & H., No. 3)......................................Mozart

The "Anacreon" overture is, indeed, a noble work, but there are other overtures by Cherubini that well deserve performance. "Les Abencerrages," "Médée," "L'hôtellerie Portugaise," "Ali Baba," for instance, have not been heard here for several years. Too great partiality has been shown the "Anacreon," and, by the way, it is a singular fact that no outcry has been raised against its appearance in Music Hall by those who wear the motto, "Purity in Art," as a campaign button; for Anacreon himself was a highly improper person and he sang of women and wine in purple and scarlet phrases.

And so one might ask Mr. Paur why he thinks it necessary to give allopathic doses of Mozart and Haydn. If the less familiar symphonies of the latter were occasionally performed, a genuine service to the memory of the composer would be added to the pleasure given to the audience. There is a musty saw about familiarity. We should all entertain a higher regard for Mozart and Beethoven if their works were set before us as luxuries and not necessities. A symphony season without the performance of a symphony by Beethoven would make much for musical righteousness in this city. And poor Mozart! The audience will soon believe that he wrote only three symphonies—I forget; one in D major has been played in Music Hall.

Now there is nothing new to be said of the pieces by Cherubini, Mendelssohn and Mozart except by way of digression. It is only fair to say, however, that Mendelssohn's "Midsummer-Night's Dream" is ageing rapidly, if it is not actually old and decrepid. Mendelssohn's fairies seem in this period of imaginative music rather earthly creatures. The "Wedding March" pleases the women who enjoyed their church wedding and those who still have hopes; and, again, there are middle-aged husbands who think the music sounded differently when it came with a crash after the benediction. Then the genteel Notturno, with its ineffably Mendelssohnian gentility!

The feature of the evening was Mr. Loeffler's brilliant performance of his own Divertimento. When this piece was played by him two years ago this month, I spoke of it in terms of hearty admiration. The admiration is today enlarged. For this Divertimento is something more than a show-piece for the virtuoso, although any one of the great violinists who have visited us of late years might well have been proud of such a performance as that given by Mr. Loeffler last night. This piece is a work of high imagination in musical conception and orchestral speech. It is the work of an individual, not a copyist, not a conventional, well-taught person who thinks it prudent to side with the majority.

In this composition I find one of the chief characteristics of Mr. Loeffler, the violinist and the man: a peculiar refinement, which abhors that which is commonplace even when it has been accepted by those in authority. This refinement is never capricious and sterile fastidiousness. There is a refinement that sniffs and does not create; but Mr. Loeffler, by his pure melodic thought, his ingenious harmonies, which are at times pungent and exotic, and his exquisite sense of instrumental coloring, has given to music something that was not found there before he wrote. The gift is not merely a singular combination of instruments, or a series of strange harmonic progressions; it is large and liberal. He has given his own self, that which is best and noblest within him. Now this best and noblest is of more than ordinary value, for Mr. Loeffler is highly and originally imaginative; and unless there is imagination in a musical work, that work simply bears witness to industry. I know of few composers living today who are at the same time so distinctly original and so poetically and discriminatingly musical as is Mr. Loeffler.

* * *

Mayor Quincy occupied the post of honor on the right of the Chairman and made one of the principal speeches of the evening. In introducing him, Mr. Miller, the President and Chairman, said in part:

"We, the musical instrument manufacturers of Boston and vicinity, feel that we have brought credit to the city. I feel that we may well feel proud of the fact that we have nobly spread the name and fame of our city by our instruments, which are found not alone all over this country, but in foreign countries as well. We have the name of being an art centre, and in acquiring this reputation we have done our share. Many of the most distinguished musicians of the world have visited Boston under our auspices, and we have today a hall built by one of our honored members, which, for the purpose for which it is intended, is the finest in the world. Our great Boston Symphony Orchestra, the pride and glory of our city, is the outcome of efforts on the part of manufacturers of musical instruments, together with those of other public-spirited citizens. We started it, and through the generosity of Col. Higginson our humble efforts were put in the shade.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 11, 1897.

Symphony Concert—Mr. Loeffler as Composer and Soloist.

Anacreon was originally a rather disreputable party who sang only of love and wine and patronized orgies generally, but in the hands of Cherubini as portrayed in the "Anacreon" overture which began Saturday's concert, he becomes quite a proper and respectable person with a penchant for difficult violin passages.

It was a grateful change from the usual heavily-scored overture which we have become accustomed to at these concerts, and showed what a master can do with a conservative scoring. It was excellently played, not over-forced in any way, and clear and limpid in all its long development.

After this pleasant introduction there came the chief feature of the concert—Mr. Loeffler's Divertimento for violin and orchestra—in which the composer sustained the solo part. While there are certain parts of this work that seem to fall short of greatness, the reviewer can emphatically state that the composition grows upon acquaintance and seemed much stronger than upon its first hearing a couple of years ago.

The composer did wisely in calling it a "Divertimento," rather than a "Concerto," (although Liszt has applied the term "Concerto" to compositions still more free and rhapsodical than this one) for it is rather a brilliantly accompanied solo than an orchestral composition, the violin being almost constantly in the foreground, and the orchestral points only supplementing its prominence.

It is one of the most grateful pieces that we have ever heard from the violin soloist's standpoint and presents most effective touches of technique in a very agreeable guise.

The "Eglogue" again made the best impression, the discarding of violins from this movement giving the solo instrument an especially noble effect, and the composer must be credited for inventing the combination of forces which gave it such peculiar power, the scoring here being decidedly unusual. The movement suggests the modern French influence and has all the Gallic grace and mastery of woodwind effects.

The final movement shows much skill and contrapuntal knowledge but less of abandon and weirdness than its subject demands, for it is a "Carnaval des Morts," a new "Danse Macabre," which ought to be as eerie as St. Saens or Berlioz in their most ghoulish movements.

As it was, the skeletonian revelry was held somewhat in check by the exigencies of the solo violin, there was a gentle episode at one moment, as if two skeletons were indulging in the tender passion, and there were interesting variations and some splendid virtuosity upon the violin, but seldom frenzied gaiety that the scene would seem to require, although it must be conceded that the introduction of such fury would have obliterated any single violin, and the composer was wise in forcing his spectral dancers to keep within bounds.

Having reviewed Mr. Loeffler, the composer, it behooves to speak of Mr. Loeffler, the violinist, and here one can indulge in unrestrained laudation. The sterling qualities of Mr. Loeffler's work have always been recognized by Boston concertgoers, but on this occasion he fairly outdid himself; we have never heard him play with such power and breadth, such easy surety in the midst of the greatest technical difficulties.

The dashing theme of the first movement, almost a "moto perpetuo," was without flaw, the pastoral calm of the second movement was perfectly presented, the difficult harmonics of the second and last movements were as broad as Wieniawski used to give them; it was not surprising therefore to find the audience enthusiastic at the end of each movement and to have the violinist recalled again and again at the conclusion of his composition.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler has many friends in Boston, but the ovation he received was more than a tribute of friendship, it was a spontaneous tribute to the best violin playing that any local artist has recently given here.

Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music followed,—at least the four most famous numbers of it. The Scherzo and the Nocturne, the former of which displayed M. Jacquet in brilliant flutework, the latter giving some flawless horn performance, seemed somewhat outgrown. Some of Mendelssohn's elegant and sweet effects which caused our grandparents to go into ecstasies have been discovered to be only orchestral sugar-water.

For all that, the anti-Mendelssohn crusade, which Wagner led so harshly has probably spent its force; there are certain Mendelssohn compositions which have the divine spark of genius, and they are coming into their rightful heritage nowadays. The overture is such a flash of genius and it is as bright, as spontaneous, as daintily humorous now as the day it was written.

Among the hundreds of compositions in large forms, that Shakespeare's plays have evolved, one may pick out certain especial gems, such as Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," Nicolai's and Verdi's musical settings of "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Verdi's "Otello," Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky's instrumental work on the same subject, Berlioz's balcony scene in his symphony on the same topic, and one could extend the list even further, and in this list one must include this overture written by a seventeen-year-old boy.

The remaining portions of the music to this play, written by the full-grown man, 17 years later, by command of the king, have not the spontaneity of this juvenile work. Mendelssohn was always the daintiest of humorists in music; while never rivalling the Aristophanian humor of Wagner as displayed in "Die Meistersinger," in the lighter moods he was beyond Beethoven, Wagner, and all the rest.

His scherzo movements are generally the beau ideal of this form (notably the one in the Scotch Symphony), and in this overture, a perfect Shakesperian bit of playfulness, he is entirely in his element. It was splendidly performed and Mr. Paur's reading brought out the salient points in a graceful and unexaggerated manner. The elfin character of the chief theme was exquisitely given by the violins, and at the return of this, after the development, the snoring of the drunken Bottom was comically given on the bass tuba, a ludicrous foil to the tricksy figures above it.

It is a pity that the ophicleide is entirely out of use with us (it is still occasionally used across the water) for this raucous-toned instrument, which Mendelssohn wrote in this part, would give the very counterfeit of a snore. The braying of bassoon, and all the other bits of musical jocoseness were admirably conserved in the performance.

What [illegible] about the [illegible] time-honored "[illegible] March?"—only that the trumpets [illegible] finely, and that Mr. Paur was very [illegible] in the degree of force used. [illegible] no effort made to exaggerate the [illegible]ssimo effects,—"For this relief much [illegible]!" Klopstock once, on being introduced to Rouget de l'Isle (composer of the "Marseillaise") exclamed: "Monster! your music has killed 50,000 Germans!" One can say, with equal vehemence, that this "Wedding March" has terminated the career of 50,000 bachelors!

The concert ended with one of those manly readings of a Mozart symphony, which Mr. Paur excels in. The flute-playing in the Minuet was commendable and the whole work was performed in its proper spirit. In no part of the concert was there any of that extreme crashing, which has sometimes been the only error of our superb orchestra. Louis C. Elson.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 10, 1897.

The Symphony Concert.

The program arranged by conductor Paur for the 11th rehearsal and concert of the Boston symphony orchestra was thoroughly enjoyed by the large audiences present Friday afternoon and last evening. It was as follows:

Overture to Anacreon, op 241 ...Luigi Cherubini
Divertimento for violin and orchestra, in A minor, op 9 ....C M Loeffler
Overture, scherzo, notturno and wedding march from Midsummer Night's Dream, op 21 and 61 ..Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
Symphony in E-flat major (B & H No. 3) Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart

Mr Loeffler is one of the most popular members of the orchestra, and his occasional appearance as soloist is a particularly welcome event of the Symphony season. During the 10 years or more that he has been with the orchestra his unvarying courtesy has endeared him to all his associates, and his uncommon talents as a musician have received full recognition from the patrons of the Symphony concerts. He was greeted with great heartiness last evening, and after the performance was recalled half a dozen times by enthusiastic plaudits.

His selection was a composition of his own, the divertimento for violin and orchestra, which he wrote during the summer of 1894, and played for the first time in public at the Symphony concert Jan 5, 1895. The work was then received with cordial favor, and was generally conceded a high rank among writing for the violin by American composers. A second hearing serves to reveal more clearly the manifold beauties of the work, and to justify all the praise that was given at the time of its first performance.

The divertimento is an exceedingly brilliant work, full of original ideas, and notable for the number and variety of striking effects. It is constructed in a thoroughly musicianly manner, but it is so very bright and lively, and so delightfully melodious, that it appeals strongly to the popular taste. The orchestration is exceedingly elaborate, and is written in the extreme modern style, but the solo instrument is never deprived of due prominence. It offers unrestricted opportunity for display of virtuosity in its wealth of showy and difficult effects, while the less complicated measures serve to reveal the soloist's sentiment and powers of expression.

Each of the three movements are so thoroughly enjoyable that it would be difficult to say which is the most pleasing. The first movement is notable for much vivacious passage work by the solo violin, with elaborate and beautiful orchestral ornamentation. The second movement is novel in that no violins are used in the orchestra. It is pastoral in character, and many delicious effects are gained, especially in the dainty measures allotted to the wood wind instruments. The last movement is the most elaborately constructed of the three, and offers best opportunity for exhibition of pyrotechnical virtuosity. The unaccompanied cadenza is amazingly brilliant, and the ending is one of the most attractive passages ever written for a work of this kind. Regarding Mr Loeffler's playing it is only possible to reiterate praises often bestowed in the past. His was a superbly artistic performance, and there was good reason for the enthusiastic applause won from the audience.

A very enjoyable feature of the program was the selections from Mendelssohn's music to "Midsummer Night's Dream." The numbers played were the overture, nocturne, scherzo and wedding march. Never have these charming compositions been interpreted with more delightful effect. The performance of the familiar wedding march proved especially pleasing to the audience, but the overture and nocturne were scarcely less charming.

Mozart's fine symphony in E-flat major was given an impressive performance under Mr Paur's intelligent direction. It was a scholarly and sympathetic interpretation, and must rank among the best ever given by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Cherubini's brilliant and showy overture to "Anacreon" was also played with splendid effect, and served to display the unrivaled precision of the violins in Mr Paur's admirably trained organization.

Mme Emma Eames will be the soloist at the next Symphony concert, and will sing two arias. The orchestra's contributions will be Dittersdorf's symphony in C major (first time here), Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni," and Beethoven's fourth symphony.

The program of the rehearsal and concert Jan 28 and 29 will be arranged in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of Schubert's birth. All the selections will be from writings by this composer, and will include the unfinished symphony and the symphony in C major. Max Heinrich will be the soloist, and he will sing several of Schubert's songs with piano accompaniment.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 10, 1897.

(Copyright, 1897. Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The symphony concert of last night, the eleventh in this season's series, was notable because of the wonderfully artistic rendering given each of the four numbers on the programme. Unlike many of the recent concerts, this was no novelty, Mr. Loeffler's violin concerto being the nearest to one, it having been heard here but once before, some two years ago this month.

At next week's concert Mme. Eames will be the soloist and a new symphony by Dittersdorf will be heard.

The Telegram

THURSDAY, JANUARY 7, 1897.

Overture, scherzo, notturno and wedding march from "Midsummer Night's Dream," music................Mendelssohn
Recitative, "Crudele? Ah, no, mio bene!" and aria. "Non mi dir, bell idol mio," from "Don Giovanni"..............Mozart
Little Suite. "Children's Games," Op. 22 ....Bizet
I. March. "Trumpeter and Drummer"—C minor.
II. Berceuse. "The Doll"—B major.
III. Impromptu. "The Top"—A minor.
IV. Duo. "Little Husband, Little Wife"—B flat major.
V. Galop. "The Ball"—A major.
(First time at these concerts.)
Aria, "Adriano" from "Rienzi"......Wagner
Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36 ....Tschaikowsky
I. Andante sostenuto, F minor, 3-4. Moderato con anima, movimento di valse, F minor, 9-8.
II. Andantino in modo di canzona, B flat minor, 2-4.
III. Scherzo. pizzicato obstinato, allegro, F major, 2-4.
IV. Finale, allegro con fuoco, F major, 4-4.
Coloist, Mme. Georgine von Januschowsky.

The program offered last evening at the third of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts at Infantry hall was far the most brilliant of the series thus far and very seldom exceeded in beauty at any concert given by the great organization in this city. Conductor Paur was not only at his best but the audience behind him was the finest of the season, not alone in point of numbers but in the the amount of enthusiasm shown after each number. The weakest point in the program was the soloist, Mme. Georgine von Januschowsky, but it may have been due to the fact that too much was expected. Her voice was strong but lacked clearness, being rather of the quality demanded for grand opera than that of a concert soloist. The first selection, Mozart's recitative and aria from "Don Giovanni" it must be said did not do Mme. Januschowsky justice as was shown when she took up the Wagnerian aria from "Rienzi." She was recalled several times after the latter performance but there was not the spontaneous outburst of applause that indicates entire satisfaction on the part of the audience.

Of the orchestral portion of the concert, too great praise can not be given. From the first to the last, it was wonderfully finished, at times holding the audience almost breathless by reason of its fiery and frenzied development followed at once by passages of the most tranquil nature. More than that it was a program that was sufficiently varied to suit everybody. It afforded amusement as well as it did the most exquisite harmony. The opening number was full of reminiscences for the wedding march was so familiar to nearly everybody that it could not but recall days that are past. Yet there were very few, if any, who ever heard the grand old march performed with such magnificence as it was last evening. The little suite by "Bizet" was so playful that the audience laughed with glee at its curious composition. In the hands of any other organization than one so well trained as the symphony, the five movements would probably have appeared ridiculous but after hearing them last evening, it is not doubted in the least that the Boston Symphony orchestra would render any one of the popular songs of the day in a manner that would carry an audience into a whirlwind of applause.

The symphony which ended the program was one of those compositions which only a masterhand could put together. At times it seemed as though a long continuance of certain movements would stir the listeners to applause in the very midst of the performance, it being a positive relief when they were ended. Every resource of the modern orchestra was taxed to the utmost and every demand was met with characteristic excellence, bringing to a grand close a concert which will be long remembered.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 10.

Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening with the following programme:

Overture, "Anacreon"..................Cherubini
Divertimento, violin and orchestra, A minor op. 9..............................C. M. Loeffler
Overture, Scherzo, Wedding March, from "Midsummer Night's Dream"...Mendelssohn
Symphony E flat major..................Mozart
Soloist, C. M. Loeffler.

This very attractive programme was given with delightful effect by the Symphony Orchestra; the Cherubini overture was interpreted with rare spirit and fire, and nothing could have been more gracefully effective than the reading of the Mendelssohn selections. Mr. Loeffler's Divertimento improves by repetition; it is a most musicianly work, and everywhere gives evidence of high thought as well as rare knowledge. It is a work of the head rather than of the heart, and sometimes the musical problems presented have a certain obscurity that allows them to be solved in various ways, but where nothing definite is intended this is a merit rather than a fault. It is a brilliant, richly colored work in the impressionistic style; indistinct in outline and in meaning, but impressive from its technical skill, its daring and bold artistic dash. Mr. Loeffler played it like the finished, conscientious artist he is; with largeness of style, boldness of contrast and with exquisite grace. He was particularly admirable in the third movement, when his technical skill had full opportunity to display itself; but his higher artistic instinct was more in evidence in the eglogue, which is the most pleasing portion of the work.

The novelties announced for the next concert are Dittersdorf's Symphony in C major, and Mme. Eames, who will sing two arias.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 10, 1897.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler's Success as Composer and Violinist—Mr.

The program of the 11th Symphony concert given in Music Hall last evening was as follows:

Overture to "Anacreon"............Cherubini
Divertimento for Violin and Orchestra, in A minor, op. 9.......................Loeffler
Overture, Scherzo, Notturno and Wedding March from "Midsummer Night's Dream," op. 21 and 61..........Mendelssohn
Symphony in E flat major (B. & H., No. 3)......................................Mozart

The "Anacreon" overture is, indeed, a noble work, but there are other overtures by Cherubini that well deserve performance. "Les Abencerrages," "Médée," "L'hôtellerie Portugaise," "Ali Baba," for instance, have not been heard here for several years. Too great partiality has been shown the "Anacreon," and, by the way, it is a singular fact that no outcry has been raised against its appearance in Music Hall by those who wear the motto, "Purity in Art," as a campaign button; for Anacreon himself was a highly improper person and he sang of women and wine in purple and scarlet phrases.

And so one might ask Mr. Paur why he thinks it necessary to give allopathic doses of Mozart and Haydn. If the less familiar symphonies of the latter were occasionally performed, a genuine service to the memory of the composer would be added to the pleasure given to the audience. There is a musty saw about familiarity. We should all entertain a higher regard for Mozart and Beethoven if their works were set before us as luxuries and not necessities. A symphony season without the performance of a symphony by Beethoven would make much for musical righteousness in this city. And poor Mozart! The audience will soon believe that he wrote only three symphonies—I forget; one in D major has been played in Music Hall.

Now there is nothing new to be said of the pieces by Cherubini, Mendelssohn and Mozart except by way of digression. It is only fair to say, however, that Mendelssohn's "Midsummer-Night's Dream" is ageing rapidly, if it is not actually old and decrepid. Mendelssohn's fairies seem in this period of imaginative music rather earthly creatures. The "Wedding March" pleases the women who enjoyed their church wedding and those who still have hopes; and, again, there are middle-aged husbands who think the music sounded differently when it came with a crash after the benediction. Then the genteel Notturno, with its ineffably Mendelssohnian gentility!

The feature of the evening was Mr. Loeffler's brilliant performance of his own Divertimento. When this piece was played by him two years ago this month, I spoke of it in terms of hearty admiration. The admiration is today enlarged. For this Divertimento is something more than a show-piece for the virtuoso, although any one of the great violinists who have visited us of late years might well have been proud of such a performance as that given by Mr. Loeffler last night. This piece is a work of high imagination in musical conception and orchestral speech. It is the work of an individual, not a copyist, not a conventional, well-taught person who thinks it prudent to side with the majority.

In this composition I find one of the chief characteristics of Mr. Loeffler, the violinist and the man: a peculiar refinement, which abhors that which is commonplace even when it has been accepted by those in authority. This refinement is never capricious and sterile fastidiousness. There is a refinement that sniffs and does not create; but Mr. Loeffler, by his pure melodic thought, his ingenious harmonies, which are at times pungent and exotic, and his exquisite sense of instrumental coloring, has given to music something that was not found there before he wrote. The gift is not merely a singular combination of instruments, or a series of strange harmonic progressions; it is large and liberal. He has given his own self, that which is best and noblest within him. Now this best and noblest is of more than ordinary value, for Mr. Loeffler is highly and originally imaginative; and unless there is imagination in a musical work, that work simply bears witness to industry. I know of few composers living today who are at the same time so distinctly original and so poetically and discriminatingly musical as is Mr. Loeffler.

* * *

Mayor Quincy occupied the post of honor on the right of the Chairman and made one of the principal speeches of the evening. In introducing him, Mr. Miller, the President and Chairman, said in part:

"We, the musical instrument manufacturers of Boston and vicinity, feel that we have brought credit to the city. I feel that we may well feel proud of the fact that we have nobly spread the name and fame of our city by our instruments, which are found not alone all over this country, but in foreign countries as well. We have the name of being an art centre, and in acquiring this reputation we have done our share. Many of the most distinguished musicians of the world have visited Boston under our auspices, and we have today a hall built by oue of our honored members, which, for the purpose for which it is intended, is the finest in the world. Our great Boston Symphony Orchestra, the pride and glory of our city, is the outcome of efforts on the part of manufacturers of musical instruments, together with those of other public-spirited citizens. We started it, and through the generosity of Col. Higginson our humble efforts were put in the shade.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 11, 1897.

Symphony Concert—Mr. Loeffler as Composer and Soloist.

Anacreon was originally a rather disreputable party who sang only of love and wine and patronized orgies generally, but in the hands of Cherubini as portrayed in the "Anacreon" overture which began Saturday's concert, he becomes quite a proper and respectable person with a penchant for difficult violin passages.

It was a grateful change from the usual heavily-scored overture which we have become accustomed to at these concerts, and showed what a master can do with a conservative scoring. It was excellently played, not over-forced in any way, and clear and limpid in all its long development.

After this pleasant introduction there came the chief feature of the concert—Mr. Loeffler's Divertimento for violin and orchestra—in which the composer sustained the solo part. While there are certain parts of this work that seem to fall short of greatness, the reviewer can emphatically state that the composition grows upon acquaintance and seemed much stronger than upon its first hearing a couple of years ago.

The composer did wisely in calling it a "Divertimento," rather than a "Concerto," (although Liszt has applied the term "Concerto" to compositions still more free and rhapsodical than this one) for it is rather a brilliantly accompanied solo than an orchestral composition, the violin being almost constantly in the foreground, and the orchestral points only supplementing its prominence.

It is one of the most grateful pieces that we have ever heard from the violin soloist's standpoint and presents most effective touches of technique in a very agreeable guise.

The "Eglogue" again made the best impression, the discarding of violins from this movement giving the solo instrument an especially noble effect, and the composer must be credited for inventing the combination of forces which gave it such peculiar power, the scoring here being decidedly unusual. The movement suggests the modern French influence and has all the Gallic grace and mastery of woodwind effects.

The final movement shows much skill and contrapuntal knowledge but less of abandon and weirdness than its subject demands, for it is a "Carnaval des Morts," a new "Danse Macabre," which ought to be as eerie as St. Saens or Berlioz in their most ghoulish movements.

As it was, the skeletonian revelry was held somewhat in check by the exigencies of the solo violin, there was a gentle episode at one moment, as if two skeletons were indulging in the tender passion, and there were interesting variations and some splendid virtuosity upon the violin, but seldom frenzied gaiety that the scene would seem to require, although it must be conceded that the introduction of such fury would have obliterated any single violin, and the composer was wise in forcing his spectral dancers to keep within bounds.

Having reviewed Mr. Loeffler, the composer, it behooves to speak of Mr. Loeffler, the violinist, and here one can indulge in unrestrained laudation. The sterling qualities of Mr. Loeffler's work have always been recognized by Boston concertgoers, but on this occasion he fairly outdid himself; we have never heard him play with such power and breadth, such easy surety in the midst of the greatest technical difficulties.

The dashing theme of the first movement, almost a "moto perpetuo," was without flaw, the pastoral calm of the second movement was perfectly presented, the difficult harmonics of the second and last movements were as broad as Wieniawski used to give them; it was not surprising therefore to find the audience enthusiastic at the end of each movement and to have the violinist recalled again and again at the conclusion of his composition.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler has many friends in Boston, but the ovation he received was more than a tribute of friendship, it was a spontaneous tribute to the best violin playing that any local artist has recently given here.

Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music followed,—at least the four most famous numbers of it. The Scherzo and the Nocturne, the former of which displayed M. Jacquet in brilliant flute-work, the latter giving some flawless horn performance, seemed somewhat outgrown. Some of Mendelssohn's elegant and sweet effects which caused our grandparents to go into ecstasies have been discovered to be only orchestral sugar-water.

For all that, the anti-Mendelssohn crusade, which Wagner led so harshly has probably spent its force; there are certain Mendelssohn compositions which have the divine spark of genius, and they are coming into their rightful heritage nowadays. The overture is such a flash of genius and it is as bright, as spontaneous, as daintily humorous now as the day it was written.

Among the hundreds of compositions in large forms, that Shakespeare's plays have evolved, one may pick out certain especial gems, such as Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," Nicolai's and Verdi's musical settings of "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Verdi's "Otello," Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky's instrumental work on the same subject, Berlioz's balcony scene in his symphony on the same topic, and one could extend the list even further, and in this list one must include this overture written by a seventeen-year-old boy.

The remaining portions of the music to this play, written by the full-grown man, 17 years later, by command of the king, have not the spontaneity of this juvenile work. Mendelssohn was always the daintiest of humorists in music; while never rivalling the Aristophanian humor of Wagner as displayed in "Die Meistersinger," in the lighter moods he was beyond Beethoven, Wagner, and all the rest.

His scherzo movements are generally the beau ideal of this form (notably the one in the Scotch Symphony), and in this overture, a perfect Shakesperian bit of playfulness, he is entirely in his element. It was splendidly performed and Mr. Paur's reading brought out the salient points in a graceful and unexaggerated manner. The elfin character of the chief theme was exquisitely given by the violins, and at the return of this, after the development, the snoring of the drunken Bottom was comically given on the bass tuba, a ludicrous foil to the tricksy figures above it.

It is a pity that the ophicleide is entirely out of use with us (it is still occasionally used across the water) for this raucous-toned instrument, which Mendelssohn wrote in this part, would give the very counterfeit of a snore. The braying of bassoon, and all the other bits of musical jocoseness were admirably conserved in the performance.

What can one say about the familiar time-honored "Wedding March?"—only that the trumpets played finely, and that Mr. Paur was very discreet in the degree of force used. There was no effort made to exaggerate the fortissimo effects,—"For this relief much thanks!" Klopstock once, on being introduced to Rouget de l'Isle (composer of the "Marseillaise") exclaimed: "Monster! your music has killed 50,000 Germans!" One can say, with equal vehemence, that this "Wedding March" has terminated the career of 50,000 bachelors!

The concert ended with one of those manly readings of a Mozart symphony, which Mr. Paur excels in. The flute-playing in the Minuet was commendable and the whole work was performed in its proper spirit. In no part of the concert was there any of that extreme crashing, which has sometimes been the only error of our superb orchestra. Louis C. Elson.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 10, 1897.

The Symphony Concert.

The program arranged by conductor Paur for the 11th rehearsal and concert of the Boston symphony orchestra was thoroughly enjoyed by the large audiences present Friday afternoon and last evening. It was as follows:

Overture to Anacreon, op 241 ...Luigi Cherubini
Divertimento for violin and orchestra, in A minor, op 9 ....C M Loeffler
Overture, scherzo, notturno and wedding march from Midsummer Night's Dream, op 21 and 61 ..Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
Symphony in E-flat major (B & H No. 3) Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart

Mr Loeffler is one of the most popular members of the orchestra, and his occasional appearance as soloist is a particularly welcome event of the Symphony season. During the 10 years or more that he has been with the orchestra his unvarying courtesy has endeared him to all his associates, and his uncommon talents as a musician have received full recognition from the patrons of the Symphony concerts. He was greeted with great heartiness last evening, and after the performance was recalled half a dozen times by enthusiastic plaudits.

His selection was a composition of his own, the divertimento for violin and orchestra, which he wrote during the summer of 1894, and played for the first time in public at the Symphony concert Jan 5, 1895. The work was then received with cordial favor, and was generally conceded a high rank among writing for the violin by American composers. A second hearing serves to reveal more clearly the manifold beauties of the work, and to justify all the praise that was given at the time of its first performance.

The divertimento is an exceedingly brilliant work, full of original ideas, and notable for the number and variety of striking effects. It is constructed in a thoroughly musicianly manner, but it is so very bright and lively, and so delightfully melodious, that it appeals strongly to the popular taste. The orchestration is exceedingly elaborate, and is written in the extreme modern style, but the solo instrument is never deprived of due prominence. It offers unrestricted opportunity for display of virtuosity in its wealth of showy and difficult effects, while the less complicated measures serve to reveal the soloist's sentiment and powers of expression.

Each of the three movements are so thoroughly enjoyable that it would be difficult to say which is the most pleasing. The first movement is notable for much vivacious passage work by the solo violin, with elaborate and beautiful orchestral ornamentation. The second movement is novel in that no violins are used in the orchestra. It is pastoral in character, and many delicious effects are gained, especially in the dainty measures allotted to the wood wind instruments. The last movement is the most elaborately constructed of the three, and offers best opportunity for exhibition of pyrotechnical virtuosity. The unaccompanied cadenza is amazingly brilliant, and the ending is one of the most attractive passages ever written for a work of this kind. Regarding Mr Loeffler's playing it is only possible to reiterate praises often bestowed in the past. His was a superbly artistic performance, and there was good reason for the enthusiastic applause won from the audience.

A very enjoyable feature of the program was the selections from Mendelssohn's music to "Midsummer Night's Dream." The numbers played were the overture, nocturne, scherzo and wedding march. Never have these charming compositions been interpreted with more delightful effect. The performance of the familiar wedding march proved especially pleasing to the audience, but the overture and nocturne were scarcely less charming.

Mozart's fine symphony in E-flat major was given an impressive performance under Mr Paur's intelligent direction. It was a scholarly and sympathetic interpretation, and must rank among the best ever given by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Cherubini's brilliant and showy overture to "Anacreon" was also played with splendid effect, and served to display the unrivaled precision of the violins in Mr Paur's admirably trained organization.

Mme Emma Eames will be the soloist at the next Symphony concert, and will sing two arias. The orchestra's contributions will be Dittersdorf's symphony in C major (first time here), Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni," and Beethoven's fourth symphony.

The program of the rehearsal and concert Jan 28 and 29 will be arranged in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of Schubert's birth. All the selections will be from writings by this composer, and will include the unfinished symphony and the symphony in C major. Max Heinrich will be the soloist, and he will sing several of Schubert's songs with piano accompaniment.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 10, 1897.

(Copyright, 1897. Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The symphony concert of last night, the eleventh in this season's series, was notable because of the wonderfully artistic rendering given each of the four numbers on the programme. Unlike many of the recent concerts, this was no novelty, Mr. Loeffler's violin concerto being the nearest to one, it having been heard here but once before, some two years ago this month.

At next week's concert Mme. Eames will be the soloist and a new symphony by Dittersdorf will be heard.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 10, 1897.

The eleventh Symphony programme was of agreeable, friendly character, filled with kindly associations and significant of many moods of cheer, of geniality and of the nobility which does not oppress but only encourages and uplifts. Most of its constituent numbers were familiar,—Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture, opening with those majestic chords, and changing soon to that eager, pressing allegro, with its hurrying violin passages and its undercurrents which are so akin to some of the Inferno music in "Orfeo;" the instrumental portions of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, and the E flat symphony of Mozart, who therein began to add to the grace, lucidity and freedom of his earlier works of that order a new power, concentration and elevation. All were finely played, and there were admirably improved opportunities in one or another work for the virtuosity of the different choirs of the orchestra to be signally displayed.

The only other number was a repetition of Mr. C. M. Loeffler's "Divertimento," written for Boston and played for the first time almost exactly two years ago. It was welcome again and fully justified the deeply favorable impression it then made, not only by its technical suitability of instrumentation, and its delicately fanciful choices and blendings of tone-colors, but also by its quaint and yet reasonable conceits, its just understanding of the place and use of ornament and heightened effect, its clear, high intellectual quality and its winning moods. It takes more than mere courage to unite, even in a divertimento, three movements so distinct in character as the bright but bland allegro; the eclogue, with that eerie, piquant environment of wind voices, accented by the tingling tones of the harp, which it provides for the solo violin; and finally its strange, romantic, daring finale, which plays with a grim "Dies Irae" theme, and wreathes it with gay and gorgeous or grave and weird fantasies of figure and harmony. Courage alone will not do — there must be an original and cultivated spirit. And in Mr. Loeffler's music, so so far as we have heard it, that is the dominant trait,—the evidence of a mind which thinks and a spirit which moves independently and firmly, yet without too much self-assertiveness or any hint of a desire to dogmatize. The orchestra read the work with beautiful care and gave a support which was full of fellow-feeling. Mr. Loeffler—than whom no violinist in the orchestra has more right sentiment and true sympathy in art—gave the solo part exquisitely, and Mr. Schuecker, whose harp stood for so much in the score, was placed very near to Mr. Loeffler and seconded him perfectly.

Next week Mme. Emma Eames will sing twice, and the orchestra will play Mozart's "Don Giovanni" overture, Beethoven's fourth symphony, and, for the novelty, a symphony by Dittersdorf.

The next succeeding concert will be a kind of centenary tribute to Schubert and the programme will be all taken from his compositions—the "Unfinished" and the C major symphonies, and songs to be rendered by Mr. Max Heinrich.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.

MONDAY, JANUARY 11, 1896.

MR. LOEFFLER PLAYS HIS OWN "DIVERTIMENTO."

Sixteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; eleventh concert, Mr. C. M. Loeffler, soloist. The programme:

"Anacreon" overture..................Cherubini
"Divertimento" for violin..................Loeffler
"Midsummer Night's Dream" music.Mendelssohn
Symphony in E flat.....................Mozart

Mr. Loeffler's "Divertimento" was all that saved the concert from being one of too-cloying sweetness and calm antiquity. But that exception was a very noteworthy one. The work was heard here two years ago, and one of the highest things that can be said of it is that it sounds more genuine and is more interesting than before. Its very uniqueness, doubtless, is a shock to the ultra-classical, who believe that composition ceased with Mendelssohn, but in the fresh breeze of its inspiration the moderns can find a deal of reviving force. The nervous, ingenious preamble displays the violin excellently; the andante with its curious background of English horn and entire absence of violin accompaniment, shows that Mr. Loeffler thinks for himself, while the "Carnival of Deaths" is absolutely unmatched in its weird harmonies and development of theme by any writing for the violin that I know of. Mr. Loeffler walks upon fresh ground, and he walks boldly, yet not recklessly. In a theme where a slip into bombast would be so supremely easy, the slip is never once made. The performer played the solo part with loving care and exceptional brilliancy; he was warmly applauded for his work in both directions, as he surely deserved to be.

Cherubini's "Anacreon" still has fire in its mellifluous beauty, and although its grace is of another age it can charm at every hearing. The surpassing excellence of our strings was again enforced on the hearers by this overture, which was read by Mr. Paur with just the right refined "elan."

The "Midsummer Night's Dream" pieces seemed for once over-long. Is this personal heresy, or is it another indication that the day of delight in Mendelssohn is beginning to wane? However it may be, the overture and scherzo might well have been omitted. The nocturne has such a refined beauty and furnishes such a golden opportunity for the horns that it is always sure of its welcome, while the nobility of the Wedding March continues to make it attractive, and full of a special suggestion to the youthful heart. It was played somewhat heavily.

The cheery Mozart symphony in E flat was charmingly given in every detail.

[illegible]

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CI., NO. 10.

SUNDAY, JAN. 10, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Loeffler, the Soloist, Plays His Own Divertimento.

Heard With Genuine Pleasure—Characteristically Original, Somewhat Bizarre, but Always Interesting—Mr. Sieveking's Pianoforte Recital at Steinert Hall.

The selections for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall were:

Overture, "Anacreon"...............Cherubini
Divertimento for violin and orchestra......C. M. Loeffler
Overture, Scherzo, Nocturne and Wedding March, from "A Midsummer Night's Dream"...............Mendelssohn
Symphony, E flat, B and H No 3.......Mozart

Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the soloist, and played his own divertimento, which had its first performance by him at a symphony concert almost exactly two years ago. The work renewed on this occasion the strong and impressive effect it made on its earlier rendering, and was heard again with genuine pleasure. It is distinctly and characteristically original, somewhat bizarre now and then, but always interesting, always holding the attention, and always musicianly in the best sense of the word. The cantabile theme in the first movement is one of rare grace, beauty and freshness. The second movement, an eglogue, is full of charms from beginning to end, not only in its themes and their development, but in its novel and masterly instrumentation, with its tender and unconventional contrasts of orchestral tone color.

The finale, entitled "Carnival of the Dead," founded on the ancient chant "Dies irae, dies illa," is perhaps the most strongly individualized movement, and the variations on it are exceptionally ingenious and effective; now fantastic, now piquant; sometimes overflowing with weird savagery and at others with infinite mournfulness, and alike unique in the solo part and the orchestration. It is a composition of notable power, and though following the extreme modern school is clear as to meaning, and solid in worth. It was played in a brilliant and masterly style by its composer, who was welcomed with hearty warmth, applauded with vigorous acclaim and recalled again and again.

The rest of the programme was familiar, but was exceedingly well balanced in interest and was finely rendered throughout; the Cherubini work, one of the great masterpieces in overture writing, and still fresh and fascinating in the hearing, was given an exceptionally perfect and beautiful interpretation.

The Mendelssohn overture was also given in splendid style, as was also the scherzo, in which the wood wind acquitted themselves with a clearness, a precision and a fine delicacy that has seldom been equalled here in the performance of that movement. The nocturne is beginning to show traces of age, and to sound somewhat quaint and garrulous, but it was given with a charming warmth and smoothness. The march, yet impressive, despite the wear and tear to which it has been subjected, was read and played with noble fire and rhythmic swing. It may be taken for granted that Mr. Paur, always in keen rapport with Mozart, gave a wholly satisfying and sympathetic interpretation of the symphony.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in C major, Dittersdorf (first time); aria, "Voi che Sapete," Mozart; overture, "Don Giovanni," Mozart; aria, "Die Almacht," Schubert; symphony No. 4, Beethoven. Emma Eames is to be the soloist.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CI., NO. 14.

THURSDAY, JAN. 14, 1897.

The information was received from New York yesterday afternoon that owing to illness Mme. Eames is unable to appear at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances by the Boston Symphony orchestra this week. Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe was hurriedly engaged, and will play the Liszt concerto for pianoforte in E flat.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, JAN. 14, 1897.

MME EAMES CANNOT APPEAR.

Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe to Take Her Place at Symphony Concert.

The information was received from New York yesterday afternoon that owing to illness Mme Eames is unable to appear at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances by the Boston symphony orchestra this week.

Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe was hurriedly engaged and will play the Liszt concerto for pianoforte in E flat.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

JANUARY 14 1897.

MADAME EAMES NOT TO APPEAR.

The information was received from New York yesterday afternoon that, owing to illness, Madame Eames is unable to appear at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe was hurriedly engaged, and will play the Liszt concerto for pianoforte in E flat.

[illegible]

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The eleventh symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Cherubini: Overture to "Anacréon," opus 241.
C. M. Loeffler: Divertimento for violin and orchestra, in A minor, opus 9.
Mendelssohn: Overture, Scherzo, Notturno, and Wedding March from the music to "Midsummer Night's Dream," opus 21 and 61.
Mozart: Symphony in E-flat major (B. & H., No. 3).
Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the violinist.

Cherubini's charming and brilliant overture was brilliantly played; perhaps with something more of modern "modification of tempo" than we quite like, but with fine spirit and accent. There are some bids at variety which succeed only in bringing about a greater monotony. When every pianissimo is taken moderately, and every crescendo is made to go accelerando, the music of one composer sounds pretty much like that of another.

In Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture one of the exceedingly few techincal flaws in our orchestra was uncomfortably apparent. Cannot the combined mass of wood-wind and horns learn to strike in exactly together on the beat? A company of infantry that came to "order arms," as they came in on the opening chords of this overture last Saturday evening, would stand no chance in a prize drill. Upon the whole, we have heard the overture go better before. The scherzo was nimbly and vivaciously played, and Mr. Jaquet well kept up the traditions of the orchestra for impeccable flute-playing. In the return of the theme in the notturno, the higher wood-wind were allowed to play too strong; never before have we heard the first horn—the sole bearer of the melody—put to such straits by an over-loud accompaniment. The wedding march went very brilliantly, the coda being especially impressive.

Mozart's ever-beautiful E-flat symphony was, upon the whole, excellently played. As in the "Anacréon" overture, we did not like hearing the soft first theme of the Allegro played slower than the forte subsidiary that followed it; and Mr. Paur made a ritenuto in the minuet that was as inconceivable as it was horrible. If any movement in all symphonic literature is written to clockwork, this minuet of the E-flat symphony is!

We are in doubt whether to call Mr. Loeffler's violin divertimento his best thing, or only one of his best. It is full of that imaginativeness that characterizes the composer—Edgar Poe would have liked to hear it!—but, to our thinking, this quality shows itself somewhat more genially than in some of his later works. The composition is less nervously high-strung, less feverish; there seems to be a deeper feeling for musical beauty, a less constant welcome to the unexpected and unusual. The opening Préambule is admirable in its alternations of warm sentiment with sparkling brilliancy. The Eglogue is one of the finest instances of continuous melodic development, in the midst of a perfect revel of sensuous and characteristic tone-color, that we know. The instrumentation of this movement is wholly Mr. Loeffler's own; other composers may have employed the same devices—muted trumpets, the omission of the violins, etc.—but never with just this effect. It is one of the most ecstatically lovely slow movements for violin and orchestra that we know. In the "Carnival of the Dead," with its variations on the "Dies irae," Mr. Loeffler shows his Mephisto smile. This movement, too, is admirable, both in its serious and its satirical moments. The instrumentation is a marvel! What a picturesque suggestion that is at the close; when all the instruments rush either up to the top or down to the bottom, and you have left only an eviscerated orchestra, with no middle to it—a very skeleton! Note, too, how Mr. Loeffler, with all his huge orchestra, always leaves a loop-hole for the solo instrument to look out through!

Mr. Loeffler's playing was perfect as ever. After his last two or three solo appearances here, there is nothing new left to be said about it. He plays like a master. He was most heartily received by audience and orchestra, and the applause afterwards seemed as if it would know no end.

The next programme is: Dittersdorf, symphony in C major (new); Mozart, aria, "Voi che sapete," from "Le Nozze di Figaro;" Mozart, overture to "Don Giovanni;" Schubert, song, "Die Allmacht;" Beethoven, symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, opus 60. Madame Eames will be the singer.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 14, 1897.

MME. EAMES CANNOT APPEAR.

The information was received from New York yesterday afternoon that owing to illness Mme. Eames is unable to appear at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. Her physician wrote as follows:

"This is to certify that Mme. Eames is suffering from a sudden indisposition which obliges me to advise against her fulfilling her Boston engagement."

Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe was hurriedly engaged, and will play the Liszt concerto for pianoforte in E flat.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

THURSDAY MORNING, JAN. 14, 1897.

MADAME EAMES NOT TO APPEAR.

The information was received from New York yesterday afternoon that, owing to illness, Madame Eames is unable to appear at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe was hurriedly engaged, and will play the Liszt concerto for pianoforte in E flat.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 13, 1897.

The program of the eleventh Symphony concert was as follows;

Overture to Anacreon..Cherubini
Divertimento for violin and orchestra, in A minor, op. 9......Loeffler
  I. Preambule: Allegro (A minor).
  II. Eglogue: Andante (F major).
  III. Carneval des Morts: Moderato (A minor).
Overture, Scherzo, Notturno and Wedding March from Midsummer Night's Dream..........................Mendelssohn
Symphony in E flat major (B. & H., No. 3)......................Mozart

Mr. Loeffler's divertimento, the solo part of which was played most brilliantly by the composer, was the feature of the concert. When this work was first performed here two years ago I wrote at length and in eulogistic phrases concerning it for THE MUSICAL COURIER. A second hearing has only enlarged my admiration.

The musical fastidiousness of Mr. Loeffler is neither arrogant nor snobbish; but it is a species of refinement that will not tolerate a commonplace in thought or expression. This fastidiousness or refinement is the chief characteristic of this composition, which is illuminated throughout by imagination. When it is necessary for Mr. Loeffler to be macabre he is sinister enough; but his shudder is always that of a nevrose, not of a sleek, fat-witted person who is shocked materially. Take the last movement for instance; I know few passages even in dramatic music that produce such pronounced goose-flesh as his first chord, which calls to mind the whole Inferno. But a cool head, that knows how to reject as well as to accept prevents him from sinking into vulgarity or mistaking noise for sound. The word "vulgarity" is not in Mr. Loeffler's dictionary; nor will you find in it the word conventional.

Although Mr. Loeffler is at times mystical; although he can present most clearly in music the color white; although at times his music is intensely spiritual, and never is he sensuous in melody or harmony or color expression, yet he can be very human in his melancholy, which is of close kin to the strange melancholy of the Russians as revealed in folk-song and in the novels of Dostoievsky.

As a writer for orchestra, Mr. Loeffler is a most distinguished individuality. He reminds you of no one but Loeffler. His experiments—and he is very daring in his combinations of instruments, and in his writing for them—never seem idly made; for the effects are novel and convincing. You say to yourself, "Why did not somebody think of that sooner?" For you hear from the orchestra of Mr. Loeffler things you have never heard before. Moods are created, suggestions are made that were only known to you before in dreams.

It is needless to say that this composer is intensely modern. He is a man of the nuance. If you care chiefly for architecture and the primary colors in music, you will hardly appreciate the rare talent of this man, who hears things his own way and expresses them again in his own speech. This refinement, remember, is never effeminate. The melody, if it is not nakedly thrust upon you, is draped so that its beauties are to be recognized. And he can strike the note of terror, just as on the other hand in the Eglogue he puts before you the high noon of a summer day, with a man and a maid beneath the amorous tree.

Imaginatjon!

Oh, the rare quality in music! And Mr. Loeffler is imaginative in high degree.

* * *

I confess the other numbers of the program do not incite me to spin sentences. This program and the one of this week will furnish the text for a short sermon in my next letter.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, JANUARY 14, 1897.

The information was received from New York yesterday afternoon that owing to illness, Mme. Eames is unable to appear at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. Miss Adele aus der Ohe was hurriedly engaged, and will play the Liszt concerto for pianoforte in E-flat. The physician's certificate as to the illness of Mme. Eames is appended:

New York, Jan. 13, '97.

To the Management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra: This is to certify that Mme. Eames is suffering from a sudden indisposition which will oblige me to advise against her fulfilling her Boston engagement.

CLEMENT CLEVELAND, M.D.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 10, 1897.

The eleventh Symphony programme was of agreeable, friendly character, filled with kindly associations and significant of many moods of cheer, of geniality and of the nobility which does not oppress but only encourages and uplifts. Most of its constituent numbers were familiar,—Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture, opening with those majestic chords, and changing soon to that eager, pressing allegro, with its hurrying violin passages and its undercurrents which are so akin to some of the Inferno music in "Orfeo;" the instrumental portions of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, and the E flat symphony of Mozart, who therein began to add to the grace, lucidity and freedom of his earlier works of that order a new power, concentration and elevation. All were finely played, and there were admirably improved opportunities in one or another work for the virtuosity of the different choirs of the orchestra to be signally displayed.

The only other number was a repetition of Mr. C, M. Loeffler's "Divertimento," written for Boston and played for the first time almost exactly two years ago. It was welcome again and fully justified the deeply favorable impression it then made, not only by its technical suitability of instrumentation, and its delicately fanciful choices and blendings of tone-colors, but also by its quaint and yet reasonable conceits, its just understanding of the place and use of ornament and heightened effect, its clear, high intellectual quality and its winning moods. It takes more than mere courage to unite, even in a divertimento, three movements so distinct in character as the bright but bland allegro; the eclogue, with that eerie, piquant environment of wind voices, accented by the tingling tones of the harp, which it provides for the solo violin; and finally its strange, romantic, daring finale, which plays with a grim "Dies Irae" theme, and wreathes it with gay and gorgeous or grave and weird fantasies of figure and harmony. Courage alone will not do — there must be an original and cultivated spirit. And in Mr. Loeffler's music, so so far as we have heard it, that is the dominant trait,—the evidence of a mind which thinks and a spirit which moves independently and firmly, yet without too much self-assertiveness or any hint of a desire to dogmatize. The orchestra read the work with beautiful care and gave a support which was full of fellow-feeling. Mr. Loeffler—than whom no violinist in the orchestra has more right sentiment and true sympathy in art—gave the solo part exquisitely, and Mr. Schuecker, whose harp stood for so much in the score, was placed very near to Mr. Loeffler and seconded him perfectly.

Next week Mme. Emma Eames will sing twice, and the orchestra will play Mozart's "Don Giovanni" overture, Beethoven's fourth symphony, and, for the novelty, a symphony by Dittersdorf.

The next succeeding concert will be a kind of centenary tribute to Schubert and the programme will be all taken from his compositions—the "Unfinished" and the C major symphonies, and songs to be rendered by Mr. Max Heinrich.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE

BOSTON TRAVELER CO.

MONDAY, JANUARY 11, 1896.

MR. LOEFFLER PLAYS HIS OWN "DIVERTIMENTO."

Sixteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; eleventh concert, Mr. C. M. Loeffler, soloist. The programme:

"Anacreon" overture	Cherubini
"Divertimento" for violin	Loeffler
"Midsummer Night's Dream" music	Mendelssohn
Symphony in E flat	Mozart

Mr. Loeffler's "Divertimento" was all that saved the concert from being one of too-cloying sweetness and calm antiquity. But that exception was a very noteworthy one. The work was heard here two years ago, and one of the highest things that can be said of it is that it sounds more genuine and is more interesting than before. Its very uniqueness, doubtless, is a shock to the ultra-classical, who believe that composition ceased with Mendelssohn, but in the fresh breeze of its inspiration the moderns can find a deal of reviving force. The nervous, ingenious preamble displays the violin excellently; the andante with its curious background of English horn and entire absence of violin accompaniment, shows that Mr. Loeffler thinks for himself, while the "Carnival of Deaths" is absolutely unmatched in its weird harmonies and development of theme by any writing for the violin that I know of. Mr. Loeffler walks upon fresh ground, and he walks boldly, yet not recklessly. In a theme where a slip into bombast would be so supremely easy, the slip is never once made. The performer played the solo part with loving care and exceptional brilliancy; he was warmly applauded for his work in both directions, as he surely deserved to be.

Cherubini's "Anacreon" still has fire in its mellifluous beauty, and although its grace is of another age it can charm at every hearing. The surpassing excellence of our strings was again enforced on the hearers by this overture, which was read by Mr. Paur with just the right refined "elan."

The "Midsummer Night's Dream" pieces seemed for once over-long. Is this personal heresy, or is it another indication that the day of delight in Mendelssohn is beginning to wane? However it may be, the overture and scherzo might well have been omitted. The nocturne has such a refined beauty and furnishes such a golden opportunity for the horns that it is always sure of its welcome, while the nobility of the Wedding March continues to make it attractive, and full of a special suggestion to the youthful heart. It was played somewhat heavily.

The cheery Mozart symphony in E flat was charmingly given in every detail.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CI., NO. 10.

SUNDAY, JAN. 10, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Loeffler, the Soloist, Plays His Own Divertimento.

Heard With Genuine Pleasure—Characteristically Original, Somewhat Bizarre, but Always Interesting—Mr. Sieveking's Pianoforte Recital at Steinert Hall.

The selections for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall were:

Overture, "Anacreon"	Cherubini
Divertimento for violin and orchestra	C. M. Loeffler
Overture, Scherzo, Nocturne and Wedding March, from "A Midsummer Night's Dream"	Mendelssohn
Symphony, E flat, B and H No 3	Mozart

Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the soloist, and played his own divertimento, which had its first performance by him at a symphony concert almost exactly two years ago. The work renewed on this occasion the strong and impressive effect it made on its earlier rendering, and was heard again with genuine pleasure. It is distinctly and characteristically original, somewhat bizarre now and then, but always interesting, always holding the attention, and always musicianly in the best sense of the word. The cantabile theme in the first movement is one of rare grace, beauty and freshness. The second movement, an eglogue, is full of charms from beginning to end, not only in its themes and their development, but in its novel and masterly instrumentation, with its tender and unconventional contrasts of orchestral tone color.

The finale, entitled "Carnival of the Dead," founded on the ancient chant "Dies irae, dies illa," is perhaps the most strongly individualized movement, and the variations on it are exceptionally ingenious and effective; now fantastic, now piquant; sometimes overflowing with weird savagery and at others with infinite mournfulness, and alike unique in the solo part and the orchestration. It is a composition of notable power, and though following the extreme modern school is clear as to meaning, and solid in worth. It was played in a brilliant and masterly style by its composer, who was welcomed with hearty warmth, applauded with vigorous acclaim and recalled again and again.

The rest of the programme was familiar, but was exceedingly well balanced in interest and was finely rendered throughout; the Cherubini work, one of the great masterpieces in overture writing, and still fresh and fascinating in the hearing, was given an exceptionally perfect and beautiful interpretation.

The Mendelssohn overture was also given in splendid style, as was also the scherzo, in which the wood wind acquitted themselves with a clearness, a precision and a fine delicacy that has seldom been equalled here in the performance of that movement. The nocturne is beginning to show traces of age, and to sound somewhat quaint and garrulous, but it was given with a charming warmth and smoothness. The march, yet impressive, despite the wear and tear to which it has been subjected, was read and played with noble fire and rhythmic swing. It may be taken for granted that Mr. Paur, always in keen rapport with Mozart, gave a wholly satisfying and sympathetic interpretation of the symphony.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in C major, Dittersdorf (first time); aria, "Voi che Sapete," Mozart; overture, "Don Giovanni," Mozart; aria, "Die Almacht," Schubert; symphony No. 4, Beethoven. Emma Eames is to be the soloist.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CI., NO. 14.

THURSDAY, JAN. 14, 1897.

The information was received from New York yesterday afternoon that owing to illness Mme. Eames is unable to appear at the Friday afternoon and the Saturday evening performances by the Boston Symphony orchestra this week. Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe was hurriedly engaged, and will play the Liszt concerto for pianoforte in E flat.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, JAN. 14, 1897.

MME EAMES CANNOT APPEAR.

Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe to Take Her Place at Symphony Concert.

The information was received from New York yesterday afternoon that owing to illness Mme Eames is unable to appear at the Friday afternoon and the Saturday evening performances by the Boston symphony orchestra this week.

Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe was hurriedly engaged and will play the Liszt concerto for pianoforte in E flat.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

JANUARY 14 1897.

MADAME EAMES NOT TO APPEAR.

The information was received from New York yesterday afternoon that, owing to illness, Madame Eames is unable to appear at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe was hurriedly engaged, and will play the Liszt concerto for pianoforte in E flat.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 11, 1897.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The eleventh symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Cherubini: Overture to "Anacréon," opus 241.
C. M. Loeffler: Divertimento for violin and orchestra, in A minor, opus 9.
Mendelssohn: Overture, Scherzo, Notturno, and Wedding March from the music to "Midsummer Night's Dream," opus 21 and 61.
Mozart: Symphony in E-flat major (B. & H., No. 3).
Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the violinist.

Cherubini's charming and brilliant overture was brilliantly played; perhaps with something more of modern "modification of tempo" than we quite like, but with fine spirit and accent. There are some bids at variety which succeed only in bringing about a greater monotony. When every pianissimo is taken moderately, and every crescendo is made to go accelerando, the music of one composer sounds pretty much like that of another.

In Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture one of the exceedingly few techincal flaws in our orchestra was uncomfortably apparent. Cannot the combined mass of wood-wind and horns learn to strike in exactly together on the beat? A company of infantry that came to "order arms," as they came in on the opening chords of this overture last Saturday evening, would stand no chance in a prize drill. Upon the whole, we have heard the overture go better before. The scherzo was nimbly and vivaciously played, and Mr. Jaquet well kept up the traditions of the orchestra for impeccable flute-playing. In the return of the theme in the notturno, the higher wood-wind were allowed to play too strong; never before have we heard the first horn—the sole bearer of the melody—put to such straits by an over-loud accompaniment. The wedding march went very brilliantly, the coda being especially impressive.

Mozart's ever-beautiful E-flat symphony was, upon the whole, excellently played. As in the "Anacréon" overture, we did not like hearing the soft first theme of the Allegro played slower than the forte subsidiary that followed it; and Mr. Paur made a ritenuto in the minuet that was as inconceivable as it was horrible. If any movement in all symphonic literature is written to clockwork, this minuet of the E-flat symphony is!

We are in doubt whether to call Mr. Loeffler's violin divertimento his best thing, or only one of his best. It is full of that imaginativeness that characterizes the composer—Edgar Poe would have liked to hear it!—but, to our thinking, this quality shows itself somewhat more genially than in some of his later works. The composition is less nervously high-strung, less feverish; there seems to be a deeper feeling for musical beauty, a less constant welcome to the unexpected and unusual. The opening Préambule is admirable in its alternations of warm sentiment with sparkling brilliancy. The Eglogue is one of the finest instances of continuous melodic development, in the midst of a perfect revel of sensuous and characteristic tone-color, that we know. The instrumentation of this movement is wholly Mr. Loeffler's own; other composers may have employed the same devices—muted trumpets, the omission of the violins, etc.—but never with just this effect. It is one of the most ecstatically lovely slow movements for violin and orchestra that we know. In the "Carnival of the Dead," with its variations on the "Dies irae," Mr. Loeffler shows his Mephisto smile. This movement, too, is admirable, both in its serious and its satirical moments. The instrumentation is a marvel! What a picturesque suggestion that is at the close; when all the instruments rush either up to the top or down to the bottom, and you have left only an eviscerated orchestra, with no middle to it—a very skeleton! Note, too, how Mr. Loeffler, with all his huge orchestra, always leaves a loop-hole for the solo instrument to look out through!

Mr. Loeffler's playing was perfect as ever. After his last two or three solo appearances here, there is nothing new left to be said about it. He plays like a master. He was most heartily received by audience and orchestra, and the applause afterwards seemed as if it would know no end.

The next programme is: Dittersdorf, symphony in C major (new); Mozart, aria, "Voi che sapete," from "Le Nozze di Figaro;" Mozart, overture to "Don Giovanni;" Schubert, song, "Die Allmacht;" Beethoven, symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, opus 60. Madame Eames will be the singer.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 14, 1897.

MME. EAMES CANNOT APPEAR.

The information was received from New York yesterday afternoon that owing to illness Mme. Eames is unable to appear at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. Her physician wrote as follows:-

"This is to certify that Mme. Eames is suffering from a sudden indisposition which obliges me to advise against her fulfilling her Boston engagement."

Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe was hurriedly engaged. and will play the Liszt concerto for pianoforte in E flat.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

THURSDAY MORNING, JAN. 14, 1897.

MADAME EAMES NOT TO APPEAR.

The information was received from New York yesterday afternoon that, owing to illness, Madame Eames is unable to appear at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe was hurriedly engaged, and will play the Liszt concerto for pianoforte in E flat.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 13, 1897.

The program of the eleventh Symphony concert was as follows;

Overture to Anacreon	Cherubini
Divertimento for violin and orchestra, in A minor, op. 9	Loeffler
I. Preambule: Allegro (A minor).
II. Eglogue: Andante (F major).
III. Carneval des Morts: Moderato (A minor).
Overture, Scherzo, Notturno and Wedding March from Midsummer Night's Dream	Mendelssohn
Symphony in E flat major (B. & H., No. 3)	Mozart

Mr. Loeffler's divertimento, the solo part of which was played most brilliantly by the composer, was the feature of the concert. When this work was first performed here two years ago I wrote at length and in eulogistic phrases concerning it for THE MUSICAL COURIER. A second hearing has only enlarged my admiration.

The musical fastidiousness of Mr. Loeffler is neither arrogant nor snobbish; but it is a species of refinement that will not tolerate a commonplace in thought or expression. This fastidiousness or refinement is the chief characteristic of this composition, which is illuminated throughout by imagination. When it is necessary for Mr. Loeffler to be macabre he is sinister enough; but his shudder is always that of a nevrose, not of a sleek, fat-witted person who is shocked materially. Take the last movement for instance; I know few passages even in dramatic music that produce such pronounced goose-flesh as his first chord, which calls to mind the whole Inferno. But a cool head, that knows how to reject as well as to accept prevents him from sinking into vulgarity or mistaking noise for sound. The word "vulgarity" is not in Mr. Loeffler's dictionary; nor will you find in it the word conventional.

Although Mr. Loeffler is at times mystical; although he can present most clearly in music the color white; although at times his music is intensely spiritual, and never is he sensuous in melody or harmony or color expression, yet he can be very human in his melancholy, which is of close kin to the strange melancholy of the Russians as revealed in folk-song and in the novels of Dostoievsky.

As a writer for orchestra, Mr. Loeffler is a most distinguished individuality. He reminds you of no one but Loeffler. His experiments—and he is very daring in his combinations of instruments, and in his writing for them—never seem idly made; for the effects are novel and convincing. You say to yourself, "Why did not somebody think of that sooner?" For you hear from the orchestra of Mr. Loeffler things you have never heard before. Moods are created, suggestions are made that were only known to you before in dreams.

It is needless to say that this composer is intensely modern. He is a man of the nuance. If you care chiefly for architecture and the primary colors in music, you will hardly appreciate the rare talent of this man, who hears things his own way and expresses them again in his own speech. This refinement, remember, is never effeminate. The melody, if it is not nakedly thrust upon you, is draped so that its beauties are to be recognized. And he can strike the note of terror, just as on the other hand in the Eglogue he puts before you the high noon of a summer day, with a man and a maid beneath the amorous tree.

Imaginatjon!

Oh, the rare quality in music! And Mr. Loeffler is imaginative in high degree.

* * *

I confess the other numbers of the program do not incite me to spin sentences. This program and the one of this week will furnish the text for a short sermon in my next letter.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, JANUARY 14, 1897.

The information was received from New York yesterday afternoon that owing to illness, Mme. Eames is unable to appear at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. Miss Adele aus der Ohe was hurriedly engaged, and will play the Liszt concerto for pianoforte in E-flat. The physician's certificate as to the illness of Mme. Eames is appended:

New York, Jan. 13, '97.

To the Management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra: This is to certify that Mme. Eames is suffering from a sudden indisposition which will oblige me to advise against her fulfilling her Boston engagement.

CLEMENT CLEVELAND, M.D.

STONEHAM INDEPENDENT,

—BY—

F. L. & W. E. WHITTIER.

F. L. WHITTIER, Editor.

Entered at the Post Office, Stoneham, Mass. as second-class mail matter.

SATURDAY, JANUARY, 16, 1897.

An Interesting Lecture.

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra" was the theme on which Mr. Wm. A. Field of Stoneham delivered an interesting lecture on last Tuesday evening in Red Men's Hall.

Only one who has heard that magnificent aggregation of artists perform can appreciate rightly the true value of a description of the work and methods of the orchestra as ably illustrated by the lecturer.

Mr. Fields had one great point in his favor in his discourse: he understood thoroughly what he was dwelling on in his description as he is a member of the Symphony (which by the way is a magic name in musical circles) and has been drummer in the orchestra for several years.

The audience present listened with rapt attention to the discourse which was delivered in a manner comprehensive even to one not versed in musical matters. Mr. Field referred to the new conductor of the orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur in glowing terms.

Mr. Field will probably deliver the lecture later in Boston.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 17, 1897.
(Copyright, 1897. Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A concert of evenly balanced merit was what the patrons of the Symphony listened to last night. There was an unusually large audience, due to the fact that Mme. Eames had been advertised to sing, and every admission ticket for both the Friday afternoon rehearsal and Saturday night concert had been disposed of before Tuesday. Then came the unfortunate announcement that Mme. Eames would be unable to sing, and the consequent disappointment of hundreds who might otherwise have heard this great singer under such excellent conditions. But rather than have their tickets go to waste, most of the admission ticket holders used theirs, and could not otherwise than have enjoyed the programme, especially in listening to the piano playing of Miss Aus der Ohe, who had been suddenly called upon to supplant Mme. Eames.

Miss Aus der Ohe has not been heard here for some time, if we remember rightly, and, judging by her excellent work of last night, it is a pity she cannot be heard oftener. She is a woman of charming presence, and, considering her sex, invests her playing with great power and intensity. Her number was the Liszt concerto No. 1 in E flat, which was first heard here about thirty years ago, and has since been very popular with public performers. It is a composition of much simple beauty, much poetic feeling, and in the hands of Miss Aus der Ohe it was given a rarely delightful rendering. The work seems especially fitted for a woman, as it requires that delicacy of treatment to which only a womanly temperament could do justice. Especially charming were her cadenzas, and her treatment of that portion when the accompaniment of strings is of the scherzo order. In fact, the whole work was played with a wonderful dash and spirit, and worked the audience up to a rare pitch of excitement, and at the close she was recalled nine times.

The symphony in C major by Dittersdorf, with which the concert opened, and was heard here for the first time, is a peculiarly constructed piece of orchestration. It is in four movements, all of them rather brief, and there were several points where brilliant and florid contrasts abound. There is a great deal of harping on a single figure, and while the construction is interesting, the symphony as a whole cannot be said to leave any special impression on the listener. The second movement is by all odds the brightest and most fanciful. It abounds in staccato passages which are introduced in many pleasing variations and with good effect. In the third movement there is the merest suggestion of a minuet, which appears again in the fourth movement. The other numbers on the programme were the overture to Mozart's "Don Giovanni" and the Beethoven symphony No. 4, both of which, it is almost unnecessary to state, were read almost faultlessly.

There will be no rehearsal or concert next week, but the week following the programme will be devoted to Schubert, who was born 100 years ago, lacking one day (Jan. 31). Max Heinrich will be the soloist.

[illegible]

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CI., NO. 17.

SUNDAY, JAN. 17, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Miss Adele Aus der Ohe Earns a Tempest of Plaudits.

As the Soloist She Is Obliged to Respond to Many Recalls—Dittersdorf's Symphony in C Major Delightfully Read and Beautifully Played—Almost Forgotten Work.

The programme for the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was:

Symphony in C major.............Dittersdorf
Concerto for pianoforte in E flat.........Liszt
Overture, "Don Juan"...............Mozart
Symphony No. 4, in B flat.........Beethoven

The soloist was Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, who was suddenly called on to fill the place of Mrs. Emma Eames, by reason of the indisposition of the latter.

The audience was very large.

Dittersdorf, though a musician of high eminence in his time, and a composer of symphonies, quartets, operas in great number and oratorios, has been, until lately, nearly forgotten, even in his own country, his name being kept alive there chiefly by his lively and charming comic opera, "Der Apotheker and der Doctor," which has held the stage in Germany down to the present day. The piece was produced in London by Storace, who, however, rewrote most of the music for it, retaining only a few numbers by the original composer. Dittersdorf paid his respects to programme music, having written three symphonies on subjects from Ovid's Metamorphoses: "The Four Ages of the World," "The Fall of Phaeton" and "Actaeon's Change Into a Stag." He was prolific, wrote industriously and left an immense quantity of music behind him, which was all of moment in his day. One work that was immensely popular was a "Symphony in the Manner of Six Nations."

Of late there has been a tendency to unearth these forgotten works, and several of his quartets and the symphony played last night are the results thus far in that direction. It is a joyous work, striking in the seeming spontanity of its inspiration, its freshness, its vigor and the well-marked individuality that distinguishes it throughout. It has much of Haydn's spirit, but the style is the composer's own. It is, of course, old fashioned, but it is of a good old fashion, and of a time when composers wrote because they could not help it, and made music for music's sake. The first movement is the most elaborate. There is in it a brief figure that is carried through it with various changes of accent and of effect that are ingenious and singularly effective. There is no attempt at profundity, the composer wearing his heart upon his sleeve even in the well-developed and melodious fugue in the finale. The slow movement is brief, consisting of a simple theme with a few bald variations, but frankly naive. It does not end on a closing cadence, but is joined to the minuet that follows, which in turn runs into the finale, which also in turn goes back to the minuet and ends with it. From which it will be seen that Dittersdorf was an innovator, and a bold one for his day. This bright and healthy work is full of charm and interest, was delightfully read and beautifully played, and afforded a rare pleasure in the hearing.

The Mozart overture was accorded a more prominent place on the programme than is usually given it, and received one of the finest interpretations that it has ever had here.

The Beethoven symphony is not to be ranked among his mightiest efforts in kind, but its wonderful and lovely adagio is the noblest and most impressive he ever wrote for the orchestra, except that in the choral symphony. It was rendered exquisitely.

Miss Aus der Ohe, who was welcomed with great fervor, played the somewhat hackneyed Liszt concerto very finely. She has gained much in point of style since she was last heard in this city, and has abandoned the overdemonstrative hand flourishing and body swaying that were formerly such disturbing accompaniments to her playing. Her technique is clearer, her touch finer, and she has broadened out into a thoughtfully intelligent and virile artist. Both her reading and her performance fully earned the tempest of plaudits and the many recalls that followed the completion of her task.

There will be no public rehearsal and concert this week. The next programme will be in commemoration of the birth of Schubert, on Jan. 1, 1797, and will be wholly devoted to his music, as follows: Unfinished symphony, songs with piano, and symphony in C major, No. 9. Mr. Max Heinrich is to be the soloist.

Miss Aus der Ohe, who was the soloist at the rehearsal and symphony in place of Mme. Emma Eames and had the warmest kind of a reception, looked charming Friday in pale blue silk and bolero of crystal and silver passementerie. The house was sold out that afternoon, for as fast as people brought back tickets for Eames they were grabbed by others waiting, and many were turned away.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 17, 1897.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Karl von Dittersdorf Appears on the Program—Miss Aus der Ohe Plays Liszt's E Flat Major Piano Concerto.

The program of the 12th Symphony concert given last night in Music Hall, Emil Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Symphony in C major..............Dittersdorf
Arranged by Hermann Kretzschmar.
(First time in Boston.)
1. Allegro molto.
2. Larghetto.
3. Menuetto I., vivace. Menuetto II., tranquillo.
4. Finale, prestissimo.
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in E-flat major ....Liszt
Overture to "Don Giovanni"..........Mozart
Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major...Beethoven

The interest of Dittersdorf's symphony is chiefly historical; and yet the man's voice is individual. The talent of Haydn was acknowledged by every-one at the time this symphony was written, and his influence was indisputable; and yet Dittersdorf was not the sedulous ape. He thought for himself; he thought in an honest, homely way, and he gave himself no airs and graces. It is straightforward music, respectable, and, like unto many respectable things and persons, it is rather dull. The katy-did repetition of simple theme is well-nigh intolerable, just as no doubt much that amuses or excites us today will be yawned at by our accomplished descendants. It must be remembered that we know this symphony only through Kretzschmar's edition, with its added expression-marks and filling-out of the cembalo part. With the small orchestra for which it was written, and in a smaller hall, it may have awakened livelier emotions; and the audience of today is not the comparatively simple folk who listened with pleasure to Dittersdorf and the Haydn of the earlier symphonies.

I speak in another column this morning of the date of Dittersdorf's first symphonies. There were symphonists before Hadyn, whose first work of this kind was written in 1759. A symphony by Sammartini was played at Milan in 1734, and one by Gossec was written in 1754. How would they seem to modern ears? Hopelessly stupid? And are any of the symphonies which Dittersdorf wrote on subjects from the Metamorphoses of Ovid still in existence? I should like to become acquainted with Dittersdorf's musical idea of Diana in the bath.

* * *

It was a great pleasure to hear Miss Aus der Ohe again. I understand that she wished to play a concerto by d'Albert, but the lateness of her arrival—for she was called suddenly as a substitute for Emma Eames—forbade the necessary rehearsal. Perhaps it was as well for her to play the familiar work of Liszt, and certainly her performance of it was admirable, most admirable.

Miss Ausder Ohe grows steadily in her art. There are pianists who appear with the brilliancy of a meteor and share its sudden fate. They grow lazy; they are spoiled by flattery; or conceit devours them. Other pianists manage by perseverance and industry to maintain a respectable position. Miss Aus der Ohe commanded attention when she first appeared in public; and since that time she has grown steadily in musical stature.

There was a time when she was Amazonian in her performance. She exulted in her strength. She gloried in the contest between piano and orchestra. And she excelled in pieces demanding dash and brilliancy. In these pieces she was a pianist who was incidentally, by accident of birth, a woman.

Even now she is a Diana in the purity and the pride of her performance. But if she is not a sensuous player, she is virginal rather than cold. She is intrepid, not arrogant. She fears no difficulty presented by Liszt; but she does not wear the scalp of the composer at her girdle. Nor does she use her strength as though she wished to show her superiority in this respect over the poor brute, man.

I admit that this concerto by Liszt does not make violent claims upon the deep emotional character of a pianist. It does make serious demands, however, on technique, taste and understanding. To say that Miss Aus der Ohe turned it into something more than a brilliant show piece is in itself no slight praise. There was no thought last night of difficulty or labor or vainglorious display. She played with amazing fluency, which was controlled constantly by musical understanding. She played with the orchestra, and not against it. Although her individuality was strongly pronounced—for Miss Aus der Ohe reminds you of no one but Miss Aus der Ohe—it never stood between the composer and the audience. The ease, the spontaneity of her performance! The charm of certain pedal effects not too deliberately and patently contrived! And above all the true elegance, without ostentation, without nervousness, in performance and performer! Seldom have I heard concerto-playing in Music Hall that gave such unalloyed pleasure. Miss Aus der Ohe may well be proud of the enthusiasm that she aroused. It was not manufactured; it was not genteel and perfunctory. It was as spontaneous as her own performance.

* * *

The overture to "Don Giovanni" is almost spoiled by the absurd coda necessary to concert use. Written originally for an orchestra of 26 or 27 and for a small theatre, it is all out of proportion when played by the Symphony orchestra in Music Hall.

In the interesting "entr'acte" in the pro[illegible]-book Mr. Apthorp says [illegible] French version [illegible] the Académie de [illegible] Paris, not at the Opéra Comique." But this season it is given in Paris at each one of these opera-houses. Maurel is still singing the part of the rake-helly hero at the Opéra Comique.

Mr. Apthorp also says "In Munich 'Don Giovanni' has been given for some years now in a small opera-house, with small orchestra, and with none of the solo voices doubled by the chorus in the first finale." Is he sure that it has thus been given for "several years"? The famous attempt to give the opera with the orchestra of Mozart, and according to his score and in a small theatre, was May 29, 1896. The opera was then sung at the Residenz theatre and not at the Opera house.

* * *

The 4th Symphony of Beethoven gave much pleasure last night. Indeed, it gave such pleasure that it would be a pity to fritter it away, even in recollection, by idle dissertations on the imperishable adagio, which is even finer and nobler than Berlioz's famous rhapsodic burst evoked by it. Let it be enough to say that it was played with full appreciation of its countless beauties, mysterious hints, and elemental grandeur.

PHILIP HALE.

Dittersdorf and His Queer Program-Symphonies.

The name of Dittersdorf, the symphonist, appeared last week for the first time on a Boston Symphony program. And, indeed, this writer of many symphonies—Riemann names over 100—violin concertos, chamber music, piano-pieces, operas, cantatas, oratorios, etc., is now known chiefly as the author of the comic opera, "Doctor und Apotheker (1786)," which is still given in Germany (twice in 1894), and the E flat major string quartet, which was first played here by the Kneisels Jan. 4, 1892.

Karl Ditters, afterward known as Karl von Dittersdorf, born in Vienna, Nov. 2, 1739, died in 1799, at the Castle Rothlhotta, near Neuhaus, in extreme poverty. In his day he was reckoned an admirable composer as well as violinist. Perhaps his most remarkable work for orchestra was the series of 12 or 15 symphonies—the statements are conflicting concerning the exact number—upon subjects taken from Ovid's Metamorphoses. These are early examples of program music. One symphony, for example, was named "Actäon." The first movement portrayed the chase in the forest; the andante, Diana bathing; in the menuet Actaeon surprised her; the subject of the final is the vengeance of Diana and the devouring of the offender by her hounds. Another of his symphonies was entitled "The Four Ages of the World." Another was named "Ill Combatti mento delle umane Passioni." These Ovidian symphonies were published in 1785, and they made such a stir that a grave theologian named Hermes wrote a long-winded analysis of them.

And as a violinist Dittersdorf indulged in vagaries, although there is no doubt of his real ability; for in 1786 he gave an imitation of the croaking of frogs upon the violin, and we read that the "cultured audience" was "uncommonly well satisfied with this admirable player."

He was also the author of a book, his Autobiography, dictated to his son and published in Leipzig in 1801 by Breitkopf and Härtel. It is a book of 300 pages miserably printed on wretched paper. This original is now rare; but an English translation was published in London a few months ago. The Autobiography is a sad but extremely entertaining work, crammed with useful information about the musical life of the time and abounding in sane advice to students of the violin and composition. While it is true that the custom of having private orchestras gave great opportunities to composers in the service of Princes and led them to write without anxiety concerning an orchestra, public or publisher, the lot of these composers was precarious, for they were dependent on the caprices of their patrons. The motto of Dittersdorf's Autobiography might well be: "O, how wretched is that poor man that hangs on Princes' favors."

Here is Dittersdorf, one of the acknowledged masters of his time, a virtuoso and a composer of undisputed ability, closing the account of his life with a pitiful statement of his income and outgo, giving these last words to the reader: "Dear Reader, do not suspect me of having written the above lines for the purpose of pumping alms from you. It is more than probable that I shall not be alive when you are reading this little book. But if any one will help my poor family after the destruction of my cottage, which is already rotten, O then will God surely recompense him! I am honest enough to admit that I have made my family doubly unhappy. First, on account of my poverty; second, on account of my sickness. Yet there is some excuse for my poverty, as my pension for 26 years of service has always been too small to pay my debts, and the money I had laid aside in case of need, the most of which has gone into the physician's little bag, the apothecary's shop, and the health baths (and all without help) I have been obliged to part with. But my heedlessness in sparing my health is unpardonable, the more so because a kindly nature gave me a strong and solid body, upon which I, poor fool, have made wanton attacks."

Dittersdorf says little about his symphonies, and he gives few or no dates. He mentions six symphonies "which attracted attention in Prague and Vienna." He says he wrote three symphonies and an oboe concerto in four weeks, and received $80 for them. At a concert given by him in Berlin two [illegible] the King of Prussia were performed, one at the beginning and one at the end of the concert.

These first mentioned "six symphonies" were written in 1759, the year that Haydn wrote his first symphony in three movements (string quartet, two oboes and two horns) for Count Morzin's orchestra.

They say that the symphony of Dittersdorf played last night first appeared in 1788. This is the year of Haydn's "Children's Symphony," and the so-called "Oxford" symphony, which was written originally for Paris.

STONEHAM INDEPENDENT,

—BY—

F. L. & W. E. WHITTIER.

F. L. WHITTIER, Editor.

Entered at the Post Office, Stoneham, Mass. as second-class mail matter.

SATURDAY, JANUARY, 16, 1897.

An Interesting Lecture.

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra" was the theme on which Mr. Wm. A. Field of Stoneham delivered an interesting lecture on last Tuesday evening in Red Men's Hall.

Only one who has heard that magnificient aggregation of artists perform can appreeiate rightly the true value of a description of the work and methods of the orchestra as ably illustrated by the lecturer.

Mr. Fields had one great point in his favor in his discourse: he understood thoroughly what he was dwelling on in his description as he is a member of the Symphony (which by the way is a magic name in musical circles) and has been drummer in the orchestra for several years.

The audience present listened with rapt attention to the discourse which was delivered in a manner comprehensive even to one not versed in musical matters. Mr. Field referred to the new conductor of the orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur in glowing terms.

Mr. Field will probably deliver the lecture later in Boston.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 17, 1897.
(Copyright, 1897. Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A concert of evenly balanced merit was what the patrons of the Symphony listened to last night. There was an unusually large audience, due to the fact that Mme. Eames had been advertised to sing, and every admission ticket for both the Friday afternoon rehearsal and Saturday night concert had been disposed of before Tuesday. Then came the unfortunate announcement that Mme. Eames would be unable to sing, and the consequent disappointment of hundreds who might otherwise have heard this great singer under such excellent conditions. But rather than have their tickets go to waste, most of the admission ticket holders used theirs, and could not otherwise than have enjoyed the programme, especially in listening to the piano playing of Miss Aus der Ohe, who had been suddenly called upon to supplant Mme. Eames.

Miss Aus der Ohe has not been heard here for some time, if we remember rightly, and, judging by her excellent work of last night, it is a pity she cannot be heard oftener. She is a woman of charming presence, and, considering her sex, invests her playing with great power and intensity. Her number was the Liszt concerto No. 1 in E flat, which was first heard here about thirty years ago, and has since been very popular with public performers. It is a composition of much simple beauty, much poetic feeling, and in the hands of Miss Aus der Ohe it was given a rarely delightful rendering. The work seems especially fitted for a woman, as it requires that delicacy of treatment to which only a womanly temperament could do justice. Especially charming were her cadenzas, and her treatment of that portion when the accompaniment of strings is of the scherzo order. In fact, the whole work was played with a wonderful dash and spirit, and worked the audience up to a rare pitch of excitement, and at the close she was recalled nine times.

The symphony in C major by Dittersdorf, with which the concert opened, and was heard here for the first time, is a peculiarly constructed piece of orchestration. It is in four movements, all of them rather brief, and there were several points where brilliant and florid contrasts abound. There is a great deal of harping on a single figure, and while the construction is interesting, the symphony as a whole cannot be said to leave any special impression on the listener. The second movement is by all odds the brightest and most fanciful. It abounds in staccato passages which are introduced in many pleasing variations and with good effect. In the third movement there is the merest suggestion of a minuet, which appears again in the fourth movement. The other numbers on the programme were the overture to Mozart's "Don Giovanni" and the Beethoven symphony No. 4, both of which, it is almost unnecessary to state, were read almost faultlessly.

There will be no rehearsal or concert next week, but the week following the programme will be devoted to Schubert, who was born 100 years ago, lacking one day (Jan. 31). Max Heinrich will be the soloist.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CI., NO. 17.

SUNDAY, JAN. 17, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Miss Adele Aus der Ohe Earns a Tempest of Plaudits.

As the Soloist She Is Obliged to Respond to Many Recalls—Dittersdorf's Symphony in C Major Delightfully Read and Beautifully Played—Almost Forgotten Work.

The programme for the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was:

Symphony in C major	Dittersdorf
Concerto for pianoforte in E flat	Liszt
Overture, "Don Juan"	Mozart
Symphony No. 4, in B flat	Beethoven

The soloist was Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, who was suddenly called on to fill the place of Mrs. Emma Eames, by reason of the indisposition of the latter.

The audience was very large.

Dittersdorf, though a musician of high eminence in his time, and a composer of symphonies, quartets, operas in great number and oratorios, has been, until lately, nearly forgotten, even in his own country, his name being kept alive there chiefly by his lively and charming comic opera, "Der Apotheker and der Doctor," which has held the stage in Germany down to the present day. The piece was produced in London by Storace, who, however, rewrote most of the music for it, retaining only a few numbers by the original composer. Dittersdorf paid his respects to programme music, having written three symphonies on subjects from Ovid's Metamorphoses: "The Four Ages of the World," "The Fall of Phaeton" and "Actaeon's Change Into a Stag." He was prolific, wrote industriously and left an immense quantity of music behind him, which was all of moment in his day. One work that was immensely popular was a "Symphony in the Manner of Six Nations."

Of late there has been a tendency to unearth these forgotten works, and several of his quartets and the symphony played last night are the results thus far in that direction. It is a joyous work, striking in the seeming spontanity of its inspiration, its freshness, its vigor and the well-marked individuality that distinguishes it throughout. It has much of Haydn's spirit, but the style is the composer's own. It is, of course, old fashioned, but it is of a good old fashion, and of a time when composers wrote because they could not help it, and made music for music's sake. The first movement is the most elaborate. There is in it a brief figure that is carried through it with various changes of accent and of effect that are ingenious and singularly effective. There is no attempt at profundity, the composer wearing his heart upon his sleeve even in the well-developed and melodious fugue in the finale. The slow movement is brief, consisting of a simple theme with a few bald variations, but frankly naive. It does not end on a closing cadence, but is joined to the minuet that follows, which in turn runs into the finale, which also in turn goes back to the minuet and ends with it. From which it will be seen that Dittersdorf was an innovator, and a bold one for his day. This bright and healthy work is full of charm and interest, was delightfully read and beautifully played, and afforded a rare pleasure in the hearing.

The Mozart overture was accorded a more prominent place on the programme than is usually given it, and received one of the finest interpretations that it has ever had here.

The Beethoven symphony is not to be ranked among his mightiest efforts in kind, but its wonderful and lovely adagio is the noblest and most impressive he ever wrote for the orchestra, except that in the choral symphony. It was rendered exquisitely.

Miss Aus der Ohe, who was welcomed with great fervor, played the somewhat hackneyed Liszt concerto very finely. She has gained much in point of style since she was last heard in this city, and has abandoned the overdemonstrative hand flourishing and body swaying that were formerly such disturbing accompaniments to her playing. Her technique is clearer, her touch finer, and she has broadened out into a thoughtfully intelligent and virile artist. Both her reading and her performance fully earned the tempest of plaudits and the many recalls that followed the completion of her task.

There will be no public rehearsal and concert this week. The next programme will be in commemoration of the birth of Schubert, on Jan. 1, 1797, and will be wholly devoted to his music, as follows: Unfinished symphony, songs with piano, and symphony in C major, No. 9. Mr. Max Heinrich is to be the soloist.

Miss Aus der Ohe, who was the soloist at the rehearsal and symphony in place of Mme. Emma Eames and had the warmest kind of a reception, looked charming Friday in pale blue silk and bolero of crystal and silver passementerie. The house was sold out that afternoon, for as fast as people brought back tickets for Eames they were grabbed by others waiting, and many were turned away.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 17, 1897.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Karl von Dittersdorf Appears on the Program—Miss Aus der Ohe Plays Liszt's E Flat Major Piano Concerto.

The program of the 12th Symphony concert given last night in Music Hall, Emil Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Symphony in C major..............Dittersdorf
Arranged by Hermann Kretzschmar.
(First time in Boston.)

1. Allegro molto.
2. Larghetto.
3. Menuetto I., vivace. Menuetto II., tranquillo.
4. Finale, prestissimo.

Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in E-flat major	Liszt
Overture to "Don Giovanni"	Mozart
Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major	Beethoven

The interest of Dittersdorf's symphony is chiefly historical; and yet the man's voice is individual. The talent of Haydn was acknowledged by every-one at the time this symphony was written, and his influence was indisputable; and yet Dittersdorf was not the sedulous ape. He thought for himself; he thought in an honest, homely way, and he gave himself no airs and graces. It is straightforward music, respectable, and, like unto many respectable things and persons, it is rather dull. The katy-did repetition of simple theme is well-nigh intolerable, just as no doubt much that amuses or excites us today will be yawned at by our accomplished descendants. It must be remembered that we know this symphony only through Kretzschmar's edition, with its added expression-marks and filling-out of the cembalo part. With the small orchestra for which it was written, and in a smaller hall, it may have awakened livelier emotions; and the audience of today is not the comparatively simple folk who listened with pleasure to Dittersdorf and the Haydn of the earlier symphonies.

I speak in another column this morning of the date of Dittersdorf's first symphonies. There were symphonists before Hadyn, whose first work of this kind was written in 1759. A symphony by Sammartini was played at Milan in 1734, and one by Gossec was written in 1754. How would they seem to modern ears? Hopelessly stupid? And are any of the symphonies which Dittersdorf wrote on subjects from the Metamorphoses of Ovid still in existence? I should like to become acquainted with Dittersdorf's musical idea of Diana in the bath.

⁂

It was a great pleasure to hear Miss Aus der Ohe again. I understand that she wished to play a concerto by d'Albert, but the lateness of her arrival—for she was called suddenly as a substitute for Emma Eames—forbade the necessary rehearsal. Perhaps it was as well for her to play the familiar work of Liszt, and certainly her performance of it was admirable, most admirable.

Miss Ausder Ohe grows steadily in her art. There are pianists who appear with the brilliancy of a meteor and share its sudden fate. They grow lazy; they are spoiled by flattery; or conceit devours them. Other pianists manage by perseverance and industry to maintain a respectable position. Miss Aus der Ohe commanded attention when she first appeared in public; and since that time she has grown steadily in musical stature.

There was a time when she was Amazonian in her performance. She exulted in her strength. She gloried in the contest between piano and orchestra. And she excelled in pieces demanding dash and brilliancy. In these pieces she was a pianist who was incidentally, by accident of birth, a woman.

Even now she is a Diana in the purity and the pride of her performance. But if she is not a sensuous player, she is virginal rather than cold. She is intrepid, not arrogant. She fears no difficulty presented by Liszt; but she does not wear the scalp of the composer at her girdle. Nor does she use her strength as though she wished to show her superiority in this respect over the poor brute, man.

I admit that this concerto by Liszt does not make violent claims upon the deep emotional character of a pianist. It does make serious demands, however, on technique, taste and understanding. To say that Miss Aus der Ohe turned it into something more than a brilliant show piece is in itself no slight praise. There was no thought last night of difficulty or labor or vainglorious display. She played with amazing fluency, which was controlled constantly by musical understanding. She played with the orchestra, and not against it. Although her individuality was strongly pronounced—for Miss Aus der Ohe reminds you of no one but Miss Aus der Ohe—it never stood between the composer and the audience. The ease, the spontaneity of her performance! The charm of certain pedal effects not too deliberately and patently contrived! And above all the true elegance, without ostentation, without nervousness, in performance and performer! Seldom have I heard concerto-playing in Music Hall that gave such unalloyed pleasure. Miss Aus der Ohe may well be proud of the enthusiasm that she aroused. It was not manufactured; it was not genteel and perfunctory. It was as spontaneous as her own performance.

⁂

The overture to "Don Giovanni" is almost spoiled by the absurd coda necessary to concert use. Written originally for an orchestra of 26 or 27 and for a small theatre, it is all out of proportion when played by the Symphony orchestra in Music Hall.

In the interesting "entr'acte" in the program-book Mr. Apthorp says, "The French version 'Don Juan' is given at the Académie de musique in Paris, not at the Opéra Comique." But this season it is given in Paris at each one of these opera-houses. Maurel is still singing the part of the rake-helly hero at the Opéra Comique.

Mr. Apthorp also says "In Munich 'Don Giovanni' has been given for some years now in a small opera-house, with small orchestra, and with none of the solo voices doubled by the chorus in the first finale." Is he sure that it has thus been given for "several years"? The famous attempt to give the opera with the orchestra of Mozart, and according to his score and in a small theatre, was May 29, 1896. The opera was then sung at the Residenz theatre and not at the Opera house.

⁂

The 4th Symphony of Beethoven gave much pleasure last night. Indeed, it gave such pleasure that it would be a pity to fritter it away, even in recollection, by idle dissertations on the imperishable adagio, which is even finer and nobler than Berlioz's famous rhapsodic burst evoked by it. Let it be enough to say that it was played with full appreciation of its countless beauties, mysterious hints, and elemental grandeur.

PHILIP HALE.

Dittersdorf and His Queer Program-Symphonies.

The name of Dittersdorf, the symphonist, appeared last week for the first time on a Boston Symphony program. And, indeed, this writer of many symphonies—Riemann names over 100—violin concertos, chamber music, piano-pieces, operas, cantatas, oratorios, etc., is now known chiefly as the author of the comic opera, "Doctor und Apotheker (1786)," which is still given in Germany (twice in 1894), and the E flat major string quartet, which was first played here by the Kneisels Jan. 4, 1892.

Karl Ditters, afterward known as Karl von Dittersdorf, born in Vienna, Nov. 2, 1739, died in 1799, at the Castle Rothlhctta, near Neuhaus, in extreme poverty. In his day he was reckoned an admirable composer as well as violinist. Perhaps his most remarkable work for orchestra was the series of 12 or 15 symphonies—the statements are conflicting concerning the exact number—upon subjects taken from Ovid's Metamorphoses. These are early examples of program music. One symphony, for example, was named "Actäon." The first movement portrayed the chase in the forest; the andante, Diana bathing; in the menuet Actaeon surprised her; the subject of the final is the vengeance of Diana and the devouring of the offender by her hounds. Another of his symphonies was entitled "The Four Ages of the World." Another was named "Ill Combatti mento delle umane Passioni." These Ovidian symphonies were published in 1785, and they made such a stir that a grave theologian named Hermes wrote a long-winded analysis of them.

And as a violinist Dittersdorf indulged in vagaries, although there is no doubt of his real ability; for in 1786 he gave an imitation of the croaking of frogs upon the violin, and we read that the "cultured audience" was "uncommonly well satisfied with this admirable player."

He was also the author of a book, his Autobiography, dictated to his son and published in Leipzig in 1801 by Breitkopf and Härtel. It is a book of 300 pages miserably printed on wretched paper. This original is now rare; but an English translation was published in London a few months ago. The Autobiography is a sad but extremely entertaining work, crammed with useful information about the musical life of the time and abounding in sane advice to students of the violin and composition. While it is true that the custom of having private orchestras gave great opportunities to composers in the service of Princes and led them to write without anxiety concerning an orchestra, public or publisher, the lot of these composers was precarious, for they were dependent on the caprices of their patrons. The motto of Dittersdorf's Autobiography might well be: "O, how wretched is that poor man that hangs on Princes' favors."

Here is Dittersdorf, one of the acknowledged masters of his time, a virtuoso and a composer of undisputed ability, closing the account of his life with a pitiful statement of his income and outgo, giving these last words to the reader: "Dear Reader, do not suspect me of having written the above lines for the purpose of pumping alms from you. It is more than probable that I shall not be alive when you are reading this little book. But if any one will help my poor family after the destruction of my cottage, which is already rotten, O then will God surely recompense him! I am honest enough to admit that I have made my family doubly unhappy. First, on account of my poverty; second, on account of my sickness. Yet there is some excuse for my poverty, as my pension for 26 years of service has always been too small to pay my debts, and the money I had laid aside in case of need, the most of which has gone into the physician's little bag, the apothecary's shop, and the health baths (and all without help) I have been obliged to part with. But my heedlessness in sparing my health is unpardonable, the more so because a kindly nature gave me a strong and solid body, upon which I, poor fool, have made wanton attacks."

Dittersdorf says little about his symphonies, and he gives few or no dates. He mentions six symphonies "which attracted attention in Prague and Vienna." He says he wrote three symphonies and an oboe concerto in four weeks, and received $30 for them. At a concert given by him in Berlin two of six symphonies which he had sent to the King of Prussia were performed, one at the beginning and one at the end of the concert.

These first mentioned "six symphonies" were written in 1759, the year that Haydn wrote his first symphony in three movements (string quartet, two oboes and two horns) for Count Morzin's orchestra.

They say that the symphony of Dittersdorf played last night first appeared in 1788. This is the year of Haydn's "Children's Symphony," and the so-called "Oxford" symphony, which was written originally for Paris.

...f the State.

...r of the City.

...ING, JAN. 18, 1897.

Symphony Concert—Miss Aus der Ohe's Success.

Mr. Paur turned back the pages of musical history when he began the concert of Saturday night with a symphony by Ditters of Dittersdorf, the contemporary of Haydn, the favorite of princes, the dissipated nobleman who was allowed to drop into poverty in his last days; yet the presentation of this symphony (in C major) was not without interest, for it showed a new phase of development springing from Haydn's initiative; while Mozart was going one path Dittersdorf was pursuing another, yet both started from Haydn—"the father of instrumental form."

It was odd to note in this work some points which Beethoven generally receives credit of establishing, as for example, the linking of the latter movements together and the transplanting of themes from preceding movements into the finale—decidedly Dittersdorf was a musical entity and did not merely reflect his models. When, however, one remembers that the year which saw the production of this symphony (1788) also found Mozart producing the G minor, the "Jupiter" and the "Clarinetts" symphonies, one can well understand why Dittersdorf was submerged.

As is the case with many of the earliest symphonies, the work is too primitive for our grand orchestra, it is magnified chamber music, not what we moderns classify as symphony. Perhaps its most striking points were some fugal work which might well be played by a string quartette, and some delicious oboe solos which appeared in the trio of the Minuet and unexpectedly bubbled up in the coda of that movement and in the closing measures of the finale. These oboe passages were beautifully played.

But if Mr. Paur desires to offer musical antiques to Boston audiences he can find something more directly interesting than Dittersdorf. In 1798, when the wandering oboeist of Haydn's London orchestra—Mr. Gottlieb Graupner—settled in Boston, he founded the first American orchestra, called "The Philharmonic."

It consisted of ten members and used to rehearse in Pond st., now Bedford st. Haydn was at first a trifle difficult for this orchestra wherefore they turned to Gyrowetz; the symphonies of this Bohemian composer were the first classical orchestral music played in Boston or in the United States.

It might be possible to unearth one of the scores from the Harvard Musical Association library and show a Boston audience what pabulum was dealt out to the forefathers.

Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe filled the place of Madame Eames, who was ill and could not appear; unlike the substitute for Rufus Choate at the banquet she did not "rattle round in it," but filled it gloriously and completely; the tremendous audience seemed not at all disappointed at the change of artists and listened to a magnificent performance of Liszt's E flat piano concerto, spellbound.

It is not a proper concerto, this rhapsodical piano composition with orchestral support, but it is a very effective concert piece for any poetic and technically powerful pianist nevertheless. What a superb development Liszt gives of that seven-noted figure that begins the work and is almost omnipresent thereafter! When some of his pupils asked the composer what the figure meant he wittily sang to its own notes—"None of you could understand!"—"Das versteh't ihr alle nicht." Bold enough the work is in its every measure, with its broad clarinet passages, its toneless triangle assuming a solo passage, its lofty march time, and if it be a trifle overspiced for conservative taste, there is not a dull moment in it.

Miss Aus Der Ohe gave it a free interpretation that suited it perfectly, and the orchestra was not only excellent in its own ensemble but seconded the caprice of the pianist finely. The technique of the pianist was astonishing and the brilliant end fairly scintillated with bravura touches. The enthusiasm which followed was something unusual; we counted six recalls and then gave up the task; no artist has had a greater ovation here in recent years.

The overture to "Don Giovani" followed and received a noble reading. The story of its rapid composition was well told in the programme book. It is one of the true stories of inspirational composition; generally it is as well to distrust stories attached to musical compositions, the tales about the "Moonlight" sonata and Schumann's "Warum" are utterly false, but the tales of the "Don Giovani" overture finished just before the performance of Handel writing "The Messiah" in 24 days, of Schubert composing "Hark, hark, the Lark" on the back of a bill of fare while waiting for his breakfast in the little inn "Zum Biersack," and of Mendelssohn's sending the first 20 measures of the "Hebrides" overture to his sister Fanny (in full orchestral score) in a letter saying that the music would show better than words how the island of Staffa impressed him, these are true tales of music and show how quickly a tone-picture may complete itself in the musical mind.

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony is not the greatest of the nine, yet it is no retrogression from that new path on which the composer started in 1804 with his "Heroic" symphony; it is bizarre with the true Beethoven grotesqueness and it is not difficult to understand the derision of Weber and the astonishment of even the friends of Beethoven at some of its bold touches.

The first movement was finely read and performed; especially the canon between clarinette and bassoon, and afterwards flute, was neatly done, although the bassoon could have been slightly louder to make a perfect balance.

The constant figure treatment in the Adagio reminds of what Beethoven did in this rhythmic direction in the seventh symphony, although it does not seem to the reviewer as great as the later work, spite of the enthusiasm of Berlioz. That Beethoven should have pushed the con- [illegible] repeating minuet form to still fur- [illegible] is always a puzzle, yet he [illegible] present symphony, in the [illegible] in his [illegible] E minor string [illegible] and in his [illegible] first movement [illegible]

[illegible] symphony, [illegible] with this advantageous change there is too much repetition in this form for the modern taste.

The performance of this did not seem as flawless as the rest of the concert, the beginning was somewhat unclear, and the violin figures that interrupt the woodwind so saucily in the Trio were somewhat heavy. We have heard the final cadence made more of also; at this point the horns should begin as if they were going to plunge again into the theme of the trio when suddenly the orchestra snaps off the whole affair with a brusque cadence, as if Beethoven in one of his grotesque moods had shouted—"Enough!"

The finale was very brilliantly performed. One ought to shower complimentary adjectives upon the contrabasses for the manner in which they gave the coda, in which the first figure of the movement, a true violin figure, is given to these ponderous instruments.

The symphony, like a wasp, bears its sting in its tail, for this final coda is the most difficult of contrabass passages and justly dreaded by players of the second rank. It was given clearly on this occasion, a thing almost impossible to do.

It was this passage that caused satirical Weber to picture the instruments of the orchestra holding an indignation meeting, in which the contrabass claims to suffer more wrongs at the hands of this "would-be composer" than all the other instruments put together. Beethoven writhed beneath the sarcasm, retorted that "Weber studied music so late that he never got beyond the art of pleasing," and wrote as difficult a passage for the contrabasses in his next symphony, in the trio of the scherzo of the fifth.

But when we think of Swinburne lacking appreciation of Tennyson, of Dr. Johnson belittling Gray's "Elegy," of Byron speaking of "Johnny Keats'" almanac poetry," we can solace ourselves with the thought that it is not only in music that practical workers in art prove themselves the poorest of critics.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 17, 1897.

Adele Aus Der Ohe Soloist at the Symphony Concert.

"Brian Boru," "The Gondoliers," Last Week of "Half a King."

German Opera Season at the Boston—Piano and Vocal Recitals.

It was expected that Mme Eames would be the soloist at the Symphony concerts this week, but she was suddenly taken ill, and Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, pianist, was secured to fill her place at short notice.

It was Miss Aus der Ohe's first appearance in this city since her return from Europe, and although she has always been a favorite in this city, she took the audience by storm at these concerts by her magnificent playing of Liszt's E flat concerto, a work that makes great demands on the performer, but a favorite of Miss Aus der Ohe's.

She has improved a great deal since her last appearance in Boston. She always combined masculine strength and feminine delicacy of touch, but her wonderful talents have broadened and matured in a wonderful manner. She not only has perfect digital dexterity, but she plays with great expressiveness and with a power and force seldom equalled by a woman. She is undoubtedly one of the most satisfying pianists of the day to all classes of music lovers, and is well entitled to rank among the leading artists of the day. Her technique leaves little to be desired, and there is always a certain self-poise or self-control that shows power in reserve. It was fully 10 minutes after she left the platform before the applause ceased, and she returned a half dozen times to bow her thanks to the audience.

The concert opened with Karl von Dittersdarf's symphony in C major, as arranged by Herrmann Kretzschmar, and played for the first time in Boston. It is far from being a great work. Light and pleasing are the adjectives that best describe it.

After the concerto the orchestra played Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni," and the concert closed with Beethoven's symphony, No. 4, in B flat major.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The program for the rehearsal and concert Jan 29 and 30 will be arranged in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of Schubert's birth. The selections will be confined to works by that composer, and will consist of the unfinished symphony, the symphony in B major, and a group of songs, with piano, to be sung by Mrs Max Heinrich.

MONDAY, JA...

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twelfth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Dittersdorf: Symphony in C major (arranged by Hermann Kretzschmar).
(First time in Boston.)
Liszt: Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in E-flat major.
Mozart: Overture to "Don Giovanni."
Beethoven: Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, opus 60.
Miss Adele aus der Ohe was the pianist.

1848 was a year of revolutions, which is perhaps no bad recommendation of it to us sons of tea-spillers. Yet there is one date in this otherwise gladsome year which Bostonians must henceforth regard with feelings not of the pleasant sort. This ill-omened date is Jan. 19, and we are hard upon its forty-eighth anniversary! On Jan. 19, 1848, was born, at Olbernhau, in Saxony, a male infant, soon afterwards christened August Ferdinand Hermann; his surname was Kretzschmar. This fell individual was given a musical education, and became in time organist, teacher and writer on music; his principal habitat was Leipzig, where he still lives. Boston would probably never have heard of him, surely never have suffered from him, had he not, some years ago, gone into the musical body-snatching business for the benefit of the anatomists of the academic concerts in Leipzig. He moused round in musico-literary graveyards—sometimes yclept libraries—and performed the resurrectionist act on various corpses of compositions which, to his not over-delicate senses, seemed not to have reached a too advanced state of decomposition for purposes of dissection. Not content with these nefarious acts, he had the ill-judged audacity to found an exportation house for musical corpses. Two parcels of his unhallowed stock in trade have reached this city and been publicly exposed here. Boston shudders! A few weeks ago the first parcel, entitled "Suit from the Ballet Music in Gluck's 'Don Juan,'" was opened in the Music Hall; last Saturday the second parcel, called "Symphony in C major, by Karl Ditters von Dittersdorf," was sampled at the same place. Boston has stopped shuddering and only bewails her sad lot!

Ah, but come now; a joke is a joke, and enough is as good as a feast, even for ghouls! This compounding of musical felony had best stop right here. Let Mr. Kretzschmar work on for his own particular clientèle, if he sees fit; but let this ridiculous little symphony of Dittersdorf's be the last importation to this city!

Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni" was capitally played; the more one hears of it the greater a work does it seem. Only, now that the old prejudice in favor of unity of key is pretty well gotten over, would it not be better to play this wonderful overture as it stands in the original score, and not with the miserable little "concert coda," written by nobody-cares-whom? Surely a modern audience could stand a well-ordered and symmetrical composition beginning in D minor and ending with a half-cadence in F major!

Beethoven's B-flat symphony was exceedingly well read by Mr. Paur; his tempi struck us as admirable, and what slight modifications he made in them now and then carried conviction with them. We do not quite like that forte-diminuendo of the second violins in the first measure of the Adagio; the even piano marked in the score seems to us better. This accompanying figure needs no such attention-arresting announcement; its thematic importance should dawn upon the listener little by little, as the movement unfolds itself. Emphasizing it too strongly in the beginning anticipates some of the effects Beethoven makes with it later. The orchestra did well in the symphony, though it seemed to us that we had heard it play the work with somewhat finer finish of style and a more delicate grace of phrasing before.

Mme. Eames was announced for this concert, but a sudden indisposition prevented her coming on from New York, and Miss aus der Ohe was induced to exchange dates with her at short notice. Besides our being heartily sorry to hear of Mme. Eames's illness, we could not but feel an added pang of regret at one result of this sudden change. Miss aus der Ohe was to have appeared at the symphony concerts here considerably later in the season, and intended to play the new pianoforte concerto by Eugen D'Albert. But she was not ready to play it at such short notice, so chose Liszt's in E-flat instead. We have thus lost the D'Albert concerto, for this season at least. Miss aus der Ohe was very warmly greeted by the audience, and played, as it seemed to us, as she had never played here before. And, in saying this, we do not forget some grand performances of hers in years gone by. No doubt some few exceptions could well be taken to her reading of some portions of the work, notably parts of the first movement and the Quasi Adagio in B major. It seemed to us that she greatly over-elaborated some effects, while leaving others hardly hinted at. This concerto of Liszt's is in many places a very sophisticated business indeed; but Miss aus der Ohe's exaggeration of effects was rather of the ingénue than of the sophisticated sort. And just where the wily, long-headed Liszt makes some of his most carefully calculated effects of modulation, the pianist failed to throw them into due relief. At times, also, she showed one of the besetting faults of her sex; a too great unconsciousness of the orchestra; she did not always distinguish sufficiently between passages where the pianoforte has the important word to say and others where it merely accompanies a solo instrument in the orchestra. But here our exceptions stop; and the reader will see that they affect only matters of detail. To our mind, these few faults were merely as so many sun-spots; they were far more than counterbalanced by the general splendor of Miss aus der Ohe's performance. Indeed—with and in spite of these few shortcomings—it was one of the most grandly magnificent performances of a pianoforte concerto that we have ever heard in the Music Hall. Miss aus der Ohe has that in her which can cover up a multitude of sins; a real streak of genius! It is more than what is nowadays called "temperament," intensity of feeling and a corresponding [illegible] will call unmusical—excesses; [illegible] Miss aus der Ohe's excesses, if a thought artistically indiscreet, are never unmusical. She may over-phrase a passage; but she does not phrase it unmusically nor ungracefully. When temperament—as in her case—runs instinctively in parallel lines with the normal conditions of the artistic medium it works in, they call it genius. The nobly impassioned swing of Miss aus der Ohe's playing of this concerto, her vigor of accent, the contagious magnetism of her touch and phrasing, carried all before them. It was playing on the largest scale; what one seldom hears; really great playing. The audience plainly thought so, too; for seldom has an artist been more rapturously applauded here.

There will be no rehearsal or concert this week. The next rehearsal and concert fall on Jan. 29 and 30 respectively. As Jan. 31 (Sunday) is the anniversary of Franz Schubert's birthday, the programme will be mede up wholly of compositions by him. It is: Unfinished symphony in B minor; songs with pianoforte; symphony No. 9, in C major. Mr. Max Heinrich will be the singer.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 20, 1897.

The program of the twelfth Symphony concert (January 16) was as follows :

Symphony in C major	Dittersdorf
Concerto for piano, No. 1, E flat major	Liszt
Overture, Don Giovanni	Mozart
Symphony No. 4, B flat major	Beethoven

I proposed last week to preach a short sermon, taking the programs of this season for a text. As there will be no Symphony concert next Saturday I defer the sermon for a week.

The symphony by Dittersdorf was played for the first time in this city. It was arranged by Hermann Kretzschmar for the Academic orchestral concerts in Leipsic. "The additions by the editor consist of expression marks, and in the Larghetto of filling out to replace the cembalo part." Kretzschmar says this symphony appeared about 1788 as one of a collection of six. I think this must have been the set that Dittersdorf sent to the King of Prussia before he went to Berlin ; but he wrote about 100 symphonies, and it is not easy to identify them. It would have perhaps been more pleasurable to hear one of his program symphonies founded on subjects from Ovid's Metamorphoses. Actæon, for instance,: the Chase (allegro), Diana in the bath (slow movement), Actæon Surprises Her (menuet) : finale, Vengeance of Diana, and the Hounds Tearing Actæon in pieces. Or the symphony Ill Combatti mento delle umane Passioni.

The symphony in C opens with its first theme in full orchestra (strings, oboes, bassoons, horns, trumpets, kettledrums). This theme is repeated and repeated with "damnable iteration." There is little true development; there is little working out in the middle part, and there is no coda. The Larghetto is merely a series of figural variations on a simple theme, and it is enchained with the menuet; the finale closes with a return to the menuet and trio as a closing coda. This work is surprisingly free from any influence of Haydn. Dittersdorf speaks with his own voice, in frank, honest, manly fashion. And here I stop in praise, for to me the interest of the symphony is chiefly historical. The Dittersdorf of Doktor und Apotheker and Lebensbeschreibung is a finer fellow. With him would I gladly drain a stoop of old Falernian. (I wonder if old Falernian was really what it was cracked up to be?)

Mrs. Emma Eames telegraphed Wednesday night that sickness would prevent her appearance at the concert. Miss Aus der Ohe was engaged as soon as possible. She wished to play a concerto by d'Albert—the second, I understand—but Mr. Paur thought it late for a special rehearsal, and we heard the familiar concerto by Liszt. She played it gloriously; indeed I have never heard it better played by pianist or orchestra. It is true she is not a sensuous player; but she is virginal rather than cold. Then this concerto does not call for any display of sensuousness. It makes demands on technic, taste, intelligence. For once it was something more than a brilliant show piece. She played with amazing fluency, controlled constantly by musical understanding. Her strength was never arrogantly asserted, as though to humiliate the poor wretch, man. It seems to me that she has gained in tone color, in cunning use of the pedals. The chief characteristic of a remarkable performance, one that provoked the most genuine and prolonged enthusiasm of this season, was supreme elegance. And do not forget that she played with the orchestra, not against it.

Why does Mr. Paur persist in the Don Giovanni overture, with its revised and foolish coda, as a concert piece? With the modern orchestra and in such a large hall it loses its vitality and its brilliancy.

The symphony by Beethoven was nobly performed, with full appreciation of its countless beauties, mysterious hints and elemental grandeur.

* * *

The program of the Symphony concert, January 30, will be devoted to the memory of Schubert. The Unfinished Symphony and the C major symphony will be performed, and Mr. Max Heinrich will sing songs with piano accompaniment.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 18, 1897.

The Symphony Concert—Miss Aus der Ohe's Success.

Mr. Paur turned back the pages of musical history when he began the concert of Saturday night with a symphony by Ditters of Dittersdorf, the contemporary of Haydn, the favorite of princes, the dissipated nobleman who was allowed to drop into poverty in his last days; yet the presentation of this symphony (in C major) was not without interest, for it showed a new phase of development springing from Haydn's initiative; while Mozart was going one path Dittersdorf was pursuing another, yet both started from Haydn—"the father of instrumental form."

It was odd to note in this work some points which Beethoven generally receives credit of establishing, as for example, the linking of the latter movements together and the transplanting of themes from preceding movements into the finale—decidedly Dittersdorf was a musical entity and did not merely reflect his models. When, however, one remembers that the year which saw the production of this symphony (1788) also found Mozart producing the G minor, the "Jupiter" and the "Clarinette" symphonies, one can well understand why Dittersdorf was submerged.

As is the case with many of the earliest symphonies, the work is too primitive for our grand orchestra, it is magnified chamber music, not what we moderns classify as symphony. Perhaps its most striking points were some fugal work which might well be played by a string quartette, and some delicious oboe solos which appeared in the trio of the Minuet and unexpectedly bubbled up in the coda of that movement and in the closing measures of the finale. These oboe passages were beautifully played.

But if Mr. Paur desires to offer musical antiques to Boston audiences he can find something more directly interesting than Dittersdorf. In 1798, when the wandering oboeist of Haydn's London orchestra—Mr. Gottlieb Graupner—settled in Boston, he founded the first American orchestra, called "The Philharmonic."

It consisted of ten members and used to rehearse in Pond st., now Bedford st. Haydn was at first a trifle difficult for this orchestra wherefore they turned to Gyrowetz; the symphonies of this Bohemian composer were the first classical orchestral music played in Boston or in the United States.

It might be possible to unearth one of the scores from the Harvard Musical Association library and show a Boston audience what pabulum was dealt out to the forefathers.

Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe filled the place of Madame Eames, who was ill and could not appear; unlike the substitute for Rufus Choate at the banquet she did not "rattle round in it," but filled it gloriously and completely; the tremendous audience seemed not at all disappointed at the change of artists and listened to a magnificent performance of Liszt's E flat piano concerto, spellbound.

It is not a proper concerto, this rhapsodical piano composition with orchestral support, but it is a very effective concert piece for any poetic and technically powerful pianist nevertheless. What a superb development Liszt gives of that seven-noted figure that begins the work and is almost omnipresent thereafter! When some of his pupils asked the composer what the figure meant he wittily sang to its own notes—"None of you could understand!"—"Das versteh't ihr alle nicht." Bold enough the work is in its every measure, with its broad clarinet passages, its toneless triangle assuming a solo passage, its lofty march time, and if it be a trifle overspiced for conservative taste, there is not a dull moment in it.

Miss Aus Der Ohe gave it a free interpretation that suited it perfectly, and the orchestra was not only excellent in its own ensemble but seconded the caprice of the pianist finely. The technique of the pianist was astonishing and the brilliant end fairly scintillated with bravura touches. The enthusiasm which followed was something unusual; we counted six recalls and then gave up the task; no artist has had a greater ovation here in recent years.

The overture to "Don Giovani followed and received a noble reading. The story of its rapid composition was well told in the programme book. It is one of the true stories of inspirational composition; generally it is as well to distrust stories attached to musical compositions, the tales about the "Moonlight" sonata and Schumann's "Warum" are utterly false, but the tales of the "Don Giovani" overture finished just before the performance of Handel writing "The Messiah" in 24 days, of Schubert composing "Hark, hark, the Lark" on the back of a bill of fare while waiting for his breakfast in the little inn "Zum Biersack," and of Mendelssohn's sending the first 20 measures of the "Hebrides" overture to his sister Fanny (in full orchestral score) in a letter saying that the music would show better than words how the island of Staffa impressed him, these are true tales of music and show how quickly a tone-picture may complete itself in the musical mind.

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony is not the greatest of the nine, yet it is no retrogression from that new path on which the composer started in 1804 with his "Heroic" symphony; it is bizarre with the true Beethoven grotesqueness and it is not difficult to understand the derision of Weber and the astonishment of even the friends of Beethoven at some of its bold touches.

The first movement was finely read and performed; especially the canon between clarinette and bassoon, and afterwards flute, was neatly done, although the bassoon could have been slightly louder to make a perfect balance.

The constant figure treatment in the Adagio reminds of what Beethoven did in this rhythmic direction in the seventh symphony, although it does not seem to the reviewer as great as the later work, spite of the enthusiasm of Berlioz. That Beethoven should have pushed the constantly repeating minuet form to still further repeats is always a puzzle, yet he did this in his present symphony, in the seventh also, and in his E minor string quartette, presenting the Following this lead Schumann saw the possibilities of the extended form and gave two different trios in his B flat symphony, but even with this advantageous change there is too much repetition in this form for the modern taste.

The performance of this did not seem as flawless as the rest of the concert, the beginning was somewhat unclear, and the violin figures that interrupt the woodwind so saucily in the Trio were somewhat heavy. We have heard the final cadence made more of also; at this point the horns should begin as if they were going to plunge again into the theme of the trio when suddenly the orchestra snaps off the whole affair with a brusque cadence, as if Beethoven in one of his grotesque moods had shouted—"Enough!"

The finale was very brilliantly performed. One ought to shower complimentary adjectives upon the contrabasses for the manner in which they gave the coda, in which the first figure of the movement, a true violin figure, is given to these ponderous instruments.

The symphony, like a wasp, bears its sting in its tail, for this final coda is the most difficult of contrabass passages and justly dreaded by players of the second rank. It was given clearly on this occasion, a thing almost impossible to do.

It was this passage that caused satirical Weber to picture the instruments of the orchestra holding an indignation meeting, in which the contrabass claims to suffer more wrongs at the hands of this "would-be composer" than all the other instruments put together. Beethoven writhed beneath the sarcasm, retorted that "Weber studied music so late that he never got beyond the art of pleasing," and wrote as difficult a passage for the contrabasses in his next symphony, in the trio of the scherzo of the fifth.

But when we think of Swinburne lacking appreciation of Tennyson, of Dr. Johnson belittling Gray's "Elegy," of Byron speaking of "Johnny Keats' almanac poetry," we can solace ourselves with the thought that it is not only in music that practical workers in art prove themselves the poorest of critics.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, JAN. 17, 1897.

Adele Aus Der Ohe Soloist at the Symphony Concert.

"Brian Boru," "The Gondoliers," Last Week of "Half a King."

German Opera Season at the Boston—Piano and Vocal Recitals.

It was expected that Mme Eames would be the soloist at the Symphony concerts this week, but she was suddenly taken ill, and Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, pianist, was secured to fill her place at short notice.

It was Miss Aus der Ohe's first appearance in this city since her return from Europe, and although she has always been a favorite in this city, she took the audience by storm at these concerts by her magnificent playing of Liszt's E flat concerto, a work that makes great demands on the performer, but a favorite of Miss Aus der Ohe's.

She has improved a great deal since her last appearance in Boston. She always combined masculine strength and feminine delicacy of touch, but her wonderful talents have broadened and matured in a wonderful manner. She not only has perfect digital dexterity, but she plays with great expressiveness and with a power and force seldom equalled by a woman. She is undoubtedly one of the most satisfying pianists of the day to all classes of music lovers, and is well entitled to rank among the leading artists of the day. Her technique leaves little to be desired, and there is always a certain self-poise or self-control that shows power in reserve. It was fully 10 minutes after she left the platform before the applause ceased, and she returned a half dozen times to bow her thanks to the audience.

The concert opened with Karl von Dittersdarf's symphony in C major, as arranged by Herrmann Kretzschmar, and played for the first time in Boston. It is far from being a great work. Light and pleasing are the adjectives that best describe it.

After the concerto the orchestra played Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni," and the concert closed with Beethoven's symphony, No. 4, in B-flat major.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The program for the rehearsal and concert Jan 29 and 30 will be arranged in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of Schubert's birth. The selections will be confined to works by that composer, and will consist of the unfinished symphony, the symphony in B major, and a group of songs, with piano, to be sung by Mrs Max Heinrich.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, JANUARY 18, 1897.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twelfth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Dittersdorf: Symphony in C major (arranged by Hermann Kretzschmar).
(First time in Boston.)
Liszt: Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in E-flat major.
Mozart: Overture to "Don Giovanni."
Beethoven: Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, opus 60.
Miss Adele aus der Ohe was the pianist.

1848 was a year of revolutions, which is perhaps no bad recommendation of it to us sons of tea-spillers. Yet there is one date in this otherwise gladsome year which Bostonians must henceforth regard with feelings not of the pleasant sort. This ill-omened date is Jan: 19, and we are hard upon its forty-eighth anniversary! On Jan. 19, 1848, was born, at Olbernhau, in Saxony, a male infant, soon afterwards christened August Ferdinand Hermann; his surname was Kretzschmar. This fell individual was given a musical education, and became in time organist, teacher and writer on music; his principal habitat was Leipzig, where he still lives. Boston would probably never have heard of him, surely never have suffered from him, had he not, some years ago, gone into the musical body-snatching business for the benefit of the anatomists of the academic concerts in Leipzig. He moused round in musico-literary graveyards—sometimes yclept libraries—and performed the resurrectionist act on various corpses of compositions which, to his not over-delicate senses, seemed not to have reached a too advanced state of decomposition for purposes of dissection. Not content with these nefarious acts, he had the ill-judged audacity to found an exportation house for musical corpses. Two parcels of his unhallowed stock in trade have reached this city and been publicly exposed here. Boston shudders! A few weeks ago the first parcel, entitled "Suit from the Ballet Music in Gluck's 'Don Juan,'" was opened in the Music Hall; last Saturday the second parcel, called "Symphony in C major, by Karl Ditters von Dittersdorf," was sampled at the same place. Boston has stopped shuddering and only bewails her sad lot!

Ah, but come now; a joke is a joke, and enough is as good as a feast, even for ghouls! This compounding of musical felony had best stop right here. Let Mr. Kretzschmar work on for his own particular clientèle, if he sees fit; but let this ridiculous little symphony of Dittersdorf's be the last importation to this city!

Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni" was capitally played; the more one hears of it the greater a work does it seem. Only, now that the old prejudice in favor of unity of key is pretty well gotten over, would it not be better to play this wonderful overture as it stands in the original score, and not with the miserable little "concert coda," written by nobody-cares-whom? Surely a modern audience could stand a well-ordered and symmetrical composition beginning in D minor and ending with a half-cadence in F major!

Beethoven's B-flat symphony was exceedingly well read by Mr. Paur; his tempi struck us as admirable, and what slight modifications he made in them now and then carried conviction with them. We do not quite like that forte-diminuendo of the second violins in the first measure of the Adagio; the even piano marked in the score seems to us better. This accompanying figure needs no such attention-arresting announcement; its thematic importance should dawn upon the listener little by little, as the movement unfolds itself. Emphasizing it too strongly in the beginning anticipates some of the effects Beethoven makes with it later. The orchestra did well in the symphony, though it seemed to us that we had heard it play the work with somewhat finer finish of style and a more delicate grace of phrasing before.

Mme. Eames was announced for this concert, but a sudden indisposition prevented her coming on from New York, and Miss aus der Ohe was induced to exchange dates with her at short notice. Besides our being heartily sorry to hear of Mme. Eames's illness, we could not but feel an added pang of regret at one result of this sudden change. Miss aus der Ohe was to have appeared at the symphony concerts here considerably later in the season, and intended to play the new pianoforte concerto by Eugen D'Albert. But she was not ready to play it at such short notice, so chose Liszt's in E-flat instead. We have thus lost the D'Albert concerto, for this season at least. Miss aus der Ohe was very warmly greeted by the audience, and played, as it seemed to us, as she had never played here before. And, in saying this, we do not forget some grand performances of hers in years gone by. No doubt some few exceptions could well be taken to her reading of some portions of the work, notably parts of the first movement and the Quasi Adagio in B major. It seemed to us that she greatly over-elaborated some effects, while leaving others hardly hinted at. This concerto of Liszt's is in many places a very sophisticated business indeed; but Miss aus der Ohe's exaggeration of effects was rather of the ingénue than of the sophisticated sort. And just where the wily, long-headed Liszt makes some of his most carefully calculated effects of modulation, the pianist failed to throw them into due relief. At times, also, she showed one of the besetting faults of her sex; a too great unconsciousness of the orchestra; she did not always distinguish sufficiently between passages where the pianoforte has the important word to say and others where it merely accompanies a solo instrument in the orchestra. But here our exceptions stop; and the reader will see that they affect only matters of detail. To our mind, these few faults were merely as so many sun-spots; they were far more than counterbalanced by the general splendor of Miss aus der Ohe's performance. Indeed—with and in spite of these few shortcomings—it was one of the most grandly magnificent performances of a pianoforte concerto that we have ever heard in the Music Hall. Miss aus der Ohe has that in her which can cover up a multitude of sins; a real streak of genius! It is more than what is nowadays called "temperament," intensity of feeling and a corresponding [illegible] Mere temperament in a player is no guard against unmusical—what the French well call anti-musical—excesses; and Miss aus der Ohe's excesses, if a thought artistically indiscreet, are never unmusical. She may over-phrase a passage; but she does not phrase it unmusically nor ungracefully. When temperament—as in her case—runs instinctively in parallel lines with the normal conditions of the artistic medium it works in, they call it genius. The nobly impassioned swing of Miss aus der Ohe's playing of this concerto, her vigor of accent, the contagious magnetism of her touch and phrasing, carried all before them. It was playing on the largest scale; what one seldom hears; really great playing. The audience plainly thought so, too; for seldom has an artist been more rapturously applauded here.

There will be no rehearsal or concert this week. The next rehearsal and concert fall on Jan. 29 and 30 respectively. As Jan. 31 (Sunday) is the anniversary of Franz Schubert's birthday, the programme will be mede up wholly of compositions by him. It is: Unfinished symphony in B minor; songs with pianoforte; symphony No. 9, in C major. Mr. Max Heinrich will be the singer.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 20, 1897.

The program of the twelfth Symphony concert (January 16) was as follows :

Symphony in C major	Dittersdorf
Concerto for piano, No. 1, E flat major	Liszt
Overture, Don Giovanni	Mozart
Symphony No. 4, B flat major	Beethoven

I proposed last week to preach a short sermon, taking the programs of this season for a text. As there will be no Symphony concert next Saturday I defer the sermon for a week.

The symphony by Dittersdorf was played for the first time in this city. It was arranged by Hermann Kretzschmar for the Academic orchestral concerts in Leipsic. "The additions by the editor consist of expression marks, and in the Larghetto of filling out to replace the cembalo part." Kretzschmar says this symphony appeared about 1788 asone of a collection of six. I think this must have been the set that Dittersdorf sent to the King of Prussia before he went to Berlin ; but he wrote about 100 symphonies, and it is not easy to identify them. It would have perhaps been more pleasurable to hear one of his program symphonies founded on subjects from Ovid's Metamorphoses. Actæon, for instance,: the Chase (allegro), Diana in the bath (slow movement), Actæon Surprises Her (menuet): finale, Vengeance of Diana, and the Hounds Tearing Actæon in pieces. Or the symphony Ill Combatti mento delle umane Passioni.

The symphony in C opens with its first theme in full orchestra (strings, oboes, bassoons, horns, trumpets, kettle-drums). This theme is repeated and repeated with "damnable iteration." There is little true development; there is little working out in the middle part, and there is no coda. The Larghetto is merely a series of figural variations on a simple theme, and it is enchained with the menuet; the finale closes with a return to the menuet and trio as a closing coda. This work is surprisingly free from any influence of Haydn. Dittersdorf speaks with his own voice, in frank, honest, manly fashion. And here I stop in praise, for to me the interest of the symphony is chiefly historical. The Dittersdorf of Doktor und Apotheker and Lebensbeschreibung is a finer fellow. With him would I gladly drain a stoop of old Falernian. (I wonder if old Falernian was really what it was cracked up to be?)

Mrs. Emma Eames telegraphed Wednesday night that sickness would prevent her appearance at the concert. Miss Aus der Ohe was engaged as soon as possible. She wished to play a concerto by d'Albert—the second, I understand—but Mr. Paur thought it late for a special rehearsal, and we heard the familiar concerto by Liszt. She played it gloriously; indeed I have never heard it better played by pianist or orchestra. It is true she is not a sensuous player; but she is virginal rather than cold. Then this concerto does not call for any display of sensuousness. It makes demands on technic, taste, intelligence. For once it was something more than a brilliant show piece. She played with amazing fluency, controlled constantly by musical understanding. Her strength was never arrogantly asserted, as though to humiliate the poor wretch, man. It seems to me that she has gained in tone color, in cunning use of the pedals. The chief characteristic of a remarkable performance, one that provoked the most genuine and prolonged enthusiasm of this season, was supreme elegance. And do not forget that she played with the orchestra, not against it.

Why does Mr. Paur persist in the Don Giovanni overture, with its revised and foolish coda, as a concert piece? With the modern orchestra and in such a large hall it loses its vitality and its brilliancy.

The symphony by Beethoven was nobly performed, with full appreciation of its countless beauties, mysterious hints and elemental grandeur.

* * *

The program of the Symphony concert, January 30, will be devoted to the memory of Schubert. The Unfinished Symphony and the C major symphony will be performed, and Mr. Max Heinrich will sing songs with piano accompaniment.

Philip Hale.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 17.

Symphony Concert.

The programme of the 12th Symphony concert is.

Symphony, C major........Karl von Dittersdorf
Concerto for Pianoforte, E flat major.....Liszt
Overture, "Don Giovanni"................Mozart
Symphony No. 4, B flat major........Beethoven
Soloist, Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe.

At this concert the Dittersdorf symphony was played for the first time in Boston, and it was made presentable by Herman Kretzschmar. It has no great distinguishing merits. It is a well manufactured work, but wanting in the vitalizing spark of genius. One listens to the work with the interest due to respectable antiquity of all kinds, and while listening one can conjure up a pretty picture of the past, with its fashions, that now suggest quaintness, and with its manners, that still retain their dignity. Contrasting the symphony with modern works, one notes the clearness of its outlines, the symmetry of its form. It was not written to confuse the intellect of polite society; the expected always happens, there is no mistaking or forgetting the ideas; they occur and reoccur with fine regularity, and when they reappear they are in their original integrity with no modification to conceal their identity. It is not difficult to understand why the rising sun of genius casts respectable works like this into the shadow of oblivion. They gather dust, not because they are old, but because they say nothing that has not been better said by the masters. They give no evidence of life because they were born dead.

Owing to the sickness of Mme. Eames, Miss Aus der Ohe kindly consented to take her place at short notice, and she gave a brilliant interpretation of the Liszt concerto, which suggests brilliant ornamentation on an empty building. Miss Aus der Ohe's work was of the best quality, and it won the enthusiastic approval of the critical audience.

A word of feeble protest might be here urged against the "Gleanings from the Court Library in Utopia" that appear in the official programme. The idea is excellent, but one wonders why this court library is filled with only the work of idiots. Surely among the authors Mr. Apthorp could find some author who had other claims to distinction than this of having passed their entire adult lives in insane asylums. In Utopia there must be somebody who possesses an idea; but Mr. Apthorp's researches have unearthed nothing but melancholy drivel and schoolboy platitudes. Mr. Farquhar Tupper was a rare genius compared to the authors discovered by Mr. Apthorp. The maunderings of these Utopian authors are redolent of beer and of the half-sleep allied to intoxication. They write with semi-palsied hands and muddled brains, and it seems cruel to inflict their leaden platitudes on an intelligent and innocent audience. Great praise is due to Mr. Apthorp for his intentions, but he should be told that instead of pouring out sparkling wine, that stimulates and invigorates, he is serving the deadly henbane, mandragora and opium that first induces heavy sleep and then slays.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 17, 1897.

The illness of Mme. Emma Eames necessitated a change in the twelfth symphony programme. The orchestral numbers remained as announced, but for the two songs—neither of which, be it said by the way, gave any particular promise of freshness or of special preparation—was substituted Liszt's E flat pianoforte concerto, in which Miss Adele aus der Ohe made her re-entrance after several seasons of absence. She has always given a more comfortable sense of abstract power than any other woman pianist of the time, and now, upon her return, that power appears to have ripened and grown and become concentrated, until her playing may justly be called masterful. For she effortlessly commands all the fulness of the instrument to sustain her, and so gives such passages as would seem to be written on purpose to tax and display a man's strength, with breadth and control enough for a man, yet without making any unwomanly struggle to conquer. In this respect of equalized and governed power she has gained greatly, as she has also gained in tranquillity and economy of execution. Her technique was always eminent for its clearness, which let no note fall into obscurity because it was comparatively unimportant, and she has lost nothing of brilliancy, velocity and dash in naturing her graver qualities. No author can be more favorable for her than Liszt, and she delivered the concerto splendidly in all its moods and forms, from its most vehement assertions to its daintiest fantasies.

The concert began with an extract from the music of a hundred years ago in the shape of a short sympathy by Dittersdorf. It might have sounded thin, for it has no flutes, clarinets or trombones to reinforce its strings; but it is so spirited, so genial, so simple-minded and so wholesome, that one cannot find fault with it because it is not more dense and substantial in scoring. It is very short and its movements are so closely interlocked that they might almost pass for one movement of variable temperament. It was gaily and smartly played.

Mozart's "Don Giovanni" overture and Bethoven's fourth symphony in commendable readings, completed the programme.

There will be no concert this week, and next week the Schubert commemoration programme will be presented.

MAIL AND EXPRESS
Broadway and Fulton St., New York.
DAY EVENING, JANUARY 22, 1897.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

The third Boston Symphony concert of the present season took place last night at the Metropolitan Opera House before an exceptionally large and appreciative audience. The soloist was M. Pol Plancon, who replaced Mme. Melba on account of the latter's illness. The programme was rather a departure from the usual order of things, and the selection of Smetana's overture, "Wallenstein's Camp," as an opening number, could be accounted for only by the good old New England practice of having pie for breakfast. In the original scheme, Mme. Melba was to have followed it with an aria from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," which would have lent countenance to the Beethoven overture to "Fidelio," the next to the last number on the programme. As it was, M. Plancon substituted for the Mozart number the beautiful aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos," and so Beethoven was left alone to represent the thought and genius of a time long past. After the Verdi excerpt came Humperdinck's preludes to Acts III. and II. of "Konig's Kinder," succeeded by Schumann's setting of "The Two Grenadiers," with which M. Plancon had replaced the "Sevillana," from Massenet's "Don Cesar de Bazan." Then came the "Fidelio" overture and the fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky. The programme was thus thrown a little out of true by the omission of the Mozart piece, and if it had been possible to omit the Beethoven work as well, artistic consistency would have been better preserved.

The Smetana overture is a comparative novelty in New York, although it was brought out in Europe not long after the composer's death in 1884. Although based on the various noises and tumults in the camp of an army, it rises far above mere descriptive power and invades successfully the realms of imagination and suggestiveness. It is full of a puissant spirit of romance, which surrounds the unsavory realties of such a place as the rendezvous of Wallenstein's horde of adventurers with inpenetrable glamour and thereby makes the subject one that fits easily into a musical setting. The bugle calls on the horns are made part of an elaborate scheme and the distant tread of armed men furnishes a rhythm that the composer turns to good account. The fanciful suggestion of night is one of the happiest touches in the overture and emphasizes the poetic quality of Smetana's nature. The work is full of daring progressions, and yet one feels that they have their place in it. Mr. Paur and his men played it admirably.

The two Humperdinck preludes had not been heard here until last evening. They are as Wagnerian as "Hansel und Gretel," and, like that work, revealed the German musician's power of building a large structure from a very few materials. There is originality in the development of the little themes and much technical skill. If Herr Humperdinck were any less versed in the capacity of a modern orchestra than he is, there would be less to admire in what he has given to the world. Last night the orchestra was enriched by a child's rattle, a sort of small edition of the watchman's rattle with which Herr Richard Strauss added insult to injury in his famous "musical joke," "Till Eulenspiegel." But there is a seriousness of purpose in what Humperdinck atempts that entitles him to consideration, and one can find genuine artistic pleasure in listening to his two preludes.

The Tschaikowsky D minor symphony is a composition that fairly overflows with Slavic impetuosity. There is life and energy and even ecstasy in some of the wonderful little themes which the great Russian has set down. Although there are novel features in the matter of the structure of some of the movements, notably the third (in which, also, the strings are played pizzicato from beginning to end), one feels that the composer wrote them in the way he has because the matter he wished to express would have become distorted if forced into stereotyped forms. There is human interest in the symphony throughout its length. It reveals Tschaikowsky in happier mood than when he wrote the "Pathetique" symphony, but the undercurrent of melancholy that colors the Slavic mind is present and is often made manifest. Mr. Paur brought out in good measure the meaning of the music.

M. Plancon sang with peculiar mellowness of tone and expressiveness. He has often sung the "Don Carlos" aria here, but rarely has he made it more appealing, more human, more poignant. "The Two Grenadiers" has come to be particularly associated with him, especially in the Metropolitan Opera House, but the accompaniment is tricky and unless the conductor is very familiar with M. Plancon's method of singing the song, there is apt to be a misunderstanding between voice and orchestra, as there was last night, a mishap doubtless due to unavoidable lack of time for rehearsal.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle
SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 23,

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Emil Paur and His Musicians in Splendid Trim—Plancon's Voice at Its Best.

One of the most delightful concerts given by the Boston Symphony orchestra was that of last evening. The band was in good trim and played with a briskness, a force and a sparkle that were delightful. Mr. Paur has been improving. His readings are no longer lethargic and his tone heavy. Residence in this country has imparted to him the nervous energy that marks the American. In shading there is a distinct betterment. Music without it is like a picture in black and white. With it, we add the element of color. There are few marked originalities in the treatment of the classics by Mr. Paur—a pause or so here and there, an emphasis on a flute passage, a prominence to the basses, and so on, but nothing radical in treatment or tempo. It was mostly old music last night, so that innovations would have declared themselves. The crescendo in the "Fidelio" overture was managed in a masterly fashion and had almost the effect of one of those stupendous risings in Wagner, as in the "Tristan and Isolde" and the "Twilight of the Gods." In the dance—the scene described by Lenau and put to music by Liszt, the band had fire and rapidity, and so near as music can paint, this piece put into form the wild revel in the inn where Faust and the peasant lass whirl to the devil's fiddling. Liszt has the Hun, the gypsy, in his blood, and it spoke in this mad music. The long number was Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, a work that is something too infrequently heard, along with other good things. Indeed, the conductors appear to have got into a certain rut and are afraid to get out of it. Why, for instance, should it always be the C symphony of Schubert, when he wrote seven or eight others? Why "In the Woods" and "Lenore" of Raff when he left at least four symphonies beside? Why so seldom a Schumann symphony—the most delightful of all? Why so seldom a Bach suite? Why not the Wagner symphony at least once? Why not the picturesque and beautiful "Frithjof" of Hofman. Why not the "Peer Gynt" music of Grieg? Why not the "Reformation" symphony of Mendelssohn? Why not a bit from Gluck's "Orpheus," once more? Why not the earlier Dvorak symphonies? Why not the sea music of Gilson and Nicode? Why not Volkmann's symphony? Why not one of Macdowell's suites? Wh y not those beautiful string quartets of Schubert's? They tell us that the best has already been chosen from the great composers, and that we have it in the concerts of the winter. But let us at least hear a few of the others to know for ourselves this so, or not. The "Scotch" symphony is the strongest of Mendelssohn's music, except perhaps a part of his oratorio writing. It is poetic and romantic, and for that Allah be praised in a day when realism and metaphysics claim so much attention in the arts. There is no analysis here, no introspection; it is all free, unconscious, breezy and picturesque. The spirit of the Scotch highlands broods across the somber andante, we hear the storm roar through the craggy pass, the sun shines on leagues of moor and the tartaned tribes march to the ringing pipe. Local color is nearly as successfully gained in this symphony as Bizet gained it in his "Carmen," yet there is no letting down of artistic dignity in order to secure it; no descent to absurdities of realism; no imitation of bagpipes. A new thing was the "Children's Games," by Bizet—new, at least, in these concerts. It is a short suite perhaps intended for little folks, but certainly worth the hearing of big ones. There is a "trumpets and drums" in which the youngsters are playing soldier, and marching to a tune that recalls the marionette's funeral of Gounod, a song sung to her doll by a child, "the top" in which there is a humming of the strings like that of the spinning song in the "Flying Dutchman," a duet of a boy and girl playing at housekeeping, and a bit of ball play marked by much vivacity. In all this there is no grossness of imitation; it is all fresh, frank and enlivening. The march was easily a product of the same pen that wrote "Carmen," and if there was juvenility in it, so there must be in the Spanish dances, as the music of people still in the juvenile stage of development. Pol Plancon, from the opera, was the singer. He grows taller, more unbendable in the back, more bristling of mustache at every season. He sang "Behold, along the dewy grass" from Haydn's "Seasons," with its odd and pleasantly old fashioned ornaments and flourishes, and Schumann's "Two Grenadiers." In the last he "let himself out." He was the hurt, fierce soldier home faring from the wars, doomed to leave his bones in soil that had soaked up the blood of thousands of his countrymen, yet crying that when the returning army tramped across his grave and the clangor of fight once more sounded on the earth, he would rise, full armed, and do battle for his emperor. As the song burst into the "Marseillaise" Plancon was all on fire. His voice was let out to the full; he gained in stature; he closed with a defiant gesture, and audience, band and everybody, catching the martial spirit, broke into a roar of enthusiasm. One has to be born a Frenchman to sing "The Two Grenadiers" as Plancon sings it, but perhaps even a French audience would have made no more of a time over him than the Brooklyn audience did last night. This afternoon the orchestra is playing at the Academy, the "Oberon" overture, the wonderful Unfinished symphony of Schubert, the entractes from "Carmen," Smetana's "Wallenstein's Camp," and Marie Toulinguet is singing Handel and Weber music. The next concert will occur on the 26th of February.

FRIDAY, JAN. 22, 1897.

THIRD CONCERT OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Superb Performance of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony—M. Plancon Takes Mme. Melba's Place as Soloist.

The third concert of the eleventh season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in this city, took place last night at the Metropolitan Opera House. The auditorium was crowded with enthusiastic music lovers, who bravely faced the copious draughts of cold air in the house for the sake of hearing good music well played. The programme consisted of Frederic Smetana's symphonic poem "Wallenstein's Camp," an aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos," the introductions to Acts II. and III. of Engelbert Humperdinck's "King's Children," Schubert's song, "The Two Grenadiers," the "Fidelio" overture of Beethoven, and Tschaikowsky's F minor symphony. This reads like a long programme, but it was really quite reasonable, as the concert lasted just an hour and three-quarters. M. Plançon's appearance as the singer of the two vocal numbers was not according to the original plan. Mme. Melba was to have sung numbers by Mozart and Massenet, and it must be confessed that although M. Plançon sang well, his rushing into the "imminent, deadly breach" with two of his well-worn Sunday night concert numbers, did not add to the dignity of an otherwise admirable concert.

The concert began with fifteen minutes of instrumental trouble by the Bohemian composer, Smetana. Wallenstein's camp, according to Schiller, was a military beehive, but it certainly never buzzed, banged, and sputtered as Mr. Smetana says it did. All the ideas to be found in this symphonic poem could be written on a postage stamp, and the composer's elaborate working out was of a verity "much ado about nothing." Now Humperdinck's music, on the contrary, was delightful. It was older music than his "Hansel and Gretel," but it was of the same sort—simple folk tunes dressed in a glittering garb of harmonic and orchestral glory till they sounded like echoes from the holy theatre of Baireuth. The gentlemen from Boston played these excerpts with luscious tone and fine solidity.

But they let loose the thunders of their Jovian right hands when they reached the Tschaikowsky symphony. The work itself is one that grows upon the hearer with every repetition. In it the growl of the great Russian bear is ominous and the wide spaces of the northern steppes, with their hardy people and their grim tales of oppression, glow through this music. Every time it is played it leaves with the hearer the conviction that it is the product of a mind of singular originality and power, of a nature gifted with intense musical feeling and enormous emotional force. If Tschaikowsky was not a genius he was something very near to one, and the first movement of this fourth symphony is a burst of stupendous musical energy such as only a great man could have conceived. The performance of the symphony was a superb example of orchestral virtuosity. The strings proclaimed the majesty of their greatness in no uncertain tones, and the wood achieved marvels in beauty, smoothness, and solidity of tone, coupled with celerity and accuracy in delivery. The difficult pizzicato ostinato movement was played with dazzling precision and flexibility, and the last movement was a tornado of musical power. Mr. Emil Paur, the conductor, covered himself with glory last night, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played, not with the perfection of refined nuance which it knew in the consulship of Gericke, but with a fierce and sweeping emotional power which was in the early days not to be found in its work.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JANUARY 21, 1897.

Mme. Melba's place as soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Metropolitan to-night, it was decided yesterday, will be M. Pol Plançon, who will sing the aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos," and, by request, "The Two Grenadiers." The orchestral numbers include Tschaikowsky's symphony in E minor, No. 4; Smetana's "Wallenstein's Camp," Humperdinck's "King's Children" music, and the "Fidelio" overture.

The New York Press

DAILY EDITION.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, JANUARY 22, 1897.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mme. Melba Too Ill to Sing, but M. Plancon Appears.

It was undoubtedly a severe disappointment to the Boston Symphony Orchestra subscribers that Mme. Melba was not able to fulfill her engagement at the third concert of the season, which was given in the Metropolitan Opera House last night, but they were comforted in some measure by the appearance of M. Plancon, who sang an aria by Verdi and Schumann's "The Two Grenadiers." It should be explained that the latter song was sung "by request." Judging from the applause M. Plancon received after singing this hackneyed but stirring song the audience was well pleased.

The playing of this splendid band was fully up to its high standard, but it must be confessed that Mr. Paur's conducting is extremely distracting. The orchestral programme consisted of Smetana's symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp;" selections from Humperdinck's new opera, "The King's Children," the E major overture to Beethoven's "Fidelio" and Tschaikowsky's splendid Fourth Symphony in F minor.

Gazette.

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 17.

Symphony Concert.

The programme of the 12th Symphony concert is.

Symphony, C major........Karl von Dittersdorf
Concerto for Pianoforte, E flat major.....Liszt
Overture, "Don Giovanni"................Mozart
Symphony No. 4, B flat major........Beethoven
Soloist, Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe.

At this concert the Dittersdorf symphony was played for the first time in Boston, and it was made presentable by Herman Kretzschmar. It has no great distinguishing merits. It is a well manufactured work, but wanting in the vitalizing spark of genius. One listens to the work with the interest due to respectable antiquity of all kinds, and while listening one can conjure up a pretty picture of the past, with its fashions, that now suggest quaintness, and with its manners, that still retain their dignity. Contrasting the symphony with modern works, one notes the clearness of its outlines, the symmetry of its form. It was not written to confuse the intellect of polite society; the expected always happens, there is no mistaking or forgetting the ideas; they occur and reoccur with fine regularity, and when they reappear they are in their original integrity with no modification to conceal their identity. It is not difficult to understand why the rising sun of genius casts respectable works like this into the shadow of oblivion. They gather dust, not because they are old, but because they say nothing that has not been better said by the masters. They give no evidence of life because they were born dead.

Owing to the sickness of Mme. Eames, Miss Aus der Ohe kindly consented to take her place at short notice, and she gave a brilliant interpretation of the Liszt concerto, which suggests brilliant ornamentation on an empty building. Miss Aus der Ohe's work was of the best quality, and it won the enthusiastic approval of the critical audience.

A word of feeble protest might be here urged against the "Gleanings from the Court Library in Utopia" that appear in the official programme. The idea is excellent, but one wonders why this court library is filled with only the work of idiots. Surely among the authors Mr. Apthorp could find some author who had other claims to distinction than this of having passed their entire adult lives in insane asylums. In Utopia there must be somebody who possesses an idea; but Mr. Apthorp's researches have unearthed nothing but melancholy drivel and schoolboy platitudes. Mr. Farquhar Tupper was a rare genius compared to the authors discovered by Mr. Apthorp. The maunderings of these Utopian authors are redolent of beer and of the half-sleep allied to intoxication. They write with semi-palsied hands and muddled brains, and it seems cruel to inflict their leaden platitudes on an intelligent and innocent audience. Great praise is due to Mr. Apthorp for his intentions, but he should be told that instead of pouring out sparkling wine, that stimulates and invigorates, he is serving the deadly henbane, mandragora and opium that first induces heavy sleep and then slays

---

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 17, 1897.

The illness of Mme. Emma Eames necessitated a change in the twelfth symphony programme. The orchestral numbers remained as announced, but for the two songs—neither of which, be it said by the way, gave any particular promise of freshness or of special preparation—was substituted Liszt's E flat pianoforte concerto, in which Miss Adele aus der Ohe made her re-entrance after several seasons of absence. She has always given a more comfortable sense of abstract power than any other woman pianist of the time, and now, upon her return, that power appears to have ripened and grown and become concentrated, until her playing may justly be called masterful. For she effortlessly commands all the fulness of the instrument to sustain her, and so gives such passages as would seem to be written on purpose to tax and display a man's strength, with breadth and control enough for a man, yet without making any unwomanly struggle to conquer. In this respect of equalized and governed power she has gained greatly, as she has also gained in tranquillity and economy of execution. Her technique was always eminent for its clearness, which let no note fall into obscurity because it was comparatively unimportant, and she has lost nothing of brilliancy, velocity and dash in naturing her graver qualities. No author can be more favorable for her than Liszt, and she delivered the concerto splendidly in all its moods and forms, from its most vehement assertions to its daintiest fantasies.

The concert began with an extract from the music of a hundred years ago in the shape of a short sympathy by Dittersdorf. It might have sounded thin, for it has no flutes, clarinets or trombones to reinforce its strings; but it is so spirited, so genial, so simple-minded and so wholesome, that one cannot find fault with it because it is not more dense and substantial in scoring. It is very short and its movements are so closely interlocked that they might almost pass for one movement of variable temperament. It was gaily and smartly played.

Mozart's "Don Giovanni" overture and Bethoven's fourth symphony in commendable readings, completed the programme.

There will be no concert this week, and next week the Schubert commemoration programme will be presented.

THE MAIL AND EXPRESS
Broadway and Fulton St., New York.

FRIDAY EVENING, JANUARY 22, 1897.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

The third Boston Symphony concert of the present season took place last night at the Metropolitan Opera House before an exceptionally large and appreciative audience. The soloist was M. Pol Plancon, who replaced Mme. Melba on account of the latter's illness. The programme was rather a departure from the usual order of things, and the selection of Smetana's overture, "Wallenstein's Camp," as an opening number, could be accounted for only by the good old New England practice of having pie for breakfast. In the original scheme, Mme. Melba was to have followed it with an aria from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," which would have lent countenance to the Beethoven overture to "Fidelio," the next to the last number on the programme. As it was, M. Plancon substituted for the Mozart number the beautiful aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos," and so Beethoven was left alone to represent the thought and genius of a time long past. After the Verdi excerpt came Humperdinck's preludes to Acts III. and II. of "Konig's Kinder," succeeded by Schumann's setting of "The Two Grenadiers," with which M. Plancon had replaced the "Sevillana," from Massenet's "Don Cesar de Bazan." Then came the "Fidelio" overture and the fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky. The programme was thus thrown a little out of true by the omission of the Mozart piece, and if it had been possible to omit the Beethoven work as well, artistic consistency would have been better preserved.

The Smetana overture is a comparative novelty in New York, although it was brought out in Europe not long after the composer's death in 1884. Although based on the various noises and tumults in the camp of an army, it rises far above mere descriptive power and invades successfully the realms of imagination and suggestiveness. It is full of a puissant spirit of romance, which surrounds the unsavory realties of such a place as the rendezvous of Wallenstein's horde of adventurers with inpenetrable glamour and thereby makes the subject one that fits easily into a musical setting. The bugle calls on the horns are made part of an elaborate scheme and the distant tread of armed men furnishes a rhythm that the composer turns to good account. The fanciful suggestion of night is one of the happiest touches in the overture and emphasizes the poetic quality of Smetana's nature. The work is full of daring progressions, and yet one feels that they have their place in it. Mr. Paur and his men played it admirably.

The two Humperdinck preludes had not been heard here until last evening. They are as Wagnerian as "Hansel und Gretel," and, like that work, revealed the German musician's power of building a large structure from a very few materials. There is originality in the development of the little themes and much technical skill. If Herr Humperdinck were any less versed in the capacity of a modern orchestra than he is, there would be less to admire in what he has given to the world. Last night the orchestra was enriched by a child's rattle, a sort of small edition of the watchman's rattle with which Herr Richard Strauss added insult to injury in his famous "musical joke," "Till Eulenspiegel." But there is a seriousness of purpose in what Humperdinck atempts that entitles him to consideration, and one can find genuine artistic pleasure in listening to his two preludes.

The Tschaikowsky D minor symphony is a composition that fairly overflows with Slavic impetuosity. There is life and energy and even ecstasy in some of the wonderful little themes which the great Russian has set down. Although there are novel features in the matter of the structure of some of the movements, notably the third (in which, also, the strings are played pizzicato from beginning to end), one feels that the composer wrote them in the way he has because the matter he wished to express would have become distorted if forced into stereotyped forms. There is human interest in the symphony throughout its length. It reveals Tschaikowsky in happier mood than when he wrote the "Pathetique" symphony, but the undercurrent of melancholy that colors the Slavic mind is present and is often made manifest. Mr. Paur brought out in good measure the meaning of the music.

M. Plancon sang with peculiar mellowness of tone and expressiveness. He has often sung the "Don Carlos" aria here, but rarely has he made it more appealing, more human, more poignant. "The Two Grenadiers" has come to be particularly associated with him, especially in the Metropolitan Opera House, but the accompaniment is tricky and unless the conductor is very familiar with M. Plancon's method of singing the song, there is apt to be a misunderstanding between voice and orchestra, as there was last night, a mishap doubtless due to unavoidable lack of time for rehearsal.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 23, 1897.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Emil Paur and His Musicians in Splendid Trim—Plancon's Voice at Its Best.

One of the most delightful concerts given by the Boston Symphony orchestra was that of last evening. The band was in good trim and played with a briskness, a force and a sparkle that were delightful. Mr. Paur has been improving. His readings are no longer lethargic and his tone heavy. Residence in this country has imparted to him the nervous energy that marks the American. In shading there is a distinct betterment. Music without it is like a picture in black and white. With it, we add the element of color. There are few marked originalities in the treatment of the classics by Mr. Paur—a pause or so here and there, an emphasis on a flute passage, a prominence to the basses, and so on, but nothing radical in treatment or tempo. It was mostly old music last night, so that innovations would have declared themselves. The crescendo in the "Fidelio" overture was managed in a masterly fashion and had almost the effect of one of those stupendous risings in Wagner, as in the "Tristan and Isolde" and the "Twilight of the Gods." In the dance—the scene described by Lenau and put to music by Liszt, the band had fire and rapidity, and so near as music can paint, this piece put into form the wild revel in the inn where Faust and the peasant lass whirl to the devil's fiddling. Liszt has the Hun, the gypsy, in his blood, and it spoke in this mad music. The long number was Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, a work that is something too infrequently heard, along with other good things. Indeed, the conductors appear to have got into a certain rut and are afraid to get out of it. Why, for instance, should it always be the C symphony of Schubert, when he wrote seven or eight others? Why "In the Woods" and "Lenore" of Raff when he left at least four symphonies beside? Why so seldom a Schumann symphony—the most delightful of all? Why so seldom a Bach suite? Why not the Wagner symphony at least once? Why not the picturesque and beautiful "Frithjof" of Hofman. Why not the "Peer Gynt" music of Grieg? Why not the "Reformation" symphony of Mendelssohn? Why not a bit from Gluck's "Orpheus," once more? Why not the earlier Dvorak symphonies? Why not the sea music of Gilson and Nicode? Why not Volkmann's symphony? Why not one of Macdowell's suites? Wh y not those beautiful string quartets of Schubert's? They tell us that the best has already been chosen from the great composers, and that we have it in the concerts of the winter. But let us at least hear a few of the others to know for ourselves this so, or not. The "Scotch" symphony is the strongest of Mendelssohn's music, except perhaps a part of his oratorio writing. It is poetic and romantic, and for that Allah be praised in a day when realism and metaphysics claim so much attention in the arts. There is no analysis here, no introspection; it is all free, unconscious, breezy and picturesque. The spirit of the Scotch highlands broods across the somber andante, we hear the storm roar through the craggy pass, the sun shines on leagues of moor and the tartaned tribes march to the ringing pipe. Local color is nearly as successfully gained in this symphony as Bizet gained it in his "Carmen," yet there is no letting down of artistic dignity in order to secure it; no descent to absurdities of realism; no imitation of bagpipes. A new thing was the "Children's Games," by Bizet—new, at least, in these concerts. It is a short suite perhaps intended for little folks, but certainly worth the hearing of big ones. There is a "trumpets and drums" in which the youngsters are playing soldier, and marching to a tune that recalls the marionette's funeral of Gounod, a song sung to her doll by a child, "the top" in which there is a humming of the strings like that of the spinning song in the "Flying Dutchman," a duet of a boy and girl playing at housekeeping, and a bit of ball play marked by much vivacity. In all this there is no grossness of imitation; it is all fresh, frank and enlivening. The march was easily a product of the same pen that wrote "Carmen," and if there was juvenility in it, so there must be in the Spanish dances, as the music of people still in the juvenile stage of development. Pol Plancon, from the opera, was the singer. He grows taller, more unbendable in the back, more bristling of mustache at every season. He sang "Behold, along the dewy grass" from Haydn's "Seasons," with its odd and pleasantly old fashioned ornaments and flourishes, and Schumann's "Two Grenadiers." In the last he "let himself out." He was the hurt, fierce soldier home faring from the wars, doomed to leave his bones in soil that had soaked up the blood of thousands of his countrymen, yet crying that when the returning army tramped across his grave and the clangor of fight once more sounded on the earth, he would rise, full armed, and do battle for his emperor. As the song burst into the "Marseillaise" Plancon was all on fire. His voice was let out to the full; he gained in stature; he closed with a defiant gesture, and audience, band and everybody, catching the martial spirit, broke into a roar of enthusiasm. One has to be born a Frenchman to sing "The Two Grenadiers" as Plancon sings it, but perhaps even a French audience would have made no more of a time over him than the Brooklyn audience did last night. This afternoon the orchestra is playing at the Academy, the "Oberon" overture, the wonderful Unfinisihed symphony of Schubert, the entractes from "Carmen," Smetana's "Wallenstein's Camp," and Marie Toulinguet is singing Handel and Weber music. The next concert will occur on the 26th of February.

The New York Times

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, JAN. 22, 1897.

THIRD CONCERT OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Superb Performance of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony — M. Plancon Takes Mme. Melba's Place as Soloist.

The third concert of the eleventh season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in this city, took place last night at the Metropolitan Opera House. The auditorium was crowded with enthusiastic music lovers, who bravely faced the copious draughts of cold air in the house for the sake of hearing good music well played. The programme consisted of Frederic Smetana's symphonic poem "Wallenstein's Camp," an aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos," the introductions to Acts II. and III. of Engelbert Humperdinck's "King's Children." Schubert's song, "The Two Grenadiers," the "Fidelio" overture of Beethoven, and Tschaikowsky's F minor symphony. This reads like a long programme, but it was really quite reasonable, as the concert lasted just an hour and three-quarters. M. Plançon's appearance as the singer of the two vocal numbers was not according to the original plan. Mme. Melba was to have sung numbers by Mozart and Massenet, and it must be confessed that although M. Plançon sang well, his rushing into the "imminent, deadly breach" with two of his well-worn Sunday night concert numbers, did not add to the dignity of an otherwise admirable concert.

The concert began with fifteen minutes of instrumental trouble by the Bohemian composer, Smetana. Wallenstein's camp, according to Schiller, was a military beehive, but it certainly never buzzed, banged, and sputtered as Mr. Smetana says it did. All the ideas to be found in this symphonic poem could be written on a postage stamp, and the composer's elaborate working out was of a verity "much ado about nothing." Now Humperdinck's music, on the contrary, was delightful. It was older music than his "Hansel and Gretel," but it was of the same sort—simple folk tunes dressed in a glittering garb of harmonic and orchestral glory till they sounded like echoes from the holy theatre of Baireuth. The gentlemen from Boston played these excerpts with luscious tone and fine solidity.

But they let loose the thunders of their Jovian right hands when they reached the Tschaikowsky symphony. The work itself is one that grows upon the hearer with every repetition. In it the growl of the great Russian bear is ominous and the wide spaces of the northern steppes, with their hardy people and their grim tales of oppression, glow through this music. Every time it is played it leaves with the hearer the conviction that it is the product of a mind of singular originality and power, of a nature gifted with intense musical feeling and enormous emotional force. If Tschaikowsky was not a genius he was something very near to one, and the first movement of this fourth symphony is a burst of stupendous musical energy such as only a great man could have conceived. The performance of the symphony was a superb example of orchestral virtuosity. The strings proclaimed the majesty of their greatness in no uncertain tones, and the wood achieved marvels in beauty, smoothness, and solidity of tone, coupled with celerity and accuracy in delivery. The difficult pizzicato ostinato movement was played with dazzling precision and flexibility, and the last movement was a tornado of musical power. Mr. Emil Paur, the conductor, covered himself with glory last night, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played, not with the perfection of refined nuance which it knew in the consulship of Gericke, but with a fierce and sweeping emotional power which was in the early days not to be found in its work.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JANUARY 21, 1897.

Mme. Melba's place as soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Metropolitan to-night, it was decided yesterday, will be M. Pol Plançon, who will sing the aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos," and, by request, "The Two Grenadiers." The orchestral numbers include Tschaikowsky's symphony in E minor, No. 4; Smetana's "Wallenstein's Camp," Humperdinck's "King's Children" music, and the "Fidelio" overture.

The New York Press

DAILY EDITION.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, JANUARY 22, 1897.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mme. Melba Too Ill to Sing, but M. Plancon Appears.

It was undoubtedly a severe disappointment to the Boston Symphony Orchestra subscribers that Mme. Melba was not able to fulfill her engagement at the third concert of the season, which was given in the Metropolitan Opera House last night, but they were comforted in some measure by the appearance of M. Plancon, who sang an aria by Verdi and Schumann's "The Two Grenadiers." It should be explained that the latter song was sung "by request." Judging from the applause M. Plancon received after singing this Hackneyed but stirring song the audience was well pleased.

The playing of this splendid band was fully up to its high standard, but it must be confessed that Mr. Paur's conducting is extremely distracting. The orchestral programme consisted of Smetana's symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp;" selections from Humperdinck's new opera, "The King's Children," the E major overture to Beethoven's "Fidelio" and Tschaikowsky's splendid Fourth Symphony in F minor.

The Morning Advertiser.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 22, 1897.

MELBA LISTENED.

SAT IN A METROPOLITAN BOX.

Third Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra—Plancon in Excellent Voice—De Reszke Absent.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at the Metropolitan Opera House, and attracted the largest audience of the season. Melba was too ill to sing, and so contented herself with sitting in a box and listening. Edouard de Reszke, who was announced, did not appear, and instead we got the valiant Pol Plancon, who was in excellent voice, and gave the well known bass aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos" and Schumann's "The Two Grenadiers," the latter being his usual Sunday night anthem. He was most liberally applauded, but wisely declined repeating the Schumann song.

There were two orchestral novelties in Mr. Paur's programme. A symphonic poem by the Bohemian composer, Smetana, called "Wallenstein's Camp," that proved almost as noisy as Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture, and not by any means as interesting, as sustained, or as fine a piece of writing as Rheinberger's treatment of a similar theme, from Schiller's "Wallenstein Triology." Smetana's is a military episode, stirring, rather coarse, and extremely harsh, with its trumpet fanfares "off stage" and its percussive climaxes. It was, nevertheless, virile music, and contained some interesting writing. The second novelty was selections from Englebert Humperdinck's music to "King's Children," another fairy story, of the "Hansel und Gretel" type.

This composer has a charm, the charm of sensuous, well-sounding orchestration. His model is Wagner, and so in the introduction to the third act of the new fairy tale we got music that was in the true Wagner vernacular. Grafted most deftly to the desperate yearning and passionate character of the first section was a quaint, volks-like melody, and this seems to be Humperdinck's curious recipe, the commingling of all that is new, even decadent, in music, with the naive, the child-like. That it has an artificial character at times cannot be denied. Yet some of the numbers last night, "The Piper's Last Song" and the "Children's Dance" (with a child's rattle in the orchestra, a sort of teething motif!) had the genuine heartiness and innocent abandonment of childhood.

Beethoven's always fresh and brilliant Fidelio overture was played with fine sense of tonal values and with marked rhythmic life, Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, the masterly and melancholy one in F minor, ended a long and not well made musical scheme. Mr. Paur was at his very best last night. He worked hard, but he got remarkable results. Anton Seidl made the first movement of this fascinating symphony or symphonic suite, more cohesive, more massed, more passionate. However, but one orchestra in the country could have played as was played last night the andantino with its iterated Slavic refrain, the lugubrious chant of Russian bargemen. The scherzo with its pizzicato ostinato, its fascinating trio for wood, the quick staccato chords for the brass, and the quicker summing up of the coda—this scherzo was delightfully read. The finale was taken at a breathless pace and rhythm was thrown to the wind, especially the brass wind. It was altogether too fast for enjoyment, but it came to a victorious finish. An evening of genuine pleasure!

J. H.

The North American

Daily Advertiser and United States Gazette

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 19, 1897.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Third Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Night.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert for the season at the Academy of Music last night, under the accustomed direction of Mr. Emil Paur, and in the presence of the usual crowded and brilliant audience. There were two novelties on the programme, a descriptive fantasia, entitled "Wallenstein's Camp," by Smetana, the distinguished Bohemian composer, lately deceased, and a suite by Bizet, called "Children's Games;" but neither proved to be of any particular importance. The Smetana music is immensely vivid and stirring, but is so chaotic and cacophonous to have much real value or interest, while Bizet's suite, graceful, melodious and artistic, as far as it goes, is a mere sketch, bright enough, but too light in texture, either to make any serious impression upon the hearer or to afford Mr. Paur's superb organization with employment worthy of its powers. As a matter of fact, although it included a beautiful interpretation of Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, an interpretation in which all the poetry and romance of that glorious composition were most eloquently and appreciatively expressed, the most striking and notable feature of the concert was the wonderfully dramatic delivery by M. Pol Plancon of Schumann's well-known song of the "Two Grenadiers." It is impossible to imagine anything finer or more thrilling than the manner in which was conveyed the emotion of the words and of the music, the grief of the veteran at the capture of his Emperor, the outburst of patriotic fervor with which he yet remembered those sons of France, who, in spite of everything, would still march on to glory. It was a great piece of work, and it stirred the audience deeply, but M. Plancon, with a wise discretion, resolutely refused an encore. Such effects cannot be repeated twice in succession. M. Plancon also sang with admirable smoothness of vocalization and art of phrasing an air from Haydn's "Seasons," but somehow or other Haydn in French seemed to be an incongruity.

The date of the next concert is Feb-

The Commercial Advertiser

Commercial Advertiser Association

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JAN 22, 1897.

Boston Symphony Concert.

Rarely has a programme of more intrinsic interest been presented to an audience of music-lovers than that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert of the season in the Metropolitan Opera House last night. There was, of course, much disappointment that Madame Melba was unable to sing because of her illness, but there was warm satisfaction with the manner in which Mons. Plancon acquitted himself of the numbers which he undertook in her place. These were an aria by Verdi, "Don Carlos," and Schumann's "The Two Grenadiers." In the latter is introduced the "Marseillaise." Mons. Plancon sang it with a fervor which one could easily perceive was profoundly patriotic, but strangely enough, with a tempo that seemed altogether his own, and nobody else's. The orchestra and he got into a tangle, or at least the orchestra did, for the singer went on, as was his right, entirely without reference to the players, who, under the nervous baton of Mr. Emil Paur, adjusted themselves after a little to "a condition, not a theory," and came out at the end fairly well. It was evident that even the conductor had not made allowance for Mons. Plancon's patriotism. The audience wanted to hear the "Marseillaise" again, but the singer, as after the previous song, only bowed graciously after each recall, and then firmly withdrew.

The purely instrumental numbers were Smetana's "Wallenstein's Camp," a "symphonic poem," selections from Engelbert Humperdinck's "King's Children," Beethoven's last overture to "Fidelio" and Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony in F minor. The first and last numbers excited the greatest interest, though the Humperdinck music, as well as the Smetana, was heard for the first time, as performed by this orchestra. The great variety and brilliancy of the symphonic poem, with its multitudinous sounds of camp life, its fanfaronades, its hubbub, its detonations, its jovial dances, its suggestions of night and rapine and of wild surroundings, were well interpreted. So also were the naive themes of the Humperdinck selections. But the triumph of the evening was the rendering of Tschaikowsky's symphony. It proved once again how universal a consciousness had the great Russian composer, and that he was indeed a kind of musical Shakespeare. There are few chords of human emotion that are not touched in this work alone. Even its eccentricities are pleasing, for they are like those of life. Such distinctive use to which each class of instruments is put is in itself marvelous. Perhaps the best phrase to apply to some of the most characteristic passages is "musical colloquy." But this again does not define the voices of nature and the unspeakable strains of passion that make themselves richly heard. Strength and delicacy, humor and gravity, sentiment and gayety, sensuousness and austerity, are all expressed. The light moderato passages in the first movement, the pizzicato in the third and all of the last, the rondo with its enthusiastic, ever increasing elan, were most admirably executed.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 22, 1897.

Third Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brought us for the third concert of its eleventh season in New York a programme that was entirely modern and which for that reason was notably and emphatically intellectual, and also, as is common with music of the present day, it was nearly always characterized by restless perturbation. The whole effect of the entertainment was to excite and stimulate the nerves without offering any food or nourishment to the heart or the spirit. No repose, no comfort, was there to be enjoyed. One sighed for dear Father Haydn; one yearned for the orderly, mathematical Bach, whose big, warm nature is felt even while he adds up his contrapuntal sums. Five minutes of the serene, heavenly calm with which Brahms soothes world-weary souls would indeed have been an ineffable blessing. But instead of these Smetana's noisy overture, "Wallenstein's Camp," was followed by Humperdinck's "King's Children" selections, and these are far from being highly inspired, nor do they compare with the beauties found in the score of "Hänsel and Gretel." There is a phlegmatic stolidity about this music, however, which helped to antidote, in a trifling degree, the exacerbating "Sturm und Drang" mood of the rest of the scheme. Pol Plançon toned down the irritating excitement a little also by a mournful aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos," in which the singer bewails the fact "Elle ne m'aime pas," and he gave further solace by a spirited rendering of "The Two Grenadiers," which, as usual, roused the audience to frantic demonstrations of delight. Perhaps no better substitute could have been found for the loss of Melba's graceful charm and exquisite voice than Plançon proved.

Of Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4 much might be said. It is a work of elaborate construction, showy, feverish, and somewhat sensational, especially in the formless, seething rush of its first movement. In this portion of his creation Tschaikowsky has given way to a peculiar weakness of his own, which is here indulged to tiresome excess, that is, his endless reiteration of the same phrase. Countless repetitions become first surprising, then wearisome, then laughable. There is so much cleverness in this writer's invention, so much that is dazzling in his orchestration that it is grievous when he stands in his own light either for the sake of stretching out his composition or else from pure self-complacency and admiration of his own ideas.

The last three movements are handsomer in form than the first one and more persuasively pleasing. It would seem as though the symphony might gain distinctly from being set in a programme among music of a character which should contrast with the fiery resplendence it possesses.

Mr. Paur's men labored faithfully and to good purpose. Energy, precision, and élan were the attributes which their work especially displayed. The balance of tone between the various choirs was, as always, noticeably excellent.

New-York [illegible]

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 22, 1897.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Pauer, took place in the Metropolitan Opera House last night. An audience, handsome both in numbers and appearance, and obviously alive to the dignity and beauty of the higher forms of orchestral music, had gathered to hear it. Doubtless the disappointment at Mme. Melba's withdrawal was keenly felt, for she has seldom been quite so brilliant in opera as she has uniformly been when singing with the Boston orchestra, but the feeling was not permitted to act as a damper on the enjoyment of the audience. After an attempt to secure the services of Mr. Edouard de Reszke had failed, Mr. Plançon was enlisted, and he gave a high degree of satisfaction. He sang first an aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos," and then the song which, to judge by the programmes of the Sunday night concerts for the last three years, constitutes three-fourths of his concert repertory. The allusion, of course, is to Schumann's "Die beiden Grenadiere." Hackneyed as M. Plançon has made the song, it aroused a frenzy of enthusiasm, but he evidently appreciated the situation better than his listeners and refused a repetition, or even an addition to the list.

The orchestral numbers were a symphonic poem entitled "Wallenstein's Camp" (the poetical motive of which, taken from Schiller's drama, has also been employed by Rheinberger and Vincent d'Indy), some selections from Humperdinck's "Die Königskinder," Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture, and Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony in F-minor. The last number reached high-water mark in the orchestra's achievement. The symphony has been played several times in New-York, and is on the lists of both the Philharmonic and Symphony societies, but it has never been given with the finish and dash that characterized the performance last night. Mr. Pauer seemed to be courting disaster with the tempo in which he took the last movement, but he knew his men, and they stood the test marvellously well. It was a case, moreover, in which finish in detail and consideration for the general and characteristic effect went hand in hand, and the result was seen in the fact that, for the first time in New-York, the public betrayed enthusiastic interest in something else than the scherzo, with its somewhat undignified but fetching pizzicato effect. The finest work of Mr. Pauer as well as his men was done in the first movement, which was worked out with great finesse and taste. Mr. Pauer also made a great deal out of the proclamatory motto which opens the work and recurs toward its close, and which those who can recall the beginning of Schumann's symphony in B-flat will recognize as a pretty tribute to that delightful work. The Humperdinck numbers disclosed that composer's skill in the development of simple themes, redolent of German nursery song, with all the puissant charm of modern harmony and orchestration; but it might be questioned whether they would have received such flattering recognition had not "Hänsel and Gretel" stood sponsor for them.

◆

THE [illegible]

The World

ied by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PAR
New York.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 22, 1897.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Admirable Programme Admirably Played by the Musicians from the Hub.

There is nothing as gratifying to the genuine music lovers of this city as the presence of a large audience at one of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The general public has been slow to realize that those musicians are not only the highest exponents of orchestral work in the country, but that their organization is one that has but few peers in the world. Judging by last night's assemblage at the Metropolitan Opera-House, the tide of prosperity has set. It was the third concert of the series and not only were the stalls well filled, but so were the galleries.

The orchestra has had fluctuations in its efficiency. The change in leaders, from Nikisch to Paur, was in a sense reactionary. The former is a brilliant individual maestro, progressive, daring, a colorist of great skill; the latter is reserved, academic, not to say pedantic. But he has substantial qualities, and if at times he is dull and uninteresting in his readings, heavy and phlegmatic, cautious and conventional, he often compels respect. There seems to have been a coming together of leader and men during the past two years and the former has certainly gained some of the freedom and enthusiasm of the latter.

Mr. Paur last evening was in a good mood, and his players have rarely given a more convincing exhibition of discipline, precision and technical skill.

The programme was an interesting one. The important number was Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. In the first movement the horns were a little shaky at times. The melodic second movement was exquisitely played: The original third movement, with the strings played pizzicato, permitted the orchestra to display its astonishing virtuosity, and the furious finale was technically flawless.

The selections from Humperdinck's music to "The King's Children" furnished evidence that the composer of "Hansel and Gretel" is somebody to be considered in the music of to-day. His inspiration seems to lie in the simple melodies which voice the joys and sorrows of childhood. In this instance his themes are original, but their character is almost elementary. In his treatment of his subjects he is a master of modern elaboration. His harmonies are rich, complicated at times, but always tremendously impressive.

The orchestra also played Smetana's symphonic poem "Wallenstein's Lager," a work in which there is more substance than form, and the "Fidelio" overture in E major.

M. Plancon appeared as substitute for Mme. Melba and sang an aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos" with impeccable diction and his favorite, "Two Grenadiers," in his usual Chauvinistic manner.

◆

The [illegible] Press

TUESDAY, JANUARY 19, 1897.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Plancon, the Soloist, and a Mendelssohn Symphony the Attraction.

The enthusiasm of those who crowd the Academy of Music whenever the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the attraction, with or without outside aid, is hard to understand. Not that this truly great orchestra is not worthy of unbounded enthusiasm when it is at its best, but the outbursts which the audiences give themselves up to on occasions are not easy to explain, for if the cause of the ovation should happen to come here under other than the Boston Symphony's protecting aegis, he might or might not, usually not, receive any attention at all.

Pol Placon is a case in point. This great artist was the soloist last evening. His vocal art is of such a superb quality in the way of vocal method, dramatic interpretation and rich timbre, that it redeemed Haydn's rather dry and uninteresting aria, "Behold Along the Dewy Grass," which turned out to be a French rendering of a poor English rendering of the German paraphrase of Thomson's "Seasons," to which Haydn wrote his music. This was received with great applause for no very apparent reason; and then, later on in the programme, when the same singer gave a fine dramatic rendering in French of Schumann's "Two Grenadiers," the audience fairly went wild. Called out again and again, Plancon bowed, and bowed, and bowed, for Mr. Paur rather churlishly would have no encore, and apparently that is what every one wanted; perhaps "Home Sweet Home." Now, the curious thing about the enthusiasm is this: One might have imagined from the demonstration that Philadelphia was Plancon crazy, and yet when he sang recently in "Faust," with Eames as "Marguerite," and sang for nearly four hours in his greatest role, Philadelphia hardly knew of it. This is the oddity. If Plancon came to-morrow it is not certain that he would fill a small hall.

As far as the general programme was concerned last night it was not notable, and at all events it would have been better had the last number been first, for if Swetana's symphonic poem is to be heard it is more digestible as a sort of after-clap than as an appetizer. The orchestra wreaked its united vengeance on the music fully, and as a rendering it was all one could ask for who likes that sort of melodramatic bombast. One of the delightful features of the evening was Bizet's dainty little suite, "Children's Games." As a writer for orchestra Bizet knew what he wanted to do and did it in the most enhancing and convincing manner. The various movements of this suite, particularly the berceuse and the duo for strings, were beautifully handled, although they approach almost the character of chamber music, and seem overloaded with the huge orchestra, even if it be not fully employed on the rendition. The symphony, Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony, was handled in the orchestra's best style and particularly in the very Scottish vivace and final movement gave great pleasure.

But even with Plancon the evening's work does not compare with the orchestra's best programmes of other dates.

THE RECORD

Philadelphia, January 19, 1897.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The power which a mere song, magnetically sung, has to sway a vast audience to the wildest enthusiasm was strikingly illustrated at the Academy of Music last evening, when M. Pol Plancon had finished Schumann's stirring episode of "the Two Grenadiers." There was such tumultuous applause as even Napoleon and his eagles might have thought no mean tribute, and it began to look at one time, through the reckless behavior of an upper gallery contingent of hypnotized listeners, as though even Mendelssohn's great "Scotch" Symphony would be obliged to play second bagpipe to Schumann's Marseillaise hymn as interpreted by the splendid French basso. But, happily, the storm cleared up after a little innocuous thunder-clapping, and the Gathering of Mendelssohn's Clans began. Nor can one begrudge the picturesue M. Pol his full share of applause, for his singing of this one familiar favorite is enough of a lyric masterpiece to stamp him as an ideal artist. His two Napoleonic soldiers stand beside his Mephisto and San Bris, in miniature—to be sure—but, nevertheless, elbow to elbow. As for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's twelfth local season, it was notably delightful throughout. The Symphony was magnificently interpreted, with extremely few fantastical readings, and the two Pauresque selections—Smetana's symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp" (on Schiller's drama) and Georges Bizet's little suite, "Children's Games"—both proved to be enjoyable novelties. Bizet's charming conceit is, indeed, worthy of the creator of "Carmen." Its dainty doll berceuse with the cradle rhythm in the 'celli, and its Watteau-like duo between the Little Husband and Little Wife, were exquisite. The top impromptu oddly mimicked the winding, spinning, wobbling and abrupt collapse of a top.

JANUARY 19, 1897

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Brilliant Program Rendered at the Academy Last Night.

The third concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, was given last night at the Academy of Music. The first number on the program was the symphonic poem "Wallenstein's Camp," one of the posthumous works of Bedrich Smetana, a Bohemian composer, who took for his theme the first part of Schiller's Wallenstein trilogy. It had never been played at these concerts. It is a piece that serves to bring out the full resources of the orchestra, and pictures in the richest tone colors old time camp life. Now the music crashes and swells, again it is as if in triumph, again it is laughing and joyous, and yet again there come the most delicate and plaintive harmonies. The short andante was delightfully played by the strings and wood winds, and in the march with which the poem closes, the trumpet effects were thrilling and inspiring. The Little Suite "Children's Games," by Bizet, which was also given for the first time, was unspeakably dainty in its suggestions of child life and pleasures. The first movement was a march theme that sounded as if played by toy drums and trumpets, and the other movements, entitled respectively "the doll," "the top," "little husband, little wife" and "the ball," were marvels of delicate purity. Besides their Dresden china beauty, it seemed hard to believe that the same composer could have written the glowing and sensuous music of "Carmen." The closing instrumental number was the Mendelssohn Symphony in A minor, otherwise the Scotch symphony. In it the composer has caught the spirit of the old Jacobite and love melodies of Scotland, which carry with them a charm peculiarly their own, and that alternate dreamy sadness and joyousness which belong to the folk music of all mountainous countries.

The rhythmical life or clearness of the passage structure was never blurred by the orchestra, and each movement was enriched with color and vitality. The strings, which at all times seem mellow marvels, were last night more luscious and intense than ever, and the balance of artistic proportion was never lost sight of.

The vocalist of the evening was M. Pol Plancon. He sang the air "Behold, along the dewy grass," from Haydn's "Seasons," with the utmost purity of expression and intonation, and in the rubato the flexibility and richness of his voice were strongly manifested. It was, however, in Schumann's "Two Grenadiers" that he achieved a triumph. There was dramatic expression in every note, the phrasing was clear and limpid and the alternate strength and tenderness of the soldier were breathed forth with the most artistic shading and freedom. The "Marseillaise," with which the song closes, was rendered with such fire and magnificent effect that the vast audience gave itself up to a perfect furore of enthusiasm, and called out the singer again and again, until he seemed to be constantly passing to the footlights and back to the side scenes. But he would not respond to an encore, which, under the circumstances, seemed rather ungracious. It was a little thing for him, it meant much to his enthusiastic admirers.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Tuesday, Jan. 19, 1897.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the Academy of Music, last evening, Herr Emil Paur, the distinguished leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, divided the honors with Monsieur Pol Plancon, its distinguished soloist. M. Plancon sang an air, "Behold, Along the Dewy Grass," from Haydn's "The Seasons," and Schumann's "The Two Grenadiers." He was liberally applauded for the first and rapturously applauded for the second, being summoned to the front of the stage nearly a dozen times. He was in excellent voice and his interpretation of the Schumann song was admirable, the French colony in the galleries being wrought up to an ecstatic pitch of enthusiasm.

The programme opened with a symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp," by Bedrich Smetana, a Bohemian composer, who died in Prague a dozen years ago. The music is of the Hungarian order, full of wild dashes and rude harmonies, and the piece is a welcome addition to the repertory of the orchestra. Next came a suite, "Children's Games," by Georges Bizet, which was possibly the most popular performance of the evening. The parts were widely contrasted, yet all were dainty, tuneful and almost playful in their tenderness of fancy. The pièce de résistance was Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3, in A minor ("Scotch"). This grandly melodious work was given with all the care, precision and fluent shading which has made Mr. Paur's corps of musicians almost illustrious, certainly notable. The orchestra under its conductor's skilful baton was swayed as one man, and the result was a performance of uncommon excellence. The audience was large, fashionable and appreciative, and the programme was generally admitted to be one of the most successful ever offered by the Boston Symphony organization.

1/20 News

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place on Wednesday, January 20, at the Music Hall. The program has been decided upon and will be the following: Overture, "Freischuetz," Little Suite; "Children Games," by Bizet, and the fourth symphony by Tschaikowsky. The soloist at this concert will be Sig. Campanari, the eminent baritone of the Abbey & Grau Metropolitan Opera forces.

The Times

TWELVE PAGES

PHILADELPHIA, JANUARY 19, 1897

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Orchestra, With Plancon, in a Beautiful Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra may have given more important concerts than that at the Academy of Music last night, but seldom one that gave such unalloyed pleasure to a crowded audience. Perhaps an exception might be made of the opening number, Smetana's so-called symphonic poem of "Wallenstein's Camp." That is realizes much of the noise and turbulence of a camp will not be denied, and this is the strongest impression that it leaves, though Smetana is never without musical ideas. But there is nothing confused or turbulent, though there is strength and dignity as well as poetry and sentiment, in Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony, of which beautiful work Mr. Paur gave an entirely satisfying performance, at once appreciative and masterful, that would have made the concert delightful if it had done nothing else. The second novelty, after the Smetana, was a charming little suite of "Children's Games" by Bizet, never played here before. They are slight things, but exceedingly spirituelle and witty and instrumented with a dainty discretion and brightness quite worthy of the masterhand of "Carmen." The soloist was Pol Plancon, who sang an aria from Haydn's "Seasons"—"Behold, along the dewy grass"—that sounded rather trivial in French, though he gave it with unimpeachable style, and then the "Two Grenadiers," one of the noblest of songs, which he declaimed not merely with consummate vocal effect but with an emotional power that was electrifying. It is not often that a man can so move a crowd with a simple and familiar song. He was recalled again and again and the audience evidently wanted to hear it again.

1/21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Paur's Artistic Leadership and Campanari's Vocal Efforts Combine to Make a Perfect Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played last night at the Music Hall in such a manner as to make lapses in the past seem impossible. Mr. Paur was in his very best mood, and led his men with a conviction and a sympathetic appreciation of his programme, which appealed in the strongest manner to the audience. The only unfavorable comment—and this was universally made—was upon placing of the symphony at the end of the programme. This was unfair to the audience, already taken by the other numbers, and it also added an unnecessary burden to the wearied players.

In spite, however, of its unfortunate position on the programme, the Tschaikowsky symphony in F minor made a deep impression. It is a work big with meaning—pervaded by an intense nobility which amounts at times almost to religious exultation. The orchestration is highly colored, without being cheap—barbaric, without any trace of offensiveness. As is customary with its author, liberal use has been made of the Russian popular airs, through which its composition gains in directness and spontaneity.

The fascinating suite of Bizet, "Children's Games," served as an effective foil to the massive symphony.

The charm of this novel piece consists in the delicate orchestral workmanship which rescues a rather trite subject from the slightest reproach of triviality. Its unconventionality was at first bewildering, but the delicate beauty of the themes causes it to bear the same relation to a larger work that a miniature painting has to a large canvas.

Since Campanari's first appearance here in opera, several years ago, Baltimoreans have taken more than an ordinary interest in his career. It was here that he made his first great success—one that served to establish him firmly as an operatic singer of serious pretentions. His annual appearance with the Boston Orchestra is therefore looked forward to with pleasure.

"Dio Passente," the baritone area from "Faust," arranged originally from a melody occurring in the overture for the English baritone Santley, and the romance to "The Evening Star," from "Tannhaeuser," were the singer's selections—familiar, almost hackneyed, but, through the impassioned singing of Campanari, invested with new interest and new suggestiveness.

Taken altogether, the concert was as near perfection as beautiful singing and admirable orchestral playing could make it.

1/21 News

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Good Attendance Notwithstanding the Weather.

Notwithstanding the bad weather, the attendance at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall last night was large, the immense auditorium being nearly full. The "Fourth Symphony" by Tschaikowsky, given at the end of the concert, received noble treatment at the hands of the performers. It is a fantastical work, and the movement is gorgeous and tremendous. Bizet's "Children's Games" was something new. It describes incidents connected with childhood, and is exceedingly graceful and melodious. The overture to "Freischutz" was likewise played.

The soloist was Signor Campanari, who is well known here from his appearance in opera. He gave a selection from "Faust" and the star song from "Tannhauser." He has a superb voice and received much applause, but no encore numbers were allowed.

The Orchestra left at midnight for New York, where a concert will be given in the Metropolitan Opera House tonight.

1/21

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Tschikowsky's Wonderful Powers Interpreted by the Well Balanced and Strong Orchestra.

The attendance last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall was fair, considering the horrible weather. Those who braved the rain and slush were repaid, for the concert was one of the most interesting given this season. There were two novelties, the most important being Tschaikowsky's "Fourth Symphony." This is a massive sort of work, but very strange and striking in many particulars. In the first movement, which is the longest, there are many curious contrasts and eccentricities, the whole orchestra being used in working up to some of the climaxes with telling effect. It is a wild sort of movement. One might imagine the composer trying to describe a ride of rushing Cossacks, or a battle of untamed men. In some places the powers of the performers on the brass instruments were considerably taxed. Russian features can be readily traced.

In the second movement a melancholy sort of march theme and a peasant song are developed with skill, and quite in the composer's vein. The effects are strongly marked. The strings do admirable work. The third is one of the oddest movements ever put in a symphony. Three themes are put in contrast—one for string picking, one for wood wind, and a third for the brass and light drums. The treatment of them is very ingenious and original. It is a lively scherzo, and was played in a stirring fashion. The strangeness of the effect was enhanced by the fact that not once during the movement was a bow used. In the fourth movement, which is in the rondo form, the opening—in fact, nearly the whole movement—is taken at a breakneck speed. The whole orchestra is brought into play, and in the working out of the three themes a tremendous effect is produced. The volume of sound from such a large body of players is astonishing.

The whole symphony impresses one with the idea that the composer was making an effort to discover what effects he could produce with a large, modern orchestra. It exhibits Tschaikowsky's power as a composer, but the symphony is not likely to be as popular as "The Pathetic" and others from his pen. It furnishes plenty of work for an orchestra.

The other novelty was Bizet's little suite, "Children's Games," which is one of the daintiest and most charming orchestral pieces heard here in a long time. It is in five parts—"the trumpeter and drummer," "the doll," "the top," "little husband, little wife," and "the ball." All sorts of sweet and touching effects are produced—light, graceful and moving. The second movement is a cradle melody, soft and tender; and the fourth is a dialogue between the first violins and the 'cellos, nothing but strings being used throughout the movement. It was handled with great delicacy and skill by the orchestra. The remaining orchestral number was Weber's overture to "Freischutz," often played, but very rarely in such a broad, glorious style as last night. The splendid burst of chords near the close was delivered in stirring style.

Signor Campanari sang "Dio Possente," from "Faust," and "Evening Star" air, from Tannhauser, in his best manner. His voice was of splendid volume and fine timbre, and the effect in both songs was such that the audience applauded him to the echo. He was called back again and again, but no encore was given. His voice is such a high baritone, and of such strength, that he could do duty as a robust tenor. His reception showed how popular he is in Baltimore.

1/7

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Boston Symphony Concert at the New Music Hall.

The third concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall is announced for Wednesday evening, January 20, with Mr. G. Campanari as the soloist, who will sing the aria "Dio Possente" from "Faust," and the aria "Evening Star" from "Tannhauser," by Wagner. Mr. Campanari is too great a favorite in Baltimore to need any further praise. The program will open with Weber's beautiful overture from "Freischutz." This opera was brought out at the Court Opera in Berlin on June 18, 1820. The literal English translation of the German word freischutz, "free marksman," does not in the least convey its meaning. The proper interpretation of the title is a marksman who uses free or charmed bullets, which fly to the mark of themselves without depending upon the marksman's aim. The second orchestral selection is Bizet's little suite, familiarly known as "Children's Games." This suite was orchestrated by Bizet from a collection of twelve piano pieces for four hands at the request of the French conductor Colonne, who asked Bizet for some unpublished work to present at the first of a series of Sunday concerts which were given in the Odeon, Paris, in 1873. The orchestration is very refined and telling. The program closes with the Symphony No. 4 of Tschaikowsky, which, like the Bizet suite, has its first presentation in this city.

1/15

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ARRIVES.

Campanari to Come From New York Tomorrow.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in town this afternoon and went to the Carrollton Hotel. After the Kneisel concert at Assembly Hall of Music Hall this afternoon the orchestra will go over to Washington and give its regular concert there tonight. After the concert it will return to Baltimore, remaining here until after its concert at Music Hall tomorrow night. Sig. Campanari, the soloist, from the Metropolitan Opera Company, will not sing in Washington tonight, but will come direct from New York tomorrow for the concert here. The programme tomorrow night will be as follows: Weber, overture, "Freischuetz;" Gounod, aria, "Faust;" Bizet, "Little Suite;" Wagner, aria, "Tannhauser," and Tschaikowsky, Sym-

---

Jewish Comment

Coming Symphony Concert..

The third concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Music Hall, is announced for Wednesday evening, January 20, with Mr. G. Campanari as the soloist, who will sing the aria "Dio Possente" from "Faust," and the aria "Evening Star" from "Tannhauser," by Wagner. Mr. Campanari is too great a favorite in Baltimore to need any further praise.

The programme will open with Weber's beautiful overture from "Freischutz." This opera was brought out at the Court Opera in Berlin, on June 18, 1820. The literal English translation of the German word Frieschutz, "free marksman," does not in the least convey its meaning. The proper interpretation of the title is a marksman who uses free or charmed bullets, which fly to the mark of themselves without depending upon the marksman's aim.

The second orchestral selection is Bizet's "Little Suite," familiarly known as "Children's Games." This suite was orchestrated by Bizet from a collection of 12 piano pieces for four hands, at the request of the French conductor Colonne, who asked Bizet for some unpublished work to present at the first of a series of Sunday concerts, which were given in the Odeon. Paris, in 1873. The orchestration is very refined and telling. The programme closes with the Symphony No. 4, of Tschaikowsky, which like the Bizet Suite, has its first presentation in this city. Of the performance of this most interesting work for the first time in Boston in the concert of November 28, a comment of one of the leading critics was that "the performance of the symphony was a memorable one, for its color, beauty and its dazzling splendor."

News 4/16 97

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston Orchestra Next Wednesday With Campanari.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert of its annual series in Music Hall next Wednesday evening. Conductor Paur has prepared an attractive

"recognition" for their party services. As matters now stand, the new President could not undo what has been done in this regard by President Cleveland. But the new President could, if he felt so disposed, reorganize the Civil Service Commission and in that way compel the adoption of such rules as would open the door to the demands of Republican spoilsmen. That this class of Republican statesmen are thoroughly in earnest in their desire to obtain a goodly share of the offices for those who aided them in the recent campaign, and in other campaigns as well, is shown by the resolution introduced in the Senate by Senator Cullom since his return from Canton, where he had a conference with the President-elect. This resolution calls upon the Civil Service Commission to report to Congress whether "in obedience to the requirements of the civil service law the said Commission has made to the President for transmission to Congress an annual report for the fiscal year 1895, and

---

Journal 1/10

• • •

The third concert of the series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place on Wednesday, January 20, at the Music Hall. The programme has been decided upon, ond will be the following: Overture, "Freischultz," Weber; "Little Suite Children's Games," Biset, and "Fourth Symphony," by Tschaikowsky. The soloist will be Signor Campanari, the well-kown baritone of the Metropolitan Opera, who is readily conceded to be the best singer of this character in the company today.

Sun 1/15

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces the third concert of its annual series in Music Hall for Wednesday evening, January 20. Conductor Paur has prepared an especially attractive programme. The soloist will be Mr. G. Campanari, from the ranks of the New York Metropolitan Opera Company, an established favorite in Baltimore. Mr. Campanari will sing for his first selection the aria "Dio Possente," from "Faust," and for a second selection the aria "Evening Star," from "Tannhaeuser," by Wagner.

Philadelphia Inquirer
UESDAY JANUARY 19. 1897

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Brilliant Program Rendered at the Academy Last Night.

The third concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, was given last night at the Academy of Music. The first number on the program was the symphonic poem "Wallenstein's Camp," one of the posthumous works of Bedrich Smetana, a Bohemian composer, who took for his theme the first part of Schiller's Wallenstein trilogy. It had never been played at these concerts. It is a piece that serves to bring out the full resources of the orchestra, and pictures in the richest tone colors old time camp life. Now the music crashes and swells, again it is as if in triumph, again it is laughing and joyous, and yet again there come the most delicate and plaintive harmonies. The short andante was delightfully played by the strings and wood winds, and in the march with which the poem closes, the trumpet effects were thrilling and inspiring. The Little Suite "Children's Games," by Bizet, which was also given for the first time, was unspeakably dainty in its suggestions of child life and pleasures. The first movement was a march theme that sounded as if played by toy drums and trumpets, and the other movements, entitled respectively "the doll," "the top," "little husband, little wife" and "the ball," were marvels of delicate purity. Besides their Dresden china beauty, it seemed hard to believe that the same composer could have written the glowing and sensuous music of "Carmen." The closing instrumental number was the Mendelssohn Symphony in A minor, otherwise the Scotch symphony. In it the composer has caught the spirit of the old Jacobite and love melodies of Scotland, which carry with them a charm peculiarly their own, and that alternate dreamy sadness and joyousness which belong to the folk music of all mountainous countries.

The rhythmical life or clearness of the passage structure was never blurred by the orchestra, and each movement was enriched with color and vitality. The strings, which at all times seem mellow marvels, were last night more luscious and intense than ever, and the balance of artistic proportion was never lost sight of.

The vocalist of the evening was M. Pol Plancon. He sang the air "Behold, along the dewy grass," from Haydn's "Seasons," with the utmost purity of expression and intonation, and in the rubato the flexibility and richness of his voice were strongly manifested. It was, however, in Schumann's "Two Grenadiers" that he achieved a triumph. There was dramatic expression in every note, the phrasing was clear and limpid and the alternate strength and tenderness of the soldier were breathed forth with the most artistic shading and freedom. The "Marseillaise," with which the song closes, was rendered with such fire and magnificent effect that the vast audience gave itself up to a perfect furore of enthusiasm, and called out the singer again and again, until he seemed to be constantly passing to the footlights and back to the side scenes. But he would not respond to an encore, which, under the circumstances, seemed rather ungracious. It was a little thing for him, it meant much to his enthusiastic admirers.

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Tuesday, Jan. 19, 1897.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the Academy of Music, last evening, Herr Emil Paur, the distinguished leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, divided the honors with Monsieur Pol Plancon, its distinguished soloist. M. Plancon sang an air, "Behold, Along the Dewy Grass," from Haydn's "The Seasons," and Schumann's "The Two Grenadiers." He was liberally applauded for the first and rapturously applauded for the second, being summoned to the front of the stage nearly a dozen times. He was in excellent voice and his interpretation of the Schumann song was admirable, the French colony in the galleries being wrought up to an ecstatic pitch of enthusiasm.

The programme opened with a symphonic poem, "Wallenstein's Camp," by Bedrich Smetana, a Bohemian composer, who died in Prague a dozen years ago. The music is of the Hungarian order, full of wild dashes and rude harmonies, and the piece is a welcome addition to the repertory of the orchestra. Next came a suite, "Children's Games," by Georges Bizet, which was possibly the most popular performance of the evening. The parts were widely contrasted, yet all were dainty, tuneful and almost playful in their tenderness of fancy. The pièce de résistance was Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3, in A minor ("Scotch"). This grandly melodious work was given with all the care, precision and fluent shading which has made Mr. Paur's corps of musicians almost illustrious, certainly notable. The orchestra under its conductor's skilful baton was swayed as one man, and the result was a performance of uncommon excellence. The audience was large, fashionable and appreciative, and the programme was generally admitted to be one of the most successful ever offered by the Boston Symphony organization.

1/20 News

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place on Wednesday, January 20, at the Music Hall. The program has been decided upon and will be the following: Overture, "Freischuetz," Little Suite; "Children Games," by Bizet ,and the fourth symphony by Tschaikowsky. The soloist at this concert will be Sig. Campanari, the eminent baritone of the Abbey & Grau Metropolitan Opera forces.

The Times
TWELVE PAGES
PHILADELPHIA, JANUARY 19, 1897

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Orchestra, With Plancon, in a Beautiful Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra may have given more important concerts than that at the Academy of Music last night, but seldom one that gave such unalloyed pleasure to a crowded audience. Perhaps an exception might be made of the opening number, Smetana's so-called symphonic poem of "Wallenstein's Camp." That is realizes much of the noise and turbulence of a camp will not be denied, and this is the strongest impression that it leaves, though Smetana is never without musical ideas. But there is nothing confused or turbulent, though there is strength and dignity as well as poetry and sentiment, in Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony, of which beautiful work Mr. Paur gave an entirely satisfying performance, at once appreciative and masterful, that would have made the concert delightful if it had done nothing else. The second novelty, after the Smetana, was a charming little suite of "Children's Games" by Bizet, never played here before. They are slight things, but exceedingly spirituelle and witty and instrumented with a dainty discretion and brightness quite worthy of the masterhand of "Carmen." The soloist was Pol Plancon, who sang an aria from Haydn's "Seasons"—"Behold, along the dewy grass" —that sounded rather trivial in French, though he gave it with unimpeachable style, and then the "Two Grenadiers," one of the noblest of songs, which he declaimed not merely with consummate vocal effect but with an emotional power that was electrifying. It is not often that a man can so move a crowd with a simple and familiar song. He was recalled again and again and the audience evidently wanted to hear it again.

21

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Paur's Artistic Leadership and Campanari's Vocal Efforts Combine to Make a Perfect Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played last night at the Music Hall in such a manner as to make lapses in the past seem impossible. Mr. Paur was in his very best mood, and led his men with a conviction and a sympathetic appreciation of his programme, which appealed in the strongest manner to the audience. The only unfavorable comment—and this was universally made—was upon placing of the symphony at the end of the programme. This was unfair to the audience, already taken by the other numbers, and it also added an unnecessary burden to the wearied players.

In spite, however, of its unfortunate position on the programme, the Tschaikowsky symphony in F minor made a deep impression. It is a work big with meaning—pervaded by an intense nobility which amounts at times almost to religious exultation. The orchestration is highly colored, without being cheap—barbaric, without any trace of offensiveness. As is customary with its author, liberal use has been made of the Russian popular airs, through which its composition gains in directness and spontaneity.

The fascinating suite of Bizet, "Children's Games," served as an effective foil to the massive symphony.

The charm of this novel piece consists in the delicate orchestral workmanship which rescues a rather trite subject from the slightest reproach of triviality. Its unconventionality was at first bewildering, but the delicate beauty of the themes causes it to bear the same relation to a larger work that a miniature painting has to a large canvas.

Since Campanari's first appearance here in opera, several years ago, Baltimoreans have taken more than an ordinary interest in his career. It was here that he made his first great success—one that served to establish him firmly as an operatic singer of serious pretentions. His annual appearance with the Boston Orchestra is therefore looked forward to with pleasure.

"Dio Passente," the baritone area from "Faust," arranged originally from a melody occurring in the overture for the English baritone Santley, and the romance to "The Evening Star," from "Tannhaeuser," were the singer's selections—familiar, almost hackneyed, but, through the impassioned singing of Campanari, invested with new interest and new suggestiveness.

Taken altogether, the concert was as near perfection as beautiful singing and admirable orchestral playing could make it.

1/21 News

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Good Attendance Notwithstanding the Weather.

Notwithstanding the bad weather, the attendance at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall last night was large, the immense auditorium being nearly full. The "Fourth Symphony" by Tschaikowsky, given at the end of the concert, received noble treatment at the hands of the performers. It is a fantastical work, and the movement is gorgeous and tremendous. Bizet's "Children's Games" was something new. It describes incidents connected with childhood, and is exceedingly graceful and melodious. The overture to "Freischutz" was likewise played.

The soloist was Signor Campanari, who is well known here from his appearance in opera. He gave a selection from "Faust" and the star song from "Tannhauser." He has a superb voice and received much applause, but no encore numbers were allowed.

The Orchestra left at midnight for New York, where a concert will be given in the Metropolitan Opera House tonight.

1/21

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Tschikowsky's Wonderful Powers Interpreted by the Well Balanced and Strong Orchestra.

The attendance last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall was fair, considering the horrible weather. Those who braved the rain and slush were repaid, for the concert was one of the most interesting given this season. There were two novelties, the most important being Tschaikowsky's "Fourth Symphony." This is a massive sort of work, but very strange and striking in many particulars. In the first movement, which is the longest, there are many curious contrasts and eccentricities, the whole orchestra being used in working up to some of the climaxes with telling effect. It is a wild sort of movement. One might imagine the composer trying to describe a ride of rushing Cossacks, or a battle of untamed men. In some places the powers of the performers on the brass instruments were considerably taxed. Russian features can be readily traced.

In the second movement a melancholy sort of march theme and a peasant song are developed with skill, and quite in the composer's vein. The effects are strongly marked. The strings do admirable work. The third is one of the oddest movements ever put in a symphony. Three themes are put in contrast—one for string picking, one for wood wind, and a third for the brass and light drums. The treatment of them is very ingenious and original. It is a lively scherzo, and was played in a stirring fashion. The strangeness of the effect was enhanced by the fact that not once during the movement was a bow used. In the fourth movement, which is in the rondo form, the opening—in fact, nearly the whole movement—is taken at a breakneck speed. The whole orchestra is brought into play, and in the working out of the three themes a tremendous effect is produced. The volume of sound from such a large body of players is astonishing.

The whole symphony impresses one with the idea that the composer was making an effort to discover what effects he could produce with a large, modern orchestra. It exhibits Tschaikowsky's power as a composer, but the symphony is not likely to be as popular as "The Pathetic" and others from his pen. It furnishes plenty of work for an orchestra.

The other novelty was Bizet's little suite, "Children's Games," which is one of the daintiest and most charming orchestral pieces heard here in a long time. It is in five parts—"the trumpeter and drummer," "the doll," "the top," "little husband, little wife," and "the ball." All sorts of sweet and touching effects are produced—light, graceful and moving. The second movement is a cradle melody, soft and tender; and the fourth is a dialogue between the first violins and the 'cellos, nothing but strings being used throughout the movement. It was handled with great delicacy and skill by the orchestra. The remaining orchestral number was Weber's overture to "Freischutz," often played, but very rarely in such a broad, glorious style as last night. The splendid burst of chords near the close was delivered in stirring style.

Signor Campanari sang "Dio Possente," from "Faust," and "Evening Star" air, from Tannhauser, in his best manner. His voice was of splendid volume and fine timbre, and the effect in both songs was such that the audience applauded him to the echo. He was called back again and again, but no encore was given. His voice is such a high baritone, and of such strength, that he could do duty as a robust tenor. His reception showed how popular he is in Baltimore.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Boston Symphony Concert at the New Music Hall.

The third concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall is announced for Wednesday evening, January 20, with Mr. G. Campanari as the soloist, who will sing the aria "Dio Possente" from "Faust," and the aria "Evening Star" from "Tannhauser," by Wagner. Mr. Campanari is too great a favorite in Baltimore to need any further praise. The program will open with Weber's beautiful overture from "Freischutz." This opera was brought out at the Court Opera in Berlin on June 18, 1820. The literal English translation of the German word freischutz, "free marksman," does not in the least convey its meaning. The proper interpretation of the title is a marksman who uses free or charmed bullets, which fly to the mark of themselves without depending upon the marksman's aim. The second orchestral selection is Bizet's little suite, familiarly known as "Children's Games." This suite was orchestrated by Bizet from a collection of twelve piano pieces for four hands at the request of the French conductor Colonne, who asked Bizet for some unpublished work to present at the first of a series of Sunday concerts which were given in the Odeon, Paris, in 1873. The orchestration is very refined and telling. The program closes with the Symphony No. 4 of Tschaikowsky, which, like the Bizet suite, has its first presentation in this city.

1/5

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ARRIVES.

Campanari to Come From New York Tomorrow.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in town this afternoon and went to the Carrollton Hotel. After the Kneisel concert at Assembly Hall of Music Hall this afternoon the orchestra will go over to Washington and give its regular concert there tonight. After the concert it will return to Baltimore, remaining here until after its concert at Music Hall tomorrow night. Sig. Campanari, the soloist, from the Metropolitan Opera Company, will not sing in Washington tonight, but will come direct from New York tomorrow for the concert here. The programme tomorrow night will be as follows: Weber, overture, "Freischuetz;" Gounod, aria, "Faust;" Bizet, "Little Suite;" Wagner, aria, "Tannhauser," and Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 4.

[77]

Jewish Comment

Coming Symphony Concert..

The third concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Music Hall, is announced for Wednesday evening, January 20, with Mr. G. Campanari as the soloist, who will sing the aria "Dio Possente" from "Faust," and the aria "Evening Star" from "Tannhauser," by Wagner. Mr. Campanari is too great a favorite in Baltimore to need any further praise.

The programme will open with Weber's beautiful overture from "Freischutz." This opera was brought out at the Court Opera in Berlin, on June 18, 1820. The literal English translation of the German word Frieschutz, "free marksman," does not in the least convey its meaning. The proper interpretation of the title is a marksman who uses free or charmed bullets, which fly to the mark of themselves without depending upon the marksman's aim.

The second orchestral selection is Bizet's "Little Suite,"familiarly known as "Children's Games." This suite was orchestrated by Bizet from a collection of 12 piano pieces for four hands, at the request of the French conductor Colonne, who asked Bizet for some unpublished work to present at the first of a series of Sunday concerts, which were given in the Odeon. Paris, in 1873. The orchestration is very refined and telling.

The programme closes with the Symphony No. 4, of Tschaikowsky, which like the Bizet Suite, has its first presentation in this city. Of the performance of this most interesting work for the first time in Boston in the concert of November 28. a comment of one of the leading critics was that "the performance of the symphony was a memorable one, for its color, beauty and its dazzling splendor."

News 1/16 97

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston Orchestra Next Wednesday With Campanari.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert of its annual series in Music Hall next Wednesday evening. Conductor Paur has prepared an attractive

"recognition" for their party services. As matters now stand, the new President could not undo what has been done in this regard by President Cleveland. But the new President could, if he felt so disposed, reorganize the Civil Service Commission and in that way compel the adoption of such rules as would open the door to the demands of Republican spoilsmen. That this class of Republican statesmen are thoroughly in earnest in their desire to obtain a goodly share of the offices for those who aided them in the recent campaign, and in other campaigns as well, is shown by the resolution introduced in the Senate by Senator Cullom since his return from Canton, where he had a conference with the President-elect. This resolution calls upon the Civil Service Commission to report to Congress whether "in obedience to the requirements of the civil service law the said Commission has made to the President for transmission to Congress an annual report for the fiscal year 1895, and

---

Herald 1/10

• • •

The third concert of the series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place on Wednesday, January 20, at the Music Hall. The programme has been decided upon, ond will be the following: Overture, "Freischultz," Weber; "Little Suite Children's Games," Biset, and "Fourth Symphony," by Tschaikowsky, The soloist will be Signor Campanari, the well-kown baritone of the Metropolitan Opera, who is readily conceded to be the best singer of this character in the company today.

Sun 1/15

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces the third concert of its annual series in Music Hall for Wednesday evening, January 20. Conductor Paur has prepared an especially attractive programme. The soloist will be Mr. G. Campanari, from the ranks of the New York Metropolitan Opera Company, an established favorite in Baltimore. Mr. Campanari will sing for his first selection the aria "Dio Possente," from "Faust," and for a second selection the aria "Evening Star," from "Tannhaeuser," by Wagner.

Herset

Coming Symphony Concert.

The third concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Music Hall, is announced for Wednesday evening, January 20, with Mr. G. Campanari as the soloist, who will sing the aria "Dio Possente" from "Faust," and the aria "Evening Star" from "Tannhauser," by Wagner. Mr. Campanari is too great a favorite in Baltimore to need any further praise.

The programme will open with Weber's beautiful overture from "Freischutz." This opera was brought out at the Court Opera in Berlin, on June 18, 1820. The literal English translation of the German word Freischutz, "free marksman," does not in the least convey its meaning. The proper interpretation of the title is a marksman who uses free or charmed bullets, which fly to the mark of themselves without depending upon the marksman's aim.

The second orchestral selection is Bizet's "Little Suite," familiarly known as "Children's Games." This suite was orchestrated by Bizet from a collection of 12 piano pieces for four hands, at the request of the French conductor Colonne, who asked Bizet for some unpublished work to present at the first of a series of Sunday concerts, which were given in the Odeon, Paris, in 1873. The orchestration is very refined and telling.

The programme closes with the Symphony No. 4, of Tschaikowsky, which, like the Bizet Suite, has its first presentation in this city. Of the performance of this most interesting work for the first time in Boston in the concert of November 28, a comment of one of the leading critics was that "the performance of the symphony was a memorable one, for its color, beauty and its dazzling splendor."

MR. PAUR'S TRIUMPH.

Under His Leadership the Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives an Excellent Programme in Fine Style.

The drawing qualities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were perhaps never before put to a severer test than last night. Such weather as that which prevailed called for genuine enthusiasm. All the more flattering, therefore, was the tribute implied by the presence at the Music Hall of an audience which must be considered large in view of the circumstance.

And it enjoyed a rare musical treat. Conductor Emil Paur and his splendid organization fairly excelled themselves. The programme, too, seemed to have been chosen with the special intent of heightening the enjoyment in proportion to the discomforts endured going to and returning from the hall. It contained two numbers so seldom given here as to be virtual novelties. Neither of them had before been played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One was Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4, in F minor, and the other Georges Bizet's "Little Suite," so called because it represents children at play.

The former is a stupendous work, full of the composer's eccentricities, but powerful in effect and masterly in execution. In this symphony Berlicz is Russianized. The Frenchman's crashes, his musical torpedoes and fireworks, are all there. But they do not constitute explosions of mirth and excess of boisterous hilarity; they interpret rather the wild outbursts of melancholia, whose only equivalent for joy and pleasure is excitement more or less savage in its aspect. Even the delicate movements, the lighter, more idyllic passages do not reflect unalloyed cheerfulness. They are beautiful in the extreme. An uncouth peasant melody, like that in the second movement, is made to charm. But no matter what them theme, it is tinged with melancholy. Of spontaneous light-heartedness there is none.

The pizzicato ostinato, which constitutes the third movement, has about it something weird, something fantastical, though held in lively rhythm and beautiful in its treatment. Through this not less than the sonorous harmonics of the first movement, the ponderous double fortimisso, the coda, the soul of the composer reveals itself. However much he may give himself an aspec[illegible] gaiety, he cannot conceal the sombre[illegible]hich underlies his nature.

But Tschaikowsky in this symphony shows that he is a past master in orchestration, and his very peculiarities excite admiration. With lights and shades so sharply marked, with themes so deftly interwoven, a conductor who undertakes to interpret the symphony has a difficult task. Mr. Paur gratified the fullest expectations. He showed great delicacy and corresponding vigor. The wealth of color in the composition was beautifully brought out. Round after round of applause rewarded him.

A thankful rendition was also "Little Suite." Its five movements are distinguished chiefly for daintiness. In the first the toy drums and boys' bugles are strongly in evidence, but with this exception the strings and wood wind instruments carry the burden of the work. The whirring motion of a top is splendidly imitated by the 'cellos, and the doll slumber song, as well as the duo "Little Husband, Little Wife," are beautiful bits of tone building. The third orchestral number was the well-known "Freischuetz" overture, which received a dignified, intelligent rendition.

The soloist of the evening was Sign[illegible] G. Campanari, whose fine baritone has been heard here repeatedly in opera and concerts. He was in excellent voice, and sang the aria "Dio Passente," from Gounod's "Faust," and the song to the evening star from Wagner's "Tannhauser" [illegible] He was called out again and again, but would not give an encore.

The third concert of the series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place on Wednesday, January 20, at the Music Hall. The programme has been arranged as follows: Overture, "Freischuetz;" Little Suite, "Children's Games," by Bizet, and the fourth symphony, by Tschaikowsky. Signor Campanari, the famous baritone of the Abbey & Grau Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, will be the soloist.

* * *

Sig. Campanari, the best of baritones, of the Metropolitan Opera House Company, will sing at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the aria "Dio Pessenta," from "Faust," and the aria "Evening Star," from "Tannhauser."

* * *

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place next Wednesday evening at Music Hall.

No orchestra in the last fifteen years has equaled the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and this organization is now considered the best in the world.

* * *

The soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony is Sig. Y. Campanari, the famous baritone, who is too great a favorite in Baltimore to need any further comment.

Every Saturday
1/7

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The third of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place next Wednesday night in Music Hall, on which occasion the popular baritone, Mr. G. Campanari, will be the soloist. Mr. Emil Paur, the conductor of this superb organization of musicians, has arranged a program calculated to please the: varied taste of the audience. The concert opens with Von Weber's overture to Der Freischutz, followed by Gounod's aria from Faust, "Dio Possente, which affords Mr. Campanari full range of his rich voice. A novelty given for the first time at these concerts will be the Little Suite, "Children's Games" Op 22 of Georges Bizet, which includes in its movements march, berceuse, impromptu, duo and galop. This promises to be a most pleasing number and sure to gratify the ear for the less rigidly classic form of music. Wagner's aria "Evening Star" from "Tannhauser," is Campanari's second number and the program terminates with Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4. in F minor, which is regarded as the most brilliant of the works of this composer. Reserved seats now on sale at Albert's.

1/20

Boston Symphony Orchestra Tonight.

The third concert of the series of the Boston symphony concerts takes place this evening at Music Hall.

The programme consists of Weber's overture, "Der Freischuetz;" Bizet's "Little Suite," known as "Children's Games;" Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4. Signor Campanari, the well-known baritone, who has appeared with great success in Baltimore on several occasions, will be the soloist and sing the aria "Dio Possente," from "Faust," and "The Evening Star," from "Tanhauser."

American
10/1

Boston Symphony Concert Tonight.

This evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert for this season at Music Hall. A programme with several novelties has been arranged as follows: Overture, "Freischutz," Weber; "Little Suite," known as "Children's Games," Bizet, and Symphony No. 4, Tschaikowsky. Signor Campanari, whose excellent baritone has been heard before in Baltimore, is the soloist, and will sing the aria "Dio Possente," from "Faust," and the "Evening Star," from "Tannhauser."

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme for the Third of the Series at Music Hall Wednesday.

The third concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall is announced for Wednesday evening, with G. Campanari as the soloist, who will sing the aria, "Dio Possente," from "Faust," and the aria, "Evening Star," from "Tannhauser," by Wagner. Campanari is too great a favorite in Baltimore to need any further praise.

The programme will open with Weber's beautiful overture from "Freischutz." The second orchestral selection is Bizet's "Little Suite," familiarly known as "Children's Games." This suite was orchestrated by Bizet from a collection of 12 piano pieces for four hands, at the request of the French conductor Colonne, who asked Bizet for some unpublished work to present at the first of a series of Sunday concerts, which were given in the Odeon, Paris, in 1873. The orchestration is very refined and telling.

The programme closes with the Symphony No. 4, of Tschaikowsky, which, like the Bizet Suite, has its first presentation in this city.

[illegible]ED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CL, NO. 24.

SUNDAY, JAN. 24, 1897.

The performance of Mozart's "Don Juan" overture last week, at the Symphony concert, brought forth again the old, old story that the composer had been so much occupied in attending the rehearsals of the opera that he could find no time to write the overture until the night before the performance. To copy the received account of the event, as correctly given in the programme book, by Mr. Apthorp: "To write such an overture in a single night—for it had to be finished by morning, as the parts had to be copied out for the orchestra—was, perhaps, no such extraordinary feat for a man like Mozart as it sounds; he was in the habit of planning out and finishing his compositions in his head, before he wrote them down; so what looked like composing was, with hm, often little more than copying from his memory. Still, the feat of memory performed by Mozart on this occasion was, in one particular, surprising. He was so pressed for time that, in writing the score of this overture, he wrote only the parts for strings and wood-wind. After this partial score had been sent off to the copyist, he wrote the parts for horns, trumpets and kettledrums on a separate sheet of music paper, and sent that off later. The ink was still wet on some of the parts when they were put before the players for the first performance. Naturally, the overture had to be played at sight. Mozart warned some of the players, before beginning, saying: 'Gentlemen of the horns, trumpets and drums, I think there is an error in your parts; in one place I think you have either four measures too many or four measures too few; I can't remember which. But be sure to follow my beat, and it will all come right.'" Mozart had, doubtless, an amazing memory, and it is beyond question that he composed in his mind all his works before putting pen to paper. His method of thus working is on record in his own words, but the story quoted is none the less hard of belief. As a mere matter of fact, it is next to impossible that he should have been able, as a mere matter of manual labor, to put the notes on paper in the time named, no heed how rapidly he may have jotted them down. That it was written in great haste is indubitable, for the copyists had all they could do to complete their tasks, and sent some of the parts wet with ink into the orchestra; though why they did not use sand, which was the drying medium of that day, is not clear. The episode of the brass wind and the drums is equally doubtful, and, moreover, how it could "come all right" by following the conductor's beat is a problem, for, as the overture was played "at sight," it was impossible for the performers to know where the four bars too many or too few came in. In either case, the playing would have continued with disastrous effect, seeing that the composer did not know himself whether there was too much or too little in the parts, though he could easily have settled the question by reference to the score. It is to be greatly suspected that this interesting exaggeration of the time taken in committing the overture to paper and the rest of the story are to be taken with a very large pinch of salt.

Herald

Coming Symphony Concert.

The third concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Music Hall, is announced for Wednesday evening, January 20, with Mr. G. Campanari as the soloist, who will sing the aria "Dio Possente" from "Faust," and the aria "Evening Star" from "Tannhauser," by Wagner. Mr. Campanari is too great a favorite in Baltimore to need any further praise.

The programme will open with Weber's beautiful overture from "Freischutz." This opera was brought out at the Court Opera in Berlin, on June 18, 1820. The literal English translation of the German word Freischutz, "free marksman," does not in the least convey its meaning. The proper interpretation of the title is a marksman who uses free or charmed bullets, which fly to the mark of themselves without depending upon the marksman's aim.

The second orchestral selection is Bizet's "Little Suite," familiarly known as "Children's Games." This suite was orchestrated by Bizet from a collection of 12 piano pieces for four hands, at the request of the French conductor Colonne, who asked Bizet for some unpublished work to present at the first of a series of Sunday concerts, which were given in the Odeon, Paris, in 1873. The orchestration is very refined and telling.

The programme closes with the Symphony No. 4, of Tschaikowsky, which, like the Bizet Suite, has its first presentation in this city. Of the performance of this most interesting work for the first time in Boston in the concert of November 28, a comment of one of the leading critics was that "the performance of the symphony was a memorable one, for its color, beauty and its dazzling splendor."

MR. PAUR'S TRIUMPH.

Under His Leadership the Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives an Excellent Programme in Fine Style.

The drawing qualities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were perhaps never before put to a severer test than last night. Such weather as that which prevailed called for genuine enthusiasm. All the more flattering, therefore, was the tribute implied by the presence at the Music Hall of an audience which must be considered large in view of the circumstance.

And it enjoyed a rare musical treat. Conductor Emil Paur and his splendid organization fairly excelled themselves. The programme, too, seemed to have been chosen with the special intent of heightening the enjoyment in proportion to the discomforts endured going to and returning from the hall. It contained two numbers so seldom given here as to be virtual novelties. Neither of them had before been played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One was Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 4, in F minor, and the other Georges Bizet's "Little Suite," so called because it represents children at play.

The former is a stupendous work, full of the composer's eccentricities, but powerful in effect and masterly in execution. In this symphony Berlicz is Russianized. The Frenchman's crashes, his musical torpedoes and fireworks, are all there. But they do not constitute explosions of mirth and excess of boisterous hilarity; they interpret rather the wild outbursts of melancholia, whose only equivalent for joy and pleasure is excitement more or less savage in its aspect. Even the delicate movements, the lighter, more idyllic passages do not reflect unalloyed cheerfulness. They are beautiful in the extreme. An uncouth peasant melody, like that in the second movement, is made to charm. But no matter what them theme, it is tinged with melancholy. Of spontaneous light-heartedness there is none.

The pizzicato ostinato, which constitutes the third movement, has about it something weird, something fantastical, though held in lively rhythm and beautiful in its treatment. Through this not less than the sonorous harmonics of the first movement, the ponderous double fortimisso, the coda, the soul of the composer reveals itself. Howe[illegible]er much he may give himself an aspec[illegible]f gaiety, he cannot conceal the sombre[illegible]ich underlies his nature.

But Tschaikowsky in this symphony shows that he is a past master in orchestration, and his very peculiarities excite admiration. With lights and shades so sharply marked, with themes so deftly interwoven, a conductor who undertakes to interpret the symphony has a difficult task. Mr. Paur gratified the fullest expectations. He showed great delicacy and corresponding vigor. The wealth of color in the composition was beautifully brought out. Round after round of applause rewarded him.

A thankful rendition was also "Little Suite." Its five movements are distinguished chiefly for daintiness. In the first the toy drums and boys' bugles are strongly in evidence, but with this exception the strings and wood wind instruments carry the burden of the work. The whirring motion of a top is splendidly imitated by the 'cellos, and the doll slumber song, as well as the duo "Little Husband, Little Wife," are beautiful bits of tone building. The third orchestral number was the well-known "Freischuetz" overture, which received a dignified, intelligent rendition.

The soloist of the evening was Sign[illegible] G. Campanari, whose fine baritone has been heard here repeatedly in opera and concerts. He was in excellent voice, and sang the aria "Dio Passente," from Gounod's "Faust," and the song to the evening star from Wagner's "Tannhauser" without a fault. He was called out again and again, but would not give an encore.

The third concert of the series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place on Wednesday, January 20, at the Music Hall. The programme has been arranged as follows: Overture, "Freischuetz;" Little Suite, "Children's Games," by Bizet, and the fourth symphony, by Tschaikowsky. Signor Campanari, the famous baritone of the Abbey & Grau Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, will be the soloist.

* * *

Sig. Campanari, the best of baritones, of the Metropolitan Opera House Company, will sing at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the aria "Dio Pessenta," from "Faust," and the aria "Evening Star," from "Tannhauser."

* * *

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place next Wednesday evening at Music Hall.

No orchestra in the last fifteen years has equaled the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, and this organization is now considered the best in the world.

* * *

The soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony is Sig. Y. Campanari, the famous baritone, who is too great a favorite in Baltimore to need any further comment.

Every Saturday

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The third of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place next Wednesday night in Music Hall, on which occasion the popular baritone, Mr. G. Campanari, will be the soloist. Mr. Emil Paur, the conductor of this superb organization of musicians, has arranged a program calculated to please the varied taste of the audience. The concert opens with Von Weber's overture to Der Freischutz, followed by Gounod's aria from Faust, "Dio Possente, which affords Mr. Campanari full range of his rich voice. A novelty given for the first time at these concerts will be the Little Suite, "Children's Games" Op 22 of Georges Bizet, which includes in its movements march, berceuse, impromptu, duo and galop. This promises to be a most pleasing number and sure to gratify the ear for the less rigidly classic form of music. Wagner's aria "Evening Star" from "Tannhauser," is Campanari's second number and the program terminates with Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4, in F minor, which is regarded as the most brilliant of the works of this composer. Reserved seats now on sale at Albert's.

1/20

Boston Symphony Orchestra Tonight.

The third concert of the series of the Boston symphony concerts takes place this evening at Music Hall.

The programme consists of Weber's overture, "Der Freischuetz;" Bizet's "Little Suite," known as "Children's Games;" Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4. Signor Campanari, the well-known baritone, who has appeared with great success in Baltimore on several occasions, will be the soloist and sing the aria "Dio Possente," from "Faust," and "The Evening Star," from "Tanhauser."

American
1/21

Boston Symphony Concert Tonight.

This evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert for this season at Music Hall. A programme with several novelties has been arranged as follows: Overture, "Freischutz," Weber; "Little Suite," known as "Children's Games," Bizet, and Symphony No. 4, Tschaikowsky. Signor Campanari, whose excellent baritone has been heard before in Baltimore, is the soloist, and will sing the aria "Dio Possente," from "Faust," and the "Evening Star," from "Tannhauser."

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme for the Third of the Series at Music Hall Wednesday.

The third concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall is announced for Wednesday evening, with G. Campanari as the soloist, who will sing the aria, "Dio Possente," from "Faust," and the aria, "Evening Star," from "Tannhauser," by Wagner. Campanari is too great a favorite in Baltimore to need any further praise.

The programme will open with Weber's beautiful overture from "Freischutz." The second orchestral selection is Bizet's "Little Suite," familiarly known as "Children's Games." This suite was orchestrated by Bizet from a collection of 12 piano pieces for four hands, at the request of the French conductor Colonne, who asked Bizet for some unpublished work to present at the first of a series of Sunday concerts, which were given in the Odeon, Paris, in 1873. The orchestration is very refined and telling.

The programme closes with the Symphony No. 4, of Tschaikowsky, which, like the Bizet Suite, has its first presentation in this city.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CI., NO. 24.
SUNDAY, JAN. 24, 1897.

The performance of Mozart's "Don Juan" overture last week, at the Symphony concert, brought forth again the old, old story that the composer had been so much occupied in attending the rehearsals of the opera that he could find no time to write the overture until the night before the performance. To copy the received account of the event, as correctly given in the programme book, by Mr. Apthorp: "To write such an overture in a single night—for it had to be finished by morning, as the parts had to be copied out for the orchestra—was, perhaps, no such extraordinary feat for a man like Mozart as it sounds; he was in the habit of planning out and finishing his compositions in his head, before he wrote them down; so what looked like composing was, with hm, often little more than copying from his memory. Still, the feat of memory performed by Mozart on this occasion was, in one particular, surprising. He was so pressed for time that, in writing the score of this overture, he wrote only the parts for strings and wood-wind. After this partial score had been sent off to the copyist, he wrote the parts for horns, trumpets and kettledrums on a separate sheet of music paper, and sent that off later. The ink was still wet on some of the parts when they were put before the players for the first performance. Naturally, the overture had to be played at sight. Mozart warned some of the players, before beginning, saying: 'Gentlemen of the horns, trumpets and drums, I think there is an error in your parts; in one place I think you have either four measures too many or four measures too few; I can't remember which. But be sure to follow my beat, and it will all come right.'" Mozart had, doubtless, an amazing memory, and it is beyond question that he composed in his mind all his works before putting pen to paper. His method of thus working is on record in his own words, but the story quoted is none the less hard of belief. As a mere matter of fact, it is next to impossible that he should have been able, as a mere matter of manual labor, to put the notes on paper in the time named, no heed how rapidly he may have jotted them down. That it was written in great haste is indubitable, for the copyists had all they could do to complete their tasks, and sent some of the parts wet with ink into the orchestra; though why they did not use sand, which was the drying medium of that day, is not clear. The episode of the brass wind and the drums is equally doubtful, and, moreover, how it could "come all right" by following the conductor's beat is a problem, for, as the overture was played "at sight," it was impossible for the performers to know where the four bars too many or too few came in. In either case, the playing would have continued with disastrous effect, seeing that the composer did not know himself whether there was too much or too little in the parts, though he could easily have settled the question by reference to the score. It is to be greatly suspected that this interesting exaggeration of the time taken in committing the overture to paper and the rest of the story are to be taken with a very large pinch of salt.

[78]

MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 27, 1897.

Boston Symphony Concert.

THE third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last Thursday night at the Metropolitan Opera House, and attracted the largest audience of the season. Melba was too ill to sing, and so contented herself with sitting in a box and listening. Edouard de Reszké, who was announced, did not appear, and instead we got the valiant Pol Plançon, who was in excellent voice, and gave the well-known bass aria from Verdi's Don Carlos and Schumann's The Two Grenadiers, the latter being his usual Sunday night anthem. He was most liberally applauded, but wisely declined repeating the Schumann song.

There were two orchestral novelties in Mr. Paur's program. A symphonic poem by the Bohemian composer, Smetana, called Wallenstein's Camp, that proved almost as noisy as Tschaikowsky's 1812 overture, and not by any means as interesting, as sustained, or as fine a piece of writing as Rheinberger's treatment of a similar theme from Schiller's Wallenstein Trilogy. Smetana's is a military episode, stirring, rather coarse, and extremely harsh, with its trumpet fanfares "off stage" and its percussive climaxes. It was, nevertheless, virile music, and contained some interesting writing. The second novelty was selections from Engelbert Humperdinck's music to King's Children, another fairy story of the Hänsel und Gretel type.

This composer has a charm—the charm of sensuous, well-sounding orchestration. His model is Wagner, and so in the introduction to the third act of the new fairy tale we got music that was in the true Wagner vernacular. Grafted most deftly with the desperate yearning and passionate Tristan character of the first section was a quaint, volks-like melody, and this seems to be Humperdinck's curious recipe, the commingling of all that is new, even decadent, in music with the naïve, the child-like. That it has an artificial character at times cannot be denied. Yet some of the numbers last night, The Piper's Last Song and the Children's Dance (with a child's rattle in the orchestra, a sort of teething motif!), had the genuine heartiness and innocent abandonment of childhood.

Beethoven's always fresh and brilliant Fidelio overture was played with fine sense of tonal values and with marked rhythmic life, and Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, the masterly and melancholy one in F minor, ended a long and not well-made musical scheme. Mr. Paur was at his very best. He worked hard, and he got remarkable results. Anton Seidl made the first movement of this fascinating symphony or symphonic suite more cohesive, more massed, more passionate. However, but one orchestra in the country could have played as was played last night the andantino with its iterated Slavic refrain, the lugubrious chant of Russian bargemen. The scherzo, with its pizzicato ostinato, its fascinating trio for wood, the quick staccato chords for the brass, and the quicker summing up of the coda—this scherzo was delightfully read. The finale was taken at a breathless pace and rhythm was thrown to the wind, especially the brass wind. It was altogether too fast for enjoyment, but it came to a victorious finish. An evening of genuine pleasure!

A MUSIC lover said to me the other day, "What admirable programs Mr. Paur has prepared this season! What a number of novelties!" But let us examine the programs of the first twelve concerts.

The "novelties" of the first concert were Bourgault-Ducoudray's L'Enterrement d'Ophélie, played in Paris in 1894, and Saint-Saëns' D major suite, played in Boston by Theodore Thomas' orchestra in 1877.

The "novelties" of the second concert were Chabrier's Gwendoline overture, played surely at Brussels in '86, and, I think, in Paris, in '84, and Dvorák's Third Slavonic Rhapsody, played in Berlin in 1879.

At the third concert Mrs. Beach's Gaelic Symphony was a genuine novelty.

The orchestral "novelty" at the fourth concert was Schillings' prelude to Act II. of Ingewelde, Carlsruhe, 1894; Cincinnati, 1895.

At the fifth it was the intermezzo from Goldmark's Das Heimchen am Herd, Vienna, March, 1896.

There was none at the sixth.

At the seventh it was Duparc's Lénore, which was performed in Paris, 1875.

At the eighth, Dvorák's 'cello concerto, London, March 19, 1896.

At the ninth, ballet music from Gluck's Don Juan, 1761 (arranged by Kretschmar, Leipsic, 1896); excerpts from Humperdinck's Königskinder, Heidelberg, June 2, 1896 (one of them at Brooklyn, November 22, 1896); Bizet's Jeux d'Enfants, Paris, 1873; an overture by Händel, arranged by Wüllner.

At the tenth Smetana's Wallenstein's Lager (written in 1859); Schütt's second concerto, Vienna, January, 1896.

There was no novelty at the eleventh.

At the twelfth a symphony in C major, by Dittersdorf, 1788 (?), arranged by Kretschmar.

⁂

Yes, we hear "novelties" in Boston, but, like unto the man in Schiller's Piccolomini, they come late.

A real "novelty," one that is worth talking about, is a musical composition that is produced for the first time or has been produced lately in a foreign city.

Here is Mr. Paur rummaging the dust bin of antiquity, dragging out ballet music by Gluck and a symphony by Dittersdorf, and yet he shuts his eyes to modern works of real importance. Has he never heard of Sinding's symphony in D minor? You heard it in New York about two years ago, I believe. Has he never heard of Martucci's symphony? In the cities of Germany they are discussing Weingartner's Lear, Strauss' Thus Spake Zarathustra, orchestral pieces of Rimsky-Korsakoff and Glazounoff. If Schillings' music must be heard, why not his later symphonic poems? The last symphony of Saint-Saëns, at least ten years old, has never been played here. The name of César Franck has not yet appeared on a Symphony program.

Benoit's Charlotte Corday overture has not been played at a symphony concert. It is absurd to ignore the existence of these composers and these works. And a long list of unknown works could be drawn up easily.

⁂

Mr. Paur has an unreasonable admiration for the ancients. I really believe that he would be happy to lead the three celebrated overtures of Weber, the three celebrated symphonies of Mozart, and the nine symphonies of Beethoven every season. To him Cherubini is the man of the Anacreon overture. Berlioz never wrote an overture entitled King Lear; but Mr. Paur produced with glee the stupid overture to the Corsair.

Gluck is an honored name? Should we therefore be obliged to listen to his antiquated ballet music, when the dances in Rimsky-Korsakoff's Mlada are unknown here? The people of Chicago are more fortunate.

⁂

I do not say that all these modern works, or one-tenth of them, will live ten years. I do say that the musicians of this city should have an opportunity of hearing them while they are comparatively fresh; while they excite discussion in other towns.

It was Moritz Hauptman, the conservative canto at Leipsic, who, shortly before his death, wrote as follows concerning the Gewandhaus concerts: "The Heroic Symphony, Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage, E flat major concerto of Beethoven—these are all excellent pieces when they are well played; but we have heard them so often; we know in advance each note and every effect. I should like to hear often something different, something unknown to me, either of the past or the present. Let us not always have the highest mountain peaks, without valleys, without hills. Nor is it good for people to hear only music that is well known by them, for, losing themselves in gloomy admiration, they abandon the use of the critical faculty. Anything new annoys them, for they do not know what they ought to say about it. We do not need nine symphonies of Beethoven every winter. This is too much of a good thing. Where only the best is given, there ceases to be any 'best.' Every day should not be Sunday."

Mr. Paur shows a singular perversity in his choice of French works. Why in the world did he put the Lénore, by Duparc, in rehearsal after he had read it? Was it because Ysaye told him it was interesting? To overlook Vincent d'Indy, Godard, Charpentier, Dubois, Franck, the young men of the Belgian school, for Duparc seems to me to be wanting in discrimination.

Not that I agree with Mr. Apthorp in protesting against the production of a symphony by Dittersdorf. There is such a thing as historical interest. Now Dittersdorf's first set of symphonies was written in 1759, the year in which Haydn wrote his first symphony, in three movements (strings, two oboes and two horns), for Count Morzin's orchestra. If the date 1788 given to Dittersdorf's symphony in C, played here January 16 is correct, in that same year Haydn wrote the so-called Oxford symphony, originally for Paris. It is of interest to the student to be able to know how such an early symphonist expressed his musical ideas, and to learn the worth of the ideas themselves. And so I should like to hear a symphony by Sammartini or Gossec, just as I should like to hear one of the symphonies written by Johann Agrell in 1725 and published 1746. Not that I should necessarily enjoy any one of these works for its contents. No doubt they are for the most part tiresome, irrevocably antiquated. On the other hand, it is a shame to know of symphonic beginnings only from allusions and descriptions in books.

⁂

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 31, 1897.

There was nothing unfamiliar on the thirteenth Symphony programme, which commemorated the birth of Schubert a hundred years ago, by naming his C major and "Unfinished" symphonies and these selections from the almost endless list of his songs: "Greisengesang," "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" and "An Schwager Kronos." It only devolves then on us to record our testimony to the general excellence of the performance in both insight and sympathy of rendering. We cannot altogether coincide with the disposition which leads Mr. Paur to so many variations of time within a single movement as were noticeable, especially in the second of the two symphonies, the andante of which sometimes assumed almost the character of a romance, while the finale fell away again and again from the allegro vivace which is prescribed for it. Schubert was indeed one of the world's great masters of song, but his symphonic themes should not be given as if they were vocal melodies.

Mr. Heinrich sang the songs finely of course, and Mr. Paur accompanied them admirably on the piano. To our thinking the highest effect was reached in the first, both vocally and spiritually, and we found the almost unbroken sequence of minor modes throughout the group a little trying to the nerves. The next programme is: Dvorak overture, "Othello," (first time); Rubinstein, Ballet music, "Feramors;" Richard Strauss, "Tod und Verklarung;" first time; Liszt, Scene in the Tavern (Mephisto waltz), from Lenau's "Faust;" Schumann, Symphony in D minor, No. 4.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

[illegible]

SUNDAY, [illegible] 31, 1897.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Program in Memory of Franz Schubert, Born January 31, 1797 —Max Heinrich Sings Songs With Piano Accompaniment.

The Schubert program of the 13th Symphony Concert, given last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Unfinished Symphony in B minor	1822
Allegro.
Andante.
Songs with Pianoforte:
(a) Gruppe aus dem Tartarus	1817
(b) Greisengesang	1820-22
(c) An Schwager Kronos	1816
Symphony No. 9, in C major	1828

This was a concert which, while it gave undoubted pleasure to the many warm admirers of Schubert, demands little attention from a reviewer. The two orchestral selections have been played here again and again, and they are familiar to concert-goers, old and young. Of what profit to again declare that the unfinished symphony is chiefly great because it is unfinished; that the second movement is a dismal falling off from the wondrous beauty of the first? Of what profit to again tell of the rash German who finished this symphony a few years ago? Or of what profit to speak of the interminable length and Hungarian spirit of the Symphony in C major?

Mr. Apthorp puts forward the suggestion in the program book that there is a legend connected with the Symphony in C, that the MS. "was never known to anyone until it was discovered by Robert Schumann some ten years after the composer's death." This is, indeed, a legend; for this same symphony was written in 1828 for a Gesellschaft concert in Vienna. The society tried it over and found it too long and too difficult. Schubert then gave the society his symphony in C, No. 6, an entirely different work. But this Symphony No. 6 was not played at a Gesellschaft concert until after Schubert's death. It was played Dec. 14, 1828, and March 12, 1829.

But Mr. Apthorp believes that an account of a performance in Vienna on the 14th of February, 1829, of a posthumous MS. symphony of Schubert—an account published in the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, February, 1829, refers to the great symphony in C. I see no reason for his belief. Dates are uncertain even today in German music journals. It is impossible from music newspapers published last year in France, Germany, and England to determine, for instance, the exact date of the first performance of "Andrea Chénier," for the dates are laughably at variance. And this is an age of the telegraph and telephone and daily newspaper. The review was probably with reference to a performance of the shorter symphony in C. Surely Hanslick in his "Geschichte des Concertwesens in Wien" would have alluded to this earlier performance, but on page 284 he mentions the performances of the shorter symphony, and then says that the first performance in Vienna of the greater symphony was in 1839, and only partial. The first two numbers were played, with an aria by Donizetti between them.

⁂

The peculiar genius of Schubert is displayed to fullest advantage in his songs, not in his orchestral music. It is therefore the more to be regretted that Mr. Heinrich did not choose more wisely. He is a skillful, at times a very skillful declaimer of songs by Schubert; he is not a singer of them. Now to gain irresistible effect as a declaimer, it is necessary for him to be in a small hall where his individuality works a potent spell; it is necessary that the vitality of the declaimer be as an atmosphere round about the hearer. In Music Hall last night "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" was ineffective, and yet I have heard him declaim this in the old Steinert Hall when the effect was overwhelming. "Greisengesang" demands a singer with greater sensuousness of tone and a mastery of vocal art. Mr. Heinrich declaimed it with much intelligence, perhaps with too much elaboration; but he declaimed it; he did not sing it. What has been said of "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" applies equally to "An Schwager Kronos." And it may be said here that no one of these three songs is among the immortal melodies of Schubert.

⁂

The piano accompaniments were played by Mr. Paur, and they were without distinction as played by him. There was a very large and applausive audience.

PHILIP HALE.

[79]

MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 27, 1897.

Boston Symphony Concert.

THE third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last Thursday night at the Metropolitan Opera House, and attracted the largest audience of the season. Melba was too ill to sing, and so contented herself with sitting in a box and listening. Edouard de Reszké, who was announced, did not appear, and instead we got the valiant Pol Plançon, who was in excellent voice, and gave the well-known bass aria from Verdi's Don Carlos and Schumann's The Two Grenadiers, the latter being his usual Sunday night anthem. He was most liberally applauded, but wisely declined repeating the Schumann song.

There were two orchestral novelties in Mr. Paur's program. A symphonic poem by the Bohemian composer, Smetana, called Wallenstein's Camp, that proved almost as noisy as Tschaikowsky's 1812 overture, and not by any means as interesting, as sustained, or as fine a piece of writing as Rheinberger's treatment of a similar theme from Schiller's Wallenstein Trilogy. Smetana's is a military episode, stirring, rather coarse, and extremely harsh, with its trumpet fanfares "off stage" and its percussive climaxes. It was, nevertheless, virile music, and contained some interesting writing. The second novelty was selections from Engelbert Humperdinck's music to King's Children, another fairy story of the Hänsel und Gretel type.

This composer has a charm—the charm of sensuous, well-sounding orchestration. His model is Wagner, and so in the introduction to the third act of the new fairy tale we got music that was in the true Wagner vernacular. Grafted most deftly with the desperate yearning and passionate Tristan character of the first section was a quaint, volks-like melody, and this seems to be Humperdinck's curious recipe, the commingling of all that is new, even decadent, in music with thè naïve, the child-like. That it has an artificial character at times cannot be denied. Yet some of the numbers last night, The Piper's Last Song and the Children's Dance (with a child's rattle in the orchestra, a sort of teething motif!), had the genuine heartiness and innocent abandonment of childhood.

Beethoven's always fresh and brilliant Fidelio overture was played with fine sense of tonal values and with marked rhythmic life, and Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, the masterly and melancholy one in F minor, ended a long and not well-made musical scheme. Mr. Paur was at his very best. He worked hard, and he got remarkable results. Anton Seidl made the first movement of this fascinating symphony or symphonic suite more cohesive, more massed, more passionate. However, but one orchestra in the country could have played as was played last night the andantino with its iterated Slavic refrain, the lugubrious chant of Russian bargemen. The scherzo, with its pizzicato ostinato, its fascinating trio for wood, the quick staccato chords for the brass, and the quicker summing up of the coda—this scherzo was delightfully read. The finale was taken at a breathless pace and rhythm was thrown to the wind, especially the brass wind. It was altogether too fast for enjoyment, but it came to a victorious finish. An evening of genuine pleasure!

A MUSIC lover said to me the other day, "What admirable programs Mr. Paur has prepared this season! What a number of novelties!" But let us examine the programs of the first twelve concerts.

The "novelties" of the first concert were Bourgault-Ducoudray's L'Enterrement d'Ophélie, played in Paris in 1894, and Saint-Saëns' D major suite, played in Boston by Theodore Thomas' orchestra in 1877.

The "novelties" of the second concert were Chabrier's Gwendoline overture, played surely at Brussels in '86, and, I think, in Paris, in '84, and Dvorák's Third Slavonic Rhapsody, played in Berlin in 1879.

At the third concert Mrs. Beach's Gaelic Symphony was a genuine novelty.

The orchestral "novelty" at the fourth concert was Schillings' prelude to Act II. of Ingewelde, Carlsruhe, 1894; Cincinnati, 1895.

At the fifth it was the intermezzo from Goldmark's Das Heimchen am Herd, Vienna, March, 1896.

There was none at the sixth.

At the seventh it was Duparc's Lénore, which was performed in Paris, 1875.

At the eighth, Dvorák's 'cello concerto, London, March 19, 1896.

At the ninth, ballet music from Gluck's Don Juan, 1761 (arranged by Kretschmar, Leipsic, 1896); excerpts from Humperdinck's Königskinder, Heidelberg, June 2, 1896 (one of them at Brooklyn, November 22, 1896); Bizet's Jeux d'Enfants, Paris, 1873; an overture by Händel, arranged by Wüllner.

At the tenth Smetana's Wallenstein's Lager (written in 1859); Schütt's second concerto, Vienna, January, 1896.

There was no novelty at the eleventh.

At the twelfth a symphony in C major, by Dittersdorf, 1788 (?), arranged by Kretschmar.

* * *

Yes, we hear "novelties" in Boston, but, like unto the man in Schiller's Piccolomini, they come late.

A real "novelty," one that is worth talking about, is a musical composition that is produced for the first time or has been produced lately in a foreign city.

Here is Mr. Paur rummaging the dust bin of antiquity, dragging out ballet music by Gluck and a symphony by Dittersdorf, and yet he shuts his eyes to modern works of real importance. Has he never heard of Sinding's symphony in D minor? You heard it in New York about two years ago, I believe. Has he never heard of Martucci's symphony? In the cities of Germany they are discussing Weingartner's Lear, Strauss' Thus Spake Zarathustra, orchestral pieces of Rimsky-Korsakoff and Glazounoff. If Schillings' music must be heard, why not his later symphonic poems? The last symphony of Saint-Saëns, at least ten years old, has never been played here. The name of César Franck has not yet appeared on a Symphony program.

Benoit's Charlotte Corday overture has not been played at a symphony concert. It is absurd to ignore the existence of these composers and these works. And a long list of unknown works could be drawn up easily.

* * *

Mr. Paur has an unreasonable admiration for the ancients. I really believe that he would be happy to lead the three celebrated overtures of Weber, the three celebrated symphonies of Mozart, and the nine symphonies of Beethoven every season. To him Cherubini is the man of the Anacreon overture. Berlioz never wrote an overture entitled King Lear; but Mr. Paur produced with glee the stupid overture to the Corsair.

Gluck is an honored name? Should we therefore be obliged to listen to his antiquated ballet music, when the dances in Rimsky-Korsakoff's Mlada are unknown here? The people of Chicago are more fortunate.

* * *

I do not say that all these modern works, or one-tenth of them, will live ten years. I do say that the musicians of this city should have an opportunity of hearing them while they are comparatively fresh; while they excite discussion in other towns.

It was Moritz Hauptman, the conservative canto at Leipsic, who, shortly before his death, wrote as follows concerning the Gewandhaus concerts: "The Heroic Symphony, Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage, E flat major concerto of Beethoven—these are all excellent pieces when they are well played; but we have heard them so often; we know in advance each note and every effect. I should like to hear often something different, something unknown to me, either of the past or the present. Let us not always have the highest mountain peaks, without valleys, without hills. Nor is it good for people to hear only music that is well known by them, for, losing themselves in gloomy admiration, they abandon the use of the critical faculty. Anything new annoys them, for they do not know what they ought to say about it. We do not need nine symphonies of Beethoven every winter. This is too much of a good thing. Where only the best is given, there ceases to be any 'best.' Every day should not be Sunday."

Mr. Paur shows a singular perversity in his choice of French works. Why in the world did he put the Lénore, by Duparc, in rehearsal after he had read it? Was it because Ysaye told him it was interesting? To overlook Vincent d'Indy, Godard, Charpentier, Dubois, Franck, the young men of the Belgian school, for Duparc seems to me to be wanting in discrimination.

Not that I agree with Mr. Apthorp in protesting against the production of a symphony by Dittersdorf. There is such a thing as historical interest. Now Dittersdorf's first set of symphonies was written in 1759, the year in which Haydn wrote his first symphony, in three movements (strings, two oboes and two horns), for Count Morzin's orchestra. If the date 1788 given to Dittersdorf's symphony in C, played here January 16 is correct, in that same year Haydn wrote the so-called Oxford symphony, originally for Paris. It is of interest to the student to be able to know how such an early symphonist expressed his musical ideas, and to learn the worth of the ideas themselves. And so I should like to hear a symphony by Sammartini or Gossec, just as I should like to hear one of the symphonies written by Johann Agrell in 1725 and published 1746. Not that I should necessarily enjoy any one of these works for its contents. No doubt they are for the most part tiresome, irrevocably antiquated. On the other hand, it is a shame to know of symphonic beginnings only from allusions and descriptions in books.

* * *

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 31, 1897.

There was nothing unfamiliar on the thirteenth Symphony programme, which commemorated the birth of Schubert a hundred years ago, by naming his C major and "Unfinished" symphonies and these selections from the almost endless list of his songs: "Greisengesang," "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" and "An Schwager Kronos." It only devolves then on us to record our testimony to the general excellence of the performance in both insight and sympathy of rendering. We cannot altogether coincide with the disposition which leads Mr. Paur to so many variations of time within a single movement as were noticeable, especially in the second of the two symphonies, the andante of which sometimes assumed almost the character of a romance, while the finale fell away again and again from the allegro vivace which is prescribed for it. Schubert was indeed one of the world's great masters of song, but his symphonic themes should not be given as if they were vocal melodies.

Mr. Heinrich sang the songs finely of course, and Mr. Paur accompanied them admirably on the piano. To our thinking the highest effect was reached in the first, both vocally and spiritually, and we found the almost unbroken sequence of minor modes throughout the group a little trying to the nerves. The next programme is: Dvorak overture, "Othello," (first time); Rubinstein, Ballet music, "Feramors;" Richard Strauss, "Tod und Verklarung;" first time; Liszt. Scene in the Tavern (Mephisto waltz), from Lenau's "Faust;" Schumann. Symphony in D minor, No. 4.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 31, 1897.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Program in Memory of Franz Schubert, Born January 31, 1797 —Max Heinrich Sings Songs With Piano Accompaniment.

The Schubert program of the 13th Symphony Concert, given last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Unfinished Symphony in B minor	1822
Allegro.
Andante.
Songs with Pianoforte:
(a) Gruppe aus dem Tartarus	1817
(b) Greisengesang	1820-22
(c) An Schwager Kronos	1816
Symphony No. 9, in C major	1828

This was a concert which, while it gave undoubted pleasure to the many warm admirers of Schubert, demands little attention from a reviewer. The two orchestral selections have been played here again and again, and they are familiar to concert-goers, old and young. Of what profit to again declare that the unfinished symphony is chiefly great because it is unfinished; that the second movement is a dismal falling off from the wondrous beauty of the first? Of what profit to again tell of the rash German who finished this symphony a few years ago? Or of what profit to speak of the interminable length and Hungarian spirit of the Symphony in C major?

Mr. Apthorp puts forward the suggestion in the program book that there is a legend connected with the Symphony in C, that the MS. "was never known to anyone until it was discovered by Robert Schumann some ten years after the composer's death." This is, indeed, a legend; for this same symphony was written in 1828 for a Gesellschaft concert in Vienna. The society tried it over and found it too long and too difficult. Schubert then gave the society his symphony in C, No. 6, an entirely different work. But this Symphony No. 6 was not played at a Gesellschaft concert until after Schubert's death. It was played Dec. 14, 1828, and March 12, 1829.

But Mr. Apthorp believes that an account of a performance in Vienna on the 14th of February, 1829, of a posthumous MS. symphony of Schubert—an account published in the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, February, 1829, refers to the great symphony in C. I see no reason for his belief. Dates are uncertain even today in German music journals. It is impossible from music newspapers published last year in France, Germany, and England to determine, for instance, the exact date of the first performance of "Andrea Chénier," for the dates are laughably at variance. And this is an age of the telegraph and telephone and daily newspaper. The review was probably with reference to a performance of the shorter symphony in C. Surely Hanslick in his "Geschichte des Concertwesens in Wien" would have alluded to this earlier performance, but on page 284 he mentions the performances of the shorter symphony, and then says that the first performance in Vienna of the greater symphony was in 1839, and only partial. The first two numbers were played, with an aria by Donizetti between them.

* * *

The peculiar genius of Schubert is displayed to fullest advantage in his songs, not in his orchestral music. It is therefore the more to be regretted that Mr. Heinrich did not choose more wisely. He is a skillful, at times a very skillful declaimer of songs by Schubert; he is not a singer of them. Now to gain irresistible effect as a declaimer, it is necessary for him to be in a small hall where his individuality works a potent spell; it is necessary that the vitality of the declaimer be as an atmosphere round about the hearer. In Music Hall last night "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" was ineffective, and yet I have heard him declaim this in the old Steinert Hall when the effect was overwhelming. "Greisengesang" demands a singer with greater sensuousness of tone and a mastery of vocal art. Mr. Heinrich declaimed it with much intelligence, perhaps with too much elaboration; but he declaimed it; he did not sing it. What has been said of "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" applies equally to "An Schwager Kronos." And it may be said here that no one of these three songs is among the immortal melodies of Schubert.

* * *

The piano accompaniments were played by Mr. Paur, and they were without distinction as played by him. There was a very large and applausive audience.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 1, 1897.

The Symphony Concert Devoted to the Works of Schubert.

A hundred years ago, yesterday, Franz Schubert was born, wherefore, must appropriately, Saturday's symphony concert was wholly devoted to the works of this melodic composer.

Schubert scarcely stands the test of an entire programme as Beethoven or Wagner might; his lack of polyphonic writing and his brief developments, to say nothing of his many repetitions, cause a certain monotony in the midst of all his beautiful touches. But one should remember that Schubert died at an age when Beethoven had not advanced beyond the Haydn stage and when Wagner had not evolved the theories which were to make him famous.

Had Schubert lived to the middle age at which Beethoven died, or to the old age which Wagner attained, he would certainly have been the peer of either of them.

The concert began with the "Unfinished Symphony," that work which haunted Schumann in the days of his mental alienation when he thought that Schubert's' ghost was pleading with him to carry the composition to completion. Generally this work is given with more stress upon its gentle and delicate points, so that it has seemed almost a similar musical violet to Mozart's G minor symphony, but at this concert Mr. Paur brought out all the virility of the work and it received a more majestic reading than it has ever had here, making the effect almost of a new work.

Where Beethoven would have held the auditor by ingenious development (in the first movement, the sonata-allegro) Schubert charms by pure melody and dramatic contrast, and these contrasts were most forcibly brought out in the performance of Saturday. The work of the violoncellos in the first movement and of the oboe, flute and clarinette in the second are to be spoken of with especial praise.

Mr. Max Heinrich was the vocalist of the concert. He chose three of the Schubert lieder for his numbers. Schubert's songs can scarcely be inflated to Music Hall dimensions; the result is somewhat like hearing Keats thundered forth through a speaking trumpet or looking at a Meissonier picture through a telescope. Naturally Mr. Heinrich was somewhat handicapped by the ungrateful task.

The singer's voice is so well known to our concert-goers that it is scarcely necessary to remind the reader that it is declamatory in style, robust and rather dark-colored, a rough organ which is made valuable by the artistic soul behind it. Two of the three songs were chosen as fitting the characteristics mentioned.

The "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" was superbly powerful and the sombre tints and dramatic touches were given with all possible effect. Much the same can be said of the "Song to Kronos," in which the piano accompaniment is an important factor and was excellently given by Mr. Paur, although the tempo seemed to exceed the "Nicht zu Schnell" marked by the composer.

In the "Greisengesang" Mr. Heinrich was out of depth. Here there are certain bold contrasts between darkness and light, sorrow and happiness, and the brighter and sweeter tints were not suited to Mr. Heinrich's style. For example, the first line.

> "Although the roof is covered with frost's white > wintry spell"

is to be given broadly and earnestly, and then in immediate contrast,

> "Still warm remains the chamber in which I > dwell"

tenderly, sweetly and pianissimo. A similar contrast follows in the next two lines—

> "Winter my crown has covered with hoary white,
> Yet in my heart is flowing, the red blood bright."

The tender passages were labored and ineffective, but the rest of the song was finely given, and Mr. Heinrich was recalled again and again at the close of the set with an enthusiasm that was evidently spontaneous. But we could have wished some other song in the place of "The Old Man's Song," something in the style of "Aufenthalt" or "Der Wegweiser."

For the closing number of the concert we had the great C major Symphony, Schubert's greatest orchestral work, and Dvorak has written his opinion that Schubert was greater in his orchestral expression than in any other field,—an opinion which, however, ought to be taken with a full quart of salt. If one judges by the rigid rules of symphony, by laws of thematic development and aesthetic unity and proportion of parts, one might arrive at the opinion of the English critic who found it a thing of shreds and patches; if one judges by beauty of themes, by dramatic contrasts, by delicious surprises of modulation, one will arrive at the wiser judgment that it is one of the masterpieces of the world.

Old Aristoxenes was right when, more than 2000 years ago, he asserted that whatever sounded well in music was technically correct. Chronologically the work comes next to Beethoven's ninth symphony, and aesthetically it has more right to the title of "the tenth symphony" than Brahms' C minor which has received it. There is not much question that Beethoven's ninth inspired parts of this work even to the scoring.

Schubert's friends used to hold Beethoven up to him as a model, citing the care which the great master took in polishing his work after completion, while Schubert rushed directly from divine inspiration to cold type. In this symphony he seems to have taken the advice to heart, for he has made alterations and revisions after the completion of the score which are very different from his usual hasty manner. One of the finest passages in the Scherzo is due to such an afterthought.

The horn theme which begins the introduction, and afterwards symmetrically forms the coda (with richer orchestration) was beautifully played without suspicion of a break and with perfect shading. The chief theme was taken at great speed, but was clear throughout. The trombones thundered out their passages in the coda with great effect.

It may be remembered that this tone-color was almost a new one in symphonic scoring; Beethoven had used trombones in the finale of his fifth symphony (first time in symphony), in the thunderstorm of his pastoral, and in his ninth symphony, but he never had attempted anything so bold or so beautiful as this crossing of tenor and bass trombones, like the crossing of swords.

The slow movement is the gem of the work. Its striking and persistent rhythm suggests the slow movement of Beethoven's Seventh symphony, and it is very possible that Schubert was influenced by that work, but the strong characteristics of the themes also indicate Magyar influ- [illegible] and in some of the chamber music speaks graphically of the time when Schubert was music teacher to the children of Prince Esterhazy at Zelesz, and heard the wonderful Gipsy music of that country.

Schumann found this element so strong in the Andante that he suggested that it was a picture of a Gipsy Camp, or at least a representation of Gipsy life.

The finale was nobly performed, the four powerful strokes which form one of the most remarkable touches in it being given with a power that our orchestra has sometimes used to excess but which was here the right thing in the right place.

Although these heavy rhythmic blows are akin to the appearance of the Commendatore in the last part of "Don Giovanni," it is probable that Schubert took the idea from the Beethoven Violin Concerto, where a similar rhythmic figure is used in almost precisely the same way. It is said that Beethoven took his idea from hearing a drunken man pounding on a street-door at a late hour at night, in Vienna; if that inebriate only knew how much future music he was pounding into that door!!

The fury of the violin figure of the theme of the finale was something wonderful.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CI., NO. 31.
SUNDAY, JAN. 31, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme Commemorative of the Schubert Anniversary.

The Night Given Over to Selections from This Composer—The Beautiful Unfinished Symphony—Mr. Apthorp's Comment on the Character of Shylock.

The 13th concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening, and was commemorative of the hundredth anniversary of the birthday of Schubert. The programme was, consequently, devoted wholly to music of that composer, as follows:

Unfinished symphony.
Songs with pianoforte:
  a. "Gruppe aus dens Tartarus."
  b. "Greisengesang."
  c. "An Schwager Kronos."
Symphony No.9, in C.

The songs were sung by Mr. Max Heinrich, the pianoforte accompaniments being played by M. Paur. The music is all thoroughly familiar to the Symphony audience, and it would be difficult to find anything new to say of it. The unfinished symphony, particularly its first movement, again impressed itself on the mind and ears as among the most lovely music that Schubert or any other composer ever wrote for the orchestra.

The C major symphony, beautiful as it undoubtedly is, bored by its "heavenly length," despite the liberal condensation to which it had been considerately subjected. Great, surpassingly great, it is in spots, notably in the opening andante and the first allegro; but its prolix repetitions in the andante con moto, and the monotonous tonality of the long finale seem, sinful as it may be to pen the word—tiresome. Both works were perfectly read and were played in the most finished style and with delightful color.

The Schubert lieder have been heard more impressively in vocal recitals this season in a smaller concert room. M. Heinrich sang them with the artistic feeling and the fine declamatory skill that appear to be his peculiar gifts as an interpreter of song, but his voice was not as effective in Music Hall as it proved to be elsewhere at a recent date. He was tremendously applauded for his graceful rendering of the "Griesengesang," and recalled many times at the close of his group of songs. M. Paur's playing of the accompaniments was able, sympathetic and musicianly.

The programme for the next concert includes two works not given here before. One is Dvorak's overture to "Othello" and Richard Strauss' "Tod und Verklaerung." The other selections are Rubenstein's "Geramorz" ballet music, Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and Schumann's symphony in D minor, No. 4.

In his Entr' Acte in last night's programme book Mr. Apthorp says that "Shylock, in 'The Merchant of Venice,' was written and originally acted as a low comedy part," and proceeds to discuss the character from that standpoint with perfect seriousness.

It would be interesting to know whence he derived his knowledge of Shakespeare's intention to make Shylock a comic part. That it was so performed when the play was revived after the restoration, and that this perversion was continued down to the time of Macklin, are beyond all question; but Shakespeare's intention is quite another matter, and if Mr. Apthorp knows that Shylock was "written and originally acted as a low comedy part" he has made a discovery hitherto unknown to any other historian and commentator of the poet, regarding whom so little is really known that any reliable addition to the scant facts would excite an unparalleled literary sensation.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 31, 1897.
(Copyright, 1897. Post Publishing Company.)

SCHUBERT CENTENARY.

Orchestra Plays His Best Symphonies and Heinrich Sings His Songs.

The Symphony concert last night was a Schubert centenary. The Unfinished Symphony, three songs with piano and the Symphony in C major were presented.

The Unfinished Symphony, famous under that name, was written when the composer was 25 years old. Philip Hale, in a recent review, says that there is nothing of more complete, well-rounded beauty in the literature of music than the first movement of this symphony; but he adds that the symphony is great because it is unfinished, the second movement being, to this critic's ear, a more diffuse and sentimental production than the incomparable first.

It is certain that the incomplete state of this remarkable composition is no accident. Schubert had written nine bars of the next movement and there stopped, without the slightest indication of what was to come next. He subsequently presented the score, in just this condition, to a musical society which had elected him to honorary membership.

Mr. Paur omitted the repeat in the first movement of this symphony; quite an unusual liberty to take with the score, but justified by the length of the programme.

Schubert's first claim to renown was in his wonderful songs. About 500 he wrote in all, and of all grades of merit; some trivial, with words as silly as an old woman's gabble, others the masterpiece of an unapproachable artist.

Max Heinrich sang three last night, and Mr. Paur himself played the piano accompaniments. The order given in the programme was not followed. The Greisengesang (Greybeard's song) was announced as first, but, without a word of notice, the Group from Tartarus was sung instead, and the other second.

This is the second time in the concerts of this season that the management has changed in this discourteous fashion the published order of their performance. When the Rubinstein "Ocean" symphony was played, a month or so ago, the rearrangement was so radical that good musicians were puzzled to tell just what was played.

The first song described souls in eternal torment. The accompaniment was loud and stormy, sometimes almost drowning the tragic voice of the singer.

Next came the Greisengesang, full of pathos and beauty. It is the soliloquy of lonely old age: Winter has frosted his roof and crowned him with snow, but the red blood still flows in his bosom; the roses have fled from his cheeks to his heart, and bloom there still; the nightingales of all the fields are dead, but still one sings within him and bids him shut the door on the rough breath of reality, and give shelter only to the fragrant mist of dreams.

Last came Goethe's song, "To Kronos the Postilion," where the poet urges Time to whip his horses down and up and down again along life's pathway. It is a radical change in manner from each of the preceding numbers—a rushing, galloping, beautiful ride of life, from youth and love to old age and death and the world of ghosts.

Heinrich's voice was clear, rich and true, and his pronunciation was distinctness itself. In some places the distinctness was exaggerated, as where he sang "Saturrens" for "Saturns" and "Herrez" for "Herz."

Last came the monumental Symphony in C, the last work of Schubert's short life. It was finished in March of 1828, and he died in September of the same year. Since the Unfinished, written in 1822, he had attempted no symphonies; and it speaks for his modesty that after writing this last and greatest, he went to arrange for lessons in counterpoint; death put an end to that arrangement. It is often said, in criticism of Schubert's instrumental music, that his final movements are weaker because of diffuseness and repetition; but no one brings this accusation against the Symphony in C, where the last movement is the crown of the whole, full of force and increasing energy.

This symphony also has an interesting history. The parts were copied and given out to an orchestra during Schubert's life, but it was given up as too long, elaborate and difficult. The current legend is that it was then lost sight of until discovered among Schubert's manuscripts some ten years after the composer's death, and was first performed in public in Leipzic in 1839. Mr. Apthorp, however, announces that he has discovered an account of a public performance in Vienna, in 1829, of a Symphony in C by Schubert, that can hardly be other than this. If this turns out to be true, it will show that Vienna in 1829 was able to forget what the whole world now delights to remember.

Franz Peter Schubert was born 100 years ago today. His father was a parish schoolmaster, his mother a cook. He was one of fourteen children born to this couple. Like many musicians, he was precocious, a wonderful singer as a child, a composer of songs, cantatas, piano duets, overtures, masses and symphonies in his boyhood. There are quartets by him that are beyond his symphonies in music and beauty. His manuscript shows no signs of revision, such as are seen in Mozart's or Beethoven's scores, and he was criticised even during his lifetime on the ground that his diffuseness and prolixity was due to haste and heedlessness in scoring. It may have been due to this fact that his last work shows signs of care more than any preceding.

Beethoven was his idol. When Schubert's mind wandered as he lay dying, he thought he was in the tomb and asked to be removed to a place nearer the master who had died before him. Then he was known as a writer of songs; now he is an immortal master.

The next concert will include two first performances, Dvorak's Otello overture and Richard Strauss's Tod und Verklaerung. There are also incidental opera numbers from Liszt and Rubinstein and Schumann's fourth symphony in D minor. There is no soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, JAN. 31, 1897.

Schubert Symphony Program.

In commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Franz Schubert the program of last evening's symphony concert was confined to selections from works by that composer. The numbers were the unfinished symphony in B minor, the great ninth symphony in C major, and three songs, with piano, sung by Mr Max Heinrich. The audience was even larger than usual, and was more than ordinarily cordial in bestowing applause.

These symphonies have both been given here several times under Mr Paur's direction, and it was a genuine pleasure to hear them again, for more intelligent, sympathetic and effective interpretations could not be imagined. Mr Paur's readings of Schubert's writings are wholly satisfactory. It is not too high praise to say that the Symphony orchestra's performance of these works under his leadership are the best that have ever been given in Boston.

The unfinished symphony, that treasure store of melody and poetic sentiment, was played with exquisite effect. In no important respect did the interpretation differ from the performance of this work a year ago, and it is unnecessary to now reiterate the words of praise that were then so heartily granted. The splendid precision of the strings was unbroken throughout the symphony, the celli sang the delicious melodies of the first movement with exquisite sweetness, the charming passages for the oboes and clarinets were played with admirable effect, and the work of the full orchestra in the stirring ensembles could not have been better.

The ninth symphony is truly a grand work. It was the product of Schubert's genius at the time of its highest development, and it seems the irony of fate that he should not have had the privilege of hearing his greatest work performed. The score was completed only a few months before his death, and was not played until two years later.

The symphony was surely never heard to better advantage than last night and the enthusiastic applause of the audience at the conclusion of each movement was thoroughly deserved. Mr Paur's reading was notable for many fine points and his ideas were faithfully presented by the admirably trained orchestra. In the first movement the horn player gave his theme with ideal effect, and the novel trombone phrases in the brilliant coda were finely played. Few symphonies give greater prominence to the wood wind, and the numerous passages for these instruments were played without blemish. Especially delightful was the pure tones of the oboe in the second movement, and scarcely less praiseworthy was the work of the clarinets. The amazingly brilliant finale was played with splendid enthusiasm and superb picturesque effect.

Mr Heinrich sang three songs, "Greisengesang," "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" and "An Schwager." Mr Paur played the piano accompaniments. So much has recently been written regarding Mr Heinrich's thoroughly enjoyable singing that nothing new remains to be said in his behalf. He is a finished artist, who is always listened to with delight. Of the three songs the first proved, perhaps, the most interesting, but all were interpreted with fine effect.

The program announced for the next rehearsal and concert is as follows:

Dvorak	Overture, Othello (First time).
Rubinstein	Ballet music, Feramors
Richard Strauss	Tod und Verklarung (First time).
Liszt	Scene in the tavern (Mephisto Waltz) From Lenau's Faust.
Schumann	Symphony in D minor, No. 4

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1897.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

As yesterday was the hundredth anniversary of Franz Schubert's birthday, the programme of the thirteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was made up wholly of works by Schubert. The list was as follows:

Unfinished Symphony in B minor.
Songs with Pianoforte:
Gruppe aus dem Tartarus, opus 24, No. 1.
Greisengesang, opus 60, No. 1.
An Schwager Kronos, opus 19, No. 1.
Symphony No. 9, in C major.
Mr. Max Heinrich was the singer.

It may be a question, whether the world's great composers are more worthily honored on anniversary occasions by giving them a "special night," or by duly preparing and bringing out some hitherto unheard great work of theirs. It is unquestionably less trouble to give a Schubert programme, a Beethoven programme or a Rubinstein programme, made up of compositions already long in the repertory, than to put an as yet untried important work into rehearsal, and peform the same for the first time in this city. Less trouble, but perhaps not quite so much honor! Still it may be said, on the other hand, that, in the case of a man like Schubert, it would be hard to find a really important orchestral work of his which did not already form part of the current repertory. To give a first performance of one of Schubert's earlier symphonies to an audience long familiar with his great C major, would be doing him no especial honor. Making such a symphony the central figure on a programme in honor of Schubert's memory would be rather too like choosing "The Two Gentleman of Verona" for performance on a Shakspeare anniversary. On the whole, last Saturday's programme was perhaps as good as another. Only, if some way could have been devised of getting round the B minor torso-symphony, we would have been delighted.

As far as the performance went, the two movements of the B minor seemed to us decidedly better played than the great C major. Schubert's C major symphony—like Beethoven's A major—is one of those works which seems to call for one definite style of performance, and no other, so distinctly and unmistakably that one wonders how two opinions can be held on the subject. The C major symphony is permeated from beginning to end with the spirit of the dance; and the quintessence of this spirit is rhythmic regularity and pertinacity. No doubt, the first movement presents a difficulty; it is inconceivable that both the first and second themes of the allegro, ma non troppo should go at one and the same tempo. We admit this freely. Yet we think the difficulty might be overcome by taking these two themes at as nearly the same tempo as possible, so as not to make the contrast too strong. The rhythm in this movement seemed uneasy and freakish last Saturday evening; there was too little unity of mood and purpose. Moreover, the closing stretto of the coda struck us as too slow. This coda is marked piu moto—not poco piu moto—and its tempo should present a striking contrast with the principal one. There is not a little of the Italian spirit in Schubert's orchestral works; this very coda is taken from an earlier "Overture in the Italian Style," and is full of the rush and bustle of the characteristic Italian finale. Now, a sudden and strongly marked—what the Germans might call an "excessive"—piu moto is one of the most characteristic features of Italian music. We should much like to hear this coda played frankly à la Rossini. Some persons perhaps might call this vulgar, but we cannot feel it to be so. The most vulgar thing in the world, to our mind, is that super-refinement that is afraid of being vulgar. The man who takes "drank" as the past participle of "drink"—to make it rhyme with, say, "thank"—is above criticism; but, if he says "has drank" simply because he is afraid of the sound "has drunk," he is an irredeemable vulgarian. We feel much the same about a too slow tempo in this coda of Schubert's.

There was much that beautiful in the playing of the second movement; Mr. Sautet, Mr. Pourtau, and Mr. Pierre Müller are highly to be praised for their exquisite solo work. Still there was too much variety in rhythmic effects; when a movement, like this one, has a certain monotony for one of its salient characteristics, it is best to make play with that monotony for all it is worth; you may thus get a cumulative effect at last that will be irresistible. To try to tone down this monotony by introducing an adventitious variety, is to weaken the whole thing. We noticed something of the sort also in the playing of the scherzo; there was too much modification of tempo!

The last movement was spoiled as usual. Since Mr. Gericke left us, we have not had this movement played here with any approach to sanity. Both Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur have come to grief over an attempt to make a horse run away at a canter—instead of at a gallop! Here there need be no question of 'conception" nor of a dignified or rollicking tempo; there is a physical impossibility that stultifies Mr. Nikisch's and Mr. Paur's slow tempo outright. The persistent violin triplet that accompanies the second theme throughout cannot be played slower than at a certain rate of speed; the violin-bow will not jump slower. And note that it is precisely this second theme of the movement which both Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur take Allegro moderato, instead of Allegro vivace. The first theme and its subsidiary go fast enough—especially the subsidiary; but just where the triplet jump of the bow comes in—in the second theme—the slackening of the pace is out of all reason.

Mr. Heinrich sang three of the very great songs. His singing of the Greisengesang was one of the most perfect expressions of deep feeling in admirably pure musical phrasing that we have ever listened to. He showed us the wonderful song in its full glory. And how exquisitely beautiful his voice sounded! In the two other songs he had to struggle against an obstreperous accompaniment that was entirely out of place. A man might sing Wotan's Farewell to such an accompaniment; indeed, many have had to, though the task is not an artistic one, not what Wagner intended. But to sing Schubert's Gruppe aus dem Tartarus and An Schwager Kronos to such a thunimpossible. The works of Schubert, Schumann and Franz were never meant to be yelled and bellowed. Mr. Heinrich did what could be done under the circumstances; but he is to be pitied for being thus placed in a totally false artistic position. He was rapturously applauded and often recalled.

The next programme is: Dvorak, overture to "Othello" (new); Rubinstein, ballet music from "Feramors; Richard Strauss, "Tod und Verklärung" (new); Liszt, scene in the tavern ("Mephisto Waltz") from Lenau's "Faust;" Schumann, Symphony No. 4, in D minor, opus 120.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1897.

The program of the thirteenth Symphony concert was devoted exclusively to pieces by Schubert, in honor of the anniversary of his birth (January 31, 1797). It was as follows:

Unfinished Symphony, B minor	1822
Songs with piano:
Gruppe Aus dem Tartarus	1817
Greisengesang	1820-22
An Schwager Kronos	1816
Mr. Max Heinrich
Symphony No. 9, C major	1828

Mr. Apthorp has made a discovery. Just as Mr. Richard Harding Davis discovered Paris and London, and Mr. Henry A. Clapp, the eminent Shakesperian critic, discovered Francis Wilson two years or so ago in the jungles of musical farce, so Mr. Apthorp has discovered the first performance of the great C major symphony.

I quote from his program book of the 30th:

> This symphony was written in March, 1828. It was never performed during Schubert's lifetime. The current legend is that the MS. was never known to anyone until it was discovered by Robert Schumann, some ten years after the composer's death; and that the first public performance was at the Gewandhaus in Leipzig under Mendelssohn's direction on March 22, 1839. In a notice of a second performance in December of the same year, in the Leipzig Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, much astonishment is expressed that so great a work should have lain so long utterly unknown.
>
> But it seems to me that this legend cannot be wholly true. In the issue of the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung for February, 1829—that is, ten years earlier—I find an account of a performance in Vienna, on the 14th of that month, of a posthumous MS. symphony in C by Schubert. The work is described thus: A beautiful, diligently worked out composition, the especially pleasing movements of which are the scherzo and the finale. What might be blamed in it is that the wind band is far too richly represented, whereas the stringed instruments, on the other hand, occupy a subordinate position. This seems to me to describe the work accurately enough for recognition. The criticism of the wind instruments playing too prominent a part would certainly not apply to the other, smaller and earlier symphony in C. So it seems as if the score of the great ninth must have been lost after this first performance in Vienna, not quite three months after Schubert's death.

⁂

Now what are the facts that are accepted by all?

Schubert gave the great C major symphony, in 1828, to the Gesselschaft der Musikfreunde, Vienna. The Society found the work too long and too difficult.

He then substituted in its place the sixth symphony (C major). He died November 19, 1828.

The said Society gave two performances of this shorter C major symphony—December 14, 1828, and March 12, 1829.

The first performance in Vienna of the great C major symphony was in the year 1839, and it was only partial; the first two movements were played, and they were separated by an aria of Donizetti. The symphony had been produced before that at the Gewandhaus in Leipzig, March 22, 1839.

I have taken these facts from Hanslick's Geschichte des Concert Wesens in Wien, pp. 284, 285.

⁂

But how about this review in the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung for February, 1829, of "a performance in Vienna, on the 14th of that month, of a posthumous MS. symphony in C by Schubert"?

Is Mr. Apthorp sure that "the 14th" refers to February? News was slow of travel in 1829. It is similarly slow to-day in the music journals of Leipsic. It is almost impossible that a concert given in Vienna February 14 should have been reviewed in the February number of the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung. It is highly probable that a concert given in Vienna December 14, 1828, should not be reviewed by the said journal until February, 1829. Now the symphony played December 14, 1828, was the shorter symphony in C major.

The criticism concerning the too rich representation of the wind band might have been applied by the critic to any symphony. He had his article to write. Not to find fault with something would lead to suspicion of his acumen.

⁂

You surely do not expect me to write a commemorative article on Schubert, just because to-day is January 31, 1897. I answer in the words of Mr. Henderson of the New York Times of this morning: "Can I say to myself, 'Now you must have a Schubert fever? Let it rage. If it does not rage spontaneously work up the rage.' Furthermore, it is not necessary. Everyone is singing or playing Schubert to-day, and he is being celebrated by machine-made essays and lectures all over the land. Schubert is a little too sacred to me to be treated in a business-like manner."

⁂

Mr. Paur's reading of the symphonies is not to be commended unreservedly. He was inclined to dawdle sentimentally with the second themes, and he often turned the simple flowing curves of Schubert's architecture into broken, irregular and rigid lines. It seemed more than once that he stopped the onward sweep of a movement so as to let the woodwind men come down to the front of the stage, show their instruments to the audience as an evidence of good faith, and then play their pretty tunes. And in these symphonies, by the way, the woodwind men covered themselves with glory. In the C major symphony the pace was not always hot enough to allow the difficult violin figures to be in evidence.

Mr. Heinrich is heard to far greater advantage in a smaller hall than Music Hall. He declaimed with intelligence and self consciousness that was akin to arrogance; but the voice was without sensuous charm, and it did not fill the hall. Nor was he fully master in the expression of his honorable intentions. The Greisengesang demands a singer of genuine vocal art. I admire Mr. Heinrich in certain ways; he is first of all an interesting individuality. He is not an accomplished singer; he is a very acute declaimer, with intelligence and imagination. But the supreme songs of Schubert should be sung. Neither Gruppe Aus dem Tartarus nor An Schwager Kronos is one of these supreme songs. That Mr. Heinrich was not effective in them is due to the fact that Music Hall is too large for the spell of his individuality.

Mr. Paur accompanied Mr. Heinrich. He played with a heavy touch, without a keen sense of rhythm, and with a passion for the damper pedal.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1897.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Fourteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall—Novelties by Dvorak and Strauss—Concert by Miss Zella Cole.

The program of the Symphony concert last night, Emil Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "Othello," op. 93..........Dvorak
(First time in Boston.)
Ballet music from "Feramors"...Rubinstein
II. Candle-dance of the Brides of Kashmire.
I. Dance of Bayaderes.
Tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," op. 24.................................Strauss
(First time in Boston.)
Scene in the Tavern ("Mephisto Waltz") from Lenau's "Faust"..........Liszt
Symphony No. 4, in D minor, op. 120....
Schumann

This "Othello" overture of Dvořák was first played in the United States at the inaugural concert of the composer in New York, Oct. 21, 1892. It then, with "In der Natur" (played here by the Symphony Orchestra, Dec. 7, 1895), and the "Carneval" overture (played here by the Symphony Orchestra Jan. 5, 1895), was called "Triple Overture."

But where is Othello in this overture? In Bohemia, apparently; not the Bohemia of Shakspeare, with its seaport, but the Bohemia of Dvořák, the home of negro medodies and negro jigs. Had Dvořák been reading the theory of Coleridge—that Othello was not influenced by jealousy—when he wrote the overture? Or had he in his portfolio an overture, without a name, and did he choose Othello because it had an agreeable sound, as Mesopotamia pleased the godly old woman?

Yes, Othello is in Bohemia; but not the romantic country known to the Dvořák of earlier years; rather the dry, sterile, flat, unwooded land where he now manufactures music. Frankly—this overture is not worth discussion. It reminds one of the tragedy only by the name, and as absolute music it is barren of ideas and dull in treatment.

⁂

"Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss, is one of the most remarkable works that Mr. Paur has produced here. It was played in 1890 at the Musicians' Congress at Eisenach. Since then it has excited hot admiration and hot ridicule. They do him wrong who say that Strauss is a mere imitator of Wagner. He has his own voice, a gigantic one, and he has his own vocabulary. There are passages of surpassing grandeur in this symphonic poem. The long and mighty crescendo after the first stroke of the gong is marvelously effective; but it is a question whether the ear is not too fatigued by the preceding irrepressible conflict of dissonances to grasp and appreciate it thoroughly. There are orchestral effects that were not known before Strauss imagined them. I confess I dislike the scheme of the work. For a man to take poetical ideas rather than musical ideas as the main material seems to be essentially unmusical; program music becomes panoramic, and the composer is in evidence, in swallow-tail coat, and with a stick. Now this symphonic poem of Strauss needs no Baedeker; the title is enough. Why should the hearers be invited to take note of the "necessitous little room," the "soft ticking of the clock" and "one candle-end"? To prepare a mood? But is not the one word—the awful, terrifying, consoling word "Death"—enough to guide the hearer?

I confess I should like to hear the work again. It is not to be comprehended as a whole in one hearing or in two hearings. This I know:—that there are noble musical thoughts, daring harmonic treatment, peculiar and penetrating melody, an astounding knowledge of the orchestra, and high imagination shown in the invention of orchestration.

⁂

The other selections do not call for extended comment. It was a great pleasure to hear again the beautiful ballet music of Rubinstein. The "Scene in the Tavern" by Liszt is of specious brilliancy, but it is corrupt and corrupting music. The D minor symphony is a rare delight from beginning to end, in which respect it stands apart from Schumann's other symphonies. Mr. Paur's reading was robust rather than romantic. In the introduction he anticipated his climax, and throughout the first movement there were few dynamic contrasts. And in the exquisite trio of the scherzo there should have been more languorous melancholy, a tenderer feeling, larger freedom of motion. The piece by Strauss was played with amazing force and general virtuosoship.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 7, 1897.

Fourteenth Symphony Concert.

Mr Paur offered two novelties on last week's symphony program, Dvorak's overture to "Othello" and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The other selections were Rubenstein's "Feramers" ballet music, Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and Schumann's No. 4 symphony. There were no soloists. The Dvorak overture is a characteristic work, the instrumentation showing in many places the peculiar combinations in which the composer frequently delights. The quiet passages of the introduction are of the briefest description and soon give way to the main theme of the overture, which is gradually and quickly developed into a strenuous fortissimo. The work of the united strings in the introduction was refined and delicate, the preceding phrases were admirably given by the brasses, and the high woodwinds, cellos and bassoons indulged in their little dialogue in an animated and harmonious manner. In the fortissimo the orchestra delivered its phrases with sonority and precision, and in the following or second theme the strings and oboe played the figures with an effect that was quite pleasing.

The conclusion is highly dramatic and irregular, at times chaotic, and here Dvorak takes advantage of his free rein and fairly taxes the fortissimo powers of the orchestra to the utmost. There was no doubt about the effective manner in which this finale was played, and probably the author's ideas were adequately presented, but it would be difficult to analyze the merit of this part of the work, owing to its tempestuous moments.

Richard Strauss, in his tone poem, presents a gloomy picture of an invalid wrestling with death. Finally the happiness sought for in this world is discovered in the realms above, and heavenly music welcomes the sufferer to his abode in paradise. The orchestration is naturally of the most somber description, and in the wailings of the strings and the short fortissimos of the brasses and woodwinds, and strokes of the kettledrum one may conjure up a startling picture of the battle between the sick man and the grim destroyer, death. The interpretation was highly commendable, the different phases of the conflict were given with vividness and precision. The passionate phrases just before the close vied with those in the Dvorak number and received the same forceful and convincing treatment. The composition is full of poetic inspiration, despite the grewsome scene it describes. It appeared as if the final, celestial strains were given by an orchestra of men inspired; but that effect was possibly caused from relief suggested by the lighter and tenderer quality of the terminal melody.

The Rubinstein ballet music was played beautifully and in perfect tempo. The "Mephisto" waltz, with its mocking interludes, was also performed in an artistic manner. The great Schumann overture was excellent in every way. The trombones deserve special mention for their figures in the fourth movement, and Mr Kneisel's violin solo in the romanza was most delightful in tonality and phrasing. The odd measures in the scherzo, presented by the woodwinds with ornamentations by the violins, are also pleasant remembrances, the artists executing the trio charmingly.

The program for this week's concerts will be as follows: Beethoven, overture, "Prometheus;" Brahms, concerto for violin; Bizet, entr'actes and ballet music from "Carmen;" Tschaikowsky, symphony No. 2. Mr Franz Kneisel will be the soloist.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1897.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

As yesterday was the hundredth anniversary of Franz Schubert's birthday, the programme of the thirteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was made up wholly of works by Schubert. The list was as follows:

Unfinished Symphony in B minor.
Songs with Pianoforte:
Gruppe aus dem Tartarus, opus 24, No. 1.
Greisengesang, opus 60, No. 1.
An Schwager Kronos, opus 19 No. 1.
Symphony No. 9, in C major.
Mr. Max Heinrich was the singer.

It may be a question, whether the world's great composers are more worthily honored on anniversary occasions by giving them a "special night," or by duly preparing and bringing out some hitherto unheard great work of theirs. It is unquestionably less trouble to give a Schubert programme, a Beethoven programme or a Rubinstein programme, made up of compositions already long in the repertory, than to put an as yet untried important work into rehearsal, and peform the same for the first time in this city. Less trouble, but perhaps not quite so much honor! Still it may be said, on the other hand, that, in the case of a man like Schubert, it would be hard to find a really important orchestral work of his which did not already form part of the current repertory. To give a first performance of one of Schubert's earlier symphonies to an audience long familiar with his great C major, would be doing him no especial honor. Making such a symphony the central figure on a programme in honor of Schubert's memory would be rather too like choosing "The Two Gentleman of Verona" for performance on a Shakspeare anniversary. On the whole, last Saturday's programme was perhaps as good as another. Only, if some way could have been devised of getting round the B minor torso-symphony, we would have been delighted.

As far as the performance went, the two movements of the B minor seemed to us decidedly better played than the great C major. Schubert's C major symphony—like Beethoven's A major—is one of those works which seems to call for one definite style of performance, and no other, so distinctly and unmistakably that one wonders how two opinions can be held on the subject. The C major symphony is permeated from beginning to end with the spirit of the dance; and the quintessence of this spirit is rhythmic regularity and pertinacity. No doubt, the first movement presents a difficulty; it is inconceivable that both the first and second themes of the allegro, ma non troppo should go at one and the same tempo. We admit this freely. Yet we think the difficulty might be overcome by taking these two themes at as nearly the same tempo as possible, so as not to make the contrast too strong. The rhythm in this movement seemed uneasy and freakish last Saturday evening; there was too little unity of mood and purpose. Moreover, the closing stretto of the coda struck us as too slow. This coda is marked piu moto—not poco piu moto—and its tempo should present a striking contrast with the principal one. There is not a little of the Italian spirit in Schubert's orchestral works; this very coda is taken from an earlier "Overture in the Italian Style," and is full of the rush and bustle of the characteristic Italian finale. Now, a sudden and strongly marked—what the Germans might call an "excessive"—piu moto is one of the most characteristic features of Italian music. We should much like to hear this coda played frankly à la Rossini. Some persons perhaps might call this vulgar, but we cannot feel it to be so. The most vulgar thing in the world, to our mind, is that super-refinement that is afraid of being vulgar. The man who takes "drank" as the past participle of "drink"—to make it rhyme with, say, "thank"—is above criticism; but, if he says "has drank" simply because he is afraid of the sound "has drunk," he is an irredeemable vulgarian. We feel much the same about a too slow tempo in this coda of Schubert's.

There was much that beautiful in the playing of the second movement; Mr. Sautet, Mr. Pourtau, and Mr. Pierre Müller are highly to be praised for their exqusite solo work. Still there was too much variety in rhythmic effects; when a movement, like this one, has a certain monotony for one of its salient characteristics, it is best to make play with that monotony for all it is worth; you may thus get a cumulative effect at last that will be irresistible. To try to tone down this monotony by introducing an adventitious variety, is to weaken the whole thing. We noticed something of the sort also in the playing of the scherzo; there was too much modification of tempo!

The last movement was spoiled as usual. Since Mr. Gericke left us, we have not had this movement played here with any approach to sanity. Both Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur have come to grief over an attempt to make a horse run away at a canter—instead of at a gallop! Here there need be no question of 'conception" nor of a dignified or rollicking tempo; there is a physical impossibility that stultifies Mr. Nikisch's and Mr. Paur's slow tempo outright. The persistent violin triplet that accompanies the second theme throughout cannot be played slower than at a certain rate of speed; the violin-bow will not jump slower. And note that it is precisely this second theme of the movement which both Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur take Allegro moderato, instead of Allegro vivace. The first theme and its subsidiary go fast enough—especially the subsidiary; but just where the triplet jump of the bow comes in—in the second theme—the slackening of the pace is out of all reason.

Mr. Heinrich sang three of the very great songs. His singing of the Greisengesang was one of the most perfect expressions of deep feeling in admirably pure musical phrasing that we have ever listened to. He showed us the wonderful song in its full glory. And how exquisitely beautiful his voice sounded! In the two other songs he had to struggle against an obstreperous accompaniment that was entirely out of place. A man might sing Wotan's Farewell to such an accompaniment; indeed, many have had to, though the task is not an artistic one, not what Wagner intended. But to sing Schubert's Gruppe aus dem Tartarus and An Schwager Kronos to such a thunderous background of pianoforte tone is impossible. The songs of Schubert, Schumann and Franz were never meant to be yelled and bellowed. Mr. Heinrich did what could be done under the circumstances; but he is to be pitied for being thus placed in a totally false artistic position. He was rapturously applauded and often recalled.

The next programme is: Dvorak, overture to "Othello" (new); Rubinstein, ballet music from "Feramors; Richard Strauss, "Tod und Verklärung" (new); Liszt, scene in the tavern ("Mephisto Waltz") from Lenau's "Faust;" Schumann, Symphony No. 4, in D minor, opus 120.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1897.

The program of the thirteenth Symphony concert was devoted exclusively to pieces by Schubert, in honor of the anniversary of his birth (January 31, 1797). It was as follows:

Unfinished Symphony, B minor	1822
Songs with piano:
Gruppe Aus dem Tartarus	1817
Greisengesang	1820-22
An Schwager Kronos	1816
Mr. Max Heinrich
Symphony No. 9, C major	1828

Mr. Apthorp has made a discovery. Just as Mr. Richard Harding Davis discovered Paris and London, and Mr. Henry A. Clapp, the eminent Shakesperian critic, discovered Francis Wilson two years or so ago in the jungles of musical farce, so Mr. Apthorp has discovered the first performance of the great C major symphony.

I quote from his program book of the 30th:

> This symphony was written in March, 1828. It was never performed during Schubert's lifetime. The current legend is that the MS. was never known to anyone until it was discovered by Robert Schumann, some ten years after the composer's death; and that the first public performance was at the Gewandhaus in Leipzig under Mendelssohn's direction on March 22, 1839. In a notice of a second performance in December of the same year, in the Leipzig Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, much astonishment is expressed that so great a work should have lain so long utterly unknown.
>
> But it seems to me that this legend cannot be wholly true. In the issue of the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung for February, 1829—that is, ten years earlier—I find an account of a performance in Vienna, on the 14th of that month, of a posthumous MS. symphony in C by Schubert. The work is described thus: A beautiful, diligently worked out composition, the especially pleasing movements of which are the scherzo and the finale. What might be blamed in it is that the wind band is far too richly represented, whereas the stringed instruments, on the other hand, occupy a subordinate position. This seems to me to describe the work accurately enough for recognition. The criticism of the wind instruments playing too prominent a part would certainly not apply to the other, smaller and earlier symphony in C. So it seems as if the score of the great ninth must have been lost after this first performance in Vienna, not quite three months after Schubert's death.

⁂

Now what are the facts that are accepted by all?

Schubert gave the great C major symphony, in 1828, to the Gesselschaft der Musikfreunde, Vienna. The Society found the work too long and too difficult.

He then substituted in its place the sixth symphony (C major). He died November 19, 1828.

The said Society gave two performances of this shorter C major symphony—December 14, 1828, and March 12, 1829.

The first performance in Vienna of the great C major symphony was in the year 1839, and it was only partial; the first two movements were played, and they were separated by an aria of Donizetti. The symphony had been produced before that at the Gewandhaus in Leipzig, March 22, 1839.

I have taken these facts from Hanslick's Geschichte des Concert Wesens in Wien, pp. 284, 285.

⁂

But how about this review in the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung for February, 1829, of "a performance in Vienna, on the 14th of that month, of a posthumous MS. symphony in C by Schubert"?

Is Mr. Apthorp sure that "the 14th" refers to February? News was slow of travel in 1829. It is similarly slow to-day in the music journals of Leipsic. It is almost impossible that a concert given in Vienna February 14 should have been reviewed in the February number of the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung. It is highly probable that a concert given in Vienna December 14, 1828, should not be reviewed by the said journal until February, 1829. Now the symphony played December 14, 1828, was the shorter symphony in C major.

The criticism concerning the too rich representation of the wind band might have been applied by the critic to any symphony. He had his article to write. Not to find fault with something would lead to suspicion of his acumen.

⁂

You surely do not expect me to write a commemorative article on Schubert, just because to-day is January 31, 1897. I answer in the words of Mr. Henderson of the New York Times of this morning: "Can I say to myself, 'Now you must have a Schubert fever? Let it rage. If it does not rage spontaneously work up the rage.' Furthermore, it is not necessary. Everyone is singing or playing Schubert to-day, and he is being celebrated by machine-made essays and lectures all over the land. Schubert is a little too sacred to me to be treated in a business-like manner."

⁂

Mr. Paur's reading of the symphonies is not to be commended unreservedly. He was inclined to dawdle sentimentally with the second themes, and he often turned the simple flowing curves of Schubert's architecture into broken, irregular and rigid lines. It seemed more than once that he stopped the onward sweep of a movement so as to let the woodwind men come down to the front of the stage, show their instruments to the audience as an evidence of good faith, and then play their pretty tunes. And in these symphonies, by the way, the woodwind men covered themselves with glory. In the C major symphony the pace was not always hot enough to allow the difficult violin figures to be in evidence.

Mr. Heinrich is heard to far greater advantage in a smaller hall than Music Hall. He declaimed with intelligence and self consciousness that was akin to arrogance; but the voice was without sensuous charm, and it did not fill the hall. Nor was he fully master in the expression of his honorable intentions. The Greisengesang demands a singer of genuine vocal art. I admire Mr. Heinrich in certain ways; he is first of all an interesting individuality. He is not an accomplished singer; he is a very acute declaimer, with intelligence and imagination. But the supreme songs of Schubert should be sung. Neither Gruppe Aus dem Tartarus nor An Schwager Kronos is one of these supreme songs. That Mr. Heinrich was not effective in them is due to the fact that Music Hall is too large for the spell of his individuality.

Mr. Paur accompanied Mr. Heinrich. He played with a heavy touch, without a keen sense of rhythm, and with a passion for the damper pedal.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1897.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Fourteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall—Novelties by Dvorak and Strauss—Concert by Miss Zella Cole.

The program of the Symphony concert last night, Emil Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "Othello," op. 93 (First time in Boston.)	Dvorak
Ballet music from "Feramors" II. Candle-dance of the Brides of Kashmire. I. Dance of Bayaderes.	Rubinstein
Tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," op. 24 (First time in Boston.)	Strauss
Scene in the Tavern ("Mephisto Waltz") from Lenau's "Faust"	Liszt
Symphony No. 4, in D minor, op. 120	Schumann

This "Othello" overture of Dvořák was first played in the United States at the inaugural concert of the composer in New York, Oct. 21, 1892. It then, with "In der Natur" (played here by the Symphony Orchestra, Dec. 7, 1895), and the "Carneval" overture (played here by the Symphony Orchestra Jan. 5, 1895), was called "Triple Overture."

But where is Othello in this overture? In Bohemia, apparently; not the Bohemia of Shakspeare, with its seaport, but the Bohemia of Dvořák, the home of negro medodies and negro jigs. Had Dvořák been reading the theory of Coleridge—that Othello was not influenced by jealousy—when he wrote the overture? Or had he in his portfolio an overture, without a name, and did he choose Othello because it had an agreeable sound, as Mesopotamia pleased the godly old woman?

Yes, Othello is in Bohemia; but not the romantic country known to the Dvořák of earlier years; rather the dry, sterile, flat, unwooded land where he now manufactures music. Frankly—this overture is not worth discussion. It reminds one of the tragedy only by the name, and as absolute music it is barren of ideas and dull in treatment.

⁂

"Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss, is one of the most remarkable works that Mr. Paur has produced here. It was played in 1890 at the Musicians' Congress at Eisenach. Since then it has excited hot admiration and hot ridicule. They do him wrong who say that Strauss is a mere imitator of Wagner. He has his own voice, a gigantic one, and he has his own vocabulary. There are passages of surpassing grandeur in this symphonic poem. The long and mighty crescendo after the first stroke of the gong is marvelously effective; but it is a question whether the ear is not too fatigued by the preceding irrepressible conflict of dissonances to grasp and appreciate it thoroughly. There are orchestral effects that were not known before Strauss imagined them. I confess I dislike the scheme of the work. For a man to take poetical ideas rather than musical ideas as the main material seems to be essentially unmusical; program music becomes panoramic, and the composer is in evidence, in swallow-tail coat, and with a stick. Now this symphonic poem of Strauss needs no Baedeker; the title is enough. Why should the hearers be invited to take note of the "necessitous little room," the "soft ticking of the clock" and "one candle-end"? To prepare a mood? But is not the one word—the awful, terrifying, consoling word "Death"—enough to guide the hearer?

I confess I should like to hear the work again. It is not to be comprehended as a whole in one hearing or in two hearings. This I know:—that there are noble musical thoughts, daring harmonic treatment, peculiar and penetrating melody, an astounding knowledge of the orchestra, and high imagination shown in the invention of orchestration.

⁂

The other selections do not call for extended comment. It was a great pleasure to hear again the beautiful ballet music of Rubinstein. The "Scene in the Tavern" by Liszt is of specious brilliancy, but it is corrupt and corrupting music. The D minor symphony is a rare delight from beginning to end, in which respect it stands apart from Schumann's other symphonies. Mr. Paur's reading was robust rather than romantic. In the introduction he anticipated his climax, and throughout the first movement there were few dynamic contrasts. And in the exquisite trio of the scherzo there should have been more languorous melancholy, a tenderer feeling, larger freedom of motion. The piece by Strauss was played with amazing force and general virtuosoship.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 7, 1897.

Fourteenth Symphony Concert.

Mr Paur offered two novelties on last week's symphony program, Dvorak's overture to "Othello" and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The other selections were Rubenstein's "Feramers" ballet music, Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and Schumann's No. 4 symphony. There were no soloists. The Dvorak overture is a characteristic work, the instrumentation showing in many places the peculiar combinations in which the composer frequently delights. The quiet passages of the introduction are of the briefest description and soon give way to the main theme of the overture, which is gradually and quickly developed into a strenuous fortissimo. The work of the united strings in the introduction was refined and delicate, the preceding phrases were admirably given by the brasses, and the high woodwinds, cellos and bassoons indulged in their little dialogue in an animated and harmonious manner. In the fortissimo the orchestra delivered its phrases with sonority and precision, and in the following or second theme the strings and oboe played the figures with an effect that was quite pleasing.

The conclusion is highly dramatic and irregular, at times chaotic, and here Dvorak takes advantage of his free rein and fairly taxes the fortissimo powers of the orchestra to the utmost. There was no doubt about the effective manner in which this finale was played, and probably the author's ideas were adequately presented, but it would be difficult to analyze the merit of this part of the work, owing to its tempestuous moments.

Richard Strauss, in his tone poem, presents a gloomy picture of an invalid wrestling with death. Finally the happiness sought for in this world is discovered in the realms above, and heavenly music welcomes the sufferer to his abode in paradise. The orchestration is naturally of the most somber description, and in the wailings of the strings and the short fortissimos of the brasses and woodwinds, and strokes of the kettledrum one may conjure up a startling picture of the battle between the sick man and the grim destroyer, death. The interpretation was highly commendable, the different phases of the conflict were given with vividness and precision. The passionate phrases just before the close vied with those in the Dvorak number and received the same forceful and convincing treatment. The composition is full of poetic inspiration, despite the grewsome scene it describes. It appeared as if the final, celestial strains were given by an orchestra of men inspired; but that effect was possibly caused from relief suggested by the lighter and tenderer quality of the terminal melody.

The Rubinstein ballet music was played beautifully and in perfect tempo. The "Mephisto" waltz, with its mocking interludes, was also performed in an artistic manner. The great Schumann overture was excellent in every way. The trombones deserve special mention for their figures in the fourth movement, and Mr Kneisel's violin solo in the romanza was most delightful in tonality and phrasing. The odd measures in the scherzo, presented by the woodwinds with ornamentations by the violins, are also pleasant remembrances, the artists executing the trio charmingly.

The program for this week's concerts will be as follows: Beethoven, overture, "Prometheus;" Brahms, concerto for violin; Bizet, entr'actes and ballet music from "Carmen;" Tschaikowsky, symphony No. 2. Mr Franz Kneisel will be the soloist.

[illegible]
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 8, 1897.

A Strong Work by Strauss Performed Here for the First Time.

The symphony concert came as an appetizing entree in the midst of the operatic banquet, and Mr. Paur spiced the dish right thoroughly to restore the jaded musical appetites. Almost everything was of the most modern character, only the last number of the programme presenting Music in the language she used to speak.

Dvorak's "Othello" overture began the programme. If Shakespeare placed a seacoast in Bohemia there is no valid reason why Dvorak should not place Venice there also, although the title had perhaps better be changed into "The Moor of Prague," for Othello in this work has certainly taken out Bohemian naturalization papers.

Perhaps the words of Iago—"I am nothing if not critical"—may suit the reviewer's mood after hearing this overture, for it seemed to consist chiefly of snatches of Bohemian folk-tunes, and it told but a vague story at the best. There was a rather military chief-theme which suggested "the plumed troop and the big wars," and there were cymbal strokes and blasts of muted horns which seemed to tell of coming evil; towards the end there was a gentle theme, chiefly harp and wood-wind, that told of Desdemona, then another clash of cymbals, a wild rush of the whole orchestra, and she was presumably smothered, matters coming to a very brusque end.

We believe that the work was intended for definite programme-music, but it can scarcely be called so. We prefer Tschaikowsky or Berlioz as our translators of Shakespeare into orchestral music.

Two charming sugar plums were now administered to take away any bad taste that the green-eyed monster had left; these were two of the ballet-numbers from Rubinstein's "Feramors," both exquisitely played, although the counter theme of the Candle-dance seemed somewhat too loud. After this matters suffered "a sea-change into something rich and strange," but not exactly beautiful, for Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" was performed for the first time in Boston. A wonderful work and one which cannot be dismissed with a sneer, but a work which seems to lead into a false path and to confirm the thought that Richard Strauss is a genius gone astray.

It is a picture of a struggle with Death, a dream-review of a life which has failed in its aspirations and finally finds its true fulfillment on the other side. Not a vastly different idea from that which Liszt worked out in "Les Preludes," and the result out-Liszts Liszt in what may as well be called a "Symphonic Poem." The modern romantic school is losing itself in strange philosophizings, and it may be doubted whether the function of Music is to deal with metaphysics.

The work is gloriously scored, and some of its thoughts are impressive in a high degree, and it even contains some short bits of absolute melodic beauty. We do not think it an echo of Wagner in any degree; it does not even copy Liszt; Strauss is a genius who has his own voice, his own method. The composition seems too prolix, the man dies a most lingering death, slower even than Tristan, and the final glorification is also too extended.

The extreme of force is attained in some of the loud passages; one should put on ear-muffs before attempting to listen to such explosive effects. Even the gong is called into play and more extensively than in any composition that we recall. This hotel instrument can be used to picture a catastrophe, and has been used loudly by Berlioz in the "Ride to Hades," and by Rubinstein in the "Tower of Babel," and softly, as one would use the evil tones of a stopped horn, to picture an approaching calamity, by Rossini at the opening of the tomb of Ninus in "Semiramide," by Meyerbeer at the rising of the nuns in "Robert," and even by Cherubini in one of his requiems, but here it is used for clashes, for soft effects, for slow crescendo effects, in short in more manners than the most enterprising railroad restaurant keeper ever dreamed of.

It is sorrowful to see great gifts perverted; we feel certain that the music of the future will recede somewhat from the position taken by the music of the present, but it will inherit from our time an ingenuity and grandeur of orchestration that will be worth much—only it will probably apply it to more legitimate purposes.

Although the auditor might be supposed to cry, "I have supped full with horrors!" there was more diablerie coming, for now followed Liszt's "Scene in the Tavern," from Lenau's "Faust," wherein Satan plays the part of fiddler. Somehow Mephistopheles did not seem very devilish. After the heavy crashes of Strauss' orchestral thunder, our poor Mephisto seemed as tame as a Sunday school superintendent. Yet the caprice and quaint syncopations of the work were well done and the performance was throughout a commendable one, it was simply that the modern Boanerges had taken the wind out of the sails of Liszt.

How calm and restful Schumann's fourth symphony seemed after all the tumult and excitement! Yet the time was when he too was deemed restless and too fond of syncopation. Who shall ever judge finally or authoritatively regarding what is the true expression of music? There is no definite rule, no infallible yardstick, in this matter. The poison of one age becomes the meat of another. Perhaps this is the strength of the Art; it faithfully reflects the mental, moral and physical character of its epoch, and this being the age of Neurosis, nervous prostration and insanity, our music only reflects our general state of mental frenzy.

All must thoroughly have enjoyed the symphony, which was well read and admirably played. The violoncello work of the second movement was beautiful. Schumann originally wrote the accompaniment for this melodious theme of the slow movement for guitar, but a single hearing convinced him that the guitar had no business in the modern orchestra.

Nowadays even the mandoline accompaniment to the serenade of Don Giovanni and the guitar accompaniment to Almaviva's air in Rossini's "Barber of Seville," are changed into pizzicato violin passages, and Schumann found that he could make no exception to the rule.

"All's well that ends well," and Schumann's symphony came as a benediction, only it did not "follow after prayer," but after a great deal of flurry and hurly-burly. It is odd to think that just the composer of such gentle music should have died insane, one would have supposed the insane composers belonged chiefly to the present.

Louis C. Elson.

[illegible]
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CL, NO. 38.
SUNDAY, FEB. 7, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Overture "Othello," by Dvorak, Very Tame.

It Is Singularly Uninteresting and Unsatisfying—The Strauss Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Is Long, Monotonous and Repellant and Lacks Meaning.

For the fourteenth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, the programme was:

Overture, "Othello," op. 93............Dvorak
(First time in Boston.)
Ballet music from "Feramors"......Rubinstein
1. Dance of the Brides of Kashmire.
2. Dance of Bayaderes.
Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration"—
Richard Strauss
(First time in Boston.)
Mephisto Waltz..............................Liszt
Symphony No. 4, D minor............Schumann

The Dvorak overture is singularly uninteresting. Perhaps if it had not been entitled "Othello," it might have seemed less tame and unsatisfying. As it is, one looks constantly for something suggesting Shakespeare's tragedy, in the appeal it makes to the emotions, and does not find it. In the opening movement there is a moment or more in which it might be supposed that Dvorak, taking the Moor for a southern darkey, typified him by a tune of the same order as is found in the symphony, "From the New World," but that cannot be, for the date of the overture precedes the time when the composer became impressed by the negro melodies of this country as a basis on which to build a school of national music. At other moments there is what might be taken as evidence that Othello was an out-and-out Bohemian. There is a bit of cantabile that may, possibly, be intended for Desdemona; but it is useless to dwell further on any probable descriptive intention in the work; and, besides, the overture is of no very pronounced worth, and is little more than highly respectable conventionality, that goes vacuously on its way, without giving offence, and without appealing successfully for admiration. There are hundreds of overtures of this empty character, that show how well the artificer knows his business, and show nothing else. It says nothing new and nothing striking, except, perhaps, the powerful crescendo with which it unexpectedly terminates.

The Strauss tone-poem is an example of the greatest extremity to which orchestral music has been carried by a follower of the most advanced modern school. It is programme music, and depicts, or is intended to depict, a sick man, in a poverty-stricken room, lighted only by a candle-end, lying in bed and wrestling with death. A sad smile plays over his face. The struggle with the grim destroyer is long and terrible. Before the victim's rapidly glazing eye the scenes of his childhood pass, then those of his mature life, and so on, until death conquers. "But from the heavenly spaces sounds mightily to greet him what he yearningly sought for here; deliverance from the world; transfiguration of the world." Whether the composer has or has not succeeded in his attempt to deal with this remarkable theme in his tone-poem, it is not easy to decide on a first hearing of the work. It is of no consequence if he has, and is of as little importance if he has not. His work is to be judged as music, and thus judged, the music says nothing that is even remotely intelligible without the description that accompanies it.

There are spasmodic bits of melody that are scarcely begun before they are ended; there is much of vagueness, little that is clear and nothing that is pleasing. The whole merit of the work lies in its surprisingly elaborate and ingenious orchestration; but most surprising of all are the ponderous masses of almost deafening noise in which it abounds. It is a triumphant assertion of the possibilities of brass in an ear-splitting direction and a glorification of three kettle drums. The transfiguration business roars and howls through the agency of horns, trumpets, trombones and a bass tuba with a violence that lends a new terror to death, if Strauss' inspiration has dealt faithfully with the subject. The work is long, monotonous and repellant, and its utter lack of meaning produces soul weariness before it has gone half way on its course. It is immensely difficult, and the supreme virtuosity of the orchestra was never more convincingly shown than it was in the skill and the smoothness with which it accomplished the task of performing it. Even the Liszt waltz came as a relief after this drearily majestic much ado about nothing, and the lovely and melodious Schumann symphony was as a glimpse of paradise after both.

The work of the orchestra through the whole concert was perfect. The charming Rubinstein ballet music was exquisitely played, the piquant Bayadere dance in particular. The symphony was given a beautiful reading, and its performance was delightful and delighting.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Prometheus," Beethoven; concerto for violin, Brahms; Entr'actes and ballet music from "Carmen," Bizet; symphony No. 2, Tschaikowsky, first time. The soloist is Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813.
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 7.

Symphony Concert.

The programme of the Symphony concert given last night was:

Overture, "Othello," op. 93............Dvorak.
Ballet Music, "Feramors".........Rubinstein.
Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration"
op. 24..............................R. Strauss.
"Mephisto Waltz"..........................Liszt.
Symphony No. 4....................Schumann.

Mr. Strauss would be an interesting study to a psychologist, for his mental organization is built on a curious pattern. Despite his many merits, which in this country at least must be taken at second hand, he has the not rare delusion of mistaking noise for music and emphasizing his aesthetic theory by means of drum-sticks and trumpet blasts. The tone poem is not an admirable work, and its composer's hand seems incapable of giving any evidence of grace and delicacy. He stands in the public places of art and attracts attention by bellowing, which is noise in the process of organization. In this way he emphasizes ideas that are not of sufficient value to call for emphasis, and whatever dignity they suggest is extrinsic to the idea itself; Falstaff reduced to a living skeleton when his stage garments are cast aside. It is always pleasant and profitable to hear new things, and one would even listen to the rising or risen genius Strauss than hear nothing.

Dvorak's "Othello" overture is a musicianly work, but here again one forces an admiration that one does not feel. One likes to be proud of the era in which one lives and is willing to lustily cheer genius on very slight symptoms, but unfortunately the symptoms are absent so far as new music is concerned.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 7, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An unusually long, heavy and monotonous programme was what the Symphony patrons had to sit through in Music Hall last night. There were six numbers, and two of them, overture to "Othello," by Dvorak, and a tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," by Strauss, had never been heard here before, and it is not likely that the latter will soon be heard again—at least, not by popular request, for reasons which will be noted later on.

The "Othello" overture opened the programme. Some pretty, soft harmonies are first heard on the horns and muted strings, which gradually develop into passages of more dramatic strength, working up to a gradual crescendo. The strings are occasionally heard in some pretty figures, and the whole overture is strikingly strong, and suggestive of the tragedy from which it takes its name. The grand crash with which it ends vividly depicts the culmination of the story. On the whole, however, the overture is rather stupid.

Following came the ballet music from "Feramors," by Rubinstein, of which two numbers were played. The music is of a light order, tuneful, playful and melodious. There are several quaint phrases and a touch or Orientalism which adds much color here and there. It was charmingly played and thoroughly enjoyable.

Next came the Strauss number, already referred to, and if ever there was a case of too much orchestra here was one. The tone poem, as it is called, is thoroughly descriptive, and for general heaviness, accumulations of noise and fiery intensity it out-Wagners Wagner. It begins in a quiet, effective way, but gradually increases to the most crescendo effects. The piece is full of the strongest contrasts, mighty discords and bizarre effects, but when it is all over one would wonder without the programme book what it was all about. It is tiresomely long, gruesome in its suggestiveness, and almost demoniacal in its tempestuous fierceness. The audience could well be excused for heaving a sigh of relief after it was all over.

A waltz scene from Lenau's "Faust," by Liszt, followed, but the selection was not wisely chosen, as it was not light and frivolous enough to relieve the gloom occasioned by the previous number. The Schumann symphony, No. 4, ended the concert. It was delightfully played, as are all the pieces by this composer, as Mr. Paur has a happy faculty of interpreting his works.

At the next concert, Mr. Kneisel will play, and the Tschaikowsky symphony, No. 2, will be heard for the first time.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 8, 1897.

A Strong Work by Strauss Performed Here for the First Time.

The symphony concert came as an appetizing entree in the midst of the operatic banquet, and Mr. Paur spiced the dish right thoroughly to restore the jaded musical appetites. Almost everything was of the most modern character, only the last number of the programme presenting Music in the language she used to speak.

Dvorak's "Othello" overture began the programme. If Shakespeare placed a seacoast in Bohemia there is no valid reason why Dvorak should not place Venice there also, although the title had perhaps better be changed into "The Moor of Prague," for Othello in this work has certainly taken out Bohemian naturalization papers.

Perhaps the words of Iago—"I am nothing if not critical"—may suit the reviewer's mood after hearing this overture, for it seemed to consist chiefly of snatches of Bohemian folk-tunes, and it told but a vague story at the best. There was a rather military chief-theme which suggested "the plumed troop and the big wars," and there were cymbal strokes and blasts of muted horns which seemed to tell of coming evil; towards the end there was a gentle theme, chiefly harp and wood-wind, that told of Desdemona, then another clash of cymbals, a wild rush of the whole orchestra, and she was presumably smothered, matters coming to a very brusque end.

We believe that the work was intended for definite programme-music, but it can scarcely be called so. We prefer Tschaikowsky or Berlioz as our translators of Shakespeare into orchestral music.

Two charming sugar plums were now administered to take away any bad taste that the green-eyed monster had left; these were two of the ballet-numbers from Rubinstein's "Feramors," both exquisitely played, although the counter theme of the Candle-dance seemed somewhat too loud. After this matters suffered "a sea-change into something rich and strange," but not exactly beautiful, for Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" was performed for the first time in Boston. A wonderful work and one which cannot be dismissed with a sneer, but a work which seems to lead into a false path and to confirm the thought that Richard Strauss is a genius gone astray.

It is a picture of a struggle with Death, a dream-review of a life which has failed in its aspirations and finally finds its true fulfillment on the other side. Not a vastly different idea from that which Liszt worked out in "Les Preludes," and the result out-Liszts Liszt in what may as well be called a "Symphonic Poem." The modern romantic school is losing itself in strange philosophizings, and it may be doubted whether the function of Music is to deal with metaphysics.

The work is gloriously scored, and some of its thoughts are impressive in a high degree, and it even contains some short bits of absolute melodic beauty. We do not think it an echo of Wagner in any degree; it does not even copy Liszt; Strauss is a genius who has his own voice, his own method. The composition seems too prolix, the man dies a most lingering death, slower even than Tristan, and the final glorification is also too extended.

The extreme of force is attained in some of the loud passages; one should put on ear-muffs before attempting to listen to such explosive effects. Even the gong is called into play and more extensively than in any composition that we recall. This hotel instrument can be used to picture a catastrophe, and has been used loudly by Berlioz in the "Ride to Hades," and by Rubinstein in the "Tower of Babel," and softly, as one would use the evil tones of a stopped horn, to picture an approaching calamity, by Rossini at the opening of the tomb of Ninus in "Semiramide," by Meyerbeer at the rising of the nuns in "Robert," and even by Cherubini in one of his requiems, but here it is used for clashes, for soft effects, for slow crescendo effects, in short in more manners than the most enterprising railroad restaurant keeper ever dreamed of.

It is sorrowful to see great gifts perverted; we feel certain that the music of the future will recede somewhat from the position taken by the music of the present, but it will inherit from our time an ingenuity and grandeur of orchestration that will be worth much—only it will probably apply it to more legitimate purposes.

Although the auditor might be supposed to cry, "I have supped full with horrors!" there was more diablerie coming, for now followed Liszt's "Scene in the Tavern," from Lenau's "Faust," wherein Satan plays the part of fiddler. Somehow Mephistopheles did not seem very devilish. After the heavy crashes of Strauss' orchestral thunder, our poor Mephisto seemed as tame as a Sunday school superintendent. Yet the caprice and quaint syncopations of the work were well done and the performance was throughout a commendable one, it was simply that the modern Boanerges had taken the wind out of the sails of Liszt.

How calm and restful Schumann's fourth symphony seemed after all the tumult and excitement! Yet the time was when he too was deemed restless and too fond of syncopation. Who shall ever judge finally or authoritatively regarding what is the true expression of music? There is no definite rule, no infallible yardstick, in this matter. The poison of one age becomes the meat of another. Perhaps this is the strength of the Art; it faithfully reflects the mental, moral and physical character of its epoch, and this being the age of Neurosis, nervous prostration and insanity, our music only reflects our general state of mental frenzy.

All must thoroughly have enjoyed the symphony, which was well read and admirably played. The violoncello work of the second movement was beautiful. Schumann originally wrote the accompaniment for this melodious theme of the slow movement for guitar, but a single hearing convinced him that the guitar had no business in the modern orchestra.

Nowadays even the mandoline accompaniment to the serenade of Don Giovanni and the guitar accompaniment to Almaviva's air in Rossini's "Barber of Seville," are changed into pizzicato violin passages, and Schumann found that he could make no exception to the rule.

"All's well that ends well," and Schumann's symphony came as a benediction, only it did not "follow after prayer," but after a great deal of flurry and hurly-burly. It is odd to think that just the composer of such gentle music should have died insane, one would have supposed the insane composers belonged chiefly to the present.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CI, NO. 38.
SUNDAY, FEB. 7, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Overture "Othello," by Dvorak, Very Tame.

It Is Singularly Uninteresting and Unsatisfying—The Strauss Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Is Long, Monotonous and Repellant and Lacks Meaning.

For the fourteenth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, the programme was:

Overture, "Othello," op. 93 .... Dvorak
(First time in Boston.)
Ballet music from "Feramorz" ..... Rubinstein
1. Dance of the Brides of Kashmire.
2. Dance of Bayaderes.
Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration" — Richard Strauss
(First time in Boston.)
Mephisto Waltz .... Liszt
Symphony No. 4, D minor .... Schumann

The Dvorak overture is singularly uninteresting. Perhaps if it had not been entitled "Othello," it might have seemed less tame and unsatisfying. As it is, one looks constantly for something suggesting Shakespeare's tragedy, in the appeal it makes to the emotions, and does not find it. In the opening movement there is a moment or more in which it might be supposed that Dvorak, taking the Moor for a southern darkey, typified him by a tune of the same order as is found in the symphony, "From the New World," but that cannot be, for the date of the overture precedes the time when the composer became impressed by the negro melodies of this country as a basis on which to build a school of national music. At other moments there is what might be taken as evidence that Othello was an out-and-out Bohemian. There is a bit of cantabile that may, possibly, be intended for Desdemona; but it is useless to dwell further on any probable descriptive intention in the work; and, besides, the overture is of no very pronounced worth, and is little more than highly respectable conventionality, that goes vacuously on its way, without giving offence, and without appealing successfully for admiration. There are hundreds of overtures of this empty character, that show how well the artificer knows his business, and show nothing else. It says nothing new and nothing striking, except, perhaps, the powerful crescendo with which it unexpectedly terminates.

The Strauss tone-poem is an example of the greatest extremity to which orchestral music has been carried by a follower of the most advanced modern school. It is programme music, and depicts, or is intended to depict, a sick man, in a poverty-stricken room, lighted only by a candle-end, lying in bed and wrestling with death. A sad smile plays over his face. The struggle with the grim destroyer is long and terrible. Before the victim's rapidly glazing eye the scenes of his childhood pass, then those of his mature life, and so on, until death conquers. "But from the heavenly spaces sounds mightily to greet him what he yearningly sought for here; deliverance from the world; transfiguration of the world." Whether the composer has or has not succeeded in his attempt to deal with this remarkable theme in his tone-poem, it is not easy to decide on a first hearing of the work. It is of no consequence if he has, and is of as little importance if he has not. His work is to be judged as music, and thus judged, the music says nothing that is even remotely intelligible without the description that accompanies it.

There are spasmodic bits of melody that are scarcely begun before they are ended; there is much of vagueness, little that is clear and nothing that is pleasing. The whole merit of the work lies in its surprisingly elaborate and ingenious orchestration; but most surprising of all are the ponderous masses of almost deafening noise in which it abounds. It is a triumphant assertion of the possibilities of brass in an ear-splitting direction and a glorification of three kettle drums. The transfiguration business roars and howls through the agency of horns, trumpets, trombones and a bass tuba with a violence that lends a new terror to death, if Strauss' inspiration has dealt faithfully with the subject. The work is long, monotonous and repellant, and its utter lack of meaning produces soul weariness before it has gone half way on its course. It is immensely difficult, and the supreme virtuosity of the orchestra was never more convincingly shown than it was in the skill and the smoothness with which it accomplished the task of performing it. Even the Liszt waltz came as a relief, after this drearily majestic much ado about nothing, and the lovely and melodious Schumann symphony was as a glimpse of paradise after both.

The work of the orchestra through the whole concert was perfect. The charming Rubinstein ballet music was exquisitely played, the piquant Bayadere dance in particular. The symphony was given a beautiful reading, and its performance was delightful and delighting.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Prometheus," Beethoven; concerto for violin, Brahms; Entr'actes and ballet music from "Carmen," Bizet; symphony No. 2, Tschaikowsky, first time. The soloist is Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813.
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 7.

Symphony Concert.

The programme of the Symphony concert given last night was:

Overture, "Othello," op. 93............Dvorak.
Ballet Music, "Feramors"..........Rubinstein.
Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration" op. 24............................R. Strauss.
"Mephisto Waltz"..........................Liszt.
Symphony No. 4......................Schumann.

Mr. Strauss would be an interesting study to a psychologist, for his mental organization is built on a curious pattern. Despite his many merits, which in this country at least must be taken at second hand, he has the not rare delusion of mistaking noise for music and emphasizing his aesthetic theory by means of drum-sticks and trumpet blasts. The tone poem is not an admirable work, and its composer's hand seems incapable of giving any evidence of grace and delicacy. He stands in the public places of art and attracts attention by bellowing, which is noise in the process of organization. In this way he emphasizes ideas that are not of sufficient value to call for emphasis, and whatever dignity they suggest is extrinsic to the idea itself; Falstaff reduced to a living skeleton when his stage garments are cast aside. It is always pleasant and profitable to hear new things, and one would even listen to the rising or risen genius Strauss than hear nothing.

Dvorak's "Othello" overture is a musicianly work, but here again one forces an admiration that one does not feel. One likes to be proud of the era in which one lives and is willing to lustily cheer genius on very slight symptoms, but unfortunately the symptoms are absent so far as new music is concerned.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 7, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An unusually long, heavy and monotonous programme was what the Symphony patrons had to sit through in Music Hall last night. There were six numbers, and two of them, overture to "Othello," by Dvorak, and a tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," by Strauss, had never been heard here before, and it is not likely that the latter will soon be heard again—at least, not by popular request, for reasons which will be noted later on.

The "Othello" overture opened the programme. Some pretty, soft harmonies are first heard on the horns and muted strings, which gradually develop into passages of more dramatic strength, working up to a gradual crescendo. The strings are occasionally heard in some pretty figures, and the whole overture is strikingly strong, and suggestive of the tragedy from which it takes its name. The grand crash with which it ends vividly depicts the culmination of the story. On the whole, however, the overture is rather stupid.

Following came the ballet music from "Feramors," by Rubinstein, of which two numbers were played. The music is of a light order, tuneful, playful and melodious. There are several quaint phrases and a touch or Orientalism which adds much color here and there. It was charmingly played and thoroughly enjoyable.

Next came the Strauss number, already referred to, and if ever there was a case of too much orchestra here was one. The tone poem, as it is called, is thoroughly descriptive, and for general heaviness, accumulations of noise and fiery intensity it out-Wagners Wagner. It begins in a quiet, effective way, but gradually increases to the most crescendo effects. The piece is full of the strongest contrasts, mighty discords and bizarre effects, but when it is all over one would wonder without the programme book what it was all about. It is tiresomely long, gruesome in its suggestiveness, and almost demoniacal in its tempestuous fierceness. The audience could well be excused for heaving a sigh of relief after it was all over.

A waltz scene from Lenau's "Faust," by Liszt, followed, but the selection was not wisely chosen, as it was not light and frivolous enough to relieve the gloom occasioned by the previous number. The Schumann symphony, No. 4, ended the concert. It was delightfully played, as are all the pieces by this composer, as Mr. Paur has a happy faculty of interpreting his works.

At the next concert, Mr. Kneisel will play, and the Tschaikowsky symphony, No. 2, will be heard for the first time.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEB. 6, 1897.

BOSTON'S FAMOUS ORGAN ROTTING AWAY UNUSED.

So famous throughout the world was the old Boston Music Hall organ, which is to be sold shortly, that it was for many years an object of admiration for music lovers. It was the inspiration of many a young student, and perhaps played a larger part in promoting musical culture than anything inanimate in Boston.

The Music Hall was built in 1852, and its opening was celebrated by a musical festival, the proceeds of which were set apart as a nucleus for a fund to provide for the hall a suitable organ, and it was the determination of the authorities to have an organ which would be regarded as the finest instrument on this continent. The fund grew slowly, and no very definite action was taken till 1856, when a scheme was put forward for raising twenty-five thousand dollars, which sum was estimated as being sufficient for the purpose. Circumstances "beyond human control" eventually rendered this sum entirely inadequate, and when the organ was at last built and installed, it was found to have cost between sixty and seventy thousand dollars.

The next move on the part of the Association was to appoint a committee to go abroad and acquire knowledge on the subject of organs and organ-builders. Consequently, the committee spent a whole summer in visiting organs and organ factories in England, France, Germany and Switzerland. They finally reported in favor of placing the contract with E. B. Wallcker & Son, of Ludwigsburg, Germany. The contract, as placed, was a document of more than forty pages in manuscript, the specifications calling for eighty-four stops and five thousand, four hundred and seventy-four pipes.

The case of the organ was built by a New York firm. The instrument was nearly fifty feet wide, eighteen feet deep and sixty feet high. Perhaps the best description of its appearance is that given by the late Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes in the Atlantic Monthly: "The structure is of black walnut, and is covered with carved statues, busts, masks and figures in boldest relief. In the centre a richly ornamented arch contains the niche for the keyboards and stops. A colossal mask of a singing woman looks over its summit. The pediment above is surmounted by the bust of Johann Sebastian Bach. Behind this rises the lofty central division, containing pipes, and crowning it is a beautiful statue of St. Cecelia, holding her lyre. On each side of her a griffin sits as guardian. The centre is connected by harp-shaped compartments filled with pipes to the two great round towers, one on each side, and each of them contains three colossal pipes. These magnificent towers come boldly forth into the hall, being the most prominent as they are the most stately and highest part of the facade. At the base of each a gigantic half-caryatid in the style of the ancient hermæ, but finished to the waist, bends beneath the superincumbent weight like Atlas under the globe. These figures are of wonderful force, the muscular development almost excessive, but in keeping with their superhuman task. At each side of the base two lion-hermæ share in the task of the giant. Over the base rise the round pillars which support the dome and inclose the three great pipes already mentioned. Graceful as these look in their position, half a dozen men might creep into one of them and lie hidden. The three great pipes are crowned by a heavily sculptured, ribbed, rounded dome, and this is surmounted on each side by two cherubs, whose heads almost touch the lofty ceiling. This whole portion of the sculpture is of eminent beauty. The two exquisite cherubs of one side are playing with the lute and lyre; those of the other side on the flute and horn. All the reliefs that run round the lower portion of the dome are of singular richness. Two lateral compartments, filled with pipes and still more suggestive of the harp in their form, lead to the square lateral towers. Over these compartments, close to the round tower, sits on either side a harper, a man on the right and a woman on the left, with their harps, all apparently of their natural size. Below three colossal hermæ of Cybil-like women perform for them the office which the giants and lion-shapes perform for the round tower. Above the dome is a vase-like support upon which are disposed figures of the lyre and other musical symbols. The whole base of the instrument in the intervals of the figures described is covered with elaborate carvings. Groups of musical instruments, standing out almost detached from the background, occupy the panels. Ancient and modern, clustered with careless grace and quaint variety, from the violin down to a string of sleigh bells, they call up all the echoes of forgotten music, such as the thousand-tongued organ blends together in one grand harmony."

Before the organ building was finished the War of the Rebellion broke out. There was a period of terrible financial depression and gloom. The finances of the Music Hall Association were in a low condition, and it looked very much as if it would be impossible to pay for the organ after all. About that time the international exhibition at South Kensington (London) was opened, and to celebrate the occasion, and for a grand commemoration of Handel, it was proposed to give a concert with four thousand picked voices and instruments. This took place at the Crystal Palace at Sydenham, and the treasurer of that institution made overtures to the Music Hall Association for the loan of the great organ, which was then almost ready for shipment. A long correspondence ensued, and it seemed as if Boston would lose its organ, at least for a time. The directors were about to accede to the terms proposed, when the Trent affair put a sudden end to negotiations, for it seemed that this country and England were on the verge of a war.

Eventually the organ was shipped from Amsterdam on the Dutch brig "Presto," and sailing under a neutral flag it was comparatively safe from hostile vessels. The "Presto" vindicated her name by taking three months to make the passage from Amsterdam to New York, arriving at that port one Sunday in March, 1863 nearly seven years after the placing o the contract. The summer was spent i building up the monster instrumen which weighed nearly seventy tons, but on October 31, the instrument being completed, a private test was held before about one thousand musicians and interested persons, and on the following Monday, November 2, the formal inauguration took place, being one of the most notable musical events in the history of Boston.

The organ was purchased by Hon. William O. Grover, who was anxious to keep such a monumental instrument in Boston. There was on foot a plan to build a large concert hall, but it fell through owing to the death of Dr. Tourgee in 1891. A shed was built and the organ was stored away in it, and in this shed the great Music Hall organ has spent more than a decade of ignominious captivity.

Let us hope that some place may be found, either in Boston or in some other American city, in which it may continue to exercise the functions outlined in the report to the board of directors of the Music Hall Association by their president: "Let it be to you and your children the inculcator of high and lofty aims—an educator of generations yet unborn—teaching with its thousand tongues the precepts of religion and virtue and heaven-born charity—from out whose golden mouths shall ever issue praise to God."

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1897.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall, last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Dvorák: Overture to "Othello," opus 93.
(First time in Boston.)
Rubinstein: Ballet Music from "Feramors."
Richard Strauss: Tone-Poem, "Tod und Verklärung," opus 24.
(First time in Boston.)
Liszt: Scene in the Tavern ("Mephisto Waltz") from Lenau's "Faust."
Schumann: Symphony No. 4, in D minor, opus 120.

A programme with a vengeance! It has been the custom of our Symphony Orchestra for the last several years to give every fourth concert without solos, either vocal or instrumental; a most excellent custom, worthy of all commendation. It is not unnatural to suppose that it originated as a concession to the taste of a respectable minority in the public who had rather hear purely orchestral music than songs or instrumental concertos in so large a place as the Music Hall. No doubt music-lovers of this sort are in the minority, as our Boston audiences go; but, as we have hinted, they form a respectable minority, and, as such, some consideration is due them. Such people look forward to the purely orchestral concerts as to the high tides of the symphony season, to the evenings which they will enjoy most. Perhaps the proportion of one in four is as just an one as could be found. Now it is reasonable to posit that, if it is worth while to please this orchestra-loving minority at all, it is worth while to please it in its own way—if this can be done without prejudice to the artistic dignity of the concerts. And we think that, if this minority could be canvassed, its vote would be found to be predominatingly in favor of the great classic and romantic composers, in favor of pretty solid music. Excepting Wagner, we thing that few of the extreme modern lights would get many votes. It can hardly be doubted that an orchestral programme selected from the works of Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Weber, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Cherubini, Wagner and Brahms, with an occasional, but only an occasional, dash of something lighter by Bizet, Saint-Saëns or Rubinstein, would please this minority best. But we mistake much if they are not disappointed when they see the names of Berlioz, Liszt, Tschaikowsky or Richard Strauss on the programme of their favorite "one-in-four" concert. To have to wade through such a slough as the first four numbers in last Saturday's programme before reaching the Schumann symphony is the last thing they want to do. For matter of that we doubt whether one listener in a hundred, leaving the minority out of the question, would care to do it. We, for one, can see no artistic sense in the collocation of those four numbers, from any point of view whatever.

Dvorak's new overture is a not disagreeable composition in a rather commonplace way; its thematic material is neither very fresh nor in any way striking; its development and working-out betray the practised hand; but one finds little vitality or inspiration in it. For one thing, it is almost killed by its title. Why on earth Dr. Dvorak called it "Othello" is hard to make out; unless, indeed, he thought "Othello" a pretty name, as good as another.

The two ballet-movements from Rubinstein's "Feramors" are unquestionably pretty, but commonplace to the last degree. If you did not know them and heard them played in a pianoforte transcription you might guess they were by Lysberg. As sugarplums after the solid meat of a Beethoven, Schumann, or Brahms symphony, they might go down, not without relish; but, after the already commonplace overture by Dvorak they seemed like a step farther toward the gutter.

Strauss's "Death and Damnation"—we beg pardon, "Death and Transfiguration"—is an unholy terror! It is like a musical reflection of all the deadly and noisome diseases flesh is heir to, viewed through a magnifying-glass of three thousand diameters. Such a farrago of hospital sounds, vividly suggesting hospital sights! The worst of it is that the man does show talent. He has something really great and grand in his mind, and shows moreover a certain vague inkling of how to say it grandly. With all his morbidness, his excessiveness and turgidity, with all his revelling in the abnormally complex and artificial, he certainly does at moments show that he has at least a distant suspicion of the artistic value of simplicity. Every now and then he seems to promise you: "Now I am going to be grandly simple!"—and forthwith breaks his word! It has been said of Richard Strauss that he lives and breathes only in an atmosphere of Wagner. We should say rather that he lives and breathes in an atmosphere that Wagner has vitiated—by breathing it before him. Strauss's Wagnerism is as superficial as possible; his music is Wagner, minus the Wagnerian artistic logic, minus the genial instinct for saying the right word at the right time. People used to say that Berlioz was Beethoven gone mad; Strauss is not Wagner gone mad, but an unbalanced mystic, crazed by trying to turn Wagner into Liszt!

Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" is undoubtedly a work of talent. It is not without its alcohol. There are times when one is glad to hear it. But, right after "Death and Transfiguration," it is simply horrible. It sounds as if Mephisto-Liszt were showing you how applicable Strauss's musical dialect was to stories of the unmentionable sort. Suffice it to say that, whatever one may think of any one of these first four numbers on the programme, they were so put together as to make each one of them show off its neighbor at its worst.

Then came the Schumann symphony as balm to the mangled ear! The performance was in most respects far better than the one Mr. Paur gave a year or two ago; the noble music was allowed more to follow its natural course, to walk its own gait. Mr. Paur used to drag the sprightly third theme in the last movement so that half the wind-players could not bring themselves to play it in the right rhythm; now he takes it more naturally, and the rhythm comes right of itself. Except that the old, apparently inveterate, fault of the violins refusing to play cantabile passages piano kept cropping up every now and then, the performance was in every way an admirable one. Those excellent first violins do, however, remind one at times of the 'cellist in the amateur orchestra who, when upbraided by the conductor for playing too loud, exclaimed: "Ah! Herr Kapellmeister, if you only knew how gloriously it makes one feel to bring out that grand, big tone!"

The next programme is: Beethoven, overture to "Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus," opus 43; Brahms, concerto for violin, in D major, opus 77 (cadenza by C. M. Loeffler); Bizet, entr'actes and ballet music from "Carmen"; Tschaikowsky, symphony No. 2, in C major, opus 17. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the violinist.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1897.

The Symphony.

Sixteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; fourteenth concert. The programme:

Overture, "Othello"....................Dvorak
(First time in Boston.)
Ballet Music from Feramers........Rubinstein
Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Richard Strauss
(First time in Boston.)
"Mephisto" waltz..........................Liszt
Symphony, No. 4......................Schumann

It took the sane and beautiful Schumann Symphony at the close to redeem the concert from being one grand and merciless exposition of the noisy and bizarre in music; everything else, save the pretty "Feramors" music, was on the plane of programme music of the blatant sort. First came the new Dvorak overture called "Othello." Why "Othello" rather than "Macbeth" or "Shylock" it is difficult to see. Dvorak has written his old, old Bohemian self into every measure of it, and has not succeeded in producing anything more than a well-made and conventional overture. Perhaps the most striking thing about it was the ascending crash with which it rather unexpectedly ended

Mr. Richard Strauss' tone poem depicting the dying hours of a man in a still, dimly lighted room, his dreams of childhood and of later strife with the world, his recurring struggles with death and final defeat, and then the transfiguration—is a work that even its frightful uproar cannot spoil, for there are moments of great effectiveness in it, and its orchestration is rich and brilliant throughout. Cut about in two, it would gain immensely; the "transfiguration," especially, is so long drawn out that one loses all interest in the man's soul, and cares not a rap whether it lands in heaven or hell.

The lovely Rubinstein ballet music was played with all the daintiness in the world, and Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz received fine treatment. It did not sound particularly stirring, but its diabolism is really more in suggestion than in actual form. The Schumann Symphony was interpreted with sincere beauty. And here we are at this end of the century commenting upon the calm loveliness of a work that fifty years ago was considered noisy and crude. W. D. QUINT.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEB. 6, 1897.

BOSTON'S FAMOUS ORGAN ROTTING AWAY UNUSED.

So famous throughout the world was the old Boston Music Hall organ, which is to be sold shortly, that it was for many years an object of admiration for music lovers. It was the inspiration of many a young student, and perhaps played a larger part in promoting musical culture than anything inanimate in Boston.

The Music Hall was built in 1852, and its opening was celebrated by a musical festival, the proceeds of which were set apart as a nucleus for a fund to provide for the hall a suitable organ, and it was the determination of the authorities to have an organ which would be regarded as the finest instrument on this continent. The fund grew slowly, and no very definite action was taken till 1856, when a scheme was put forward for raising twenty-five thousand dollars, which sum was estimated as being sufficient for the purpose. Circumstances "beyond human control" eventually rendered this sum entirely inadequate, and when the organ was at last built and installed, it was found to have cost between sixty and seventy thousand dollars.

The next move on the part of the Association was to appoint a committee to go abroad and acquire knowledge on the subject of organs and organ-builders. Consequently, the committee spent a whole summer in visiting organs and organ factories in England, France, Germany and Switzerland. They finally reported in favor of placing the contract with E. B. Wallcker & Son, of Ludwigsburg, Germany. The contract, as placed, was a document of more than forty pages in manuscript, the specifications calling for eighty-four stops and five thousand, four hundred and seventy-four pipes.

The case of the organ was built by a New York firm. The instrument was nearly fifty feet wide, eighteen feet deep and sixty feet high. Perhaps the best description of its appearance is that given by the late Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes in the Atlantic Monthly: "The structure is of black walnut, and is covered with carved statues, busts, masks and figures in boldest relief. In the centre a richly ornamented arch contains the niche for the keyboards and stops. A colossal mask of a singing woman looks over its summit. The pediment above is surmounted by the bust of Johann Sebastian Bach. Behind this rises the lofty central division, containing pipes, and crowning it is a beautiful statue of St. Cecelia, holding her lyre. On each side of her a griffin sits as guardian. The centre is connected by harp-shaped compartments filled with pipes to the two great round towers, one on each side, and each of them contains three colossal pipes. These magnificent towers come boldly forth into the hall, being the most prominent as they are the most stately and highest part of the facade. At the base of each a gigantic half-caryatid in the style of the ancient hermæ, but finished to the waist, bends beneath the superincumbent weight like Atlas under the globe. These figures are of wonderful force, the muscular development almost excessive, but in keeping with their superhuman task. At each side of the base two lion-hermæ share in the task of the giant. Over the base rise the round pillars which support the dome and inclose the three great pipes already mentioned. Graceful as these look in their position, half a dozen men might creep into one of them and lie hidden. The three great pipes are crowned by a heavily sculptured, ribbed, rounded dome, and this is surmounted on each side by two cherubs, whose heads almost touch the lofty ceiling. This whole portion of the sculpture is of eminent beauty. The two exquisite cherubs of one side are playing with the lute and lyre; those of the other side on the flute and horn. All the reliefs that run round the lower portion of the dome are of singular richness. Two lateral compartments, filled with pipes and still more suggestive of the harp in their form, lead to the square lateral towers. Over these compartments, close to the round tower, sits on either side a harper, a man on the right and a woman on the left, with their harps, all apparently of their natural size. Below three colossal hermæ of Cybil-like women perform for them the office which the giants and lion-shapes perform for the round tower. Above the dome is a vase-like support upon which are disposed figures of the lyre and other musical symbols. The whole base of the instrument in the intervals of the figures described is covered with elaborate carvings. Groups of musical instruments, standing out almost detached from the background, occupy the panels. Ancient and modern, clustered with careless grace and quaint variety, from the violin down to a string of sleigh bells, they call up all the echoes of forgotten music, such as the thousand-tongued organ blends together in one grand harmony."

Before the organ building was finished the War of the Rebellion broke out. There was a period of terrible financial depression and gloom. The finances of the Music Hall Association were in a low condition, and it looked very much as if it would be impossible to pay for the organ after all. About that time the international exhibition at South Kensington (London) was opened, and to celebrate the occasion, and for a grand commemoration of Handel, it was proposed to give a concert with four thousand picked voices and instruments. This took place at the Crystal Palace at Sydenham, and the treasurer of that institution made overtures to the Music Hall Association for the loan of the great organ, which was then almost ready for shipment. A long correspondence ensued, and it seemed as if Boston would lose its organ, at least for a time. The directors were about to accede to the terms proposed, when the Trent affair put a sudden end to negotiations, for it seemed that this country and England were on the verge of a war.

Eventually the organ was shipped from Amsterdam on the Dutch brig "Presto," and sailing under a neutral flag it was comparatively safe from hostile vessels. The "Presto" vindicated her name by taking three months to make the passage from Amsterdam to New York, arriving at that port one Sunday in March, 1863 nearly seven years after the placing o the contract. The summer was spent i building up the monster instrumen which weighed nearly seventy tons, but on October 31, the instrument being completed, a private test was held before about one thousand musicians and interested persons, and on the following Monday, November 2, the formal inauguration took place, being one of the most notable musical events in the history of Boston.

The organ was purchased by Hon. William O. Grover, who was anxious to keep such a monumental instrument in Boston. There was on foot a plan to build a large concert hall, but it fell through owing to the death of Dr. Tourgee in 1891. A shed was built and the organ was stored away in it, and in this shed the great Music Hall organ has spent more than a decade of ignominous captivity.

Let us hope that some place may be found, either in Boston or in some other American city, in which it may continue to exercise the functions outlined in the report to the board of directors of the Music Hall Association by their president: "Let it be to you and your children the inculcator of high and lofty aims—an educator of generations yet unborn—teaching with its thousand tongues the precepts of religion and virtue and heaven-born charity—from out whose golden mouths shall ever issue praise to God."

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1897.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall, last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Dvorák: Overture to "Othello," opus 93.
(First time in Boston.)
Rubinstein: Ballet Music from "Feramors."
Richard Strauss: Tone-Poem, "Tod und Verklärung," opus 24.
(First time in Boston.)
Liszt: Scene in the Tavern ("Mephisto Waltz") from Lenau's "Faust.".
Schumann: Symphony No. 4, in D minor, opus 120.

A programme with a vengeance! It has been the custom of our Symphony Orchestra for the last several years to give every fourth concert without solos, either vocal or instrumental; a most excellent custom, worthy of all commendation. It is not unnatural to suppose that it originated as a concession to the taste of a respectable minority in the public who had rather hear purely orchestral music than songs or instrumental concertos in so large a place as the Music Hall. No doubt music-lovers of this sort are in the minority, as our Boston audiences go; but, as we have hinted, they form a respectable minority, and, as such, some consideration is due them. Such people look forward to the purely orchestral concerts as to the high tides of the symphony season, to the evenings which they will enjoy most. Perhaps the proportion of one in four is as just an one as could be found. Now it is reasonable to posit that, if it is worth while to please this orchestra-loving minority at all, it is worth while to please it in its own way—if this can be done without prejudice to the artistic dignity of the concerts. And we think that, if this minority could be canvassed, its vote would be found to be predominatingly in favor of the great classic and romantic composers, in favor of pretty solid music. Excepting Wagner, we thing that few of the extreme modern lights would get many votes. It can hardly be doubted that an orchestral programme selected from the works of Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Weber, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Cherubini, Wagner and Brahms, with an occasional, but only an occasional, dash of something lighter by Bizet, Saint-Saëns or Rubinstein, would please this minority best. But we mistake much if they are not disappointed when they see the names of Berlioz, Liszt, Tschaikowsky or Richard Strauss on the programme of their favorite "one-in-four" concert. To have to wade through such a slough as the first four numbers in last Saturday's programme before reaching the Schumann symphony is the last thing they want to do. For matter of that we doubt whether one listener in a hundred, leaving the minority out of the question, would care to do it. We, for one, can see no artistic sense in the collocation of those four numbers, from any point of view whatever.

Dvorak's new overture is a not disagreeable composition in a rather commonplace way; its thematic material is neither very fresh nor in any way striking; its development and working-out betray the practised hand; but one finds little vitality or inspiration in it. For one thing, it is almost killed by its title. Why on earth Dr. Dvorak called it "Othello" is hard to make out; unless, indeed, he thought "Othello" a pretty name, as good as another.

The two ballet-movements from Rubinstein's "Feramors" are unquestionably pretty, but commonplace to the last degree. If you did not know them and heard them played in a pianoforte transcription you might guess they were by Lysberg. As sugarplums after the solid meat of a Beethoven, Schumann, or Brahms symphony, they might go down, not without relish; but, after the already commonplace overture by Dvorak they seemed like a step farther toward the gutter.

Strauss's "Death and Damnation"—we beg pardon, "Death and Transfiguration"—is an unholy terror! It is like a musical reflection of all the deadly and noisome diseases flesh is heir to, viewed through a magnifying-glass of three thousand diameters. Such a farrago of hospital sounds, vividly suggesting hospital sights! The worst of it is that the man does show talent. He has something really great and grand in his mind, and shows moreover a certain vague inkling of how to say it grandly. With all his morbidness, his excessiveness and turgidity, with all his revelling in the abnormally complex and artificial, he certainly does at moments show that he has at least a distant suspicion of the artistic value of simplicity. Every now and then he seems to promise you: "Now I am going to be grandly simple!"—and forthwith breaks his word! It has been said of Richard Strauss that he lives and breathes only in an atmosphere of Wagner. We should say rather that he lives and breathes in an atmosphere that Wagner has vitiated —by breathing it before him. Strauss's Wagnerism is as superficial as possible; his music is Wagner, minus the Wagnerian artistic logic, minus the genial instinct for saying the right word at the right time. People used to say that Berlioz was Beethoven gone mad; Strauss is not Wagner gone mad, but an unbalanced mystic, crazed by trying to turn Wagner into Liszt!

Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" is undoubtedly a work of talent. It is not without its alcohol. There are times when one is glad to hear it. But, right after "Death and Transfiguration," it is simply horrible. It sounds as if Mephisto-Liszt were showing you how applicable Strauss's musical dialect was to stories of the unmentionable sort. Suffice it to say that, whatever one may think of any one of these first four numbers on the programme, they were so put together as to make each one of them show off its neighbor at its worst.

Then came the Schumann symphony as balm to the mangled ear! The performance was in most respects far better than the one Mr. Paur gave a year or two ago; the noble music was allowed more to follow its natural course, to walk its own gait. Mr. Paur used to drag the sprightly third theme in the last movement so that half the wind-players could not bring themselves to play it in the right rhythm; now he takes it more naturally, and the rhythm comes right of itself. Except that the old, apparently inveterate, fault of the violins refusing to play cantabile passages piano kept cropping up every now and then, the performance was in every way an admirable one. Those excellent first violins do, however, remind one at times of the 'cellist in the amateur orchestra who, when upbraided by the conductor for playing too loud, exclaimed: "Ah! Herr Kapellmeister, if you only knew how gloriously it makes one feel to bring out that grand, big tone!"

The next programme is: Beethoven, overture to "Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus," opus 43; Brahms, concerto for violin, in D major, opus 77 (cadenza by C. M. Loeffler); Bizet, entr'actes and ballet music from "Carmen"; Tschaikowsky, symphony No. 2, in C major, opus 17. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the violinist.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1897.

The Symphony.

Sixteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; fourteenth concert. The programme:

Overture, "Othello" .... Dvorak
(First time in Boston.)
Ballet Music from Feramers .... Rubinstein
Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Richard Strauss
(First time in Boston.)
"Mephisto" waltz .... Liszt
Symphony, No. 4 .... Schumann

It took the sane and beautiful Schumann Symphony at the close to redeem the concert from being one grand and merciless exposition of the noisy and bizarre in music; everything else, save the pretty "Feramors" music, was on the plane of programme music of the blatant sort. First came the new Dvorak overture called "Othello." Why "Othello" rather than "Macbeth" or "Shylock" it is difficult to see. Dvorak has written his old, old Bohemian self into every measure of it, and has not succeeded in producing anything more than a well-made and conventional overture. Perhaps the most striking thing about it was the ascending crash with which it rather unexpectedly ended

Mr. Richard Strauss' tone poem depicting the dying hours of a man in a still, dimly lighted room, his dreams of childhood and of later strife with the world, his recurring struggles with death and final defeat, and then the transfiguration—is a work that even its frightful uproar cannot spoil, for there are moments of great effectiveness in it, and its orchestration is rich and brilliant throughout. Cut about in two, it would gain immensely; the "transfiguration," especially, is so long drawn out that one loses all interest in the man's soul, and cares not a rap whether it lands in heaven or hell.

The lovely Rubinstein ballet music was played with all the daintiness in the world, and Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz received fine treatment. It did not sound particularly stirring, but its diabolism is really more in suggestion than in actual form. The Schumann Symphony was interpreted with sincere beauty. And here we are at this end of the century commenting upon the calm loveliness of a work that fifty years ago was considered noisy and crude.

W. D. QUINT.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1897.

BOSTON, Mass., February 7, 1897.

THE program of the fourteenth Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Overture to Othello, op. 93....................................Dvorák
(First time in Boston.)
Ballet music from Feramors—
Candle Dance of the Brides of Kashmere...}
Dance of Bayadères.........................}..........Rubinstein
Tone Poem, Tod und Verklärung, op. 24..............Richard Strauss
(First time in Boston.)
Scene in the Tavern (Mephisto Walzer), from Lenau's Faust....Liszt
Symphony No. 4, in D minor...................................Schumann

You heard the Othello overture, I believe, in 1892 at Dvorák's inaugural concert in New York. It was then, with the Carneval and the In der Natur, entitled Triple Overture. Can anyone tell me whether that performance in New York was the first? Or had the overtures been played in Europe before Dr. Dvorák heard Mrs. Thurber's Macedonian cry or went a-gunning in the Bowery and Spillville for negro tunes?

This overture does not seem worthy of serious consideration. The Moor—and what a tame fellow he is!—lives and suffers in Bohemia, and he is caught dancing to the music of a negro Bohemian jig. Why did Dvorák give this overture the title? Pray, what is his idea of Shakespeare's tragedy? I know of few pieces of music by modern composers of renown that are so free from what may be called character drawing. I find no salient, irresistible theme, no attention-compelling treatment. There is apparently no following of any scenario; there is no inevitable suggestion of a mood of any kind. The music might have been written by any chapelmaster in a small town in Germany, so far as inspiration or imagination is concerned. Dvorák takes his Othello to Bohemia. This is reasonable. Alas! the Bohemia is not the romantic, enchanted country in which Dvorák delighted before he engaged in contract labor for English festivals and English publishers. The Bohemia where he now lives must be a dry and sterile land.

The strange symphonic poem of Richard Strauss was played superbly, and respect for the orchestra should have brought heartier applause from the audience, even if many of the hearers were perplexed or bored or stunned. 'Tis an amazing work, whether you like it or dislike it. There are orchestral effects that were not heard in concert halls or theatres before the first performance at Eisenach. There are stupendous passages, as the great crescendo that follows the first stroke of the gong. There are daring harmonic progressions, so daring that some consider them foolhardy. They may be right. The conflict of dissonances may be so protracted that the ear is fatigued and half of the effect of the close thereby destroyed.

I know, however, that my attention was riveted, that I became aware of new things in music, that the close left me with an eager desire to hear the work again.

I do not know who wrote the poem in blank verse that serves as a libretto; and the poem itself is not essential to enjoyment or intelligent understanding. What does the hearer care for the Flemish detail: "In the necessitous little room, dimly lighted by only a candle-end, lies the sick man on his bed." This is all well enough for a prose poem; but music cannot picture the size of the room, quality of the furniture, or lighting by a candle-end or a whole candle. I believe it was Hanslick, who, protesting against the endeavor of Strauss to make the music express each detail of the poem, as though the poem were a ballet libretto, wondered why the composer did not put the sick man on the stage with scenic effects. What need of all this babble? Is not the awesome word "death" suggestive in itself? Is there no unmistakable, fierce contention in the music? "Make the barrier thy stirrup!" It is a good line; it sounds like Emerson or Thoreau. But the music itself tells of heroic endeavor.

They do Strauss injustice who accuse him of being the slavish imitator of Wagner. Strauss has his own voice; he has his own vocabulary. His melody is his own. He has his own method of arranging contrasts and climaxes. He may be a poseur, and so was Ajax defying the lightning. He has been called pessimistic. There must be pessimism in the soul of every hero who struggles. Such pessimism—contempt for the meannesses, the tricks, the fawning, the lies that lead to worldly success—is nobler than the smug optimism that accepts everything without discrimination, and does not distinguish between the good man and the scoundrel. This symphonic poem of Strauss is not to be judged sanely after one hearing. It seems to me that it is full of noble musical thoughts; that it displays an astounding knowledge of the orchestra; that large imagination is shown in the invention of orchestration.

After the overwhelming finale of the symphonic poem the Scene in the Tavern was cheap and mean. The specious brilliancy was as hollow as the laugh of an avaricious and expectant courtesan. It was a pleasure to hear again the beautiful ballet music of Rubinstein, although Mr. Paur was inclined to treat the bayadères and the brides as though they were on the parade ground near Prussian barracks. His reading of the D minor symphony was robust rather than romantic. He paid little attention to dynamic contrasts, and for once the symphony was boresome.

⁂

Mr. Apthorp's entr'acte in the program book was of genuine interest and force. It was founded on this text:

"Mr. Händel, the University of Oxford is ready to confer upon you the degree of Doctor of Music."

"What costs?"

"Five pounds."

"Me no want!"

His conclusion is so in line with an editorial article published some time ago in THE MUSICAL COURIER that I quote it in full:

In conferring an academic degree upon an artist of distinction, a university tacitly arrogates to itself the right and competency to judge that artist's work; it arrogates to itself the right to treat the artist de haut en bas, and pat him on the head with fatherly complacency—for surely no university would be willing to accept the position of merely official mouthpiece of a popular verdict! Now it seems to me that the university arrogates too much to itself in this. A university is no more competent to set the seal of greatness upon an artist's fame than a board of aldermen is to put the last touch to his glory by a vote of approval. The university works in one field, the artist in another. And the artist's field is the higher and nobler of the two. In officially commending the artist, the university makes a move ultra crepidam; the artist has full right to resent such officious patronage. The academic degree is but a sorry pebble in his crown of diamonds. It is worse than carrying coals to Newcastle; it is offering a chromo to a collecter of Millets and Corots! And the artist who accepts an academic degree virtually steps down from his native throne, and exchanges his royal purple for a livery.

Baltimore

Mr. Paur gave us an improved program at the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert January 20, and the performance would have been made still more interesting had the Tschaikowsky Symphony been the opening instead of the closing number. Mr. Paur conducted with unusual discrimination, and the orchestra never played better, furnishing, with Signor Campanari's artistic singing, the most delightful concert of the season.

With such orchestral music as the Boston Orchestra furnishes one can well wonder with what success the project of organizing an orchestra at the Peabody Institute will be met. The plan proposed, as I understand it, is to enter a number of students, who will receive instruction from a corps of instructors, made up of those constituting the regular orchestra, and thus combined to have the largest orchestra in the history of the institute. I wish the scheme every successs, but I fear that for many years to come we will have to depend upon other sources for the enjoyment of first-class orchestral concerts.

THE EVENING BULLETIN

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1897.

Symphony Concert.

The fourth Symphony concert was given last night at Infantry Hall. As at the January concert, the hall was well filled, and Mr. Paur and his band of renowned players were given a warm welcome. The programme was one of much interest, and its performance was marked by some of the most superb playing we have ever listened to, even from this world-renowned orchestra. The following numbers were presented:

Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120..........................Robert Schumann
I. Ziemlich langsam (D minor).
Lebhaft (D minor).
II. Romanze: Ziemlich langsam (D minor).
III. Scherzo Lebhaft (D minor).
Trio (B-flat major).
IV. Langsam (D minor).
Lebhaft (D major).
Symphonie Espagnole, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 21..............Edouard Lalo
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Scherzando (Allegro molto).
III. Andante.
IV. Rondo (Allegro).
Scene in the Tavern (Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust"..............Franz Liszt
Overture, "William Tell"..........................Giachino Antonio Rossini

As in the case of a few other composers the opus numbers of Schumann's works refer to the order of their publication rather than to that of their composition, this so-called fourth symphony being really his first and the one commonly labelled as No. 1 the last to be written. Schumann was never in haste to print his works, preferring to keep them by him till sometimes revision and excision had made vast changes in the original draft. Meantime other things were begun and perhaps finished before all these changes were effected to his liking. In the case of this particular symphony there is little doubt but that the amended version which Schumann finally gave to his publisher is a vast improvement upon the original. The earlier score has also been published, long after the composer's death, and is occasionally played as a matter of historical interest, but does not compare with the authentic version in musical value or interest. Of Schumann's four symphonies the best are this and the one in B-flat (No. 1), and as between the two it is difficult to award the palm. This D-minor symphony is a work in which perhaps Schumann follows more closely the classical models and exhibits less of his own peculiar and striking originality than in any of the others. At the same time it is profound, impressive, of more evenly sustained interest and richer in orchestral color than its brethren. It is, after all, of small profit to measure such works one against another. We take what we get and are thankful. The performance of the symphony last night was magnificent in every sense of the word.

The solo number of the programme introduced to us for the second time this season, that very excellent and always popular player, Mr. Timothie Adamowski. This concerto of Lalo's is fully as original as anything we have had from his gifted pen. Mr. Apthorp's programme notes aptly describe it as follows:

"The 'Symphonie Espagnole' is esteemed a fine expression of its composer's piquant individuality. Each movement is marked by some Spanish national peculiarity, either of melody, accent, or rhythm. Many and varied are the felicitous touches in the instrumentation, which, though full, is so deftly managed as not to override the agreeable, attractive, and brilliant solo part. The work, as has been pointed out by another, is scarcely deep enough to justify its title of symphony. It is more properly a symphonic concerto." Mr. Adamowski is quite happy in works of this genre. They seem to be sympathetic to his individuality as an artist and he plays them with all the dash and abandon which they require. Four or five enthusiastic recalls, in which his brother players heartily joined, greeted his most excellent performance of the work.

Liszt's music in illustration of episides from Lenau's "Faust" is a striking tone-picture, at once bizarre in character and most effective in suggestion. The text which it is meant to illustrate is far different from the more familiar work of Goethe. In this scene a tavern episode is pictured, where Faust dances with a village wench to music made by Mephisto upon a borrowed fiddle. The orchestration is most cunning and original. One cannot help wondering, after hearing it, whether Richard Wagner did not at times condescend to borrow something besides money from his talented father-in-law. Like the other numbers of the programme, it was played with astounding vigor and remarkable finesse.

Rossini's most popular overture made a brilliant and pleasant ending to the evening's musical feast. As played by this superb orchestra it seemed like a composition never heard before, and showed that there are unsuspected depths in the music of Italy's premier melodist.

There was much applause all through the concert, and it is safe to say that the programme was as generally enjoyed as any that has been given this season. The fifth concert will be given on the evening of Wednesday, March 10.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1897.

It was a very fine and a most enthusiastic audience that gathered in Infantry hall last evening for the fourth of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts. The program offered was an attractive one, not quite as good possibly as at the last concert, but still affording sufficient variety to satisfy even the most captious. It was made up as follows:

Robert Schumann ....
........Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120
I. Ziemlich langsam (D minor)..........3-4
Lebhaft (D minor) 2-4
II. Romanze: Ziemlich langsam (D minor) 3-4
III. Scherzo: Lebhaft (D minor).........3-4
Trio (B-flat major)............................3-4
IV. Langsam (D minor)........................4-4
Lebhaft (D major)..............................4-4
Edouard Lalo ....
Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra, Op. 21. ....
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Scherzando (Allegro molto).
III. Andante.
IV. Rondo (Allegro).
Franz Liszt..
Scene in the Tavern (Mephisto waltz), from Lenau's "Faust."
Giachino Antonio Rossini..........................
.......................Overture, "William Tell"

The soloist of the evening was Mr. T. Adamowski, always a favorite here and more so now since his brilliant performance of the Spanish symphony. This gave an opportunity for bringing from the violin every expression of which it is capable, not too deep to be easily understood and sufficiently Spanish to be as pleasing as the music of that country generally is. Each movement brought out something characteristic of the nation, deftly rendered by Mr. Adamowski, the peculiar accent and melody being noticeable throughout the performance. The notes called attention to the fact that it is a fine instance of the composer's piquant individuality, but it is not so dainty as some of the chamber music which he has written nor does it have the force of some of the rhapsodies but, of course, it must be remembered that the symphony is arranged for a solo and not for an ensemble, though the orchestral accompaninment lends no small additional charm to the performance, especially as given by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Adamowski was recalled again and again, but it could not be expected that he would play more after the exertion of the long solo.

The opening symphony differed from those of most composers in that the four movements were so connected that but for Mr. Paur's reading there would have been no means of knowing where one ended and the next began unless one happened to be familiar with the work. The interpretation of the symphony was robust, at times filled with strong contrasts that brought out the full meaning of the composer and often, especially in the third movement, very exquisitely played. The work, however, does not equal some of the other efforts of Schumann.

The scene in the tavern was one of those novelties which are always pleasing to the average listener no matter how corrupting they may be to the musician and the picture was clearly set forth by the magnificent rendition given it through Mr. Paur's efforts. Everybody knows the full beauty of the overture with which the program was brought to a close and no one who has heard it before ever listened to a better performance. It was nothing short of perfect. The next concert occurs Merch 10.

The fourth Symphony concert was given last night at Infantry Hall. As at the January concert, the hall was well filled, and Mr. Paur and his band of renowned players were given a warm welcome. The programme was one of much interest, and its performance was marked by some of the most superb playing we have ever listened to, even from this world-renowned orchestra. The following numbers were presented:

Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120..........................Robert Schumann
I. Ziemlich langsam (D minor).
Lebhaft (D minor).
II. Romanze: Ziemlich langsam (D minor).
III. Scherzo Lebhaft (D minor).
Trio (B-flat major).
IV. Langsam (D minor).
Lebhaft (D major).
Symphonie Espagnole, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 21..............Edouard Lalo
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Scherzando (Allegro molto).
III. Andante.
IV. Rondo (Allegro).
Scene in the Tavern (Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust"..............Franz Liszt
Overture, "William Tell"..........................Giachino Antonio Rossini

As in the case of a few other composers the opus numbers of Schumann's works refer to the order of their publication rather than to that of their composition, this so-called fourth symphony being really his first and the one commonly labelled as No. 1 the last to be written. Schumann was never in haste to print his works, preferring to keep them by him till sometimes revision and excision had made vast changes in the original draft. Meantime other things were begun and perhaps finished before all these changes were effected to his liking. In the case of this particular symphony there is little doubt but that the amended version which Schumann finally gave to his publisher is a vast improvement upon the original. The earlier score has also been published, long after the composer's death, and is occasionally played as a matter of historical interest, but does not compare with the authentic version in musical value or interest. Of Schumann's four symphonies the best are this and the one in B-flat (No. 1), and as between the two it is difficult to award the palm. This D-minor symphony is a work in which perhaps Schumann follows more closely the classical models and exhibits less of his own peculiar and striking originality than in any of the others. At the same time it is profound, impressive, of more evenly sustained interest and richer in orchestral color than its brethren. It is, after all, of small profit to measure such works one against another. We take what we get and are thankful. The performance of the symphony last night was magnificent in every sense of the word.

The solo number of the programme introduced to us for the second time this season, that very excellent and always popular player, Mr. Timothie Adamowski. This concerto of Lalo's is fully as original as anything we have had from his gifted pen. Mr. Apthorp's programme notes aptly describe it as follows:

"The 'Symphonie Espagnole' is esteemed a fine expression of its composer's piquant individuality. Each movement is marked by some Spanish national peculiarity, either of melody, accent, or rhythm. Many and varied are the felicitous touches in the instrumentation, which, though full, is so deftly managed as not to override the agreeable, attractive, and brilliant solo part. The work, as has been pointed out by another, is scarcely deep enough to justify its title of symphony. It is more properly a symphonic concerto." Mr. Adamowski is quite happy in works of this genre. They seem to be sympathetic to his individuality as an artist and he plays them with all the dash and abandon which they require. Four or five enthusiastic recalls, in which his brother players heartily joined, greeted his most excellent performance of the work.

Liszt's music in illustration of episides from Lenau's "Faust" is a striking tone-picture, at once bizarre in character and most effective in suggestion. The text which it is meant to illustrate is far different from the more familiar work of Goethe. In this scene a tavern episode is pictured, where Faust dances with a village wench to music made by Mephisto upon a borrowed fiddle. The orchestration is most cunning and original. One cannot help wondering, after hearing it, whether Richard Wagner did not at times condescend to borrow something besides money from his talented father-in-law. Like the other numbers of the programme, it was played with astounding vigor and remarkable finesse.

Rossini's most popular overture made a brilliant and pleasant ending to the evening's musical feast. As played by this superb orchestra it seemed like a composition never heard before, and showed that there are unsuspected depths in the music of Italy's premier melodist.

There was much applause all through the concert, and it is safe to say that the programme was as generally enjoyed as any that has been given this season. The fifth concert will be given on the evening of Wednesday, March 10.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1897.

BOSTON, Mass., February 7, 1897.

THE program of the fourteenth Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Overture to Othello, op. 93.................................Dvorák
(First time in Boston.)
Ballet music from Feramors—
Candle Dance of the Brides of Kashmere... } ....Rubinstein
Dance of Bayadères......................... }
Tone Poem, Tod und Verklärung, op. 24..............Richard Strauss
(First time in Boston.)
Scene in the Tavern (Mephisto Walzer), from Lenau's Faust....Liszt
Symphony No. 4, in D minor.................................Schumann

You heard the Othello overture, I believe, in 1892 at Dvorák's inaugural concert in New York. It was then, with the Carneval and the In der Natur, entitled Triple Overture. Can anyone tell me whether that performance in New York was the first? Or had the overtures been played in Europe before Dr. Dvorák heard Mrs. Thurber's Macedonian cry or went a-gunning in the Bowery and Spillville for negro tunes?

This overture does not seem worthy of serious consideration. The Moor—and what a tame fellow he is!—lives and suffers in Bohemia, and he is caught dancing to the music of a negro Bohemian jig. Why did Dvorák give this overture the title? Pray, what is his idea of Shakespeare's tragedy? I know of few pieces of music by modern composers of renown that are so free from what may be called character drawing. I find no salient, irresistible theme, no attention-compelling treatment. There is apparently no following of any scenario; there is no inevitable suggestion of a mood of any kind. The music might have been written by any chapelmaster in a small town in Germany, so far as inspiration or imagination is concerned. Dvorák takes his Othello to Bohemia. This is reasonable. Alas! the Bohemia is not the romantic, enchanted country in which Dvorák delighted before he engaged in contract labor for English festivals and English publishers. The Bohemia where he now lives must be a dry and sterile land.

The strange symphonic poem of Richard Strauss was played superbly, and respect for the orchestra should have brought heartier applause from the audience, even if many of the hearers were perplexed or bored or stunned. 'Tis an amazing work, whether you like it or dislike it. There are orchestral effects that were not heard in concert halls or theatres before the first performance at Eisenach. There are stupendous passages, as the great crescendo that follows the first stroke of the gong. There are daring harmonic progressions, so daring that some consider them foolhardy. They may be right. The conflict of dissonances may be so protracted that the ear is fatigued and half of the effect of the close thereby destroyed.

I know, however, that my attention was riveted, that I became aware of new things in music, that the close left me with an eager desire to hear the work again.

I do not know who wrote the poem in blank verse that serves as a libretto; and the poem itself is not essential to enjoyment or intelligent understanding. What does the hearer care for the Flemish detail: "In the necessitous little room, dimly lighted by only a candle-end, lies the sick man on his bed." This is all well enough for a prose poem; but music cannot picture the size of the room, quality of the furniture, or lighting by a candle-end or a whole candle. I believe it was Hanslick, who, protesting against the endeavor of Strauss to make the music express each detail of the poem, as though the poem were a ballet libretto, wondered why the composer did not put the sick man on the stage with scenic effects. What need of all this babble? Is not the awesome word "death" suggestive in itself? Is there no unmistakable, fierce contention in the music? "Make the barrier thy stirrup!" It is a good line; it sounds like Emerson or Thoreau. But the music itself tells of heroic endeavor.

They do Strauss injustice who accuse him of being the slavish imitator of Wagner. Strauss has his own voice; he has his own vocabulary. His melody is his own. He has his own method of arranging contrasts and climaxes. He may be a poseur, and so was Ajax defying the lightning. He has been called pessimistic. There must be pessimism in the soul of every hero who struggles. Such pessimism—contempt for the meannesses, the tricks, the fawning, the lies that lead to worldly success—is nobler than the smug optimism that accepts everything without discrimination, and does not distinguish between the good man and the scoundrel. This symphonic poem of Strauss is not to be judged sanely after one hearing. It seems to me that it is full of noble musical thoughts; that it displays an astounding knowledge of the orchestra; that large imagination is shown in the invention of orchestration.

After the overwhelming finale of the symphonic poem the Scene in the Tavern was cheap and mean. The specious brilliancy was as hollow as the laugh of an avaricious and expectant courtesan. It was a pleasure to hear again the beautiful ballet music of Rubinstein, although Mr. Paur was inclined to treat the bayadères and the brides as though they were on the parade ground near Prussian barracks. His reading of the D minor symphony was robust rather than romantic. He paid little attention to dynamic contrasts, and for once the symphony was boresome.

* * *

Mr. Apthorp's entr'acte in the program book was of genuine interest and force. It was founded on this text:

"Mr. Händel, the University of Oxford is ready to confer upon you the degree of Doctor of Music."

"What costs?"

"Five pounds."

"Me no want!"

His conclusion is so in line with an editorial article published some time ago in THE MUSICAL COURIER that I quote it in full:

In conferring an academic degree upon an artist of distinction, a university tacitly arrogates to itself the right and competency to judge that artist's work; it arrogates to itself the right to treat the artist de haut en bas, and pat him on the head with fatherly complacency—for surely no university would be willing to accept the position of merely official mouthpiece of a popular verdict! Now it seems to me that the university arrogates too much to itself in this. A university is no more competent to set the seal of greatness upon an artist's fame than a board of aldermen is to put the last touch to his glory by a vote of approval. The university works in one field, the artist in another. And the artist's field is the higher and nobler of the two. In officially commending the artist, the university makes a move ultra crepidam; the artist has full right to resent such officious patronage. The academic degree is but a sorry pebble in his crown of diamonds. It is worse than carrying coals to Newcastle; it is offering a chromo to a collecter of Millets and Corots! And the artist who accepts an academic degree virtually steps down from his native throne, and exchanges his royal purple for a livery.

[illegible]

Mr. Paur gave us an improved program at the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert January 20, and the performance would have been made still more interesting had the Tschaikowsky Symphony been the opening instead of the closing number. Mr. Paur conducted with unusual discrimination, and the orchestra never played better, furnishing, with Signor Campanari's artistic singing, the most delightful concert of the season.

With such orchestral music as the Boston Orchestra furnishes one can well wonder with what success the project of organizing an orchestra at the Peabody Institute will be met. The plan proposed, as I understand it, is to enter a number of students, who will receive instruction from a corps of instructors, made up of those constituting the regular orchestra, and thus combined to have the largest orchestra in the history of the institute. I wish the scheme every successs, but I fear that for many years to come we will have to depend upon other sources for the enjoyment of first-class orchestral concerts.

THE EVENING BULLETIN

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1897.

Symphony Concert.

The fourth Symphony concert was given last night at Infantry Hall. As at the January concert, the hall was well filled, and Mr. Paur and his band of renowned players were given a warm welcome. The programme was one of much interest, and its performance was marked by some of the most superb playing we have ever listened to, even from this world-renowned orchestra. The following numbers were presented:

Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120.....
........................Robert Schumann
I. Ziemlich langsam (D minor).
Lebhaft (D minor).
II. Romanze: Ziemlich langsam (D minor).
III. Scherzo Lebhaft (D minor).
Trio (B-flat major).
IV. Langsam (D minor).
Lebhaft (D major).
Symphonie Espagnole, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 21................Edouard Lalo
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Scherzando (Allegro molto).
III. Andante.
IV. Rondo (Allegro).
Scene in the Tavern (Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust"...............Franz Liszt
Overture, "William Tell"..................
..................Giachino Antonio Rossini

As in the case of a few other composers the opus numbers of Schumann's works refer to the order of their publication rather than to that of their composition, this so-called fourth symphony being really his first and the one commonly labelled as No. 1 the last to be written. Schumann was never in haste to print his works, preferring to keep them by him till sometimes revision and excision had made vast changes in the original draft. Meantime other things were begun and perhaps finished before all these changes were effected to his liking. In the case of this particular symphony there is little doubt but that the amended version which Schumann finally gave to his publisher is a vast improvement upon the original. The earlier score has also been published, long after the composer's death, and is occasionally played as a matter of historical interest, but does not compare with the authentic version in musical value or interest. Of Schumann's four symphonies the best are this and the one in B-flat (No. 1), and as between the two it is difficult to award the palm. This D-minor symphony is a work in which perhaps Schumann follows more closely the classical models and exhibits less of his own peculiar and striking originality than in any of the others. At the same time it is profound, impressive, of more evenly sustained interest and richer in orchestral color than its brethren. It is, after all, of small profit to measure such works one against another. We take what we get and are thankful. The performance of the symphony last night was magnificent in every sense of the word.

The solo number of the programme introduced to us for the second time this season, that very excellent and always popular player, Mr. Timothie Adamowski. This concerto of Lalo's is fully as original as anything we have had from his gifted pen. Mr. Apthorp's programme notes aptly describe it as follows:

"The 'Symphonie Espagnole' is esteemed a fine expression of its composer's piquant individuality. Each movement is marked by some Spanish national peculiarity, either of melody, accent, or rhythm. Many and varied are the felicitous touches in the instrumentation, which, though full, is so deftly managed as not to override the agreeable, attractive, and brilliant solo part. The work, as has been pointed out by another, is scarcely deep enough to justify its title of symphony. It is more properly a symphonic concerto." Mr. Adamowski is quite happy in works of this genre. They seem to be sympathetic to his individuality as an artist and he plays them with all the dash and abandon which they require. Four or five enthusiastic recalls, in which his brother players heartily joined, greeted his most excellent performance of the work.

Liszt's music in illustration of episides from Lenau's "Faust" is a striking tone-picture, at once bizarre in character and most effective in suggestion. The text which it is meant to illustrate is far different from the more familiar work of Goethe. In this scene a tavern episode is pictured, where Faust dances with a village wench to music made by Mephisto upon a borrowed fiddle. The orchestration is most cunning and original. One cannot help wondering, after hearing it, whether Richard Wagner did not at times condescend to borrow something besides money from his talented father-in-law. Like the other numbers of the programme, it was played with astounding vigor and remarkable finesse.

Rossini's most popular overture made a brilliant and pleasant ending to the evening's musical feast. As played by this superb orchestra it seemed like a composition never heard before, and showed that there are unsuspected depths in the music of Italy's premier melodist.

There was much applause all through the concert, and it is safe to say that the programme was as generally enjoyed as any that has been given this season. The fifth concert will be given on the evening of Wednesday, March 10.

The Telegram

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1897.

It was a very fine and a most enthusiastic audience that gathered in Infantry hall last evening for the fourth of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts. The program offered was an attractive one, not quite as good possibly as at the last concert, but still affording sufficient variety to satisfy even the most captious. It was made up as follows:

Robert Schumann ....
........Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120
I. Ziemlich langsam (D minor)..........3-4
Lebhaft (D minor) 2-4
II. Romanze: Ziemlich langsam (D minor) 3-4
III. Scherzo: Lebhaft (D minor).........3-4
Trio (B-flat major)...................3-4
IV. Langsam (D minor)...................4-4
Lebhaft (D major).....................4-4
Edouard Lalo ....
Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra, Op. 21. ....
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Scherzando (Allegro molto).
III. Andante.
IV. Rondo (Allegro).
Franz Liszt.......................................
Scene in the Tavern (Mephisto waltz), from Lenau's "Faust."
Giachino Antonio Rossini.........................
.... Overture, "William Tell"

The soloist of the evening was Mr. T. Adamowski, always a favorite here and more so now since his brilliant performance of the Spanish symphony. This gave an opportunity for bringing from the violin every expression of which it is capable, not too deep to be easily understood and sufficiently Spanish to be as pleasing as the music of that country generally is. Each movement brought out something characteristic of the nation, deftly rendered by Mr. Adamowski, the peculiar accent and melody being noticeable throughout the performance. The notes called attention to the fact that it is a fine instance of the composer's piquant individuality, but it is not so dainty as some of the chamber music which he has written nor does it have the force of some of the rhapsodies but, of course, it must be remembered that the symphony is arranged for a solo and not for an ensemble, though the orchestral accompaninment lends no small additional charm to the performance, especially as given by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Adamowski was recalled again and again, but it could not be expected that he would play more after the exertion of the long solo.

The opening symphony differed from those of most composers in that the four movements were so connected that but for Mr. Paur's reading there would have been no means of knowing where one ended and the next began unless one happened to be familiar with the work. The interpretation of the symphony was robust, at times filled with strong contrasts that brought out the full meaning of the composer and often, especially in the third movement, very exquisitely played. The work, however, does not equal some of the other efforts of Schumann.

The scene in the tavern was one of those novelties which are always pleasing to the average listener no matter how corrupting they may be to the musician and the picture was clearly set forth by the magnificent rendition given it through Mr. Paur's efforts. Everybody knows the full beauty of the overture with which the program was brought to a close and no one who has heard it before ever listened to a better performance. It was nothing short of perfect. The next concert occurs Merch 10.

[illegible]NCE JOURNAL

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1897.

Symphony Concert.

The fourth Symphony concert was given last night at Infantry Hall. As at the January concert, the hall was well filled, and Mr. Paur and his band of renowned players were given a warm welcome. The programme was one of much interest, and its performance was marked by some of the most superb playing we have ever listened to, even from this world-renowned orchestra. The following numbers were presented:

Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120.....
........................Robert Schumann
I. Ziemlich langsam (D minor).
Lebhaft (D minor).
II. Romanze: Ziemlich langsam (D minor).
III. Scherzo Lebhaft (D minor).
Trio (B-flat major).
IV. Langsam (D minor).
Lebhaft (D major).
Symphonie Espagnole, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 21................Edouard Lalo
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Scherzando (Allegro molto).
III. Andante.
IV. Rondo (Allegro).
Scene in the Tavern (Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust"...............Franz Liszt
Overture, "William Tell"..................
..................Giachino Antonio Rossini

As in the case of a few other composers the opus numbers of Schumann's works refer to the order of their publication rather than to that of their composition, this so-called fourth symphony being really his first and the one commonly labelled as No. 1 the last to be written. Schumann was never in haste to print his works, preferring to keep them by him till sometimes revision and excision had made vast changes in the original draft. Meantime other things were begun and perhaps finished before all these changes were effected to his liking. In the case of this particular symphony there is little doubt but that the amended version which Schumann finally gave to his publisher is a vast improvement upon the original. The earlier score has also been published, long after the composer's death, and is occasionally played as a matter of historical interest, but does not compare with the authentic version in musical value or interest. Of Schumann's four symphonies the best are this and the one in B-flat (No. 1), and as between the two it is difficult to award the palm. This D-minor symphony is a work in which perhaps Schumann follows more closely the classical models and exhibits less of his own peculiar and striking originality than in any of the others. At the same time it is profound, impressive, of more evenly sustained interest and richer in orchestral color than its brethren. It is, after all, of small profit to measure such works one against another. We take what we get and are thankful. The performance of the symphony last night was magnificent in every sense of the word.

The solo number of the programme introduced to us for the second time this season, that very excellent and always popular player, Mr. Timothie Adamowski. This concerto of Lalo's is fully as original as anything we have had from his gifted pen. Mr. Apthorp's programme notes aptly describe it as follows:

"The 'Symphonie Espagnole' is esteemed a fine expression of its composer's piquant individuality. Each movement is marked by some Spanish national peculiarity, either of melody, accent, or rhythm. Many and varied are the felicitous touches in the instrumentation, which, though full, is so deftly managed as not to override the agreeable, attractive, and brilliant solo part. The work, as has been pointed out by another, is scarcely deep enough to justify its title of symphony. It is more properly a symphonic concerto." Mr. Adamowski is quite happy in works of this genre. They seem to be sympathetic to his individuality as an artist and he plays them with all the dash and abandon which they require. Four or five enthusiastic recalls, in which his brother players heartily joined, greeted his most excellent performance of the work.

Liszt's music in illustration of episides from Lenau's "Faust" is a striking tone-picture, at once bizarre in character and most effective in suggestion. The text which it is meant to illustrate is far different from the more familiar work of Goethe. In this scene a tavern episode is pictured, where Faust dances with a village wench to music made by Mephisto upon a borrowed fiddle. The orchestration is most cunning and original. One cannot help wondering, after hearing it, whether Richard Wagner did not at times condescend to borrow something besides money from his talented father-in-law. Like the other numbers of the programme, it was played with astounding vigor and remarkable finesse.

Rossini's most popular overture made a brilliant and pleasant ending to the evening's musical feast. As played by this superb orchestra it seemed like a composition never heard before, and showed that there are unsuspected depths in the music of Italy's premier melodist.

There was much applause all through the concert, and it is safe to say that the programme was as generally enjoyed as any that has been given this season. The fifth concert will be given on the evening of Wednesday, March 10.

[84]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 15, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

After a frenzied indulgence in a long course of passion and leit-motiven by Wagner, the Symphony concert leads us back to the paths of Virtue and the Sonata-form, wherefore we are ready to accept the overture to Beethoven's "Prometheus" in a prodigal-son-like spirit, although, under other circumstances we should call it the weakest of the Beethoven set.

In it the composer adopts the strict sonata-allegro form as Mozart had established it, but he has not achieved such a work as Mozart's Overture to the "Marriage of Figaro," although the composition is cast in the same mould. Beethoven's one ballet had better be forgotten; its overture is the only portion of it that now holds its place on the repertoire, although Mr. Gericke tried vainly to galvanize its other bones some ten years ago.

Brahms' violin concerto now followed, with Mr. Kneisel as soloist. It is not an exciting work, like Beethoven's concerto, nor a melodic one like Bruch's G minor, nor a symmetrical display of virtuosity as Mendelssohn's, but it pleases the musician because of its solid construction, its ingenious development of ideas. We fear, however, that it is likely to remain "musician's music" for a time to come, a work that cannot be incomprehensible to the general public at least in its opening movement.

Mr. Loeffler had lent an additional interest to this movement by writing a new cadenza for his confrere. This cadenza was very ingenious, introducing much double-stopping, using proper references to integral parts of the first movement, but was rather long for such an interpolation. We believe that the day of the total abolition of the cadenza is near; Beethoven as well as Brahms has never been much in favor of this sop of the Cerberus of Virtuosity, and other modern composers are beginning to see the incongruity of it. But a well-played cadenza often wins more public applause for a soloist than an entire concerted work, and Mr. Kneisel played this one very finely, wherefore applause was hearty at the close of the movement.

The oboe work in the adagio was admirable, and Mr. Kneisel took up the theme with much refinement and delicacy. The finale is in some degree popular music, having almost a folk-song style, and this was given with so much dash and brio that many hearty recalls followed, the orchestra uniting with the public in this tribute to the concert-meister who has done so much for Boston's music.

A series of selections from "Carmen" might strike the extreme classicist as a case of Saul among the Prophets, but we were glad to see this evidence of catholicity of taste, and the selections were delightful little tone-pictures, often omitted in the operatic performance, and never done so well as they were on this occasion.

The first entr'acte gave some fine opportunities to the bassoons which were taken full advantage of. The second gave equal chance for brilliant work to the flute, while the movement of the third had that clangor of festivity which Bizet was so successful in depicting. Much applause greeted these musical dainties, and they deserved the recognition.

The concert ended with Tschaikowsky's second symphony, in C minor, a rather inferior work, yet one which, in justice to the rank of the deceased composer, ought to be heard once in a while in our symphony concerts. The horn had some prominent and expressive work in the first movement, which was excellently done, but the climax seemed only of noise, while the development appeared quite disjointed. The tumult finally subsided into the horn theme of the introduction, come back to finish the movement, very much like the effect employed by Schubert in his C-major symphony.

The march which followed was semi-barbaric in character, kettle-drums being freely used on tonic and dominant to mark the rhythm strongly, and forming a quaint organ-point (double) from the very first measure. The modulations begin very strangely, a flatting of the seventh taking place in the second measure of the theme that is very effective and reminds one somehow of Brahms' bold mudulations in the slow movement of his fourth symphony.

In the scherzo Tschaikowsky shows his love for unusual rhythms by using 2-8 rhythm in the trio. There was more of bizarrerie than of beauty in this movement; it ended with an odd conflict between a 2-8 and a 3-8 rhythm, the latter finally predominating.

The finale was full of reiteration, a four-barred phrase being announced at the beginning of the movement and varied thereafter as Brahms varies his eight-barred theme in the finale of his fourth symphony, continuously, with some ingenuity also.

The turning of this phrase, which is an absolute bit of folk-dance music, into a chorale by simplification, is one of the ingenious touches of the work. One excellent climax, with a gong stroke, is achieved, but as a whole the movement is not comparable to the climaxes which the great composer has managed to attain in the finales of his later symphonies.

One can say that the work was quaint, odd, barbaric and ingenious, but neither beautiful nor quite intelligible. It was finely performed. Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CI., NO. 45.
SUNDAY, FEB. 14, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Franz Kneisel, the Soloist, Recalled Many Times.

He Plays the Brahms Concerto for Violin in D Major with Truly Artistic Interpretation—The Beethoven Overture "Prometheus"—A Piquant Bizet Selection.

The 15th of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last night, the programme being:

Overture, "Prometheus"..............Beethoven
Concerto for violin in D major.........Brahms
Entr'actes and ballet music from "Carmen"
Bizet
Symphony No. 2, in C minor......Tschaikowsky

Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist.

The Beethoven overture is not among the composer's finest works in kind, and is perhaps the lightest of the series, but it is brilliant and tuneful, and even in its most serious moments is never very deep. It has been placed by the side of Mozart's overture to "Figaro," but, brief as the latter is, it is richer in ideas and more thoughtful in treatment; but it must be remembered that the former is merely the prelude to a ballet of action. Some one has called it the finale to the Sonata Pathetique in the major, but why is not exactly clear.

The Brahms violin concerto is notable for the nobility of its character and for its earnestness, even in the more florid flourishes to show off the technique of the performer. It is perhaps the least alluring of all the great concertos for the violin, and is lacking in the breadth and easy dignity of the Beethoven concerto, the grace and melodious brilliancy of that by Mendelssohn, and the brilliant showiness of the familiar works in kind by Bruch; but it is, nevertheless, one of the masterpieces written for the instrument, even though it is not destined to attain the popularity reached by the compositions just named. Here, as elsewhere, Brahms is more concerned in pleasing himself than his hearers, and in appealing to the head rather than the heart. Mr. Kneisel's performance of the work was in his usual highly finished vein. Something more of fulness of tone might have been desired; but nothing could have been more exquisitely pure than his intonation, more perfect than his technique, more beautiful than his phrasing and more artistic than his interpretation generally. The adagio was given with delightful refinement of taste and dignity of expression, and through the whole interpretation he entered fully into the spirit of the music and the underlying sentiment of the work. The cadenza in the first movement was by Mr. C. M. Loeffler, and fitted sympathetically into what had gone before. It is of exceeding brilliancy and difficult, but in this, as throughout his whole performance, Mr. Kneisel played it flawlessly. He was received with long contined applause, and at the end of the concerto was recalled many times with immense fervor.

The piquant, tuneful and exquisitely instrumented Bizet selections met with hearty favor. They are the briefest of pretty trifles, full of character and charming in the hearing, and were read and played with fascinating effect. They are not always given with the opera, and were heard on this occasion for the first time at these concerts.

Another novelty was the symphony. It is scarcely worthy the composer of the great Symphony Pathetique. It is of a much lighter character, and is not always interesting. It has a dainty andante, served with clever elaboration and considerable originality, and this is the clearest and most attractive movement of the work. The scherzo is strong in rhythm and fiery in spirit, and the trio is a vigorously marked Russian dance tune, of which the orchestration is strikingly ingenious and effective, but the movement, as a whole, is of no great musical worth.

The finale is founded on a rugged theme suggesting a peasant dance. It is brief, and is repeated with a persistency that, at last, makes it tiresomely monotonous. The second theme is the most flowing and melodious portion of the symphony, but it is short, and speedily gives way to the first subject and its endless reiterations of the same thing. The movement has dissonances enough to provide for nearly a whole Wagner opera, and the orchestration is almost continuously noisy. Tschaikowsky is not heard at his best in this work, which is often vague in its meaning and perfunctory in effect. Mr. Paur read it with characteristic vigor and appreciation, and the orchestra did it full justice, but it made no very favorable impression.

The selections for the next concert are: Academic overture, Brahms; Concerto No. 4, for pianoforte, Rubinstein; Symphony No. 1, Beethoven, and Hungarian Rhapsody No. 6, Liszt, which makes its first appearance on these programmes. The soloist is to be Mme. Teresa Carreno.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1897.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Occasion of Rare Interest—First Hearing Here of Tschaikowsky's Second Symphony—Franz Kneisel's Success With the Violin Concerto by Brahms.

Conductor Paur is not always so fortunate in his choice of a program as he was for the 15th Symphony concert given last evening, as usual, in Music Hall. For variety and breadth of artistic outline, and a strictly nonpartisan choice, the program may be said to have surpassed any similar set of orchestral selections that has been heard here for several seasons. The last two of the three great Bs—also Bizet and Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky were the composers.

The soloist for the violin concerto by Brahms, op. 77, was Concertmeister Kneisel. An episode of no inconsiderable charm interspersing the performance was a cadenza to its first movement by C. M. Loeffler.

A renewed experience with this concerto could not have failed to enhance the generally favorable impression it created among musicians when it was first produced here.

In fact, the statement of its first theme by the violas, 'celli, bassoons and horns and its development seems nearer what Beethoven would have written than anything that has appeared from the pen of Brahms. The adagio has a certain noble simplicity, and delicately refined sentiment, no less uncharacteristic of Brahms than it is gratifying. In the final movement an unspontaneous and labored attempt at humor has its reconciliation in its virtuosal embroidery for the solo instrument. Such are few of the leading impressions that a second hearing of the work created. It need not be told that the concerto has a higher artistic value than even a classic show piece for violin and orchestra could be required to contain. It seems musically quiet as much as in the strictly concerto sense of the term, a work of rare perennity.

The refined, logical and masterly cadenza, composed for the work by Loeffler, seems quite as it should be.

This is not the fitful and hysterical interpolation that such cadenzas often are, but a perfectly natural and appropriate tribute without words from a gifted and scholarly tone-artist to a more experienced contemporary, it unmistakably is.

Mr. Franz Kneisel performed the work in that masterly fashion, perfect taste, and loyal artistry that are too thoroughly well-known of him to require extended comment.

It is difficult to subdue enthusiasm, or to write in discriminating and critical terms of the second symphony by Tschaikowski. It was heard here last evening for the first time. A record of impressions is all that one has a right to demand after an initial hearing of any symphonic production.

While the symphony in question is not such an incomparable creation as the composer's famous sixth; while it has not been evolved with such lavish and exciting display of genius as is the characteristic of Tschaikowski's chef-d'ocuvre, it is nevertheless an art wonder in the best sense. Where in any work by Brahms does any one find any such charming and unforced contrpuntal writing as Tschaikowski has revealed in the magnificent allegro vivo?

The andante marziale is not without its borrowed thought of the march from the Leonora symphony by Raff, but it is not a plagiarized piece of music. It is more in the nature of a homage that rises superior to any such merit as the "Leonora" march contains.

The finale of the work is a slightly exaggerated and noisy illustration of the grotesque in music, but it is a superbly unique and scholarly movement for all that.

Of other noteworthy features of the concert, the orchestral accompaniment to the solo part of the concerto was often coarse, and quite invariably unsympathetic and over loud.

The entr'actes and ballet music from Bizet's "Carmen" were deliciously interpreted, and the performances of the overture and symphony were characteristic of the orchestra's best work. At the 16th concert, a week from next Saturday, the Academic overture by Brahms, fourth concerto by Rubinstein, Beethoven's symphony No. 1 and the sixth Hungarian rhapsody by Liszt will be played. The soloist will be Mme. Teresa Carreno.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, FEB. 14, 1897.

Fifteenth Symphony Concert.

Last week's symphony program comprised Beethoven's overture to "The Men of Prometheus," Brahm's violin concerto in D major, selections from Bizet's "Carmen" and Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 2, the latter piece given for the first time at these concerts. The cadenza in the Brahms concerto was written by Mr C. M. Loeffler and Mr Franz Kneisel was the violin soloist.

Beethoven's delightful overture was brilliantly played, the work of the oboes and flutes in the tripping little second theme in the earlier part of the piece calling for special mention, the harmonic contrasts being perfectly preserved against the background formed by the more sonorous instruments. The vivacious measures which succeed this movement were admirably given by the full orchestra, the men following Mr Paur without a perceptible deviation from the accelerated tempo. Again in the long coda was the magnificent team work of the orchestra shown, and the finale was played with thrilling effect. It was a notably spirited interpretation of a charming composition.

Mr Kneisel's violin part in the Brahm's concerto was performed in a highly praiseworthy manner. The long introductory cadenza is not calculated to exploit the artist as a brilliant violinist, but Mr Kneisel's work was conscientiously done and the elaborations were charmingly presented. In the coda supplied by Mr Loeffler, Mr Kneisel easily overcome all the difficulties in a masterly fashion.

His chief success, though, was in the delicate romanza of the second movement, which was beautifully phrased and expressed, and appeared to be perfect in tonality and execution. The finale movement was conspicuous for its brilliant treatment. The modesty of this gifted violinist is a marked feature in all of his work, and he is always the artist and never the seeker after applause by methods so frequently adopted by soloists. He was most heartily applauded at the close of his performance.

The familiar selections from Bizet's "Carmen" received sympathetic treatment. The first intermezzo, the waltz and the ballet movements may be mentioned as specially pleasing examples of delicate interpretations.

Tschaikowsky's overture No. 2 is a very difficult work, and throughout the four movements are found many of the author's characteristic orchestral combinations. The first movement is generally somber in motif, the second is a march development of three themes, the third part introduces a dance tune, and the last movement partakes largely of the dancing theme, with an oddly written rhythm.

The horns gave out the sad measures of the first part with admirable solemnity, and the gradual development to fortissimo and then back to pianissimo was, as a whole, smoothly played by the full band. The different contingents preserved their musical relations skilfully, and the intricate "conversations" were very evenly presented.

The march, a peculiar combination of three airs, was capitally worked up and the effects were all that could be desired. In the third movement the Slavic dance tunes appear trivial, although the orchestra gave a commendable interpretation of the score and little or no fault is to be found with the men. The fourth part showed the author's peculiar trend for orchestral effects and was not specially interesting. The composition fairly bristles with musical stumbling blocks and is very elaborate in character.

The celebrated pianist, Mme Teresa Carreno, will be the soloist at this week's concerts. The program will be as follows: Academic overture, Brahms; concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, Rubinstein; symphony No. 1, in C major, op. 21, Beethoven; Hungarian rhapsody, No. 6 (first time), Liszt.

The Boston Traveler
PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY.

Mr. Kneisel Played the Brahms Concerto—A Symphony by Tschaikowsky as a Novelty.

Sixteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; fifteenth concert. Mr. Kneisel, soloist. The programme:

Overture, Prometheus.................Beethoven
Concerto for violin, D major............Brahms
Entr'actes and ballet music from Carmen..Bizet
Symphony No. 2, C minor.........Tschaikowsky
(First time at these concerts.)

Mr. Kneisel chose well the great Brahms Concerto, for it is full of nobility and charm from beginning to end. It effectually disposes of the sneers against Brahms as being a mere able mechanic in the work of composition. This work is admirably put together, it is true, but that is scarcely a fault; it has also beauty of melody, clearness of thought, poetry and inspiration. Mr. Kneisel played it with his never-failing grace and purity of sentiment, but it is indisputable that he has not the power or breadth to fully exploit such a concerto in such a hall. He was warmly applauded for his work, especially for his charming playing of Mr. Loeffler's scholarly cadenza.

The Tschaikowsky No. 2 Symphony has been played here before by the Walter Damrosch orchestra at the Tremont Theatre several years ago. But to all intents and purposes, and to most of the audience and many of the critics, it was new; and not only new, but disappointing. How excellent a thing for the fame of Tschaikowsky that the great "Pathetique," and not this noisy and crude No. 2, was the last large work of his life. It has plenty of rugged power, but lacks the spark of genius that might redeem so barbaric a style. The andante is in many ways the most interesting movement of the four, although the scherzo is filled with vigorous rhythm and displays a very rich and glowing orchestration. The finale deteriorates into that wild blatancy which Tschaikowsky occasionally could not control. Spite of the brilliant way the symphony was played by the orchestra, it did not at all satisfy the adherents of the great Russian, many of whom felt a certain regret that they had heard it at all.

Beethoven's "Prometheus" still remains fresh, lovely and inspired. It is less massive than some of his other great overtures, but clearly a work of genius. It was exquisitely given.

The Bizet pieces, brief and beautiful additions to the score of "Carmen" that we do not often hear, charmed and delighted by their elegance and fragrance. It was a great pleasure to hear suggestions of the wonderful opera played by such an orchestra as ours. W. D. QUINT.

Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MORNING, FEBRUARY 14, 1897.
1897, Post Publishing Company.)

KNEISEL PLAYED.

Last night's Symphony concert was rather thin for Music Hall traditions. Mr. Franz Kneisel was the central figure. He played last night the well-known Brahms concerto in D major, Op. 77, with Cadenza by Loeffler, his colleague in the orchestra, the composer of the concerto having followed the old-fashioned habit of leaving the cadenza for the performer instead of writing one himself.

The score of this concerto is dedicated to Joseph Joachim, the man who was first to discover the genius of Brahms. Brahms was then playing in concert and found the piano where he was to play somewhat low-pitched. So he transposed as he played a very difficult concerto from A to B flat, a feat which astonished and delighted Joachim. He sent the youthful wonder—Brahms was 20—to Schumann, and Schumann added to his own fame by publishing an article announcing the new composer as the man of destiny. Brahms is now 64 years old, the exponent of modern conversation in music as against the tendencies that Wagner represents, and the greatest living composer. He is in Vienna, afflicted with cancer of the stomach, and his work is nearly done.

Kneisel's playing was faultless in technique, of course, but lacked the flaming tones that one always hopes for (and seldom gets) with a solo violin.

Beethoven's overture, "The Men of Prometheus," preceded the concerto, and entr'actes from "Carmen," with the very brief ballet music, followed. The last number was Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 2 in C minor.

Mr. Apthorp found it "impossible to procure" a full score of "Carmen," so he was unable to tell the audience that the first intermezzo from "Carmen" contained a bassoon solo, which was repeated by the clarinet and then parcelled out among the other wood wind; that the "graceful cantilena" in the second was for a flute solo—and, by the way, the flute was flat here—and that the very gypsy-like third intermezzo, as well as the ballet number, was scored for all sorts of "plagal" things, triangles, tambourines, etc.

This Tschaikowsky's symphony is not at all heavy. It could doubtless succeed at the concerts which are given in the same place in the liquid summer time; and the opening and closing measures of the second movement would add to the fame of John Philip Sousa. It was very well received.

At the next concert Mme. Teresa Carreno will play Rubinstein's concerto No. 4 and Liszt's sixth Hungarian rhapsody ("The Carnival at Pesth"); the other numbers will be an academic overture by Brahms and Beethoven's first symphony.

THE WASHINGTON TIMES

WASHINGTON, D. C., JANUARY 20, 1897

HEARD AT THE SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third of the season's concerts at the Columbia last night. There is really very little that is new to write of the coming of this peerless body of musicians. As usual the theater was crowded with cultured and hence appreciative auditors and the concert was received with the customary enthusiasm which Mr. Paur and his players invariably inspire.

The program varied in character, presenting selections from the works of Mozart, Weber, Handel, Bizet and Liszt, and there was a measure of novelty in the appearance of a vocalist with the orchestra, the first time this season. The playing was, as usual, beyond cavil, exquisitely fine in finish, truthful in tonal value and sympathetically responsive to the delicate suggestion of Mr. Paur's baton.

The symphony performed was Mozart's in G minor, which has long disputed the claim of being the "model symphony" with Beethoven's second. Von Weber's overture to the fairy opera, "Oberon," some "Carmen" entacte and ballet music, which was a pleasant novelty, and Franz Liszt's tone picture, founded on an episode from Lenau's "Faust." Mr. Apthorp thus describes the scene which inspired the music: "The scene is laid in a village tavern, where a peasant wedding is going forward. Mephistopheles looks in at the window in the guise of a huntsman, and beckons Faust to follow him into the room. Entering upon the scene of jollification, Faust soon becomes smitten with a black-eyed village beauty, but feels a little shy at first about asking her to dance with him. Mephisto laughs at him 'who has just had it out with hell, and is now abashed before a woman.' Turning to the village musicians, he says: 'You dear people, your bow is drawn far too sleepily! To your waltz sick pleasure may turn on lame toes, but not youth full of blood and glow. Reach me a fiddle, 'twill give out another sound, and in the tavern shall be other springing!' He takes the fiddle and strikes up a waltz-tune, to which Faust and the young girl dance madly, he the while commenting on all the delights of dancing, love, and beauty in a glowing monologue."

Miss Marie Toulinguet was the soloist. Her voice is a well rounded soprano of power, but exceeding sweetness in legato passages and pleasing vibrato on organ notes. Her selections were an aria from Weber's rarely given "Xerxes" and a more familiar aria from "Freischutz."

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 14, 1897.

The fifteenth Symphony programme named only one work which was new to Boston. This was Tschaikowsky's second symphony, which was put last, as if it had been thought best that the listener should not be in too critical a state of mind when he reached it. The preceding numbers were: Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture; the Brahms violin concerto, (with a cadenza written by Mr. C. M. Loeffler) played by Mr. Kneisel: and the entr acte and ballet music from Bizet's "Carmen."

When Brahms chooses to be purely musical, how delightful he can be! When he puts aside learned elaboration, contrapuntal mystery and thematic torture and lets his better, brighter, simpler self sing out! In his concerts, for instance, after the scholasticism—and it is not sombre or severe—of the first movement has passed, what light, joy, suavity and sympathy remain! One can hardly believe that one is listening to the Brahms of tremendous variation things and of some of the mighty but unlovely symphonic movements. Mr. Kneisel played—as we suppose he could not now help playing, even were he in a trance—with faultless execution and perfect style, and also with that passionless intellectuality and controlled tonality which make the pellucid, slender voice of his violin sometimes sound as though it were an echo or a group of fairy strings. Mr. Loeffler's cadenza was masterly—intricate and imposing in virtuosity, but with none of its arduous and brilliant phrases turned for mere display.

The symphony was most interesting in its originality and power; yet it was characteristic of its composer, too, and significant of his nationality. The vehemence and almost overwhelming tonal might of some of his later works is hinted in it, but only in the last movement is there any positive display of them; and then only fitfully and briefly. An irrepressible vitality pervades it all, and even the lonesome, mournful and unaccompanied theme of the first movement is strong and vast, and its development and association are energetic and indomitable. The second movement is less imposing, with its light martial approach and retreat, and the third is imbued with a wild and whirling vivacity, sparkling out through quaint figures and swift shoots of tone. Occasionally a strange and unexpected change comes into the apparently established treatment, and in the first and last movement there are curious broken rhythms and syncopations, together with some odd instrumental effects, among which one solitary crash of the ghastly tam-tam is not to be forgotten. It is a work, in fact, which is alive with warm, human life and does not need to "draw blood," (using the Transcript's favorite phrase,) to support itself by a transfusion from the auditors.

The orchestra played these things finely and earnestly, gave firmness to the overture and contributed to the little "Carmen" pieces the various and perfect obbligati which give to each its special quality of beauty and spirit.

The next programme stands thus: Brahms, Academic Overture; Rubinstein, Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4; Beethoven, Symphony No. 1, in C major, Op. 21; Liszt, Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 6, ("Pesther Carneval") (first time.) Soloist, Madame Teresa Carreno.

Howard Malcom Ticknor.

Gazette

Symphony Concert.

The sixteenth concert of the Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening. The programme was:

Academic Overture	Brahms
Concerto No. 4, D minor	Rubinstein
Symphony No. 1, C major	Beethoven
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 6	Liszt

Soloist, Mme. Teresa Carreno.

So far as the soloist is concerned, it would be sufficient simply to announce her name, for Mme. Carreno has reached a position where criticism is a superfluity. In the matter of technique, largeness of style, adaptation of means to end, fine taste and self-reserve she is the finished artist. If the enthusiasm aroused at the Friday afternoon rehearsal may be taken as evidence, Mme. Carreno is a rival of Paderewski, not only in skill, but in the demonstrative affection that she rouses in her audience, and, having said so much, further praise would be a superfluity.

The Liszt Rhapsody was given in Boston for the first time on this occasion, and yet it did not suggest the idea of novelty, for it seemed to be the legitimate continuation of the other rhapsodies. There was the usual brilliancy at the expense of ideas, the usual surface glitter at the expense of soul; in other words, it was Liszt. The Academic overture and the Beethoven symphony are old friends, and if the Academic overture keeps on appearing in its usual routine it will soon rival the symphony in the number of times it has been played. The works were masterfully read and performed, and for the pleasure it gave the concert was the most striking of the season.

The soloist for the concert to be given March 5 is Mr. Arthur Whiting, who will play his own Fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 11.

1897

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fifteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: Overture to "Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus," opus 43.
Brahms: Concerto for Violin, in D major, opus 77. (Cadenza by C. M. Loeffler.)
Bizet: Entr'actes and Ballet-Music from "Carmen."
Tschaikowsky: Symphony No. 2, in C minor, opus 17.

It was good to hear the perfect little "Prometheus" overture again; it had too long been silent! Would, too, that we might sometime hear the beautiful Andante and Adagio from the same work, that have not been played here, we believe, since the old days of the Harvard Musical Association's concerts. They used to be sure cards.

The entr' actes and single ballet-movement from "Carmen"—the latter originally written for "Les Pecheurs de Perles"—are so charming that their extreme lightness seems no just bar to their figuring on the programme of a symphoney concert. It is good, too, to hear them played so admirably as by our Symphoney Orchestra, instead of dimly shadowed forth by the average opera orchestra amid the half-silence of an entr' acte. There are other things of the sort which might be played at the symphony concerts now and then with advantage; things which the public has heard time and again at the opera, but has never heard played as they deserve to be. We should be glad to hear, for instance, the prelude to Gounod's "Faust," the little hunting intermezzo between the second and third acts of "Der Freischütz," a ballet-movement or two from Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable."

Tschaikowsky's second symphony seems to us, on the whole, the least interesting of his symphonies we have heard here. We have now had them all, except the No. 3, in D major, and the symphony "after Byron's Manfred," opus 58. Whether this last is really a full-fledged symphony or not, we do not know. Tschaikowsky is always individual; but this C minor symphony of his seems far below his usual level of spontaneity. A good deal in it, too, is trivial and tiresome. It was admirably played.

Brahms's violin concerto surely and steadily makes its way toward the head of the list, every time one hears it afresh. The Beethoven and Mendelssohn concertos no longer have the top all to themselves; Joachim's "Hungarian" and Max Bruch's G minor are already left behind by this one of Brahms's. The work is so beautiful, so soulful, so genially great; the composer is great in it with so little effort; Mr. Kneisel played it to perfection; one feels the work to have been made for him and he for it. For stoutness and totality of conception, and unerring sureness and beauty of execution, his performance was incomparable. That was the playing of a master! Mr. Loeffler's cadenza to the first movement may be said to realize the ideal of that sort of writing. It is at once brilliant and solid. Mr. Loeffler, in writing for the violin, has got beyond the point of writing technical difficulties, that are brilliantly playable and congenial to the violinist; he has reached the point of writing brilliant difficulties that sound well and display the finest qualities of the instrument. Mr. Kneisel played the admirable cadenza as perfectly as he did the concerto itself. When we hear such a work so played, our objection to violin concertos in general ceases.

The next programe is: Brahms, academic overture; Rubinstein, concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor; Beethoven, symphony No. 1, in C major; Liszt, Hungarian rhapsody, No. 6, "Pesther Carneval" (first time in Boston). Mme. Teresa Carreno will be the pianist.

DAY, FEB.

Mme Carreno Soloist at the Symphony Concert.

The famous pianist, Mme Teresa Carreno, was the soloist at last week's symphony concerts, and she was greeted by two immense audiences, the assemblage at the rehearsal Friday afternoon being specially large. Mme Carreno played Rubinstein's fourth piano concerto; the orchestral selections were Brahms' academic overture, Beethoven's first symphony and Liszt's "Carnival in Pesth," the latter number for the first time here.

Rubinstein's concerto is one of the grandest works of its class. The interest is steadily maintained, in fact it is increased by the magnificent third movement, and the length and almost insurmountable difficulties of the many fortissimo passages renders even a passable interpretation an impossibility to any but pianists of the highest artistic and physical attainments. After an absence of about eight years Mme Carreno has returned to America, the scene of earlier triumphs. As a child she was a prodigy, later in life she was an admirable artist, and now she proves to be one of the foremost pianists of the world.

Very few pianists of the gentler sex have been able to fully respond to the physical tax which Rubinstein's work demands, and the last movement has generally suffered by comparison with the two preceding it. In Mme Carreno there was no perceptible falling off in her marvelous strength, and she played the finale with as much spirit and vigor as in the earlier movements. Her whole interpretation was masterly, if such a term may be applied correctly to one of her sex, and that the praise from abroad which has classed this artist with Paderewski and Rubinstein himself in the performance of this work was well deserved, was evidenced by madam's work of Friday and Saturday.

The dashing introductory cadenzas of the first movement were given with great brilliancy and the cadenza and coda, with the figuration in octaves running up to a fortissimo long sustained were examples of heroic work seldom vouchsafed at the hands of a woman. The passion and insight shown in these movements stamp her indisputably as a grand artist. In the slow movement her phrasing and delicacy of tone was all that could be reasonably desired, the cantabile passages were very sweet and the double arpeggios were given with notable clearness.

In the closing movement the chords were delivered with dramatic breadth of tonality, and the double runs and development of the theme in D minor were given with enormous power, the overwhelming fortissimo close showing no trace of exhaustion in the player. It was an exciting finale, and before the music ceased the applause of the audience fairly drowned the closing phrases of the concerto. Applause, recalls and floral offerings were showered upon the player at the end of the performance.

The orchestra played the concerto admirably. The Brahms overture was given with becoming pomposity, the excellence of tone in the brass contingent being a conspicuous feature. In the Beethoven symphony the dignity of the first movement was artistically preserved, the dainty conversations of the second part were capitally sustained, and the joyous nature of the fourth movement found pleasing exemplification.

The Liszt rhapsody, played here for the first time, was interpreted in a delightful and characteristic style. The difficult variations of tempo were given with the precision that makes the "team work" of this band so enjoyable, and all the bizarre effects of the number were quaintly and artistically emphasized.

The concerts this week will be omitted. Next week Mr Arthur Whiting will be the soloist. The program will be as follows: Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Brahms; fantasy, pianoforte and orchestra, op. 11, Whiting; "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Weingartner; overture to "Alfonso and Estralla," Schubert.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 14, 1897.
(Copyright, 1897. Post Publishing Company.)

KNEISEL PLAYED.

Last night's Symphony concert was rather thin for Music Hall traditions. Mr. Franz Kneisel was the central figure. He played last night the well-known Brahms concerto in D major, Op. 77, with Cadenza by Loeffler, his colleague in the orchestra, the composer of the concerto having followed the old-fashioned habit of leaving the cadenza for the performer instead of writing one himself.

The score of this concerto is dedicated to Joseph Joachim, the man who was first to discover the genius of Brahms. Brahms was then playing in concert and found the piano where he was to play somewhat low-pitched. So he transposed as he played a very difficult concerto from A to B flat, a feat which astonished and delighted Joachim. He sent the youthful wonder—Brahms was 20—to Schumann, and Schumann added to his own fame by publishing an article announcing the new composer as the man of destiny. Brahms is now 64 years old, the exponent of modern conversation in music as against the tendencies that Wagner represents, and the greatest living composer. He is in Vienna, afflicted with cancer of the stomach, and his work is nearly done.

Kneisel's playing was faultless in technique, of course, but lacked the flaming tones that one always hopes for (and seldom gets) with a solo violin.

Beethoven's overture, "The Men of Prometheus," preceded the concerto, and entr'actes from "Carmen," with the very brief ballet music, followed. The last number was Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 2 in C minor.

Mr. Apthorp found it "impossible to procure" a full score of "Carmen," so he was unable to tell the audience that the first intermezzo from "Carmen" contained a bassoon solo, which was repeated by the clarinet and then parcelled out among the other wood wind; that the "graceful cantilena" in the second was for a flute solo—and, by the way, the flute was flat here—and that the very gypsy-like third intermezzo, as well as the ballet number, was scored for all sorts of "plagal" things, triangles, tambourines, etc.

This Tschaikowsky's symphony is not at all heavy. It could doubtless succeed at the concerts which are given in the same place in the liquid summer time; and the opening and closing measures of the second movement would add to the fame of John Philip Sousa. It was very well received.

At the next concert Mme. Teresa Carreno will play Rubinstein's concerto No. 4 and Liszt's sixth Hungarian rhapsody ("The Carnival at Pesth"); the other numbers will be an academic overture by Brahms and Beethoven's first symphony.

THE WASHINGTON TIMES

WASHINGTON, D. C., JANUARY 20, 1897

HEARD AT THE SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third of the season's concerts at the Columbia last night. There is really very little that is new to write of the coming of this peerless body of musicians. As usual the theater was crowded with cultured and hence appreciative auditors and the concert was received with the customary enthusiasm which Mr. Paur and his players invariably inspire.

The program varied in character, presenting selections from the works of Mozart, Weber, Handel, Bizet and Liszt, and there was a measure of novelty in the appearance of a vocalist with the orchestra, the first time this season. The playing was, as usual, beyond cavil, exquisitely fine in finish, truthful in tonal value and sympathetically responsive to the delicate suggestion of Mr. Paur's baton.

The symphony performed was Mozart's in G minor, which has long disputed the claim of being the "model symphony" with Beethoven's second. Von Weber's overture to the fairy opera, "Oberon," some "Carmen" entaete and ballet music, which was a pleasant novelty, and Franz Liszt's tone picture, founded on an episode from Lenau's "Faust." Mr. Apthorp thus describes the scene which inspired the music: "The scene is laid in a village tavern, where a peasant wedding is going forward. Mephistopheles looks in at the window in the guise of a huntsman, and beckons Faust to follow him into the room. Entering upon the scene of jollification, Faust soon becomes smitten with a black-eyed village beauty, but feels a little shy at first about asking her to dance with him. Mephisto laughs at him 'who has just had it out with hell, and is now abashed before a woman.' Turning to the village musicians, he says: 'You dear people, your bow is drawn far too sleepily! To your waltz sick pleasure may turn on lame toes, but not youth full of blood and glow. Reach me a fiddle, 'twill give out another sound, and in the tavern shall be other springing!' He takes the fiddle and strikes up a waltz-tune, to which Faust and the young girl dance madly, he the while commenting on all the delights of dancing, love, and beauty in a glowing monologue."

Miss Marie Toulinguet was the soloist. Her voice is a well rounded soprano of power, but exceeding sweetness in legato passages and pleasing vibrato on organ notes. Her selections were an aria from Weber's rarely given "Xerxes" and a more familiar aria from "Freischutz."

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 14, 1897.

The fifteenth Symphony programme named only one work which was new to Boston. This was Tschaikowsky's second symphony, which was put last, as if it had been thought best that the listener should not be in too critical a state of mind when he reached it. The preceding numbers were: Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture; the Brahms violin concerto, (with a cadenza written by Mr. C. M. Loeffler) played by Mr. Kneisel: and the entr acte and ballet music from Bizet's "Carmen."

When Brahms chooses to be purely musical, how delightful he can be! When he puts aside learned elaboration, contrapuntal mystery and thematic torture and lets his better, brighter, simpler self sing out! In his concerts, for instance, after the scholasticism—and it is not sombre or severe—of the first movement has passed, what light, joy, suavity and sympathy remain! One can hardly believe that one is listening to the Brahms of tremendous variation things and of some of the mighty but unlovely symphonic movements. Mr. Kneisel played—as we suppose he could not now help playing, even were he in a trance—with faultless execution and perfect style, and also with that passionless intellectuality and controlled tonality which make the pellucid, slender voice of his violin sometimes sound as though it were an echo or a group of fairy strings. Mr. Loeffler's cadenza was masterly—intricate and imposing in virtuosity, but with none of its arduous and brilliant phrases turned for mere display.

The symphony was most interesting in its originality and power; yet it was characteristic of its composer, too, and significant of his nationality. The vehemence and almost overwhelming tonal might of some of his later works is hinted in it, but only in the last movement is there any positive display of them; and then only fitfully and briefly. An irrepressible vitality pervades it all, and even the lonesome, mournful and unaccompanied theme of the first movement is strong and vast, and its development and association are energetic and indomitable. The second movement is less imposing, with its light martial approach and retreat, and the third is imbued with a wild and whirling vivacity, sparkling out through quaint figures and swift shoots of tone. Occasionally a strange and unexpected change comes into the apparently established treatment, and in the first and last movement there are curious broken rhythms and syncopations, together with some odd instrumental effects, among which one solitary crash of the ghastly tam-tam is not to be forgotten. It is a work, in fact, which is alive with warm, human life and does not need to "draw blood," (using the Transcript's favorite phrase,) to support itself by a transfusion from the auditors.

The orchestra played these things finely and earnestly, gave firmness to the overture and contributed to the little "Carmen" pieces the various and perfect obbligati which give to each its special quality of beauty and spirit.

The next programme stands thus: Brahms, Academic Overture; Rubinstein, Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4; Beethoven, Symphony No. 1, in C major, Op. 21; Liszt, Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 6, ("Pesther Carneval") (first time.) Soloist, Madame Teresa Carreno.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Gazette

Symphony Concert.

The sixteenth concert of the Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening. The programme was:

Academic Overture	Prahms
Concerto No. 4, D minor	Rubinstein
Symphony No. 1, C major	Beethoven
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 6	Liszt

Soloist, Mme. Teresa Carreno.

So far as the soloist is concerned, it would be sufficient simply to announce her name, for Mme. Carreno has reached a position where criticism is a superfluity. In the matter of technique, largeness of style, adaptation of means to end, fine taste and self-reserve she is the finished artist. If the enthusiasm aroused at the Friday afternoon rehearsal may be taken as evidence, Mme. Carreno is a rival of Paderewski, not only in skill, but in the demonstrative affection that she rouses in her audience, and, having said so much, further praise would be a superfluity.

The Liszt Rhapsody was given in Boston for the first time on this occasion, and yet it did not suggest the idea of novelty, for it seemed to be the legitimate continuation of the other rhapsodies. There was the usual brilliancy at the expense of ideas, the usual surface glitter at the expense of soul; in other words, it was Liszt. The Academic overture and the Beethoven symphony are old friends, and if the Academic overture keeps on appearing in its usual routine it will soon rival the symphony in the number of times it has been played. The works were masterfully read and performed, and for the pleasure it gave the concert was the most striking of the season.

The soloist for the concert to be given March 5 is Mr. Arthur Whiting, who will play his own Fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 11.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1897.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fifteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: Overture to "Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus," opus 43.
Brahms: Concerto for Violin, in D major, opus 77. (Cadenza by C. M. Loeffler.)
Bizet: Entr'actes and Ballet-Music from "Carmen."
Tschaikowsky: Symphony No. 2, in C minor, opus 17.

It was good to hear the perfect little "Prometheus" overture again; it had too long been silent! Would, too, that we might sometime hear the beautiful Andante and Adagio from the same work, that have not been played here, we believe, since the old days of the Harvard Musical Association's concerts. They used to be sure cards.

The entr' actes and single ballet-movement from "Carmen"—the latter originally written for "Les Pecheurs de Perles"—are so charming that their extreme lightness seems no just bar to their figuring on the programme of a symphoney concert. It is good, too, to hear them played so admirably as by our Symphoney Orchestra, instead of dimly shadowed forth by the average opera orchestra amid the half-silence of an entr' acte. There are other things of the sort which might be played at the symphony concerts now and then with advantage; things which the public has heard time and again at the opera, but has never heard played as they deserve to be. We should be glad to hear, for instance, the prelude to Gounod's "Faust," the little hunting intermezzo between the second and third acts of "Der Freischütz," a ballet-movement or two from Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable."

Tschaikowsky's second symphony seems to us, on the whole, the least interesting of his symphonies we have heard here. We have now had them all, except the No. 3, in D major, and the symphony "after Byron's Manfred," opus 58. Whether this last is really a full-fledged symphony or not, we do not know. Tschaikowsky is always individual; but this C minor symphony of his seems far below his usual level of spontaneity. A good deal in it, too, is trivial and tiresome. It was admirably played.

Brahms's violin concerto surely and steadily makes its way toward the head of the list, every time one hears it afresh. The Beethoven and Mendelssohn concertos no longer have the top all to themselves; Joachim's "Hungarian" and Max Bruch's G minor are already left behind by this one of Brahms's. The work is so beautiful, so soulful, so genially great; the composer is great in it with so little effort; Mr. Kneisel played it to perfection; one feels the work to have been made for him and he for it. For stoutness and totality of conception, and unerring sureness and beauty of execution, his performance was incomparable. That was the playing of a master! Mr. Loeffler's cadenza to the first movement may be said to realize the ideal of that sort of writing. It is at once briliant and solid. Mr. Loeffler, in writing for the violin, has got beyond the point of writing technical difficulties, that are brilliantly playable and congenial to the violinist; he has reached the point of writing brilliant difficulties that sound well and display the finest qualities of the instrument. Mr. Kneisel played the admirable cadenza as perfectly as he did the concerto itself. When we hear such a work so played, our objection to violin concertos in general ceases.

The next programe is: Brahms, academic overture; Rubinstein, concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor; Beethoven, symphony No. 1, in C major; Liszt, Hungarian rhapsody, No. 6, "Pesther Carneval" (first time in Boston). Mme. Teresa Carreno will be the pianist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 21, 1897.

Mme Carreno Soloist at the Symphony Concert.

The famous pianist, Mme Teresa Carreno, was the soloist at last week's symphony concerts, and she was greeted by two immense audiences, the assemblage at the rehearsal Friday afternoon being specially large. Mme Carreno played Rubinstein's fourth piano concerto; the orchestral selections were Brahms' academic overture, Beethoven's first symphony and Liszt's "Carnival in Pesth," the latter number for the first time here.

Rubinstein's concerto is one of the grandest works of its class. The interest is steadily maintained, in fact it is increased by the magnificent third movement, and the length and almost insurmountable difficulties of the many fortissimo passages renders even a passable interpretation an impossibility to any but pianists of the highest artistic and physical attainments. After an absence of about eight years Mme Carreno has returned to America, the scene of earlier triumphs. As a child she was a prodigy, later in life she was an admirable artist, and now she proves to be one of the foremost pianists of the world.

Very few pianists of the gentler sex have been able to fully respond to the physical tax which Rubinstein's work demands, and the last movement has generally suffered by comparison with the two preceding it. In Mme Carreno there was no perceptible falling off in her marvelous strength, and she played the finale with as much spirit and vigor as in the earlier movements. Her whole interpretation was masterly, if such a term may be applied correctly to one of her sex, and that the praise from abroad which has classed this artist with Paderewski and Rubinstein himself in the performance of this work was well deserved, was evidenced by madam's work of Friday and Saturday.

The dashing introductory cadenzas of the first movement were given with great brilliancy and the cadenza and coda, with the figuration in octaves running up to a fortissimo long sustained were examples of heroic work seldom vouchsafed at the hands of a woman. The passion and insight shown in these movements stamp her indisputably as a grand artist. In the slow movement her phrasing and delicacy of tone was all that could be reasonably desired, the cantabile passages were very sweet and the double arpeggios were given with notable clearness.

In the closing movement the chords were delivered with dramatic breadth of tonality, and the double runs and development of the theme in D minor were given with enormous power, the overwhelming fortissimo close showing no trace of exhaustion in the player. It was an exciting finale, and before the music ceased the applause of the audience fairly drowned the closing phrases of the concerto. Applause, recalls and floral offerings were showered upon the player at the end of the performance.

The orchestra played the concerto admirably. The Brahms overture was given with becoming pomposity, the excellence of tone in the brass contingent being a conspicuous feature. In the Beethoven symphony the dignity of the first movement was artistically preserved, the dainty conversations of the second part were capitally sustained, and the joyous nature of the fourth movement found pleasing exemplificaion.

The Liszt rhapsody, played here for the first time, was interpreted in a delightful and characteristic style. The difficult variations of tempo were given with the precision that makes the "team work" of this band so enjoyable, and all the bizarre effects of the number were quaintly and artistically emphasized.

The concerts this week will be omitted. Next week Mr Arthur Whiting will be the soloist. The program will be as follows: Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Brahms; fantasy, pianoforte and orchestra, op. 11, Whiting; "Invitation to Dance," Weber-Weingartner; overture to "Alfonso and Estralla," Schubert.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1897.

How Teresa Carreno Made Her Debut in '63.

Glimpses of Some Romantic Episodes in Her Life.

Notes and Comments on Singers, Players and Pieces.

The Symphony Program Book of Feb. 13 said that Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 2, in C minor, was played that night for the "first time." As the same book said that Bizet's Entr'actes and Ballet Music from "Carmen" were played for the "first time at these concerts," the natural inference is that the Tschaikowsky symphony was first played in Boston Feb. 13, 1897. As a matter of fact, it was played here for the first time Dec. 9, 1891, at a concert given in Music Hall by the New York Symphony Orchestra, led by Mr. Walter Damrosch.

⁂

In a review of the Symphony concert of Feb. 6, I stated that Dvorák's "Othello" overture—a part of the triple overture—was first played in the United States at the Inaugural concert of the composer in New York, Oct. 21, 1892.

But this performance was not the first production. Mr. G. H. Wilson, now of Pittsburg, has sent me a program of the performance at Prague, where they were first played—from manuscript—May 8, 1892. The concert was devoted exclusively to works of Dvorák—Antonína Dvoráka, as the program spells his name. Dvorák conducted an orchestra of 60 players. An account of the concert was published in the Boston Musical Herald of July, 1892.

⁂

Thirty-four years ago Teresa Carreno made her début in Boston. Her first appearance was in Music Hall Jan. 2, 1863.

Born at Caracas, Venezuela, in 1853, the daughter of a Government official of high standing, she showed her musical instinct at an early age. A revolution exiled her family. New York was her dwelling place.

At the age of 9 she appeared in a benefit concert in the old Academy of Music, New York. (She had been trained chiefly by her father, but her first teacher of widespread fame was Gottschalk.) I am told that the manager decamped with the box office receipts.

She made her first appearance here in Music Hall. Mathilde Phillipps assisted her. The child-pianist played Döhler's notturno, a piece by Gottschalk, Thalberg's "Norma" fantasie, etc.

She next played in Chickering Hall Jan. 15, 1863. Her program was as follows:

Barcarole	Thalberg
Fantasia on "Trovatore	Goria
Andante and Rondo	Mendelssohn
Nocturne	Chopin
Fantasia on "Puritani"	Herz
Nocturne	Doehler

She was then described by a local critic as "a child of nine years with fine head and face full of intelligence, Spanish looking." She had "a funny deal of difficulty in getting herself upon the seat before the grand piano." Her playing "would charm even if she was not a child."

Now listen to the solemn warnings of Mr. J. S. Dwight in 1863: "The child's face beams with intelligence and genius, these speak too in her touch, in a certain untaught life that there is in her playing. It is a precious gift. O treat is reverently and tenderly, educate it, save it, and not let the temptation of dazzling success or gain exhaust it ere its prime." And again: "There can be no doubt of real talent here; may it only have wise training, and not be early wasted before publics! It is too precious for continual exposure. Such gifts are of God, and ought not to be prostituted for mere gain."

Then there was the triumphal career of an infant phenomenon. She traveled. Her first appearance in Paris was May 14, 1866, at a concert given by Vivier, the extraordinary horn-player and jester. She played Thalberg's "Moses" fantasia, and Gottschalk's arrangement of the Miserere from "Il Trovatore." She was called a double phenomenon of talent and beauty. Paul Smith wrote: "Beautiful as a Galatea just leaving the chisel of a new Pygmalion." Her hands and arms were thought to be of ultra-feminine vigor.

Here are a few dates in her early career. She gave concerts in Paris in June and July, '66; she went to Spain, returned to Paris in '67, visited London in 1868 and played there; went to Holland in '69 with Minnie Hauck and Sivori; '69-'70 she went with a company under Strakosch to Germany (Strakosch was then busy in producing Rossini's Mass); she was in a company with Vieuxtemps and Bottesini. In 1872 she was again in Paris. In the English provinces she sang the Queen of Navarre in "The Huguenots" for Mapleson.

⁂

Her first appearance in Boston after these adventures was in a concert company the last of September, 1872, with Mario, Carlotta Patti, Cary, Ronconi, Sauret. Mr. Dwight described her then as "a tall and beautiful young lady," who had too much "Spanish fire" to please him in the "interpretation of the classics."

She married Sauret in London, in June or July of 1873. Here is Mr. W. S. B. Mathews's version of the romance: "The New World was not ripe for him (Sauret). He presently grew tired of the country. They were in poverty almost, and Sauret was homesick. Perhaps differences grew between them. Carreno was expecting a baby very soon. In this crisis Sauret left her, with little money, among strangers, for her father was dead. She told him that if he left her then she would never live with him another day in the world. He departed, and in due time her daughter was born. Later the child was taken by Sauret's sister, most of his family thinking that the young wife had been hardly dealt with. The conditions under which Carreno allowed her child to leave her were that the child should be taught that her mother was dead. When she should be 19 years old it was the mother's intention to see her daughter and set all the case before her, leaving her free to go with either parent. When she told me this I said: 'Mme. Carreno, you have done very wrong. When your daughter grows up without knowing her mother, and you come to see her, you will be simply a stranger. You are unjust to the child, and the experiment cannot possibly turn out well.' So one of the reasons why she wanted to live in Europe was to see again this long-lost daughter, and perhaps receive her again to herself. So she wrote to the aunt in charge of the daughter, but discovered that the aunt was very fond of the girl and in mortal dread lest when she should see her mother her heart should go out to her and the aunt be left in her old age alone, for she is unmarried. The feeling was very natural, but rather hard upon the mother's heart. Carreno begged and plead; she was willing to promise not to make herself known to her daughter, if only she could see her and talk with her. And with a half concession of this kind she came to Wiesbaden, where the aunt lives. The very day that Carreno was coming in from one side the aunt and the daughter went out upon the other, and when I saw Mme. Carreno in London (1890) she had not yet seen her daughter."

⁂

Since 1873 she has lived the life of a wandering virtuoso. She has appeared in concert companies and alone. Thus in 1874 she was with de Murska, Braga, Habelmann, Ferranti. In '78 she was with Wilhelmj, Lazzarini, Tagliapietra. In '80 she gave concerts with the 'cellist Adolph Fischer.

And she has been heard in Boston—as in other cities—as an opera singer. In March, 1876, she was seen here as Zerlina in "Don Giovanni." Titiens, Beaumont, Orlandini, Barili and Brignoli were the other chief singers.

⁂

After Sauret and Teresa had separated, the pianist married Tagliapietra, the baritone, who is well known here. By him she had three children, and for several years, they say, there was happiness. "Later the husband developed habits which a wife could not be expected to tolerate, and one reason of her going to Europe was to make a technical desertion without making scandal against Mr. Tagliapietra."

⁂

This as a prelude to the queer episode in her operatic life told by Mr. Mathews:

"Some years ago Venezuela celebrated the centennial of Bolivar and liberty. About a year before, they sent over a national hymn to Carreno, asking her to compose the music for it, which she did. Then they asked her and her husband, Tagliapietra, the baritone, to come as guests of the State. So they were met at every railway station with bands, military, the Mayor with the freedom of the city in a gold box, and all that sort of thing. Ceremonies, functions, and social enjoyments intervened between the concerts—tickets for the latter being sold out at advance rates weeks ahead. They desired opera the next year. So a subvention of twenty thousand dollars was voted and 'Tag' went off to Italy to engage a company. The time came and the opera opened brilliantly. But a revolution was impending. One night the police exhumed some barrels of gunpowder from under the Opera House, intended to blow the President and all the audience into 'thin air,' as Virgil says, when it should be quite sure that the President had appeared. Revolution was in the air. Everybody quarreled with everybody else. The first soprano quarreled with the first conductor, and as conductors could be spared better than the dramatic soprano, he went. Two days later the soprano quarreled with the second conductor, and insulted him so grossly that he also left. Here was a box. There was not another conductor competent for the place within some thousands of miles. To stop—ruin. But how to go on? It was a fiddler who solved it. He said: 'Mme. Carreno, why do you not direct the orchestra yourself?' She answered that she could not direct. 'Nonsense,' said the musician. 'You have stage experience; you are an artist and know exactly how the music ought to be done, and you are a singer and know how an artist ought to be accompanied. You are the very person, and the only person.' So, since it was sink or swim, Mme. Carreno undertook the direction and conducted the remaining three weeks of the opera with perfect success. She said that the musicians were very polite to her and did exactly as she desired them. She always spoke to them politely and gently, and when things needed to be practised they simply went over them again and again until the effect was realized. But the work of beating! 'You cannot imagine how arduous I found it. I had to have my arm rubbed for hours every night after performance before I could sleep at all; and toward the last I feared that I would be paralyzed permanently.'"

⁂

Mrs. Carreno's first appearance at a Symphony concert was Oct. 29, 1887, when she played Chopin's E minor concerto. This was her sole appearance before last night.

⁂

She made her reappearnce in Europe as a pianist in 1889, and since that time her career has been one of steadily increasing fame.

In 1892 she made an error of judgment. She married Eugen d'Albert. She is no longer his wife, and as soon as the divorce was granted he married an opera singer, Hermine Finck. Sauret has been married happily for some years. Tagliapietra was here not long ago in Lillian Russell's company.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 22, 1897.

Triumph of Teresa Carreno at the Symphony Concert.

It is always a pleasure to hear Brahms' "Academic Overture," with which the concert opened on Saturday night, for it is genial in every measure and is a good proof of the solid foundation that German music finds in the Teutonic folk-song.

Robert Franz once wrote to the present writer—"Music began with the lyric forms and will probably end with them," meaning that the song was the foundation of instrumental music. One can find plenty of indications of this in the German repertoire.

Beethoven's seventh symphony presents an old folk-melody in its scherzo, and even the ninth has the folk-song idea as its climax; Wagner makes an old chorale the basis of his "Kaiser Marsch;" Richard Strauss uses "Funicoli-Funicola" as important material in his "Italian" symphony (or symphonic poem), and hosts of other examples might be cited, but none which is more direct, more pat to its purpose, than this playful use of three student melodies as foundation of a classical instrumental work.

The bassoons deserve especial praise; to them is given one of the finest and most humorous touches of the overture, and they played "Was kommt dort von der Hoeh" (the "Upidee" of the German student) with excellent effect, giving just the right freedom and abandon to the bright theme. The climax was well worked up, and the overture never made a better effect.

The great triumph of the concert was, however, won by Teresa Carreno, one of the greatest female pianists that has ever existed. She has always been a brilliant and exciting performer, she has always been fiery and untrammelled in her interpretations; but now she has attained something more, a degree of dignity and reserve even in the midst of passion that indicates a possibility of yet higher achievement. The hand of iron in the glove of velvet, the "Suaviter in modo, fortiter in re," is beginning to come with maturity, and may lead to more classical triumphs.

There was masculine force, and even more than that, in the opening measures of Rubenstein's D minor concerto, as she played it. It was as if she had thrown down an amazonian gauntlet to begin with; one cannot help saying, with the Queen of Denmark, "The lady protests too much, methinks"; it was too evident a desire to display virility. But one must acknowledge that the power was sustained even to the very end, so that the final climax was as powerful as the beginning.

There is always this fault in the Rubinstein concertos—they are piano compositions, first and foremost, not symphonies with piano obbligato, as Beethoven's fourth and fifth, and Brahms' second concertos are. Piano and orchestra remain oil and water almost throughout, and the slow movement becomes almost a song without words for piano solo, spite of the orchestral echoes of the theme. This movement was performed with the utmost expression and formed an admirable foil to the forcible passages that preceded and succeeded it.

The octave work of the finale and the bravura work of the coda were exciting enough spite of the fact that the lack of intertwining of the forces was still an apparent blemish of the work; such playing was bound to arouse enthusiasm, and at the end a fury of applause burst forth, an ovation that seemed as if it would never cease, a series of more than half-a-dozen recalls. "Boston coldness," which used to nearly freeze the artists to death in the old Harvard Symphony days, is certainly a thing of the remote past.

Now followed the prim and rather square-cut Beethoven symphony in C (No. 1), and sandwiched in between two dashing, heavily scored works, that made its simplicity seem almost quakerish. A Haydn symphony, if ever there was one, a work in which only one glimpse of the later Beethoven appears, in the bold minuet. It was well read, even if rather slowly at times, an error that leaned to virtue's side in such a composition.

The symphony (composed before 1800) belongs to the last century in spirit as well as in contents; had Beethoven died at Schubert's age, the world would never have known of him save as a very talented follower of Haydn!

The slow movement was admirably given, its imitative effects being presented with excellent balance and its coda being shaded to perfection.

The minuet always seems to the present writer as if a giant were tugging at his chains; the formal and periwigged Haydn had admitted the dainty dance as third movement of the regular symphonic form, and therefore everyone who wrote a symphony was obliged to bring in his ¾ dance rhythm whether he felt like it or not. It was very much as if it were made obligatory to introduce a waltz in each cycle form today. Naturally the lemon was squeezed very dry; they tried to evade the ensuing monotony by allowing changes of tempo, and the elegant swing of the dance minuet gave way to a quicker and more capricious tempo, but even with this elasticity there was a frightful sameness of style when the classical minuets began to mount into the hundreds.

Beethoven yielded to the commands of his time and used the minuet, but the people who would caper to that bold movement as here applied, must first achieve St. Vitus dance; it was the freest minuet that had up to that time been composed, freer than the scherzo with which Beethoven replaced the minuet in his second symphony. Another syncopated minuet came in the Fourth Symphony, and in the small Eighth Symphony came the most formal of Beethoven's works in this form, but this minuet of the First Symphony is the earliest indication of the musical reformer that was to come. The finale is Haydn clear through; although a sonata-allegro in form it is the veriest rondo in spirit and character of themes.

That [illegible] with a diatonic scale which forms the introduction to this finale aroused almost as much criticism as the first modulation (to F) in the introduction of the first movement. Tuerck held it to be utterly out of the bounds of symphony and cut it out altogether. So that this symphony has altogether a curious fate, the old pedants holding it to be too bold, the radical moderns criticising it as too formal. The poor bat was cast out from the society of the birds as being too like a mouse, and from the companionship of the mice as being too much like a bird.

The concert ended with fireworks in the shape of Liszt's "Carnival of Pesth," the most bombastic of the Hungarian rhapsodies. The present writer remembers Pesth as a city given over to Turkish baths, Tokay gipsy music and tropical beauties; a city an overwhelming part of whose society dispenses with the formality of letters of introduction. This "Wine, Women and Song" element is present in Liszt's composition; at the very beginning the trumpet fanfares give one the premonition of a coming shipwreck upon a "dissolute island"—a species of oriental Coney Island.

The festivity is well pictured even if one cares little for the portrayal. The harp had some brilliant work which deserves mention and the important work of the violoncello also demands recognition; it was a showy ending of a brilliant concert.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CI., NO. 52.

SUNDAY, FEB. 21, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mme. Carreno Achieves a Most Distinguished Success.

Given Recall After Recall on the Close of Her Exceptionally Artistic Performance—The Liszt Rhapsody, "The Carnival in Pesth," Given for the First Time at These Concerts.

The 16th concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening, the programme being:

Academic Festival overture	Brahms
Concerto, D-minor, for pianoforte	Rubinstein
Symphony, No: 1	Beethoven
Hungarian rhapsody, No. 6	Liszt

The soloist was Mme. Teresa Carreno, who returns hither more stately of presence and more imposing of manner than when she was here last, and, at the same time, a more deep, serious and matured artist, ranking with the best in her art. She played the well known concerto with noble dignity, bringing to bear on it a virility wholly masculine. Both interpretation and performance were of the highest order.

Next to the perfection of technique with which the work was rendered were the fine rhythmic swing that marked the playing of its more vigorous moods, the fire with which the powerful climaxes were worked up to and sustained, and the keen artistic spirit that animated the effort. The slow movement was read with exquisite beauty and in a style that was, above all, keenly intellectual.

The whole performance was that of a really great artist, fully master of her art and strong in her ability to give convincing evidence of it. Her success was overwhelming. Recall after recall followed at the close of the effort, and before it was all over the artist must have been more fatigued by responding to the demands for her reappearance than by her performance of the work.

The only novelty on the programme was the Liszy rhapsody, "The Carnival in Pesth," given for the first time at these concerts. It is the ninth in the set of 15, written by Liszt for the pianoforte, and the sixth of those arranged for the orchestra. It is also, perhaps, the most commonplace, though the most pretentious of the whole. It is brilliantly and difficultly instrumented, but it is fairly open to question if it was worth the trouble taken with it. Nevertheless, Mr. Paur gave an immensely effective reading of it, and the orchestra made but little ceremony in overcoming its difficulties.

It was a relief to hear the Beethoven symphony again, if only as a change from the immense quantity of less lucid modern music that has of late been given here. The work of the orchestra through the entire concert was in its best manner, and the support given by M. Paur to the soloist in the concert was unusually fine.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 4, Brahms; Fantasy for piano and orchestra, Whiting; "Invitation to Dance," Veber-Weingartner; overture, "Alfonso and Estrella," Schubert. The soloist will be Mr. Arthur Whiting.

[87]

Boston Transcript
TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1897.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the sixteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Brahms: Akademische Fest-Ouvertüre, opus 80.
Rubinstein: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor, opus 70.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 1, in C major, opus 21.
Liszt: Hungarian Rhapsody No. 6, "Pesther Carneval."
Mme. Teresa Carreño was the pianist.

Brahms's Academic Overture is a work one does not tire of. In its way, it is a tour de force; but one of those tours de force only to be accomplished by genius; mere musical learning and savoir faire cannot perform such feats. To take a number of students' songs and make them the basis of a coherently developed composition in the overture form may seem simple enough at first sight. But this sort of musical material is really exceedingly difficult to treat in this way. The short popular song is a musical entity so complete in itself that it does not lend itself readily to that dissection and dismemberment which play so important a part in thematic development and working-out; the thematic material of an extended composition is subjected to an almost constant process of change and dissection during the development, and the ear is all too liable to reject this sort of thing as artificial and somehow wrong, when it is applied to a simple, familiar melody. The way Brahms has here given his prime material a genuinely thematic value, by selecting just such phrases as are best fitted to his purpose, and rejecting the others, is simply perfect. The whole composition hangs together as if the material it is based on were of his own invention; it does not in the least give you the impression of patchwork. The composer has established what seems like an elective affinity between the various members of all those simple tunes, and they fall into their several places in the work as if by divine right. The overture was magnificently played.

Of the performance of Beethoven's first symphony we might have much to say in detail, were that worth while. But we prefer to eschew all mention of minor details, and consider it as a whole. We have long been waiting for so brilliant and characteristic an example of a certain musical tendency which is unquestionably the dominant one today. Technically, the performance was conspicuously fine; the orchestra played superbly. The playing was not only accurate and highly finished; it was full of life, vigor of accent, and exquisite effects of light and shade. In a word, it was a performance hors ligne! That Mr. Paur's reading of the work was quite in the modern spirit need hardly be said. In its way, it had the conspicuous merits of totality of conception, the nicest regard for details, and the due subordination of details to the total impression. It was thus a truly artistic and, from one point of view, exhaustive reading of a beautiful work of genius. The way Mr. Paur carried out his intentions left nothing whatever to be desired in point of authority, completeness, and executive skill. It is seldom that one finds an intelligent, comprehensive conception of a composition so admirably carried out at every point. And yet the performance seemed to us to efface the very prime characteristic of the symphony; its direct, naive simplicity. The music did not seem to be allowed to walk its own gait; this persistent playing of every phrase for all it could possibly be argued to be worth seemed sophisticated and at variance with the genial naiveté of the work. There was infinite art, but no artlessness; the music was not allowed to stand before us in puris naturalibus, but was bedecked and bedizened with all sorts of adornments that made it seem something quite different from itself. In short, the performance was a splendid example of the complete realization of an ideal that seems to us irreconcilable with Beethoven's C major symphony.

We mistake if Liszt's "Pesther Carneval," though announced as "first time in Boston," has not been played here once or twice before,—by Mr. Thomas and Mr. Listemann. The work does not sound so brilliant as it looks in the score; a good deal in it is trivial and trivially treated. Liszt has done better, even in his Hungarian Rhapsodies.

Mme. Carreno's playing of Rubinstein's D minor concerto was magnificent from beginning to end. This concerto was the first thing Rubinstein himself played in Boston; had Mme. Carreno played the furious interpolated cadenza in left-hand octaves which he improvised on that occasion,—just after the introductory orchestral ritornello,—and copied his device (also done on the spur of the moment) of suddenly dropping the last phrase of the second theme down an octave lower than it is written, her playing of the first movement would have been like Rubinstein's to the point of illusion. But these two tricks of the great pianist-composer are probably nowhere written down, and must share the fate of all improvisations. Certainly Mme. Carreno, in her playing of this concerto, is the first pianist who has really reminded us of Rubinstein himself. Hers is not only a wondrously fine, coherent and adequate conception of the work, but it is in all important points his conception; it is authentic! One difference is, however, to be noted; Rubinstein played like the most masculine of men; Mme. Carreno plays like a woman through and through. She shows at once a woman's muliebrity and a woman's feminity—to recall a distinction once made by Oliver Wendell Holmes. Though a strong "grand," muscular player, she by no means falls into that class of musical women with whom Saint-Saëns found fault for "ever striving to prove their virility." Her grand strength does not suggest the man; it is the puissant physical means of expression of a distinctly womanly feeling. Her power is as womanly as her passion. Then her feminity! ever and anon, at the close of a phrase, you seem to feel the cat's claw working in its sheath beneath its winsome charm and fascination. The velvet paw gives you a suspicion of its being able to scratch! All this is as it should be, to the manner born; it has the compelling power of unmistakable genuineness. Mme. Carreno has a warmth of passionateness that suggests something very like genius; especially as she expresses all this passion in a musical, artistic way. She makes it do artistic work; she does not merely blow off steam. When a woman shows such perfect self-command, and shows so much self to have command over, we take off our hat in respectful admiration. In a word, Mme. Carreno's playing of this concerto was magnificent in every resepct; it was the work of one who deserves to be recognized—as she is—as a great artist. It was great all through! We are sorry to say that the concerto was very badly accompanied.

The next programme—for Friday afternoon, March 5, and Saturday evening, March 6 (there will be no rehearsal nor concert this week) is: Brahms, symphony No. 4, in E minor; Whiting, Fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra, opus 11; Weber "Aufforderung zum Tanz," scored by Weingärtner (first time in Boston); Schubert, overture to "Alfonso und Estrella." Mr. Arthur Whiting will be the pianist.

PUBLIC LEDGER—
FEBRUARY 23, 1897.

The Boston Symphony Concert—"All the Comforts of a Home," "Little Tycoon," Kellar. "The Cherry Pickers," Etc.

Teresa Carreno, who returned to the Academy last evening, after too long an absence, to figure as the soloist of the fourth Boston Symphony concert, was received with all the honors and distinction due a veritable star. Well she might be, for while this gifted pianiste was heard in but one number (Rubinstein's No. 4 D minor concerto), her work therein sparkled with a musical lustre that well deserved the enthusiastic appreciation of the large house, and which would have sufficed, had she never played here before, to stamp her as an artiste of shining achievement. Perhaps brilliancy will best sum up the many virtues of Carreno's performance, and, although the adjective is so hackneyed and so often misapplied or wasted that one hates to use it, no more appropriate word can be found when bestowed, as in this instance, in its finest sense. There may not, possibly, be depth or passionate expression in the artistic equipment of this pianiste, but, be that as it may, one fact stood out last evening with more prominence, even, than ever before—Carreno is a personage in whom beauty of execution, vigor of style (a vigor characterized, among other things, by boldness of attack) and what might be called vivid color are blended in a fashion at once unusual and delightful. There is, too, a certain masculinity of tone suggesting the touch of Adèle Aus der Ohe, and this feature, which is naturally enough often absent in the feminine player, had admirable illustration in the first movement of the concerto, the moderato in D minor. Here one detected a sureness and digital force eminently in harmony with the requirements of the occasion, and without which the movement would have fallen flat and unprofitable. On the other hand there were no vulgar effects and none of that pounding which occasionally distorts the work of over-zealous executants; all was in excellent taste. In the second movement, the moderato assai in F major, Carreno's art assumed a more sympathetic turn, and it was easy to recognize behind the wealth of technique the intelligence (although hardly the soulfulness) without which the greatest exhibition of virtuosity would be as Dead Sea fruit. The final movement, the allegro in D minor, again emphasized the brilliancy of the performer, and at its close she was several times called before the house with every show of honest enthusiasm. It had been a welcome experience, and the hearers were in the mood for more, but the artiste merely bowed and smiled her thanks, and left behind her a charming memory. It was a memory produced by a curious combination of glitter and force, finesse and power, and it is such a combination that forms the almost paradoxical keynote to Carreno's method. At one moment we are delighted by a fairy-like grace calling to mind the feathery effects of Joseffy and at another we are surprised at a display of virility. Both qualities are grateful, and when they are manifested in the same pianiste, as they were last evening, the result falls more than pleasantly upon the ear.

Apart from the contribution of the soloist, the concert included a worthy presentation of Beethoven's fourth symphony, which resembles nothing so strongly as a gleam of gentle sunshine. It has been said of this work that it is the "happiest and most serene" of the wonderful series, and its illustration under the thoughtful direction of Mr. Paur certainly tended to prove the correctness of this classification. The orchestra played finely throughout, and was also heard in a very pretty excerpt from Goldmark's "Cricket on the Hearth," and Liszt's sixth Hungarian Rhapsody (the "Pesther Carnival"), which was given with considerable color and picturesqueness of spirit. The symphony, wisely enough, was placed first upon the programme, and was enjoyed with all the more zest and freshness in consequence.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle
FEBRUARY 27, 1897

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Performance at the Academy of Music.

The Cossack, who looms on the political horizon, is likewise making himself known in art, and although the fad for Russian books has passed, whatever is of worth in the literature of the czar's empire is accepted and we are discovering a great deal that is strong and fine in the country's pictorial art. In music the Cossack has made himself heard by sheer strength of lung and fist, if in no other way, and last night at the Academy of Music he monopolized more than half the programme. It was a modern bill that Mr. Paur had prepared for this fourth of the season's concerts, for although it led off with a Weber overture, Weber is really a modern, not only in his ideals, but in his manner, and Camille Saint Saens is in all respects a man of our time. The only other composers on the list were Rubinstein and Tschaikowsky, the one represented in his long D minor concerto, the other in his longer F minor symphony—always in minors, these barbarians from the northland. The occasion was heightened in interest because the piano part of the concerto was played by the South American, Teresa Carreno, whose tropic warmth of fancy and passionate energy of execution admirably qualified her for the work. When last seen here Teresa Carreno was a girlish and graceful personality. She had a nearly classic profile, an eye that laughed and a smile that was as warm as her Venezuelan sun. Something of the smile is left, but in her extraordinarily varied career in Europe she has lost the vivacity and grace, has acquired a matronly figure and rather a masculine countenance. But in her art she has ripened surprisingly. She played the Rubinstein concerto almost as Rubinstein himself would have played it. There was the same tremendous physical force or effect of it, the same daring accents and rolling crescendoes, the same marvelous speed and the composer was almost out-Russianized in the savage accellerando that occurs in the first division of the work, where the piano, as if no longer able to endure the trammel of the orchestra, breaks away from it and with chromatic accents in the treble and pounding octaves in the bass rises to a frenetic height of expression. One is reminded of the effect of the Pyrrhic dances and the ancient war songs. Rubinstein was not, it is true, allied to his people in taste and style; he was Teutonic in his preferences and he absurdly copied the Germans in his music, instead of recognizing the wealth of material in the dances and folk songs of his own people, on which to found an artistic music that should be as commandingly original as any; yet the Tartar shows itself, every now and again and no amount of schooling in the severer and accepted forms can hide it. In this concerto it asserts itself and as Carreno plays the piece it stalks defiantly into the open. Yet Rubinstein, when he is most Russian, is but a dim forecast of the school that has begun to flourish in these later years. He founded it, perhaps; at least he taught it to speak, though he probably lived long enough to despair over it when he saw it leaving the smooth ways in which he sought to lead it, and strike out for itself, bold and blatant in its youth and strength. In view of a few things that have been perpetrated in the name of Russian art in our own country, the Fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky is mild and conventional; but it is as Russian as we shall probably care to accept. It was wrongly stated on the bill that this was the first time of its performance here. Some of the music, especially the scherzo, is familiar. This scherzo, played mostly by the violin band, without use of the bow, the musicians picking the strings like those of mandolins, is a curiosity and in its way is a gem. It is one of the few bits of Tartar music in which there seems to be a little sunlight. Melody there is in other parts of the symphony, fragments of folk song and pleasing inventions, but the prevalent tone is gloomy, and it is a curious and unwholesome taste for the gloomy that appears to make the immediate porsperity of this Russian music, as it is accountable also for the dramas of Maeterlinck, Ibsen and Sudermann; and for the increase in suicide. Where action is found it is not joyous action, but rather a recklessness, for northern gaiety is seldom glad. Much of the symphony goes at a reckless gait, in impossible time, with confusing syncopations, and reminds one of the demon rides in the Raff symphonies. Such an ill bred drum, such swearing trombones, such vulgarian cornets, such barbaric bassoons! The finale is a nihilist jubilee. There are human heart beats in this work and moments when the earth is not all made for darkness and misfortune, yet the impression of the whole is that it is the speech of a people who suffer cold, hunger, militarism and misgovernment. The overture at the beginning was "The Euryanthe," played here only a few weeks ago, but played last night with buoyancy and fire. The largo—the episode of the vision—was slightly marred by over accent, since it best suits the mystery of this interpolation to play it as smoothly and softly as possible; but this is a fault to which Mr. Paur has not often been addicted, and he is forgiven. The "Rouet d'Omphale" of Saint-Saens, brisk, sweet, delightful music, with a striking exploit of realism in the hum and whir of the spinning wheel and a humorous use of dialogue between the powerful wind, representing Hercules, and the piping oboe which speaks for Omphale, was fluently and beautifully presented. These, with a dainty performance by Mme. Carreno of Chopin's cradle song, completed the programme.

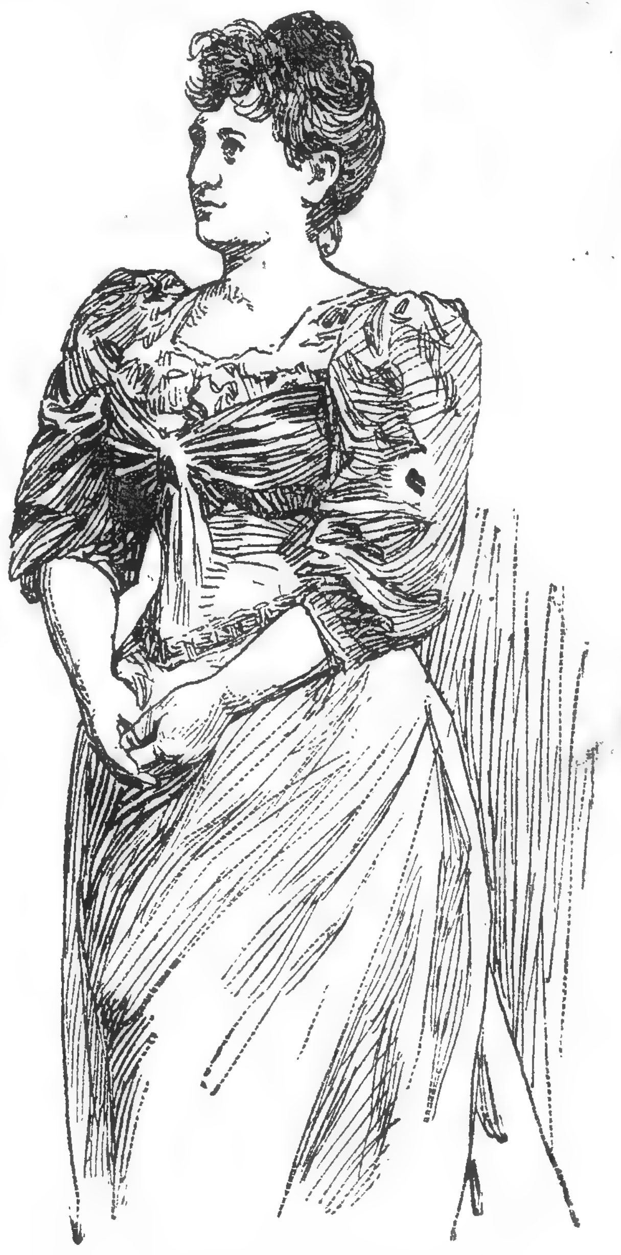
NEW-YORK DAILY TRIBUNE,
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 189

INSTITUTE'S GREAT WEEK.

MUSIC-LOVERS APPEALED TO BY TWO PROGRAMMES.

THE WASHINGTON ANNIVERSARY MEETING, A SERVISS LECTURE AND AN EVENING WITH THE CINEMATOGRAPHE PARTS OF THE SCHEDULE.

This week there are many things planned for the entertainment and instruction of the members of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. It is, in fact, one of the strongest weeks of the season. Perhaps the entertainments which will attract the greatest attention of the week are the concerts by the Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Emil Paur, on Friday evening and Saturday afternoon. Mme. Teresa Carreño is to be the soloist at the symphony concert on Friday evening, and many Brooklynites are looking forward to that concert with particular interest. Mme. Carreño returns to the city after an absence of several years, during which time her popularity as a pianist has in no manner decreased. She played in Chicago not long ago before an audience estimated at 6,000. In the present week she will make a tour of the Eastern cities with the symphony orchestra, appearing at the concert on Friday evening. She will return to Brooklyn for a piano recital in the Academy of Music on the evening of March 11. This recital is the next in the regular course of the Institute, and Mme. Carreño will occupy the entire evening with her programme. It will probably be the last opportunity that Brooklyn music-lovers will have to hear her this season. This is the programme of the Friday evening concert:



MME. TERESA CARRENO.

Overture to "Euryanthe"...........Karl Maria von Weber
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor, Op. 70, Anton Rubinstein
Symphonic Poem, "Omphale's Spinning-wheel," in A major, Op. 31..................Camille Saint-Saëns
Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Op. 36 (first time), Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky

Timothy Adamowski will be the soloist at the afternoon concert of the orchestra on Saturday. Mr. Adamowski shares with Franz Kneisel the place of first violin in Mr. Paur's orchestra, and the Spanish symphony which he will play at the concert is an interesting composition which will give his abilities full opportunity for display. The programme of this concert is the following:

Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, Op. 60....... Ludwig van Beethoven
1. Adagio (B-flat major)........................4-4
   Allegro vivace (B-flat major)...............2-2
2. Adagio (E-flat major)........................3-4
3. Allegro vivace (B-flat major)...............3-4
   Trio: Un poco meno Allegro (B-flat major)..3-4
4. Finale: Allegro ma non troppo (B-flat major), 2-4

Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra, Op. 21, Edouard Lalo
1. Allegro non troppo.
2. Scherzando (Allegro molto).
3. Andante.
4. Rondo (Allegro).

Prelude to Part III of "The Cricket on the Hearth." (First time)............................Karl Goldmark
Overture, "William Tell"........Giachino Antoni Rossini

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give three concerts in Greater New-York this week, two in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, and one in the Metropolitan Opera House on Thursday evening. Programmes are as follows: Brooklyn, Friday evening—Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; concerto, D minor, No. 4, Rubinstein (Mme. Carreño); "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saëns; symphony, F minor, No. 4, Tschaikowsky. Brooklyn, Saturday afternoon—Symphony, No. 4, Beethoven; Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra, Lalo (Mr. T. Adamowski); prelude to Act III, "Cricket on the Hearth," Goldmark; overture, "William Tell," Rossini. New-York, Metropolitan Opera House, Thursday—Symphony, No. 1, Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte, Grieg; prelude to Act III, "Cricket on the Hearth," Goldmark; "Pesther Carnival," Liszt; overture, "William Tell," Rossini. Mme. Carreño will be the solo pianist.

Philadelphia Inquirer

TUESDAY - - - FEBRUARY 23, 1897

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Its Fourth Concert of the Season at the Academy Last Night.

The fourth concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Academy of Music last night. This was the program:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 4, in B flat major.

Rubenstein, Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor.

Karl Goldmark, Prelude to part III of the "Cricket on the Hearth."

Liszt, Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 6, (Pesther Carnival).

The Beethoven Symphony may not rank as high as No. 3, the Eroica, and it has not the dramatic quality of its follower, but for gentleness, placidity of movement and yet elaborate working out of the dominant themes, it is marvelously beautiful and it could not possibly have had a more delicate interpretation than that which was bestowed upon it last night. The work of the strings, especially in the first movement, was of the richest character, and with the embroidery that was given to the tone-picture by the wood winds, the pleasure to the ear was complete. The answering calls of the instruments in the second movement, the manner in which the strings take up the last figure of the flute and the dialogue between clarinet and bassoons accompanied by the strings, produced in the hands of the players a feeling of quiet and unrestrained joyousness, and in the finale the dexterity and swiftness of the strings made itself manifest. As for the Goldmark number it showed an utter lack of originality of treatment. Saving a simple ballad theme at the opening with a certain tenderness, all was commonplace and the contra dance theme at the close, although brisk and merry, never rose above mediocrity. To ask an orchestra like that of last night to play such an ordinary composition is like putting Hercules to the distaff. It was, however, played with spirit and skill. The Liszt rhapsody is too well known to piano players to need comment. It is the most popular and picturesque of the composer's fifteen compositions of that character, and was, therefore, welcomed effusively.

Mme. Teresa Carreno was the soloist. She selected for this her first appearance in Philadelphia for a number of years the Rubinstein concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra, and it served to display to the full her vigor and brilliancy, dash and daring impetuosity, highly organized technic and warm temperament, as also her complete sympathy with the broad, sweeping strength of the composer. To each of the three movements she imparted rich and lustrous style and deep significance. She showed in the first movement great fondness for the tempo rubato, and this, together with her technical fearlessness and unerring judgment, helped to strengthen her individualism. She approached her playing with a large heart and a broad mind, and in all that she did there were splendid clearness and exactitude and a dazzling alternation of limpid, crystalline agility and marvelous dramatic force. She entered into the spirit of the second movement with the touch and feeling of the true artist. While it may be said that she did not bestow upon it the sentiment which some other great players have done, yet the atmosphere with which she surrounded it was pure and strongly emotional, the familiar theme pulsated with new vitality and the tone-color, rhythm and nuances were absolutely flawless. No such illustration of captivating grace, sonority, breadth and repose has been witnessed in this city for years.

The Times

TEN PAGES

PHILADELPHIA, FEBRUARY 23, 1897.

CARRENO IN CONCERT

The South American Pianist Aroused Great Enthusiasm With the Boston Orchestra.

The feature of last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the reappearance of Teresa Carreno, after an absence of several years. Though she was remembered as a pianist of distinction, her performance of the D minor concerto of Rubinstein was a surprise and a delight. It manifested all the qualities of great piano-playing—a broad intellectual grasp, warm feeling, poetic sentiment; an absolute facility of execution, with extraordinary power and a not less unusual refinement, and a solid sincerity and clearness of expression altogether wholesome and inspiring. The composition is one of the most beautiful of its class, with a very wide range both of emotional and of technical character, and it is impossible to say that Madame Carreno played one part less completely than another, the gorgeous opening, the tenderly melodious movement that follows or the rich and brilliant finale. Her style is large and fine, rich in color and always bright and clean, and her impression upon the audience was of the most genuine kind, stirring them deeply by no personal display, but by the legitimate power of musical expression.

Before the concerto Mr. Paur gave an elaborate "reading" of the fourth symphony in B flat major, in which the great music at times escaped from his analytical repression and brought back the memory of Beethoven. The latter part of the programme contained two novelties, the prelude to the third act of Goldmark's opera, "The Cricket on the Hearth," a very sprightly and good-humored bit, with lots of movement and color, and one of the unfamiliar Hungarian Rhapsodies of Liszt, the Pesther Carnival, a rushing, noisy, fascinating dissipation, astoundingly well played.

WASHINGTON POST

FEBRUARY 24, 1897.

CARRENO'S GREAT TRIUMPH

Her Wonderful Work at the Boston Symphony Concert.

The Occasion Was Altogether a Remarkable Combination of Fine Music Rendered Without a Flaw—A Magnificent Audience.

A musical scheme which began with the majestic chords of the fourth symphony of Beethoven, one of the most beautiful compositions ever penned, and ended with the wild and furious czardas of the gypsy bands of Hungary, as crystallized by Liszt, was indeed most catholic. Yet the programme which Conductor Paur presented at the Columbia Theater last night to an audience which not only filled all the seats but tested to the utmost all the standing room, was more than merely versatile. It presented at least two noble compositions and concluded with two numbers, which, although lighter in form, were nevertheless classics of their style. In fact, the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night was the finest which has been given this season and it would be difficult to see it excelled at any time.

The occasion was notable, first of all, for the return of Mme. Teresa Carreno. It has been some time since this wonderfully gifted artist has been heard here, but it is pleasant to record that the passing years have not dimmed the fire of her soul nor marred the brilliancy of her technique. She was in her element when she essayed the fourth concerto of Rubinstein. Its technical difficulties and its complicated rhythm she mastered with consummate ease, and she gave to its arpeggio passages a smoothness and at the same time a brilliancy which captivated the ear. Her broad intelligence, as well as her great skill proclaimed her still the greatest artiste of her day and generation. Above all, she played with that peculiar force which might best be termed masculine. The tonal quality of each note was something to be heard and not described. All that was crystalline, all that was resonant, all that was musically sonorous, was in the sound that came forth in obedience to her unerring, confident touch. The cadenza in the first movement was in its tempo, as well as in its interpretation a remarkable bit of work, but this was only a single incident in a performance which stood out as a masterly effort. It was no wonder that when she had concluded the applause was deafening, and when at the fourth or fifth recall she consented to play an encore, she showed that she could enter into the soul of Chopin, a something which she must have learned of late. There was a time when Carreno could not play Chopin, but certainly last night there was no lack of delicacy and of appreciation in the poetic nocturne which she so exquisitely rendered.

As for the work of the orchestra, it seemed fairly to surpass itself. Beethoven was in glorious mood when he wrote the fourth symphony, and the orchestra was in glorious mood when it interpreted the work last night. The sensuous first movement was given with ardent spirit, while the solemn adagio, the lively allegro, and the joyous finale each received a reading which was as sympathetic and as lucid as one could wish. The work of the strings was especially noticeable, nor in all justice can one refrain from praising the work of the solo flutist. Karl Goldmark's prelude to part 3 of "The Cricket on the Hearth," and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 6, known as the Pesth Carnival, were each given with an abandon that swept all before it. In its ensemble work the orchestra was simply beyond criticism. Altogether, the concert was one long to be remembered and was worthy of the brilliant audience which assembled, as the latter was worthy of it.

The New York Press

DAILY EDITION.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1897.

MME. CARRENO WINS LAURELS

Audience Recalls Her Six Times at the Symphony Concert.

Mme. Teresa Carreno, the accomplished pianist, was the soloist at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Metropolitan Opera House, and evoked extraordinary enthusiasm, being called out no less than six times after a remarkably spirited and brilliant performance of Grieg's concerto in A minor. Finally she had to play again in response to the unwearied applause.

This admirable band of players, under Mr. Paur's leadership, was at its best, and gave a careful and sympathetic performance of Beethoven's symphony in C, No. 1, op. 21, which was the opening number. The prelude to the third part of Karl Goldmark's opera, "The Cricket on the Hearth," was played for the first time. This opera had its first performance in Vienna last March. The prelude is a fascinating bit of music, ending with a sprightly contra-dance theme, which is worked up with surprising effect. Liszt's "Sixth Hungarian Rhapsody" ("Pesther Carnival") was played also for the first time. The last number was the overture to "William Tell."

The Philadelphia Press.

PUBLISHED DAILY AND WEEKLY.

THE PRESS COMPANY, LIMITED,
PUBLISHERS,
SEVENTH AND CHESTNUT STREETS,
PHILADELPHIA.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Delightfully Rendered Programme Given With Madame Carreno as Soloist.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the Academy of Music was by far the best of this season, taking it as a whole, even if one does not lay too much stress on the individual success of Madame Carreno, whose playing would redeem any programme, no matter how arranged. There was in the arrangement such a balance that the interest of the evening was worked up to a lively Rubenstein climax, to an anti-climax through Beethoven to Liszt. Mr. Paur wisely gave the symphony, Beethoven's No. 4 in B-flat major, the leading place on the programme. More than most compositions of the great master, the fourth symphony seems to have been written to prove that the orchestra can "sigh like a zephyr and strike like the thunderbolt," for such are the contrasts noted all through the four movements. And, moreover, there is such a constant call for the various choirs to lend their subtle colors to the effect that the mind carries away nothing but the most delightful impressions of light and shade and varied musical tonal beauties. All these involved effects were most deliciously brought out by the orchestra and the softest phrases were no less decided than the full orchestra at its loudest.

This beauty of contrast, which was the keynote of the symphony's interpretation, was a notable feature of the impressive rendering the fourth piano concerto of Rubinstein in D minor received at the hands of Madame Carreno. A "wunder-kind" at 10, Madame Carreno's many years of musical experience as a musical artist of varied abilities—what has she not done, and done well?—have ripened her art until today she stands among the first pianists of the world. And, of all things, in conquering technique she has conquered sex, so that her playing stands absolutely as pure art and calls for no reservations as to femininity in touch or manner.

The concerto is a composition that requires strength as well as knowledge, technique and sentiment, and Madame Carreno failed in none of these points. Her brilliant handling of the composition was fully recognized. In the first movement, a tense, fierce, masculine touch was made evident in the forceful passion of her handling of the cadenzas, the coda of the first movement closing in superb style. But in this movement, though particularly in the second "moderato assai," her power of soft and subtle poetic and smoothly flowing treatment was equally in evidence, the delicate touch of the closing phrases of the second movement being in fine contrast to the sinewy control that marked her forte passages in the first. Force and clearness and a singing beauty alternated in all her work and the concerto stood out as a thing apart in the evening work.

The concluding numbers were well suited for an after-climax. Goldmark's prelude to Part III of the "Cricket on the Hearth," with a folk-song choral effect and a very lively dance movement, worked out in fine fury by the orchestra, led the way to a characteristic and altogether pleasing rendition of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 6. This brilliant rhapsody, with its lilt and swing, showed the orchestra at its best, and made a fitting ending for an enjoyable concert.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1897.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

After last night's concert at the Metropolitan Opera House by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it seems safe to say to the music-lovers of New-York that if they are very good M. Paur may in time play the "Masaniello" overture for them. He swung himself almost up to that exalted level last night, and in doing so labored with a zeal which challenged hearty enthusiasm from all but the sceptics. Out of deference to the two numbers of the programme, or at least their composers, they must be disposed of before the rest of the programme is even mentioned. They were Beethoven's first symphony and Grieg's pianoforte concerto. There was enough Viennese snap and incisiveness in the performance of the symphony, possibly, to extenuate its introduction into a symphonic scheme in the metropolis toward the close of a season, and Mme. Carreño made the somewhat shallow concerto a delight. But what can be said for a concert aspiring to such dignity as it is not only the privilege but the duty of the Boston Orchestra to maintain, when it is added that the rest of the programme consisted of the prelude to Act III of Goldmark's "Heimchen am Herd" (for some time a back number on the programmes of our "Sunday Pops"), Liszt's "Pesther Carnaval" (certainly one of the weakest of the great transcriber's Hungarian rhapsodies), and the overture to "William Tell"? It would be generous to conclude that Mr. Paur was joking; but his joke would have been fairer when his audiences were smaller—that is, at the beginning of the season. Mme. Carreño played superbly and awakened much enthusiasm. Only in part did she satisfy the expressed desire for more by a brilliant performance of Chopin's G-flat major Etude.

The New York Times

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, FEB. 26, 1897.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Programme of Light Music and Mme. Carreno as Soloist.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in the Metropolitan Opera House last night. The audience was the largest which the orchestra has enjoyed this Winter, and there was room for doubt as to whether this was caused by the attractive powers of the soloist, Mme. Teresa Carreno, or the extreme lightness of the programme. It is seldom that so much light music is heard in one evening outside of a Sunday night concert. M. Paur will certainly have to give us a good deal of roast beef next time, for last night he fed us on sweets and jellies. The programme consisted of Beethoven's first symphony, the Grieg piano concerto, the prelude to Part III. of Goldmark's "Cricket on the Hearth," Liszt's "Pester Carnival" rhapsodies, and Rossini's "William Tell" overture. Surely those who are fond of candy had a delightful time last night.

Of course it would be heresy to say anything derogatory to Beethoven's first symphony, and indeed there is nothing to say against it except that it does not represent fully the genius of its maker. It belongs to the childhood of his creative powers, and it is so full of reminiscences of Haydn and Mozart in thought, style, and instrumentation that one must have educated himself up to a high enjoyment of simplicity in order to appreciate it. It is not possible, for instance, for a hearer of to-day to put his mind in the condition of those to which the first hearing of that remarkable minuet—a true scherzo—came as a revelation. It was remarkable in 1800; it is boyish in its clearness and ingenuousness to-day. Yet it is the one part of the symphony in which the future Beethoven speaks. No other hand than his could have written the trio, and it is not difficult for the student of musical history to understand the effect it made in the Burg Theater of Vienna on that memorable April 2 of ninety-seven years ago. The symphony was admirably played, and the clear and restful slow movement stirred the audience to enthusiasm.

Goldmark's prelude, heard in this city for the second time, is a very feeble attempt to follow the lead of Engelbert Humperdinck. The themes are made up of fragments of German folk song, and the treatment is much the same as that of similar themes in "Hansel und Gretel." As for Liszt's "Pesther Carnival," it is a good orchestral show piece, and it gave the gentlemen of Boston ample opportunity for a display of that virtuosity for which they are renowned. They played it brilliantly. The true soloist at the concerts of this organization is the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mme. Carreno was in fine spirits, and played the Grieg concerto with magnificent dash and power. Her octave and chord passages were splendid, but one could not help wishing for a little more tenderness here and there, although it was noticeable that the pianist paid more attention to her tone color and her pedaling in cantabile parts last night than she sometimes does. But, on the whole, Mme. Carreno's playing is aggressive, rather than wooing. In response to an imperative demand, she added to the programme Chopin's G flat major study, commonly known as the "Butterfly Etude." In her hands, however, the butterfly tries to be an eagle, and the result is not wholly enjoyable.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1897.

The Fourth Boston Symphony Concert.

It seems difficult to believe that there actually exist men and women to-day—and not old ones, either—who remember the time when a Beethoven symphony was looked upon as a ponderous work and difficult of ready assimilation. Many such people doubtless were present last night at the Metropolitan when the Boston symphony orchestra played the great master's familiar first symphony to open the fourth concert, but regarded in the light of modern development Beethoven's music seemed to them like the innocent, ingenuous expression of a youth or maiden having as yet no experience of the strainings and strivings of present day life. Yet it would be a pity if a taste for the more highly wrought music of the present should rob us of an appreciative love for past simplicity, and it is pleasant to note that the symphony, played with wonderful delicacy and precision, if perhaps a trifle coolly, afforded the audience palpable pleasure and roused its warm applause.

There were two pieces on the programme new to Metropolitan concert-goers—a prelude from Goldmark's "Cricket on the Hearth," and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 6 (Pesther Carneval). The first of these opened with some strains reminiscent of the "Queen of Sheba" and then dashed into a succession of evident folk-song and dance-motifs of an airy liveliness that seemed quite to startle the classically inclined listeners. The virtuosity of the Boston men was splendidly displayed in the finale of the Goldmark prelude, which was taken at almost breakneck speed, and also in the Liszt piece, which differs only in details from the other rhapsodies proceeding from that composer's fitful and feverish pen. It is a trifle more spasmodic than some of the others and really less satisfying than the more familiar ones.

The final piece on the list was the "William Tell" overture, which received an interpretation that surely must have delighted the shade of Rossini were it perchance present to listen. It made a magnificent closing to an unusually enjoyable concert. Mme. Carreno was the soloist, and in Grieg's A-minor concerto she displayed her fine musical instinct, her dramatic force, magnetism and daring brilliancy of technique to the fullest advantage, rousing her hearers at the conclusion of the last movement to unrestrained enthusiasm. Mme. Carreno was recalled again and again, the audience refusing to release her without an encore, to which she at last responded by playing Chopin's G flat étude in her own delicious and inimitable manner.

The orchestra covered itself with glory in its portion of the Grieg concerto, playing with such beautiful tone and perfection of taste that one experienced a vivid desire to become a soloist of some description just for the mere pleasure of being thus accompanied.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1897.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Fourth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The salient feature of the very admirable and enjoyable concert given at the Academy of Music last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra before the usual crowded and brilliant audience was the superb performance by Mme. Teresa Carreno, of Rubinstein's pianforte concerto in D minor. Doubtless many of the older concert-goers present had pleasant memories of Mme. Carreno, whom they recalled as a pianist with a brilliant technique and a good deal of temperament. But however enjoyable may have been their recollection of good work done eight or ten years ago, they could hardly have been prepared for what was to come.

The degree to which Mme. Carreno's powers have ripened and broadened and deepened and matured during the interval which has elapsed since she was heard here last is something quite extraordinary. Every promise of her earlier years has been more than fulfilled, and from a brilliant executant standing level with many others she has developed into one of the three or four great artists of the world. Her interpretation of the concerto, of whose enormous difficulties she seemed to make no account, was to the last degree impressive and convincing. It was such an interpretation as Rubinstein would have applauded; such as he himself might have given an interpretation full of fire and force and passion, sweeping the keyboard with an easy and triumphant mastery, glowing with emotion, luminous with intelligence, ardent tumultuous, titanic and intense.

No such pianofore playing as that has been heard in Philadelphia for years, and this is said without forgetting the wonderful performance of Adele Aus der Ohe, upon the occasion of Tschaikowsky's visit to this city, when she played that composer's tremendous fourth pianoforte concerto from the manuscript, and broke her health in the effort which it cost her. As for that gentle genius M. Ignace Paderewski he is in quite another and a different class. Mme. Carreno is a pianist of the order of Rubinstein and Liszt, a pianist who thrills no less than charms; and as of such pianists there has of late years been a dearth, Mme. Carreno took the surprised and delighted house by storm, and was many times recalled.

The orchestral programme comprised Beethoven's fourth symphony, of which a rather pallid but unexceptionably polished and lucid rendering was given, Liszt's sensuous and many-colored "Pesther Carnival" rhapsody, and an intermezzo from Goldmark's opera, "The Cricket on the Hearth," a light, bright, melodious and significant piece of writing, obvious without being commonplace, which made a good impression. The date of the next and last concert is March 22.

THE RECORD

Philadelphia, February 23, 1897.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening was rendered notable by the Philadelphia readvent of Mme. Teresa Carreno, the Venezuelan pianiste. The welcome extended to her could not have been heartier, even had the lion of the evening been the chrysanthemum-locked Paderewski himself. And certainly this energetic mistress of the black and white keys well earned her ovation by her vigorous execution of the difficult Rubinstein concerto in D minor, op. 70. In her style Mme. Carreno has ceased to be quite so aggressively brilliant as of yore, but in solid management of the most heavy fingering she must be admitted to have really improved. There was, too, an echo of her old-time verve in her triumphant handling of the ornamental octaves of the first movement and in her spirited working up of the finale. As for the orchestra itself, the highest praise must again be accorded to its rendering of one of Beethoven's Immortal Nine. Herr Emil Paur is steadily improving in his interpretation of symphonic music, and, while his treatment of the third movement of the Fourth Symphony last night was slightly fantastic at times, nevertheless the entire composition was superbly given. Two delightful novelties of the concert were Liszt's "Pesther Caneval" Rhapsody, and the prelude to Part III of Karl Goldmark's new opera, "The Cricket on the Hearth." The curious orchestration of the former number was as striking as the thematic contrasts of the Goldmark prelude, which started off in unusually quiet coloring for that composer, but blossomed out at the end in his unmistakably unique style. The melodies were most charming in this little morceau, and it only increased the hope that American opera-goers may next season be enabled to hear this highly-successful opera. It has scored the success of the season at Berlin, having been given 32 times. The fifth and concluding Boston Symphony concert will take place on March 2 next.

The Morning Advertiser.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1897.

ITS FOURTH CONCERT.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Interesting Programme Successfully Rendered at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Conductor Emil Paur, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose fourth concert was given in the Metropolitan Opera House last night, compiled a programme for the occasion that really sounded better than it looked. Fancy the first symphony of Beethoven being jostled by the piano concerto of Grieg, this followed by some Goldmark, then the Pesther Carnival of Liszt, and—ye shades of Wagner—the "William Tell" overture! The scheme was entirely a successful one, for the Haydn-like melodies of the C major symphony were capitally offset by the A minor concerto with its piquant northern harmonies, and then came the keys of B flat and D major tonal parallelisms, topping off effectively with the Rossini overture.

Teresa Carreno was the solo pianist, and she has never played here so brilliantly and genially. Of course, one can never forget the ideal performance of Grieg's masterpiece in miniature, this same concerto, every bar of which is perfumed with the Norwegian air. This ideal performance was from the hands of a very remarkable and hardly appreciated pianist and composer named Edmund Neupert, to whom the score is dedicated, and who had much to do with the making of the cadenza in the first movement. Neupert got more out of the work than Carreno, but she lacked nothing in vigor, fire, dash and charm. The middle movement was played with more breadth than sweetness, but the last movement, before which Mr. Paur made an unjustifiable pause, was taken at a break-neck pace, and with exceeding clarity. The finale, where the key and the rhythm both change, was masterfully delivered. The piano fairly dominated the orchestra.

Carreno was called out a half dozen times before she would play; but at last she went to the keyboard and gave us Chopin's "Butterfly" study in G flat, and gave it with great velocity and vim.

The Goldmark number was the prelude to part three of his new and successful opera, "The Cricket on the Hearth." It did not by any means prove remarkable, the finale in particular smelling very strongly of "Zampa." It was played so deftly, with such swing and buoyancy, that it made an excellent impression. Fortunately for the work itself, this prelude, despite its popular tang, is by no means representative of the general worth of the score.

I suppose Goldmark said to himself, "If Humperdinck can get a big success with folks tunes, why can't I?" So he set Dickens' story to music, and he made a hit, too. To me the music sounded more as if an Italian renascence might be looked for than any further exploration of the treasures of old German melodies.

The "Tell" overture, Herr Schroeder playing the 'cello solo nobly, was altogether a success, and so was Liszt's stirring carnival, which sounded as if it might have been written for the late millennial Magyar celebration at Budapest. It was altogether a more brilliant commentary than Richard Harding Davis' in a well known monthly. But then no American can ever comprehend the bewildering Hungarian nation!

The audience was the largest of the season. Carreno is always a magnet. J. H.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK. FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1897.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mme. Carreno was the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Metropolitan Opera House last night. She played Grieg's A minor concerto for the piano in a style that confirmed the good opinions created by her previous work here this season. Her delivery of the finale movement was a brilliant exhibition of virtuosity, which evoked deserved and hearty applause.

The orchestral numbers, all of which were rendered in the musicianly manner for which Mr. Paur's instrumentalists are famous, included the familiar Beethoven Symphony No. 1, in C major; hackneyed "William Tell" overture, Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 6, the "Pesther Carneval" and the prelude to the third part of Goldmark's "The Cricket on the Hearth."

The latter two numbers had their first hearing here from this orchestra. The Liszt composition, which is a fair type of programme music, is full of local color and was played with delightful verve and dash. The Goldmark prelude, with its ingenious and graceful treatment of old fashioned folk songs, was a pleasing intermezzo and a grateful contrast to the rest of the programme.

The World

ed by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PAR
New York.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1897.

OVATION TO CARRENO.

Fair Pianist Wins Great Applause at the Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The audiences at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are steadily growing in size. Last night, at the fourth concert, the Metropolitan Opera-House had its seats and boxes filled, and the upper galleries had their quota of genuine music lovers. The fact that Teresa Carreno was to be the soloist drew many persons, for the fair pianist has been duplicating this season the success of her former tours, but the players from Boston have now an established clientele of enthusiastic supporters in this city.

Mme. Carreno played Grieg's concerto in A minor — a fascinating work with themes of rare beauty, superb combinations and contrasts, well-balanced relations between the piano forte and the orchestra, florid passages and brilliant cadenzas, characteristic rhythms and an uninterrupted flow of originality. She played it with extraordinary spirit, with stupendous fluency, broadly, authoritatively and with contagious enthusiasm. In the majestic finale she dashed across the piano in waves of octaves and torrents of arpeggi. She was rewarded with an ovation by the audience.

The orchestral part of this concerto was delightfully played—especially the adagio, with its development by the muted strings.

In its performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 1, in C major, Mr. Paur's men were not at their best. The reading of the first movement was jerky, full of abrupt emphases and lacking in thoughtful repose. The other movements were formed far more satisfactorily.

The Prelude to Part III. of Goldmark's "Cricket on the Hearth"—a clean and literal piece of music—was played with chrystalline clearness and delightful symmetry. The Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody (Pesther Carnival) was brilliantly executed.

Mr. Paur saw fit to end the concert with the overture to Rossini's "William Tell"—a work which ought not to figure on the programme of a master organization visiting us but four or five times a year. It served the egotistical purpose of illustrating the orchestra's virtuosity—the rich tone and delicious cantabile of Mr. Schroeder's 'cello playing, the tonal purity of the flute and English horn players and the mechanical precision of the whole orchestra in presto passages.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1897.

Teresa Carreño made her reappearance in Boston last night at the sixteenth Symphony concert in Music Hall.

In this same hall she made her début as an infant phenomenon January 2, 1863. Mathilde Phillipps assisted her. The child pianist played a nocturne by Döhler, a piece by Gottschalk, Thalberg's Norma fantasie, &c.

Mr. J. S. Dwight described her as "a child of nine years with fine head and face, full of intelligence, Spanish looking." She had "a funny deal of difficulty in getting herself upon the seat before the grand piano." Her playing "would charm even if she was not a child."

She played in Chickering Hall January 15, 1863.

Mr. Dwight in admiration spoke wise words of counsel: "The child's face beams with intelligence and genius. These speak, too, in her touch, in a certain untaught life that there is in her playing. It is a precious gift. O, treat it reverently and tenderly; educate it, save it, and not let the temptation of dazzling success or gain exhaust it ere its prime!" And again: "There can be no doubt of real talent here; may it only have wise training, and not be early wasted before publics! It is too precious for continual exposure. Such gifts are of God, and ought not to be prostituted for mere gain."

Her first reappearance here after her European tour was in a concert company in September, 1872, with Mario, Carlotta Patti, Cary, Ronconi, Sauret. Mr. Dwight then described her as "a tall and beautiful young lady."

She sang the part of Zerlina in Don Giovanni at the Boston Theatre in March, 1876. Titiens, Beaumont, Orlandini, Barili and Brignoli were the other chief singers.

Her first appearance at a Boston Symphony concert was October 29, 1887, when she played Chopin's E minor concerto. This was her sole appearance at these concerts before last night.

As she will give two recitals here, allow me to wait before speaking at length of the playing of this wondrous woman. I now repeat here what I said in the Boston Journal this morning:

The program of the sixteenth Symphony concert, given in Music Hall last night, Emil Paur conductor, was as follows:

Academic Festival Overture	Brahms
Concerto for Piano, No. 4, in D minor	Rubinstein
Symphony No. 1, in C major	Beethoven
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 6, The Carnival in Pesth	Liszt

The chief interest was in the reappearance of Mrs. Carreño, who, since her début here in 1863, has, like Ulysses, seen many cities and men.

The reports that have crossed the Atlantic may no longer be reckoned extravagant. Mrs. Carreño is a great pianist; a very great pianist. She has gained immeasurably in breadth, dignity and deep musical intelligence. She was always a passionate creature, and she was at times demoniacal in her performance; but in earlier years she often seemed to miss the composer's real purpose; she did not always think behind the printed page.

However unpleasant her association with d'Albert may have been—and it seems incredible that such a stately, superbly sensuous woman should have thrown her handkerchief to the gnome-like d'Albert—she undoubtedly learned much from him of the higher art of piano playing. She might well have taught him passion; he, on the other hand, knew a dignity and a serenity in performance that she did well to study.

Her choice of the concerto last night was wise; for this work of Rubinstein is not only one of his greatest achievements—in that the high level is steadily maintained—but it is one of the greatest of concertos. There is little or nothing that you would have changed. The themes are expressive, often beautiful; the development is generally masterly; the orchestration is effective without extravagance—notice, for instance, the skillful use of the solo trumpet, the manner in which the solo horn and solo clarinet are employed—and the concerto as a whole has an invigorating and noble atmosphere. In this work an accomplished pianist can move, thrill, suggest, startle.

Too much cannot be said of Mrs. Carreño's performance. It was heroic, with haunting episodes of tenderness. From the standpoint of him who merely watches technic with a powerful field glass it was amazing in its perfection; to him who is not dazzled by mere technical display it was soul-satisfying. The woman was a part of the concerto; the concerto was her voice. There was then an apparition of glorified sex, splendid in beauty, caressing in appeal, irresistible in passion, still more dangerous in languor. There was a realization of the woman in the Oriental rhapsody: "She that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners."

No wonder that the spontaneity, the strength, the grandeur of the performance excited most hearty and long continued applause.

* * *

The dry overture of Brahms was dryly read, and it was played in perfunctory yet none too precise fashion. The symphony—would that Mr. Paur had omitted the first and third movements—was played delightfully, with marked finish. So, too, the accompaniment to the concerto was played con amore.

* * *

It seems hardly possible that the rhapsody by Liszt was heard in Boston last night for the first time. The program book is not always to be trusted in these matters, and this music of Liszt is so inherently vulgar and bombastic that it must have appealed to some wandering, visiting conductor. Neither the body of this music nor its orchestral dress is worthy of serious attention.

Boston Symphony Concert.—Mme. Teresa Carreño will play Grieg's A minor concerto at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Metropolitan Opera House Thursday evening. The orchestral numbers on the program will be Beethoven's Symphony in C, No. 1; the prelude to the third act of Goldmarck's Cricket on the Hearth, Liszt's Pesther Carneval, and the William Tell overture.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SIXTEENTH SEASON, 1896-7.

FEBRUARY ITINERARY AFTER THIS DATE.

Concert Music Hall, Mount Royal avenue and Cathedral street, Baltimore, Wednesday, February 24, at 8 P. M.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. RR., Wednesday, February 24, at midnight.
Arrive New York, depot Central RR. of N. J., Thursday, February 25, at 7 A. M.
New York Address, Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square.
Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, at 8 P. M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, February 26, at 8 P. M.
Concert (Matinée) at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, February 27, at 3 P. M.
Leave New York, Grand Central Depot, Saturday, February 27, at midnight.
Arrive Boston Sunday, February 28, at 7 A. M. Providence Depot.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

SATURDAY, February 20, 1897.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 3, 1897.

The program of the Boston Symphony concert, February 6, included Tod und Verklärung, by Richard Strauss, and Liszt's Scene in the Tavern (Mephisto waltz).

I am told that Mr. H. L. Higginson, Patronus Magnificus, likewise Patronus Superbus, wrote a letter to Mr. Paur after this concert, protesting vigorously against such "höllenmusik," as he deigned graciously to call it. I hope this rumor is not true. When Mr. Higginson hires a conductor, he should have full confidence in him, and avoid influencing in any way the character of the programs.

Should the musical public of Boston be debarred from hearing works new to them because Mr. Higginson may not like them? I hope Mr. Paur has a stiff backbone and will make his own programs until his contract expires. I do not regard Mr. Paur as very fortunate in his program making. But there is a principle at stake. A conductor should have full charge. Music committees should be confined to churches, to chasten the organist and give the congregation material for grumbling.

Boston Symphony Concert.

THE fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Metropolitan Opera House last Thursday evening. This was the program:

Symphony No. 1, C major, op. 21	Ludwig van Beethoven
Concerto for piano, A minor, op. 16	Edvard Hagerup Grieg
Prelude to Part III. of The Cricket on the Hearth (First time.)	Karl Goldmark
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 6 (Pesther Carneval) (First time).	Franz Liszt
Overture, William Tell	Giachimo Antonio Rossini

This unusual scheme really was more entertaining than one could imagine, and the somewhat antique flavor of the first and last numbers was relieved by the modern coloring of Grieg, Goldmark and Liszt. Were it not for the menuetto the first symphony of Beethoven would be a mere collocation of echoes from Mozart and Haydn. In its extreme simplicity lie its interest and power. The young giant began where the others left off, and, with the ease born of genius, bore on his broad shoulders the polyphonic burdens imposed by his predecessors. The work was read with great clarity and smoothness by Mr. Paur.

The Goldmark prelude—not new to us—is not an inspiring bit of writing. It is melodious, the melody at the close suggesting Zampa, and it appears to be an ingenious attempt to follow in the path first "blazed" by Humperdinck, the setting of simple folk tunes in an elaborate harmonic frame. The composer of Hänsel und Gretel still holds his own.

This, like the Liszt number, was brilliantly executed by the orchestra, which seemed in a particularly happy and elastic condition. The Tell overture was a bold stroke on the part of Mr. Paur. It is really a classic composition, despite its banal storm episode. That it was agreeably played we not need say. The 'cello solo of Mr. Schroeder was beautifully sonorous, and the flutist covered himself with glory. The finale was quite sensational.

Teresa Carreño, the solo pianist of the evening, was in one of her most dashing and lovable moods. She played Grieg's characteristic and charming work with great vigor, power and delicacy. We liked best the first and last movements, the adagio lacking somewhat on the poetic side. The accompaniment to this movement was given with the utmost tenderness and with a tone quality that was bewitching. Madame Carreño made a stormy and exciting climax in the cadenza of the first movement, and in the final chord passages at the end of the concerto her instrument rang out with orchestral power. She was recalled a half dozen times and finally responded with Chopin's G flat study, The Butterfly, from his op. 25.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 6, 1897.

Sixteenth Symphony Concert.

Rich indeed! The solo attraction was Teresa Carreno, whom some consider the finest living woman pianist. She played superbly Rubinstein's Fourth Concerto in D minor, op. 70; and was recalled again and again, though resolutely refusing to play a second time. Not many pianists can combine so much expression with scientific digital gymnastics.

The orchestral work was equally beautiful. No need to speak of the First Beethoven Symphony; nor the Overture Academic, wherewith Brahms won his Breslau degree of Doctor of Philosophy. How could such a work as Beethoven's ever have been condemned.

The absolute novelty here was the Liszt orchestral version of his Sixth Hungarian Rhapsody, the Pesth Carnival, a composition raising a melody-lover into ecstatic enjoyment, so full is it of bizarre effects and folklore.

Readers of the Transcript that night were startled to find Madame Carreno's name heading the column of Recent Deaths; but it was only a complimentary paragraph misplaced. Think of that woman as thrice a wife and four times a mother!

February Facts.

The fifteenth Symphony Concert might be dubbed a ballet affair. Ballet music from Carmen; ballet music in Beethoven's overture, Men of Prometheus; and much like dance music in Tschaikowsky's Second Symphony, C minor, op. 17; while the Brahms violin Concerto in D, op. 77, with cadenza by C. M. Loeffler, magnificently played by Mr. Kneisel, lies in the same vivacious line. A thoroughly delightful week, and a relief from the depth of a Wagner operatic week.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 7, 1897.

Arthur Whiting, the Soloist, at Symphony Concert.

Mr Arthur Whiting was the soloist at the 17th symphony concert, the program of which comprised Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala," Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, Schubert's overture to "Rosamunde" and Mr Whiting's fantasia in B flat minor, for piano and orchestra, the latter number for the first time here. The fantasia is of uneven merit, and the opening theme, given to the piano and gradually developed by that instrument, is almost shrouded by the heavy orchestration for the wood-winds and brasses. The crescendo passages that lead up to the allegro are well combined, and in these the orchestra and piano preserve a harmonious balance. The light second theme is quite delicate in conception, and in the cadenza Mr Whiting's piano work was thoroughly satisfying, and in the pastorale, or second movement, the character of the music was sweetly presented by the composer.

The opening of the pastorale is written in a quaint way, the oboe being used almost as an echo to the phrases of the piano. In the elaboration of the theme the piano part is well written, and the interpretation was effective, the relations between the solo instrument and the orchestra being admirably sustained. In the slow movement, leading up to the cadenza there is a lack of broad orchestral effects, although the piano part appeared to be skilfully written, and Mr Whiting's second cadenza did not compare favorably with that of the first movement. The finale was not very interesting as a whole. Mr Whiting played with his accustomed skill, but in his fortissimo work he seemed unable to bring the piano into sufficient prominence, being subordinated by the powerful orchestra.

In the Goldmark overture the so-called "water" effects were beautifully maintained by the heavier stringed instruments, forming a suggestive background to the thematic work of the other contingents of the orchestra. In the lovely second theme by the oboe and violins the phrasing was perfectly harmonious and the vivacity of the hunting tune, scurrying about among the strings, brasses and wood-winds, was notably well given, the cues being taken without a break. The cantabel, in which the exquisite playing of the harp was prominent, the elaborate free fantasia and the fortissimo phrases by the whole band at the close of the number, deserve special mention.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony was grandly played. The familiar work never palls upon the ears of the auditor, and when given by this orchestra never fails to arouse enthusiasm. The wonderful second movement was delightful in every way, though not more artistically interpreted than were the others; but this is the great movement of the four, and naturally calls forth special praise. Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture was gracefully and brilliantly performed.

Mr T. Adamowski will be the soloist at this week's concerts. The program will be Wagner's arrangement of Gluck's overture to "Iphigenie en Aulis," Lalo's symphony, "Espagnole," for violin and orchestra, and Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1897.

Teresa Carreño made her reappearance in Boston last night at the sixteenth Symphony concert in Music Hall.

In this same hall she made her début as an infant phenomenon January 2, 1863. Mathilde Phillipps assisted her. The child pianist played a nocturne by Döhler, a piece by Gottschalk, Thalberg's Norma fantasie, &c.

Mr. J. S. Dwight described her as "a child of nine years with fine head and face, full of intelligence, Spanish looking." She had "a funny deal of difficulty in getting herself upon the seat before the grand piano." Her playing "would charm even if she was not a child."

She played in Chickering Hall January 15, 1863.

Mr. Dwight in admiration spoke wise words of counsel: "The child's face beams with intelligence and genius. These speak, too, in her touch, in a certain untaught life that there is in her playing. It is a precious gift. O, treat it reverently and tenderly; educate it, save it, and not let the temptation of dazzling success or gain exhaust it ere its prime!" And again: "There can be no doubt of real talent here; may it only have wise training, and not be early wasted before publics! It is too precious for continual exposure. Such gifts are of God, and ought not to be prostituted for mere gain."

Her first reappearance here after her European tour was in a concert company in September, 1872, with Mario, Carlotta Patti, Cary, Ronconi, Sauret. Mr. Dwight then described her as "a tall and beautiful young lady."

She sang the part of Zerlina in Don Giovanni at the Boston Theatre in March, 1876. Titiens, Beaumont, Orlandini, Barili and Brignoli were the other chief singers.

Her first appearance at a Boston Symphony concert was October 29, 1887, when she played Chopin's E minor concerto. This was her sole appearance at these concerts before last night.

As she will give two recitals here, allow me to wait before speaking at length of the playing of this wondrous woman. I now repeat here what I said in the Boston Journal this morning:

The program of the sixteenth Symphony concert, given in Music Hall last night, Emil Paur conductor, was as follows:

Academic Festival Overture	Brahms
Concerto for Piano, No. 4, in D minor	Rubinstein
Symphony No. 1, in C major	Beethoven
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 6, The Carnival in Pesth	Liszt

The chief interest was in the reappearance of Mrs. Carreño, who, since her début here in 1863, has, like Ulysses, seen many cities and men.

The reports that have crossed the Atlantic may no longer be reckoned extravagant. Mrs. Carreño is a great pianist; a very great pianist. She has gained immeasurably in breadth, dignity and deep musical intelligence. She was always a passionate creature, and she was at times demoniacal in her performance; but in earlier years she often seemed to miss the composer's real purpose; she did not always think behind the printed page.

However unpleasant her association with d'Albert may have been—and it seems incredible that such a stately, superbly sensuous woman should have thrown her handkerchief to the gnome-like d'Albert—she undoubtedly learned much from him of the higher art of piano playing. She might well have taught him passion; he, on the other hand, knew a dignity and a serenity in performance that she did well to study.

Her choice of the concerto last night was wise; for this work of Rubinstein is not only one of his greatest achievements—in that the high level is steadily maintained—but it is one of the greatest of concertos. There is little or nothing that you would have changed. The themes are expressive, often beautiful; the development is generally masterly; the orchestration is effective without extravagance—notice, for instance, the skillful use of the solo trumpet, the manner in which the solo horn and solo clarinet are employed—and the concerto as a whole has an invigorating and noble atmosphere. In this work an accomplished pianist can move, thrill, suggest, startle.

Too much cannot be said of Mrs. Carreño's performance. It was heroic, with haunting episodes of tenderness. From the standpoint of him who merely watches technic with a powerful field glass it was amazing in its perfection; to him who is not dazzled by mere technical display it was soul-satisfying. The woman was a part of the concerto; the concerto was her voice. There was then an apparition of glorified sex, splendid in beauty, caressing in appeal, irresistible in passion, still more dangerous in languor. There was a realization of the woman in the Oriental rhapsody: "She that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners."

No wonder that the spontaneity, the strength, the grandeur of the performance excited most hearty and long continued applause.

* * *

The dry overture of Brahms was dryly read, and it was played in perfunctory yet none too precise fashion. The symphony—would that Mr. Paur had omitted the first and third movements—was played delightfully, with marked finish. So, too, the accompaniment to the concerto was played con amore.

* * *

It seems hardly possible that the rhapsody by Liszt was heard in Boston last night for the first time. The program book is not always to be trusted in these matters, and this music of Liszt is so inherently vulgar and bombastic that it must have appealed to some wandering, visiting conductor. Neither the body of this music nor its orchestral dress is worthy of serious attention.

*

Boston Symphony Concert.—Mme. Teresa Carreño will play Grieg's A minor concerto at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Metropolitan Opera House Thursday evening. The orchestral numbers on the program will be Beethoven's Symphony in C, No. 1; the prelude to the third act of Goldmarck's Cricket on the Hearth, Liszt's Pesther Carneval, and the William Tell overture.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SIXTEENTH SEASON, 1896–7.

FEBRUARY ITINERARY AFTER THIS DATE.

Concert Music Hall, Mount Royal avenue and Cathedral street, Baltimore, Wednesday, February 24, at 8 P. M.

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. RR., Wednesday, February 24, at midnight.

Arrive New York, depot Central RR. of N. J., Thursday, February 25, at 7 A. M.

New York Address, Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square.

Concert at Metropolitan Opera House, at 8 P. M.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, February 26, at 8 P. M.

Concert (Matinée) at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, February 27, at 3 P. M.

Leave New York, Grand Central Depot, Saturday, February 27, at midnight.

Arrive Boston Sunday, February 28, at 7 A. M. Providence Depot.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

SATURDAY, February 20, 1897.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 3, 1897.

The program of the Boston Symphony concert, February 6, included Tod und Verklärung, by Richard Strauss, and Liszt's Scene in the Tavern (Mephisto waltz).

I am told that Mr. H. L. Higginson, Patronus Magnificus, likewise Patronus Superbus, wrote a letter to Mr. Paur after this concert, protesting vigorously against such "höllenmusik," as he deigned graciously to call it. I hope this rumor is not true. When Mr. Higginson hires a conductor, he should have full confidence in him, and avoid influencing in any way the character of the programs.

Should the musical public of Boston be debarred from hearing works new to them because Mr. Higginson may not like them? I hope Mr. Paur has a stiff backbone and will make his own programs until his contract expires. I do not regard Mr. Paur as very fortunate in his program making. But there is a principle at stake. A conductor should have full charge. Music committees should be confined to churches, to chasten the organist and give the congregation material for grumbling.

Boston Symphony Concert.

THE fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Metropolitan Opera House last Thursday evening. This was the program:

Symphony No. 1, C major, op. 21	Ludwig van Beethoven
Concerto for piano, A minor, op. 16	Edvard Hagerup Grieg
Prelude to Part III. of The Cricket on the Hearth (First time.)	Karl Goldmark
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 6 (Pesther Carneval) (First time).	Franz Liszt
Overture, William Tell	Giachimo Antonio Rossini

This unusual scheme really was more entertaining than one could imagine, and the somewhat antique flavor of the first and last numbers was relieved by the modern coloring of Grieg, Goldmark and Liszt. Were it not for the menuetto the first symphony of Beethoven would be a mere collocation of echoes from Mozart and Haydn. In its extreme simplicity lie its interest and power. The young giant began where the others left off, and, with the ease born of genius, bore on his broad shoulders the polyphonic burdens imposed by his predecessors. The work was read with great clarity and smoothness by Mr. Paur.

The Goldmark prelude—not new to us—is not an inspiring bit of writing. It is melodious, the melody at the close suggesting Zampa, and it appears to be an ingenious attempt to follow in the path first "blazed" by Humperdinck, the setting of simple folk tunes in an elaborate harmonic frame. The composer of Hänsel und Gretel still holds his own.

This, like the Liszt number, was brilliantly executed by the orchestra, which seemed in a particularly happy and elastic condition. The Tell overture was a bold stroke on the part of Mr. Paur. It is really a classic composition, despite its banal storm episode. That it was agreeably played we not need say. The 'cello solo of Mr. Schroeder was beautifully sonorous, and the flutist covered himself with glory. The finale was quite sensational.

Teresa Carreño, the solo pianist of the evening, was in one of her most dashing and lovable moods. She played Grieg's characteristic and charming work with great vigor, power and delicacy. We liked best the first and last movements, the adagio lacking somewhat on the poetic side. The accompaniment to this movement was given with the utmost tenderness and with a tone quality that was bewitching. Madame Carreño made a stormy and exciting climax in the cadenza of the first movement, and in the final chord passages at the end of the concerto her instrument rang out with orchestral power. She was recalled a half dozen times and finally responded with Chopin's G flat study, The Butterfly, from his op. 25.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 6, 1897.

Sixteenth Symphony Concert.

Rich indeed! The solo attraction was Teresa Carreno, whom some consider the finest living woman pianist. She played superbly Rubinstein's Fourth Concerto in D minor, op. 70; and was recalled again and again, though resolutely refusing to play a second time. Not many pianists can combine so much expression with scientific digital gymnastics.

The orchestral work was equally beautiful. No need to speak of the First Beethoven Symphony; nor the Overture Academic, wherewith Brahms won his Breslau degree of Doctor of Philosophy. How could such a work as Beethoven's ever have been condemned.

The absolute novelty here was the Liszt orchestral version of his Sixth Hungarian Rhapsody, the Pesth Carnival, a composition raising a melody-lover into ecstatic enjoyment, so full is it of bizarre effects and folklore.

Readers of the Transcript that night were startled to find Madame Carreno's name heading the column of Recent Deaths; but it was only a complimentary paragraph misplaced. Think of that woman as thrice a wife and four times a mother!

February Facts.

The fifteenth Symphony Concert might be dubbed a ballet affair. Ballet music from Carmen; ballet music in Beethoven's overture, Men of Prometheus; and much like dance music in Tschaikowsky's Second Symphony, C minor, op. 17; while the Brahms violin Concerto in D, op. 77, with cadenza by C. M. Loeffler, magnificently played by Mr. Kneisel, lies in the same vivacious line. A thoroughly delightful week, and a relief from the depth of a Wagner operatic week.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 7, 1897.

Arthur Whiting, the Soloist, at Symphony Concert.

Mr Arthur Whiting was the soloist at the 17th symphony concert, the program of which comprised Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala," Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, Schubert's overture to "Rosamunde" and Mr Whiting's fantasia in B flat minor, for piano and orchestra, the latter number for the first time here. The fantasia is of uneven merit, and the opening theme, given to the piano and gradually developed by that instrument, is almost shrouded by the heavy orchestration for the wood-winds and brasses. The crescendo passages that lead up to the allegro are well combined, and in these the orchestra and piano preserve a harmonious balance. The light second theme is quite delicate in conception, and in the cadenza Mr Whiting's piano work was thoroughly satisfying, and in the pastorale, or second movement, the character of the music was sweetly presented by the composer.

The opening of the pastorale is written in a quaint way, the oboe being used almost as an echo to the phrases of the piano. In the elaboration of the theme the piano part is well written, and the interpretation was effective, the relations between the solo instrument and the orchestra being admirably sustained. In the slow movement, leading up to the cadenza there is a lack of broad orchestral effects, although the piano part appeared to be skilfully written, and Mr Whiting's second cadenza did not compare favorably with that of the first movement. The finale was not very interesting as a whole. Mr Whiting played with his accustomed skill, but in his fortissimo work he seemed unable to bring the piano into sufficient prominence, being subordinated by the powerful orchestra.

In the Goldmark overture the so-called "water" effects were beautifully maintained by the heavier stringed instruments, forming a suggestive background to the thematic work of the other contingents of the orchestra. In the lovely second theme by the oboe and violins the phrasing was perfectly harmonious and the vivacity of the hunting tune, scurrying about among the strings, brasses and wood-winds, was notably well given, the cues being taken without a break. The cantabel, in which the exquisite playing of the harp was prominent, the elaborate free fantasia and the fortissimo phrases by the whole band at the close of the number, deserve special mention.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony was grandly played. The familiar work never palls upon the ears of the auditor, and when given by this orchestra never fails to arouse enthusiasm. The wonderful second movement was delightful in every way, though not more artistically interpreted than were the others; but this is the great movement of the four, and naturally calls forth special praise. Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture was gracefully and brilliantly performed.

Mr T. Adamowski will be the soloist at this week's concerts. The program will be Wagner's arrangement of Gluck's overture to "Iphigenie en Aulis," Lalo's symphony, "Espagnole," for violin and orchestra, and Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 8, 1897.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" Overture at the Symphony Concert.

It was a programme of melody, a concert intelligible to the laity yet not weak or insipid to the classical musician. There was an aberration between the house programme and the analytical book of the concert as regards the first and last numbers, but it is to be hoped that none were led to suppose that the yearning, sensuous, broadly-scored ork at the beginning was Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture! It was Goldmarks's noble "Sakuntala" overture that began Saturday's concert, and it was played with a beauty that enhanced its themes. Perhaps one ought rather to use the singular than the plural in this connection, since the five notes of the chief theme are almost constantly in evidence in this number, the chief fault of the overture being its repetition of a single thought, the melody representing the affection of the two lovers.

There was magnificent execution on the part of the brasses in this number and the English horn was also very effective. The broad climax, again introducing the oft-repeated theme, was excellently worked up in the commendable interpretation.

In these days of dissonance, of unnatural progressions, it is a delight to listen to the intelligible harmonies and rich melodies of Goldmark; it reminds one that one of the functions of Art is to give pleasure, an idea at which some of the moderns scoff.

Mr. Arthur Whiting's Fantasie for piano and orchestra also followed this idea, and one ought to be cognizant of the fact that the composer has not utterly avoided the beaten paths of harmony to push through the brambles of new chord-combinations; in short, the work is natural, melodic and uninflated.

Its chief fault is that it is not entirely homogeneous, it presents a series of small pictures rather than one large one. This defect gives it the character of drawing-room music masquerading in a large form. There are many contrasts in the work, some of them of the utmost brusquerie, a la Beethoven, and there are many most graceful touches of tune down to the frankest style of salon-musik. The piano and the orchestra are not very closely interwoven, and the former instrument has many long stretches of solo work, but this may be condoned in so free a form as a "Fantasie."

Mr. Whiting was, of course, most satisfactory as his own interpreter, and played the piano part with a caprice and dash that suited it well. He was twice recalled at the close. He deserved this both as pianist and as composer. He is making evident advances in the latter capacity; this work is one of the best he has yet given us, and if the shortcomings above mentioned are undeniable one must hasten to add that there is more dramatic effect and fire in the composition than one would have expected from the composer's previous works, and we are heartily glad to perceive that the writer has not sold his musical birthright to the modern dissonance-mongers.

After considerable loud tuning of instruments (of which we have been getting too much recently) Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony was performed. The introduction was given with a breadth and power that would have taken away the breath of the polished and genteel composer could he have heard it, yet this reading gave a new meaning and a splendid virility to the thoughts expressed and prepared us for the striking and brilliant performance that was to follow.

It was, all in aii, the very best performance of the old work that we have ever heard. In the first movement the contrast of themes was finely accented. There is a certain difficulty in the presentation of the chief and subordinate theme in this movement; they do not possess that masculine and feminine character which Schumann was wont to impart to his leading themes in symphony, nor is there that combat between them that Beethoven sometimes employed in symphony (the fifth, for example) or in sonata (the great opus 106); the trouble here is that neither of the themes is very virile. Mr. Paur brought out the points of difference very skilfully, however, and thedevelopment was clearness itself. The storm of the coda was superbly played, nor must we forget the phenomenal work of the violoncelli in the returning passage at the end of the development.

The Scherzo, which is here in an unusual free Rondo form without a Trio, affords the one example of a German composer catching up the true lilt and spirit of Scotch folk-music; Beethoven, Schumann, Franz, Bruch, and other Teutonic masters have attempted the Scotch vein, but not one of their efforts may compare with this rollicking Scherzo.

The title of "Clarinette Symphony" is generally applied to that work in E flat wherein Mozart (in 1788) introduced the instrument into the symphonic orchestra; it might more justly be applied to this work which is the first symphony in which this king of the woodwind attains all his rights; the dark and spectral tone-color of the lower register (chalumeau) is given its first symphonic application in the introduction, and in the Scherzo and in the final the clarinette comes into the foreground more prominently than it had ever done previously except perhaps in Weber's "Freischuetz."

The clarinette work in the second movement is particularly difficult and it is due to the players to mention the excellent performance of their trying passages. How the violins sang the lovely theme of the Adagio! How nobly the violoncellos played at the reprise of this theme! It was a perfect performance and not tinged with the sentimentality with which some conductors weaken Mendelssohn.

The final of the symphony is Mendelssohn's highest orchestral peak; there is at last something masculine to commend, something of Ossianic power. It was more forcibly played than is usual, and gained by this treatment. Of course, the hymn of thanksgiving at the close was made very powerful, for Mr. Paur revels in just such touches. It always seems a pity that after such sustained loftiness Mendelssohn should show, not the cloven hoof, but the kid glove, by a passage of the utmost conventionality just at the tip end of the coda. Mr. Paur tried to disguise its inherent weakness by allowing the brasses to thunder forth, but all the power in the world cannot hide the utter triviality of the concluding phrases of this excellent work.

The concert ended with Schubert's overture to "Rosamunde." It sounded as simple as if it were an overture to Maria Edgeworth's "Rosamond" instead of Wilhelmine von Chesy's mixture of blood and sugar; but, by the way, there is some question whether this work was intended as the overture to the opera whose name it bears. Its themes are eartickling, even to the verge of negro-minstrelsy, one of them being first cousin to "The Old Folks at Home." They were all well played, and so the melodious concert came to a consistent and very tuneful end.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, MARCH 7, 1897.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Arthur Whiting's Fantasia for Piano and Orchestra Played for the First Time in Boston—Concert Announcements.

The program of the 17th Symphony Concert last night in Music Hall, Emil Paur conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "Sakuntala"............Goldmark
Fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra, in B-flat minor, Op. 11......Arthur Whiting
(First time in Boston.)
I. Moderato maestoso.
Allegro appassionato.
II. Pastorale.
III. Finale: Allegro scherzando.
Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch"..
Mendelssohn
Overture to "Rosamunde"...........Schubert

Mr. Whiting's fantasia was first played in public at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge, March 12, 1896. Mr. Whiting was then the pianist. I believe it was played a little before that at a quasi-private concert in Newton, when the Festival orchestra was conducted by Mr. Mollenhauer.

The program-book says that the score bears no dedication. Mr. Apthorp is mistaken. The Fantasia is dedicated to Mr. George W. Chadwick.

This Fantasia is an interesting, pleasing work. The composer has been accused in times past, and not without justice, of a certain peculiar dryness in thought and expression. His fastidiousness led him to reject any appearance of musical sensuousness; for sensuousness seemed to him of close kin to vulgarity. The temperament of Mr. Whiting leads him to place a perhaps undue importance on that which is purely intellectual in music. I hasten to add that in this Fantasia there is sentiment, there is humanity as well as mere intellectual display. This composer may yet surprise us in a year or two by a burst of sensuousness, or at least warm emotion. The Fantasia is indeed a fantasia, but it is not merely a succession of sleep-chasings, unregulated, uncontrolled, incoherent. On the contrary, I do not remember any work by Mr. Whiting in which his discrimination and technical skill appear to such musical advantage. Pastorale is delightful in its simplicity and freshness, in its use and not abuse of wood—wind instruments. There are suggestions here that a man less adroit would have expanded and discussed at length to the consternation of an audience. The finale is effective in its original brilliancy. I have spoken of the portions of the work that are bound to be the most popular.

The first movement is of genuine interest to the musician, who must needs admire the skill with which Mr. Whiting has handled his thematic material, material that in itself is not very striking. The composer played the piano part as it should be played in this instance: as one of the instruments of the orchestra. His tone was crisp, but not metallic, his technical performance was unobtrusively distinct and brilliant, and, more than this, there was a decided personal flavor. He did not remind one of this pianist or that pianist; he played the thoughts of Mr. Whiting in Mr. Whiting's way. Thus by piece and performance did he win a legitimate success.

⁂

The other selections do not call for extended comment. It was a pleasure to hear again the sultry, swooning music of Goldmark, the Oriental; and it was not a pleasure to hear the hopelessly bourgeois overture of Schubert. The introduction of the "Rosamunde" will pass, but the allegro is music for a beer garden. Schubert's memory is not honored by such revivals. In the Symphony Mr. Paur might have taken the introduction at a little faster pace, but as a whole the work was well read. It is idle to protest against his trick of reading the first theme of the allegro in nearly every first movement of a symphony in a coquettish manner, and afterward settling down to the proper speed. The music suffers thereby, nine cases out of ten, but frankness in delivery of a theme is not esteemed by those who misunderstand and think they follow certain principles laid down by Wagner in his Art of Conducting. In the finale there are noble marches of the double-basses and 'cellos that might have been more strongly brought out. And may I suggest respectfully to Mr. Paur that a little sharper precision in the attack of chords by the wind instruments would not be amiss?

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 7, 1897.
(Copyright, 1897, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. A. B. Whiting Plays the Piano Part of His Own Fantasy.

A piano concerto is generally a solo set in an orchestral frame; the soloist is the show performer, and the orchestra is his harmonic background. But the fantasy (Opus 11, in B-flat minor) played last night by Mr. Whiting, put the piano more nearly in its proper place.

The opening passage is an assertion of leadership by the solo instrument; immediately the orchestra steps forward and leads the movement on. The cadenza-like passages for the piano are frequent, but short, and while giving ample opportunity for display of intricate technique are not prolonged for physical endurance, nor to the injury of the musical structure.

Nowhere is this curious duel for preeminence more prominent than in the pastoral movement, where the tranquil theme is drawn out in delicate mysticism, beautiful and dreamy, as if with no thought that it ever would change, until the piano sounds a thundering chord; the orchestra startles, then dreams again, and again the solo instrument breaks in, seizes the leadership and launches into a cadenza that seems to satisfy it.

All three movements of this composition are given without intervening pauses. The composer, Mr. Arthur Battelle Whiting of New York, is the nephew of the well-known organist of the Immaculate and of the New England Conservatory. The young composer was not very enthusiastically applauded last night. It is trying for a pianist to play the next concert after Carreno and his personality was not heroic.

The opening number was Goldmark's Sakuntala overture. A sort of Druidical priestess has a love affair with a royal Nimrod, and by enchantment loses her hold on him. It is very graphic programme music, the opening measures, in which is suggested a bubbling spring in the depths of the forest, where Sakuntala's mother lived as a water nymph, being one of the clearest suggestions of woodland ways ever written.

The third number was Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3 in A minor ("Scotch"). The first few bars were written after a visit to the scene of Rizzio's murder; they bear the impression of it, and give an air of tragedy to the whole of the first movement. The second movement, supposed to portray rural gayety, and put second as a contrast to the tragic themes of the first, was regarded by Schumann as "more full of genius than anything that has been written in modern times."

The third movement is a meditation on the by-gone grandeur of Scotland, and the last, sometimes called the "Gathering of the Clans," concludes with a majestic melody of national character, in which the calls of the trumpets are answered as if by the uprising of a nation, with a bearing of pathos and heroism.

Mendelssohn intended this symphony to be played through all four movements without pause; Schumann's D Minor Symphony is the only other one ever written in that way; but Mr. Paur was wisely conservative, and made loopholes for applause and for the guidance of musical toddlers.

The Rosamunde Overture of Schubert, with its delightful melodies, was a fitting close to a delightful programme.

At the concert next week Timothy Adamowski will play Lalo's Symphonic Espagnole, for violin and orchestra; Wagner's arrangement of Glueck's overture to Iphigenie en Aulis, and Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony are the other two numbers announced.

---

of their son, and Clipstone wins the Derby.

SYMPHONY'S FOURTH CONCERT.

Mme. Teresa Carreno, Pianiste, to Be the Soloist.

Wednesday evening the fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the series at Music Hall will be given. The soloist will be Mme. Teresa Carreno pianiste, whose successful career in the principal cities of Europe during the past seven years has awakened a desire to hear her. Madame Carreno will play the Grieg concerto for pianoforte in A minor, opus 16, a favorite work with her, eminently suited to display her dash, brilliancy and technique.

Of the orchestral selections the most important is the Beethoven Symphony No. 1, which had its first performance in Vienna on April 2, 1800, a few months after it was written. The concert was the first benefit given to Beethoven, and the great composer himself appeared as the solo pianist. The remaining orchestral numbers are novelties; the prelude to Act 3 from the "Cricket on the Hearth," an opera composed by Goldmark, and adapted from Dickens' Christmas story, having its first presentation at the Court Opera, Vienna, in March of last year, and scoring an immediate success. The closing selection is the Hungarian Rhapsody No. 6, otherwise known as the "Pesther Carneval," from its dedication to the city of Buda-Pesth. It is scored in Liszt's brilliant and effective style.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CI., NO. 66.
SUNDAY, MARCH 7, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Arthur Whiting Performed His Own Fantasia.

Work the Clearest and Least Labored in Effect of Any of the Composers That Has Had a Hearing in Boston —Spirited and Brilliantly Worked Out Finale.

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening, with the following programme:

Overture, "Sakuntala"............Goldmarck
Fantasia for piano and orchestra, op. 11
(first time in Boston)........Arthur Whiting
Symphony in A minor, "Scotch"..Mendelssohn
Overture, "Rosamunde".............Schubert

The soloist was Mr. Arthur Whiting, who performed his own fantasia, which is the clearest and the least labored in effect of any work of his that has had a hearing in Boston. It is somewhat original in form, the first and the second movements being practically one, the former being interrupted by the latter, a flowing and graceful theme chiefly, but elaborately treated, and merging back into the allegro of the opening movement, which in turn is carried by a cadenza into the spirited and brilliantly worked out finale.

A single hearing offers no impediment to a thorough understanding of the composer's meaning, and there is an easy freedom in the flow of the music, as well as an absence of dryness, that marks a growth in Mr. Whiting's style.

There is, in addition, much of melodiousness, especially in the pastorale, which has a graceful frankness in its general aspect that is very pleasing. The solo part is brilliant and showy, without being meretricious in character, and it is fairly blended with the orchestra instead of standing apart from it in order to display the performer's skill, while the orchestration is rich, discreet and effective. Mr. Whiting played his exacting share in the work with clean-cut and fluent technique, and at its close met with a vigorous outburst of plaudits and several recalls.

The sensuous Goldmarck overture wears well, and holds its place firmly as one of the most poetic and most sumptuously-colored of modern works in its class, and will probably remain the effort by which the composer will be best and longest remembered. It was splendidly read and performed, and showed both the conductor and the players in their highest perfection.

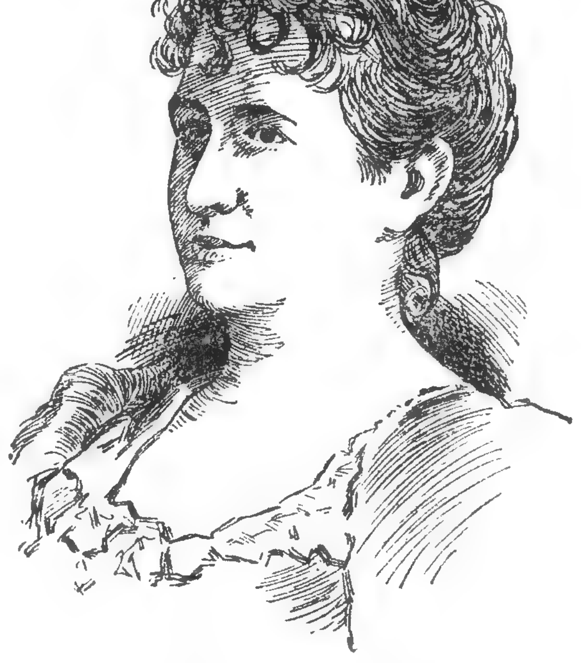
The symphony was subjected to something of a more modern interpretation than it usually receives, in regard to tempi and color, particularly in the first allegro and the finale; but it lost nothing in dignity and effect thereby, though now and then there was a virile, rhythmic accent that sounded strange and was scarcely the familiar Mendelssohn. The Rosamunde overture has grown decidedly old, and not gracefully at that, for its themes appear baldly commonplace, not to say puerile. The composer, great as he was in almost every walk of his art, was not felicitous in his overtures, for he has not left one that is of the first order, or that adds anything to his fame.

The audience was large and was applausive throughout. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Iphigenie in Aulis," Gluck; Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra, Lalo, and Cowen's Scandinavian symphony. Mr. T. Adamowski is to be the soloist.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mme. Teresa Carreno the Soloist at Music Hall Tonight.

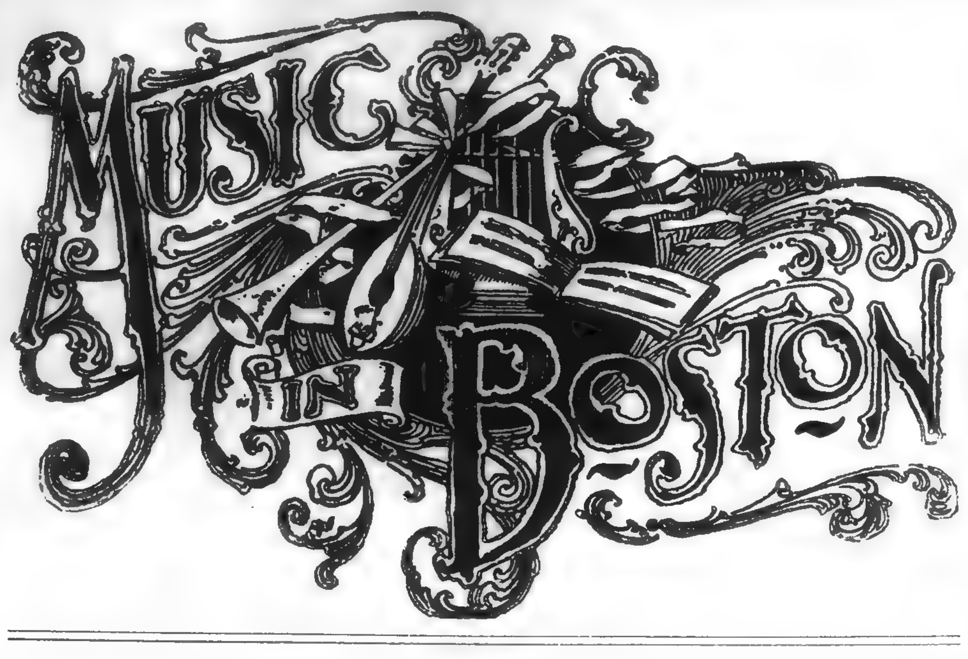
The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth concert at Music Hall tonight. The Orchestra arrived yesterday and went over to Washington, as usual, last night, and gave a concert there. The performers are in good condition for the concert tonight. Mme. Teresa Carreno, pianist, will be the soloist. The programme will be as follows:



Mme. Teresa Carreno.

Ludwig van Beethoven—Symphony No. 1, in C major, Op. 21.
Edvard Hagerup Grieg—Concerto for pianoforte, in A minor, Op. 16.
Karl Goldmark—Prelude to Part III. of "Cricket on the Hearth." (First time.)
Franz Liszt—Hungarian Rhapsody No. 6 ("Pesther Carneval.") (First time.)

March 10



MUSIC IN BOSTON

Concerts and musical performances of any kind given in any halls in Boston not included in this list will not be reviewed in these columns:

MUSIC HALL,
TREMONT TEMPLE,
CHIPMAN HALL,
ASSOCIATION HALL,
COPLEY HALL,
HOLLANDER'S,
BUMSTEAD HALL.
ART CLUB,
CHICKERING HALL,
UNION HALL,
PIERCE HALL,
TUILERIES.

BOSTON, Mass., February 7, 1897.

THIS was the program of the seventeenth Symphony concert in Music Hall March 6:

Overture to Sakuntala..Goldmark
Fantasia for piano and orchestra in B flat minor, op. 11.
....Arthur Whiting
(First time in Boston.)
Moderato maestoso.
Allegro appassionato.
Pastorale.
Finale: Allegro scherzando.
Symphony No. 3, in A minor, Scotch.....................Mendelssohn
Overture to Rosamunde..Schubert

Here again iș an instance of Mr. Paur's ability as "a lightning change artist." The program of March 6, as announced originally, was Brahms' fourth symphony, Whiting's fantasia, Weingartner's arrangement or paraphrase of Weber's Invitation to the Dance and the overture to Schubert's Alfonso and Estrella.

Mr. Whiting's fantasia was first played in public at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge, Mass., March 12, 1896. Mr. Whiting was then, as last night, the pianist. I believe the work was played before that date at a private or club concert in Newton, Mass., when the Festival Orchestra was led by Mr. Mollenhauer.

This fantasia was in certain respects an agreeable disappointment.

In times past I have been inclined to the opinion that when Mr. Whiting first pondered the question of a calling he must have hesitated between chess and music. His music seemed to me full of openings and gambits and queer things contrived as in a game. He was the player and the audience was his antagonist. Mr. Whiting was generally the easy conqueror. The audience gave up the contest and admired the skill of the musician. When I say audience I mean the average, every day audience, not a special band devoted to the worship of Brahms and his disciples and imitators.

You respected the music of Mr. Whiting, but you did not feel for it any personal affection. The music lacked humanity.

Mr. Whiting had, and no doubt has, high ideals. Sensuousness in music seemed to him as something intolerable, something against public morals, something that should be suppressed by the Selectmen. Perhaps he never went so far as to petition for an injunction against sex in music; but rigorous intellectuality was his one aim. He might have written a Serious Call to Devout and Holy Composition, or A Practical Treatise Upon Musical Perfection, to which is now added, by the same author, The Absolute Unlawfulness of the Stage Entertainment fully demonstrated. Indeed, his music had the inexorable argument and the icy polish of William Law.

The Lord forbid that I should flout a man for high aims! But there was almost intolerance in Mr. Whiting's musical attitude. He himself is a man of wit rather than humor, a man with a very pretty knack at sarcasm. He is industrious, fastidious, a severe judge of his own works. As a musician he was even in his dryest days worthy of sincere respect.

Now this fantasia, which I heard last night for the first time, is the outward and sure expression of a change in Mr. Whiting's way of musical thinking, and the change is decidedly for the better. There is still a display of pure intellectuality; there is still a solving of self-imposed problems; but Mr. Whiting's musical enjoyment is no longer strictly selfish.

Here is a fantasia in the true sense of the term; form is here subservient to fancy. The first movement, if you wish to observe traditional terminology, is conspicuous chiefly for the skill, yes fancy, with which thematic material of no marked apparent, inherent value is treated. The pastorale is fresh and suggestive. The ordinary pastorale is a bore. There is the familar recipe: take an oboe the size of an egg, stir with a flute, add a little piano, throw in a handful of muted strings, and let the whole gently simmer in a 9-8 stew pan. But Mr. Whiting has treated his landscape and animal kingdom with rare discretion. I might talk to you of summer afternoons or spring thaws, of flocks and Watteau shepherds and their girls; but let me whisper in your ear—or lug, if some oatmeal eating admirer of Ian Maclaren prefer the latter term—I did not happen to think of any such things while Mr. Whiting's pastorale was a-playing. The music gave pleasure; it soothed by its quiet, untortured beauty, its simplicity, its discretion. And in like manner, without receiving or desiring to receive any definite, precise impression, the finale interested because it was not a hackneyed form of brilliant talk. The finale is something more than clever, to use a hideous term that I heard applied to it. It is individual, and this praise may be awarded the whole work. Remember, too, that although this is a fantasia, there is not merely a succession of unregulated, uncontrolled, incoherent sleep-chasings.

In this work there is a warmer spirit than that which animated or kept alive Mr. Whiting's former creations. There is no deep emotion, there is no sensuousness, there is no glowing color, no "color of deciduous days." These might be incongruous in the present scheme. But there is a more pronounced vitality, there is a more decided sympathy with the world and men and women; there is more humanity.

The piano is here an orchestral instrument, and as such it was played admirably by Mr. Whiting. His style of playing is his own, even his tone seems peculiarly his own, with a crispness that is not metallic, with a quality that deceives at first in its carrying power. His performance was singularly clean and elastic, its personality was refreshing. He played the thoughts of Mr. Whiting in Mr. Whiting's way. And thus by piece and performance did he win a legitimate success.

⁂

The Sakuntala overture never wearies me when it is well played, nor do I find its sensuousness cloying. Not that I hear in it an epitome of Kalidasa's work, for I have never read the said work. But the languorous, sultry music transports a hearer from shabby Music Hall, analytical programs, club gossip, harassing domesticity, and he loses for a time the weight of a New England conscience.

On the other hand, when the Rosamunde allegro begins there is the thought of a beer garden on the Elbe, footstools for the women, a family of three with two beer glasses, bad tobacco, Sunday in its best clothes. Why revive such works, injurious to the great composer?

And—since I am making personal confession—I could live placidly for years without hearing the first, third and fourth movements of the Scotch symphony. I wonder if Glenlivit and soda taken in copious draughts before the concert would correct such imperfect sympathy? Not without reason did Mendelssohn dedicate his symphony to Queen Victoria. She should have given him a shawl for it. Oh, the fatiguing, futile second theme of the first allegro! How truly Mendelssohnian in its priggishness! And then the admired storm! Mendelssohn is in it; his friend holds an umbrella over him; it has a silvern handle. I hear Mendelssohn saying: "What a beautiful umbrella! How much did you pay for it?" The scherzo is another matter. And even in commonplace passages of the symphony there will be now and then some unerring stroke of orchestration that delights. It would be a pleasant surprise to hear the opening andante con moto taken con moto. It would also be a pleasant surprise to find Mr. Paur reading the first theme of an allegro frankly and without any suspicion of coquetry. Last night he advanced it tentatively, as though he were not yet decided as to the proper speed; but the theme does not admit of such treatment.

⁂

Have you read the letters of Bizet to his pupil Paul Lacombe? I do not remember any notice of them in THE MUSICAL COURIER. Let me make some quotations.

At first Bizet was disinclined to teach by letter. "Ideal composition is not easily treated by correspondence. But counterpoint, fugue, orchestration can be treated successfully by letter.

"My lessons bring me 20 frs. My time in your case is worth 15 frs. an hour.

"I am an eclectic. I lived three years in Italy, and I have been influenced not by the shameful musical proceedings of that country, but by the temperament of some of its composers. My sensual nature is gripped by that fluent, lazy, amorous, lascivious, passionate music. By conviction I am German, heart and soul. However, I go astray occasionally; I wander about in musically ill-famed resorts. And I admit to you in a whisper, I find infinite pleasure in so doing. In a word I love Italian music as one loves a courtesan; but she must be charming. When we have named two-thirds of Norma, four numbers of Puritani, three of Sonnambula, two acts of Rigoletto, one of Trovatore, nearly half of Traviata—add Don Pasquale and—well, throw the rest where you please. As for Rossini—he has his Tell, his sun—Comte Ory, the Barber, one act of Otello, his satellites; thus we may pardon him horrible Semiramide and all his other sins. With you, I put Beethoven above the greatest, the most renowned. The ninth symphony is for me the combination of our wit. Dante, Michael Angelo, Shakespeare, Homer, Beethoven, Moses. Neither Mozart with his divine form, nor Weber with his powerful, colossal originality, nor Meyerbeer with his astounding dramatic genius, can dispute the palm with the Titan, the Prometheus of music." This letter was written in '67.

"I find in your piece a certain languor, a certain charm, but not enough. You should do better. My judgment will seem to you severe. Wait a while. Let the thing sleep, and when you look at it again, after you have almost forgotten its existence, you will be of my opinion. You will find the piece a little soap-bubbly. I have always noticed that the compositions the least well rounded are always the dearest at the moment of hatching. Look at Beethoven; take his vaguest, most ethereal work; it is always wished, always held. He dreams, and yet his idea has a body. You can take hold of it. Only one man was known to make music quasi-improvisée, or at least music that seems so—and he is Chopin, a strange and charming personality, inimitable, not to be imitated.

"Mendelssohn, among other faults, treats sometimes his symphonic andantes as songs without words.

"Elegance, taste are excellent qualities if they do not exclude clearness and firmness.

"You write too much for the wind instruments as you do for the strings. The timbre of each of the wood instruments is so individual that it is not good to use them as a body, except for special effects. The strings are only one

---

February Facts.

The fifteenth Symphony Concert might be dubbed a ballet affair. Ballet music from Carmen; ballet music in Beethoven's overture, Men of Prometheus; and much like dance music in Tschaikowsky's Second Symphony, C minor, op. 17; while the Brahms violin Concerto in D, op. 77, with cadenza by C. M. Loeffler, magnificently played by Mr. Kneisel, lies in the same vivacious line. A thoroughly delightful week, and a relief from the depth of a Wagner operatic week.

Sixteenth Symphony Concert.

Rich indeed! The solo attraction was Teresa Carreno, whom some consider the finest living woman pianist. She played superbly Rubinstein's Fourth Concerto in D minor, op. 70; and was recalled again and again, though resolutely refusing to play a second time. Not many pianists can combine so much expression with scientific digital gymnastics.

The orchestral work was equally beautiful. No need to speak of the First Beethoven Symphony; nor the Overture Academic, wherewith Brahms won his Breslau degree of Doctor of Philosophy. How could such a work as Beethoven's ever have been condemned.

The absolute novelty here was the Liszt orchestral version of his Sixth Hungarian Rhapsody, the Pesth Carnival, a composition raising a melody-lover into ecstatic enjoyment, so full is it of bizarre effects and folklore.

Readers of the Transcript that night were startled to find Madame Carreno's name heading the column of Recent Deaths; but it was only a complimentary paragraph misplaced. Think of that woman as thrice a wife and four times a mother!

The Boston Symphony Concert.

With only two remaining performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, the announcement of the fourth concert in the series at Music Hall on Wednesday evening, February 24, will awaken unusual interest. The soloist, Madame Teresa Carreno, fresh from her seven years' sojourn abroad, will play the Grieg concerto for pianoforte in A minor, opus 16, a work eminently suited to display her brilliant, dashing style and superb technique.

Of the three orchestral numbers, two are novelties; the prelude to Part III, of Karl Goldmark's opera, "The Cricket On the Hearth." This work was written and received its first performance a little less than a year ago in Vienna. The other novelty is the Hungarian Rhapsody No. 6, otherwise known as the "Pesther Carneval," by Liszt. The most important part of all the orchestral selections is Beethoven's first symphony, composed early in 1800, and presented to the public for the first time at his benefit on April 2 of the same year at the Burg Theatre, in Vienna.

Seats are now on sale at Albert's.

With only two remaining performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, the announcement of the fourth concert in the series at Music Hall, on Wednesday evening, February 24, will awaken unusual interest. The soloist, Madame Teresa Carreno, fresh from her seven years' sojourn abroad, will play the Grieg concerto for pianoforte in A minor, opus 16, a work eminently suited to display her brilliant, dashing style and superb technique.

Of the three orchestral numbers, two are novelties; the prelude to Part III., of Karl Goldmark's opera, "The Cricket On the Hearth." This work was written and received its first performance a little less than a year ago in Vienna. The other novelty is the Hungarian Rhapsody No. 6, otherwise known as the "Pesther Carneval," by Liszt. The most important part of all the orchestral selections is Beethoven's first symphony, composed early in 1800, and presented to the public for the first time at his benefit on April 2 of the same year at the Burg Theatre.

March 10

MUSIC
IN BOSTON

Concerts and musical performances of any kind given in any halls in Boston not included in this list will not be reviewed in these columns:

MUSIC HALL,	BUMSTEAD HALL,
TREMONT TEMPLE,	ART CLUB,
CHIPMAN HALL,	CHICKERING HALL,
ASSOCIATION HALL,	UNION HALL,
COPLEY HALL,	PIERCE HALL,
HOLLANDER'S,	TUILERIES.

BOSTON, Mass., February 7, 1897.

THIS was the program of the seventeenth Symphony concert in Music Hall March 6:

Overture to Sakuntala .... Goldmark
Fantasia for piano and orchestra in B flat minor, op. 11. .... Arthur Whiting
(First time in Boston.)
Moderato maestoso.
Allegro appassionato.
Pastorale.
Finale: Allegro scherzando.
Symphony No. 3, in A minor, Scotch .... Mendelssohn
Overture to Rosamunde .... Schubert

Here again is an instance of Mr. Paur's ability as "a lightning change artist." The program of March 6, as announced originally, was Brahms' fourth symphony, Whiting's fantasia, Weingartner's arrangement or paraphrase of Weber's Invitation to the Dance and the overture to Schubert's Alfonso and Estrella.

Mr. Whiting's fantasia was first played in public at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge, Mass., March 12, 1896. Mr. Whiting was then, as last night, the pianist. I believe the work was played before that date at a private or club concert in Newton, Mass., when the Festival Orchestra was led by Mr. Mollenhauer.

This fantasia was in certain respects an agreeable disappointment.

In times past I have been inclined to the opinion that when Mr. Whiting first pondered the question of a calling he must have hesitated between chess and music. His music seemed to me full of openings and gambits and queer things contrived as in a game. He was the player and the audience was his antagonist. Mr. Whiting was generally the easy conqueror. The audience gave up the contest and admired the skill of the musician. When I say audience I mean the average, every day audience, not a special band devoted to the worship of Brahms and his disciples and imitators.

You respected the music of Mr. Whiting, but you did not feel for it any personal affection. The music lacked humanity.

Mr. Whiting had, and no doubt has, high ideals. Sensuousness in music seemed to him as something intolerable, something against public morals, something that should be suppressed by the Selectmen. Perhaps he never went so far as to petition for an injunction against sex in music; but rigorous intellectuality was his one aim. He might have written a Serious Call to Devout and Holy Composition, or A Practical Treatise Upon Musical Perfection, to which is now added, by the same author, The Absolute Unlawfulness of the Stage Entertainment fully demonstrated. Indeed, his music had the inexorable argument and the icy polish of William Law.

The Lord forbid that I should flout a man for high aims! But there was almost intolerance in Mr. Whiting's musical attitude. He himself is a man of wit rather than humor, a man with a very pretty knack at sarcasm. He is industrious, fastidious, a severe judge of his own works. As a musician he was even in his dryest days worthy of sincere respect.

Now this fantasia, which I heard last night for the first time, is the outward and sure expression of a change in Mr. Whiting's way of musical thinking, and the change is decidedly for the better. There is still a display of pure intellectuality; there is still a solving of self-imposed problems; but Mr. Whiting's musical enjoyment is no longer strictly selfish.

Here is a fantasia in the true sense of the term; form is here subservient to fancy. The first movement, if you wish to observe traditional terminology, is conspicuous chiefly for the skill, yes fancy, with which thematic material of no marked apparent, inherent value is treated. The pastorale is fresh and suggestive. The ordinary pastorale is a bore. There is the familar recipe: take an oboe the size of an egg, stir with a flute, add a little piano, throw in a handful of muted strings, and let the whole gently simmer in a 9-8 stew pan. But Mr. Whiting has treated his landscape and animal kingdom with rare discretion. I might talk to you of summer afternoons or spring thaws, of flocks and Watteau shepherds and their girls; but let me whisper in your ear—or lug, if some oatmeal eating admirer of Ian Maclaren prefer the latter term—I did not happen to think of any such things while Mr. Whiting's pastorale was a-playing. The music gave pleasure; it soothed by its quiet, untortured beauty, its simplicity, its discretion. And in like manner, without receiving or desiring to receive any definite, precise impression, the finale interested because it was not a hackneyed form of brilliant talk. The finale is something more than clever, to use a hideous term that I heard applied to it. It is individual, and this praise may be awarded the whole work. Remember, too, that although this is a fantasia, there is not merely a succession of unregulated, uncontrolled, incoherent sleep-chasings.

In this work there is a warmer spirit than that which animated or kept alive Mr. Whiting's former creations. There is no deep emotion, there is no sensuousness, there is no glowing color, no "color of deciduous days." These might be incongruous in the present scheme. But there is a more pronounced vitality, there is a more decided sympathy with the world and men and women; there is more humanity.

The piano is here an orchestral instrument, and as such it was played admirably by Mr. Whiting. His style of playing is his own, even his tone seems peculiarly his own, with a crispness that is not metallic, with a quality that deceives at first in its carrying power. His performance was singularly clean and elastic, its personality was refreshing. He played the thoughts of Mr. Whiting in Mr. Whiting's way. And thus by piece and performance did he win a legitimate success.

* * *

The Sakuntala overture never wearies me when it is well played, nor do I find its sensuousness cloying. Not that I hear in it an epitome of Kalidasa's work, for I have never read the said work. But the languorous, sultry music transports a hearer from shabby Music Hall, analytical programs, club gossip, harassing domesticity, and he loses for a time the weight of a New England conscience.

On the other hand, when the Rosamunde allegro begins there is the thought of a beer garden on the Elbe, footstools for the women, a family of three with two beer glasses, bad tobacco, Sunday in its best clothes. Why revive such works, injurious to the great composer?

And—since I am making personal confession—I could live placidly for years without hearing the first, third and fourth movements of the Scotch symphony. I wonder if Glenlivit and soda taken in copious draughts before the concert would correct such imperfect sympathy? Not without reason did Mendelssohn dedicate his symphony to Queen Victoria. She should have given him a shawl for it. Oh, the fatiguing, futile second theme of the first allegro! How truly Mendelssohnian in its priggishness! And then the admired storm! Mendelssohn is in it; his friend holds an umbrella over him; it has a silvern handle. I hear Mendelssohn saying: "What a beautiful umbrella! How much did you pay for it?" The scherzo is another matter. And even in commonplace passages of the symphony there will be now and then some unerring stroke of orchestration that delights. It would be a pleasant surprise to hear the opening andante con moto taken con moto. It would also be a pleasant surprise to find Mr. Paur reading the first theme of an allegro frankly and without any suspicion of coquetry. Last night he advanced it tentatively, as though he were not yet decided as to the proper speed; but the theme does not admit of such treatment.

* * *

Have you read the letters of Bizet to his pupil Paul Lacombe? I do not remember any notice of them in THE MUSICAL COURIER. Let me make some quotations.

At first Bizet was disinclined to teach by letter. "Ideal composition is not easily treated by correspondence. But counterpoint, fugue, orchestration can be treated successfully by letter.

"My lessons bring me 20 frs. My time in your case is worth 15 frs. an hour.

"I am an eclectic. I lived three years in Italy, and I have been influenced not by the shameful musical proceedings of that country, but by the temperament of some of its composers. My sensual nature is gripped by that fluent, lazy, amorous, lascivious, passionate music. By conviction I am German, heart and soul. However, I go astray occasionally; I wander about in musically ill-famed resorts. And I admit to you in a whisper, I find infinite pleasure in so doing. In a word I love Italian music as one loves a courtesan; but she must be charming. When we have named two-thirds of Norma, four numbers of Puritani, three of Sonnambula, two acts of Rigoletto, one of Trovatore, nearly half of Traviata—add Don Pasquale and—well, throw the rest where you please. As for Rossini—he has his Tell, his sun—Comte Ory, the Barber, one act of Otello, his satellites; thus we may pardon him horrible Semiramide and all his other sins. With you, I put Beethoven above the greatest, the most renowned. The ninth symphony is for me the combination of our wit. Dante, Michael Angelo, Shakespeare, Homer, Beethoven, Moses. Neither Mozart with his divine form, nor Weber with his powerful, colossal originality, nor Meyerbeer with his astounding dramatic genius, can dispute the palm with the Titan, the Prometheus of music." This letter was written in '67.

"I find in your piece a certain languor, a certain charm, but not enough. You should do better. My judgment will seem to you severe. Wait a while. Let the thing sleep, and when you look at it again, after you have almost forgotten its existence, you will be of my opinion. You will find the piece a little soap-bubbly. I have always noticed that the compositions the least well rounded are always the dearest at the moment of hatching. Look at Beethoven; take his vaguest, most ethereal work; it is always wished, always held. He dreams, and yet his idea has a body. You can take hold of it. Only one man was known to make music quasi-improvisée, or at least music that seems so—and he is Chopin, a strange and charming personality, inimitable, not to be imitated.

"Mendelssohn, among other faults, treats sometimes his symphonic andantes as songs without words.

"Elegance, taste are excellent qualities if they do not exclude clearness and firmness.

"You write too much for the wind instruments as you do for the strings. The timbre of each of the wood instruments is so individual that it is not good to use them as a body, except for special effects. The strings are only one

---

February Facts.

The fifteenth Symphony Concert might be dubbed a ballet affair. Ballet music from Carmen: ballet music in Beethoven's overture, Men of Prometheus; and much like dance music in Tschaikowsky's Second Symphony, C minor, op. 17; while the Brahms violin Concerto in D, op. 77, with cadenza by C. M. Loeffler, magnificently played by Mr. Kneisel, lies in the same vivacious line. A thoroughly delightful week, and a relief from the depth of a Wagner operatic week.

With only two remaining performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, the announcement of the fourth concert in the series at Music Hall, on Wednesday evening, February 24, will awaken unusual interest. The soloist, Madame Teresa Carreno, fresh from her seven years' sojourn abroad, will play the Grieg concerto for pianoforte in A minor, opus 16, a work eminently suited to display her brilliant, dashing style and superb technique.

Of the three orchestral numbers, two are novelties; the prelude to Part III., of Karl Goldmark's opera, "The Cricket On the Hearth." This work was written and received its first performance a little less than a year ago in Vienna. The other novelty is the Hungarian Rhapsody No. 6, otherwise known as the "Pesther Carneval," by Liszt. The most important part of all the orchestral selections is Beethoven's first symphony, composed early in 1800, and presented to the public for the first time at his benefit on April 2 of the same year, at the Burg Theatre,

---

Sixteenth Symphony Concert.

Rich indeed! The solo attraction was Teresa Carreno, whom some consider the finest living woman pianist. She played superbly Rubinstein's Fourth Concerto in D minor, op. 70; and was recalled again and again, though resolutely refusing to play a second time. Not many pianists can combine so much expression with scientific digital gymnastics.

The orchestral work was equally beautiful. No need to speak of the First Beethoven Symphony; nor the Overture Academic, wherewith Brahms won his Breslau degree of Doctor of Philosophy. How could such a work as Beethoven's ever have been condemned.

The absolute novelty here was the Liszt orchestral version of his Sixth Hungarian Rhapsody, the Pesth Carnival, a composition raising a melody-lover into ecstatic enjoyment, so full is it of bizarre effects and folklore.

Readers of the Transcript that night were startled to find Madame Carreno's name heading the column of Recent Deaths; but it was only a complimentary paragraph misplaced. Think of that woman as thrice a wife and four times a mother!

The Boston Symphony Concert.

With only two remaining performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, the announcement of the fourth concert in the series at Music Hall on Wednesday evening, February 24, will awaken unusual interest. The soloist, Madame Teresa Carreno, fresh from her seven years' sojourn abroad, will play the Grieg concerto for pianoforte in A minor, opus 16, a work eminently suited to display her brilliant, dashing style and superb technique.

Of the three orchestral numbers, two are novelties; the prelude to Part III, of Karl Goldmark's opera, "The Cricket On the Hearth." This work was written and received its first performance a little less than a year ago in Vienna. The other novelty is the Hungarian Rhapsody No. 6, otherwise known as the "Pesther Carneval," by Liszt. The most important part of all the orchestral selections is Beethoven's first symphony, composed early in 1800, and presented to the public for the first time at his benefit on April 2 of the same year at the Burg Theatre, in Vienna.

Seats are now on sale at Albert's.

[93]

immense instrument, perfectly homogeneous. They are the foundation of the symphonic orchestra. More and more am I convinced that it is necessary to use the woodwind and brass with circumspection. It is necessary to employ two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two or four bassoons and four horns. It is impossible to orchestrate well by using only a single instrument of each kind. * * * You use the horn as an ordinary instrument. You make a great mistake. The special timbre of this instrument, the great difficulty of delivering certain stopped tones, make it impossible to use it as a stringed instrument.

"In my opinion the repeat is hopelessly old-fashioned. The greater number of symphonies by Beethoven and Mendelssohn (and Mozart, of course) would gain by performance without repeats.

"There are few critics here who are able to hear, much less read, a sonata." 1869.

"I have finished the first act of Carmen; I am much pleased with it."

PHILIP HALE.

◆

Boston Music Notes.

Concerts and musical performances of any kind given in any halls in Boston not included in this list will not be reviewed in these columns:

MUSIC HALL.
TREMONT TEMPLE.
CHIPMAN HALL.
ASSOCIATION HALL.
COPLEY HALL.
HOLLANDER'S.
BUMSTEAD HALL.
ART CLUB.
CHICKERING HALL.
UNION HALL.
PIERCE HALL.
TUILERIES.

Miss Suza Doane, the young pianist, will play at the first Children's Popular Concert in Cambridge, on March 6.

Miss Edith Rowena Noyes, whose little opera Last Summer was recently performed in Lowell with such success, has just completed an Easter anthem, Easter Morn, which will be published at once by the B. F. Wood Music Company.

There will be a faculty recital of the Daudelin School of Music in Association Hall on Tuesday evening, March 9. Mr. Van Veachton Rogers will play two groups of harp solos.

The second subscription recital by advanced students of the New England Conservatory of Music took place on Wednesday afternoon.

Miss Marguerite Hall, whose concert took place on Monday evening, has been spending a few days in Boston with her sister.

Mr. Franz Kneisel will play the violin obligato in the beautiful Bendictus in the performance of the great Missa Solemnis of Beethoven, which the Cecelia gives for the first time on Friday evening. The solo parts are of extreme difficulty, and will be sung by Miss Helen M. Wright, soprano; Miss Lena Little, contralto; Frederick Smith, tenor, and Arthur Beresford, bass.

From Gloom to Glory, a song for Easter by Adam Geibel, and just published by the White-Smith Publishing Company, is, on dit, the finest Easter song that has appeared as yet this season or in fact for a number of years. It is arranged for high and low voice, and singers generally are attracted by the melodious and well written composition.

Mrs. Carlotta Dean Goodrich sang with great success in Haverhill on Tuesday evening and received most flattering notices from the press.

Mr. Louis C. Elson is to give a special subscription course of lectures on music: Thursday evening, March 11, Shakespeare in Music—Giving many illustrations of the songs, ballads and dances of the era of the poet, as used in his plays during his lifetime. Thursday evening, March 18, Old Scottish History and Songs—In this lecture the old Gaelic songs and border ballads are graphically introduced, leading up to the stirring songs of the Jacobite uprisings in 1715 and 1745 for the restoration of the Stuarts. Saturday afternoon, March 27, The Troubadours and Their Descendants—Sketching in outline French songs and giving not only notable songs of the Troubadours, but the music of the Trouvères, the compositions of Louis XIII. and the old Noëls or Christmas songs. Thursday evening, April 1, The Songs and Legends of the Sea—Comprising the sailor music of many different nations, interspersed with stories of quaint superstitions and legends gathered by Mr. Elson in the course of many voyages on various seas. Thursday evening, April 8, The History of National Music—Not only are the European national hymns examined, but the history of each of our national songs is given. Hail Columbia is sung from the first edition (with strange harmonies), and the drinking song which gave rise to the Star Spangled Banner is rendered from an old English edition, published before our national song was born.

These lectures are full of interest even to those who have never sung or played a note. They intertwine history, poetry, legend and anecdote around the musical selections in a manner original and fascinating.

The many friends of Mrs. Jennie Crocker Follett, the soprano of Trinity Church, will be pleased to learn that her health is quite restored, and she expects to enter the concert field next season. Mrs. Follett has been obliged to refuse many offers for both concert and oratorio work, her health only permitting her to continue with her church work.

Miss Gertrude Capen's fourth pupils' recital took place Thursday evening, and was no less successful than the others have been, both in point of audience and in the skill with which the program was arranged and presented.

Again there was a large attendance to-day at the free organ concert, given this time at the Central Church, corner of Berkeley and Newbury streets. George A. Burdett was the organist, and his program included the following selections: Alexandre Guilmant, two movements from his fifth organ sonata; Clara K. Rogers, song, From Dark to Light; Joseph Rheinberger, a prelude from Meditations, a cantilena from his eleventh organ sonata, and also a monologue from a series of twelve character pieces; F. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, air from oratorio St. Paul; F. De la Tombelle, Pontifical March.

The singing of the solos by Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke and Mr. Arthur W. Wellington added much to the success of the concert. Miss Clarke, in her delivery of the song by Mrs. Rogers, was very pleasing, and her rich soprano voice rang out in the great church with a freedom of tone which was most effective in the strong passages and equally enjoyable in the more delicate phrases. The same in general may be said of Mr. Wellington's singing of the air from St Paul. His strong, deep bass voice was in good form, and his clear enunciation, one of his good qualities, was especially noticeable in the quieter passages.

An important question as to the extent that equity will protect an assigned trade name by injunction was decided by the full bench of the Supreme Court on Friday in the case of Mary E. Messer against "The Fadettes" (corp.), Caroline B. Nichols, Jennie P. Daniell, Viola M. Dunn, Lilla V. Wyman, Anna F. Grant, Mary J. Tracy and Alice E. Ball. The court holds, in a majority opinion written by Judge Knowlton, that one cannot acquire by assignment a right, enforceable in equity by injunction, to a trade name the right or ownership in which depended upon the reputation of personal skill of the assignor.

The plaintiff purchased from Ethel Atwood all her right to the trade name The Fadette Ladies' Orchestra, together with the business itself. There was no contract made with the other members of the orchestra, some of whom are members of the defendant corporation, and they joined the latter company. The plaintiff brought this bill in equity to have the defendants restrained from using the trade name consisting of the words, The Fadette Ladies' Orchestra, claiming she alone had the right to use it by virtue of her contract with Miss Atwood. In holding she is not entitled to an injunction the majority of the court say:

"So far as Ethel Atwood had any right or ownership in the trade name which designated the organization under her management, it was personal to herself, depending upon her personal reputation and skill, and it was not assignable. The other musicians employed by her could not by her contract of sale be put in the control of other persons, and there was nothing in her relation that she could convey. The case is not like those in which there is a sale of fixed property and a local business to which the name belongs, and whose principal features remain unchanged after the sale. If the use by the plaintiff of the name 'Fadette Ladies' Orchestra' would have any influence beneficial to herself upon the public who wished to procure the services of such an organization, it would be only to mislead and defraud them by implying that she and such musicians as she employed were the same persons who had formerly gained a good reputation under their name. It is well known that the courts will not enforce a claim of this kind which contains a misrepresentation to the public."

Judge Lathrop views the case differently from his brethren, saying in part: "The opinion of the majority appears to be founded upon a view of the law which is sound within certain limitations; namely, that where the trade mark is that of the proprietor of the business it cannot be sold apart from the business, on the ground that it means to the public that the personal skill of a particular individual is exercised in the manufacture or selection of the goods upon which it is used. * * * But this doctrine has no application where the name is sold with the business. * * * In the case at bar I see no reason why the plaintiff was not entitled to have the trade name of the orchestra protected. Such a name is clearly to my mind assignable. It also seems to me that the defendants, being merely employés of the plaintiff and of her predecessor in title, could not, by

High=Class Artists.

THE
HENRY WOLFSOHN MUSICAL BUREAU,
131 East 17th Street, New York.

CARL

SPRING

BOHEMIAN
String Quartet.
Acknowledged to be the Finest Organization of its kind in the world.
MARCH, APRIL, MAY.
Address . . .
WOLFSOHN MUSICAL BUREAU,
131 East 17th Street, NEW YORK.

ANTONIA H.

February Facts.

The fifteenth Symphony Concert might be dubbed a ballet affair. Ballet music from Carmen; ballet music in Beethoven's overture, Men of Prometheus; and much like dance music in Tschaikowsky's Second Symphony, C minor, op. 17; while the Brahms violin Concerto in D, op. 77, with cadenza by C. M. Loeffler, magnificently played by Mr. Kneisel, lies in the same vivacious line. A thoroughly delightful week, and a relief from the depth of a Wagner operatic week.

With only two remaining performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, the announcement of the fourth concert in the series at Music Hall, on Wednesday evening, February 24, will awaken unusual interest. The soloist, Madame Teresa Carreno, fresh from her seven years' sojourn abroad, will play the Grieg concerto for pianoforte in A minor, opus 16, a work eminently suited to display her brilliant, dashing style and superb technique.

Of the three orchestral numbers, two are novelties; the prelude to Part III., of Karl Goldmark's opera, "The Cricket On the Hearth." This work was written and received its first performance a little less than a year ago in Vienna. The other novelty is the Hungarian Rhapsody No. 6, otherwise known as the "Pesther Carneval," by Liszt. The most important part of all the orchestral selections is Beethoven's first symphony, composed early in 1800, and presented to the public for the first time at his benefit on April [illegible] at the Burg Theatre

---

Sixt

Rich indee
Teresa Carr
the finest li played supe
Concerto in D called again
ly refusing t
many pianist pression with tics.

The orchest
tiful. No nee
Beethoven Sy
Academic, wh
Breslau degree
How could suc
ever have been

The absolute
Liszt orchestr
Hungarian Rh
val, a composi lover into ecsta
of bizarre effec

Readers of were startled name heading
Deaths; but it paragraph mi woman as thri mother!

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 8, 1897.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the seventeenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Goldmark: Overture to "Sakuntala," opus 13.
Arthur Whiting: Fantasy for Pianoforte and Orchestra, in B-flat minor, opus 11.
(First time in Boston).
Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch," opus 56.
Schubert: Overture to "Rosamunde," opus 26.
Mr. Arthur Whiting was the pianist.

Goldomark's "Sakuntala" was grandly played; the work itself wears well, better than one would have supposed twenty years ago; it is luxuriously sensuous music, not particularly interesting, but physically pleasant to listen to.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, too, was excellently well played; and, although it was given last year, and the composer's "Italian" has been played this very season, the audience seemed glad to hear it again. We think, however, that the symphony has aged somewhat more than its companion, the "Italian;" the second movement still remains one of the most brilliant things Mendelssohn, or anyone else, ever wrote; but all life has gone out from the 6-8 coda of the finale, and the slow movement begins to sound a little threadbare. One wonders how one ever could have found it heavenly. Would that we could hear Mendelssohn's concert overtures oftener! In them the great man shows himself at his very best.

Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture went, as it seemed to us, rather tamely. But its place on the programme may have been at fault, rather than anything in the performance. When the programme was so well arranged as it was at first—beginning with the "Rosamunde" and ending with the "Sakuntala"—it seems strange that any change should have been made in it. As it was, the "Sakuntala" did Mr. Whiting's Fantasy no good; and all the wind was taken out of the "Rosamunde's" sails.

Mr. Whiting's Fantasy is a work to uphold, and increase, the composer's reputation. It is one of the most original things we know. Mr. Whiting has joined the modern composers' expedition to discover something that will take the place of the old cyclical forms in three or four movements. We do not know that this expedition has as yet made any very important discovery. The notion of joining the separate movements together seems to us of no very material importance; if there is an essential connection between the two movements, this tying them together does not strengthen it; if there is no such connection, it does not establish any. We have never been able to appreciate, for instance, that Mendelssohn really gained anything, one way or the other, by suppressing the customary waits between the movements of his "Scotch" symphony. It is quite another matter when one movement is actually worked up to debouch into another—as in the scherzo and finals of Beethoven's C-minor symphony;—here something is unquestionably gained. But it may well be doubted whether applying this method between all the movements of a long symphonic composition would not result in somewhat obscuring the form. Liszt's tying together the comparatively short sectons of his symphonic poems, again, is a dfferent matter; for these sections have little distinctness of musical form in themselves. A priori speculation can, on the whole, do little in the business. Still, one may suspect that, if anything of real value is to be gained by tying together the separate movements of cyclical forms, it can be gained only by effecting some change in the form of the separate movements themselves, by letting the form of the one somehow influence the form of the other, and thus establishing essential symmetrical relations between the two, as parts of an organically constructed whole. This Mr. Whiting seems to us to have done with the first and second movements of his Fantasy. Here he has done very much what was done before him by Louis Brassin in his pianoforte concerto. He has worked up his first movement in regular sonata form, up to the end of the first part; then, just as you expect him to begin his free fantasia, or "working-out," he leads over by a cadenza to his slow movement. After this Pastorale, he leads back to his first movement again, taking it up at what would regularly have been the beginning of the third part, thus getting the due formal counterpoise to the first part. His Pastorale (second movement) is really nothing but a slow episode, introduced between the first and third parts of his first movement; the balance of the form is perfect, and its clearness beyond reproach. On the other hand, we do not see that Mr. Whiting has gained anything by the transitional cadenza leading over to his third movement. His finale is too long to be accepted as a coda on a new theme, and its self-dependent form still further precludes its serving as such; the movement is an independent whole in itself, and the mere tying it to what has gone before does not establish any real connection. Even admitting the excellence of this finale, we cannot help feeling that the formal balance of the whole Fantasy would have gained by its omission, and that Mr. Whiting would have done better to have followed Brassin's scheme—resting content with his interlocked first and second movements. Apart from these formal considerations, Mr. Whiting's Fantasy strikes us as a conspicuously fine work; fresh and vital in invention, full of life and beauty, and carried through with a very firm hand. His use of both pianoforte and orchestra is admirable, and steadily effective. He played the work capitally. He and his composition were warmly received by the audience, and the success was one of enthusiasm.

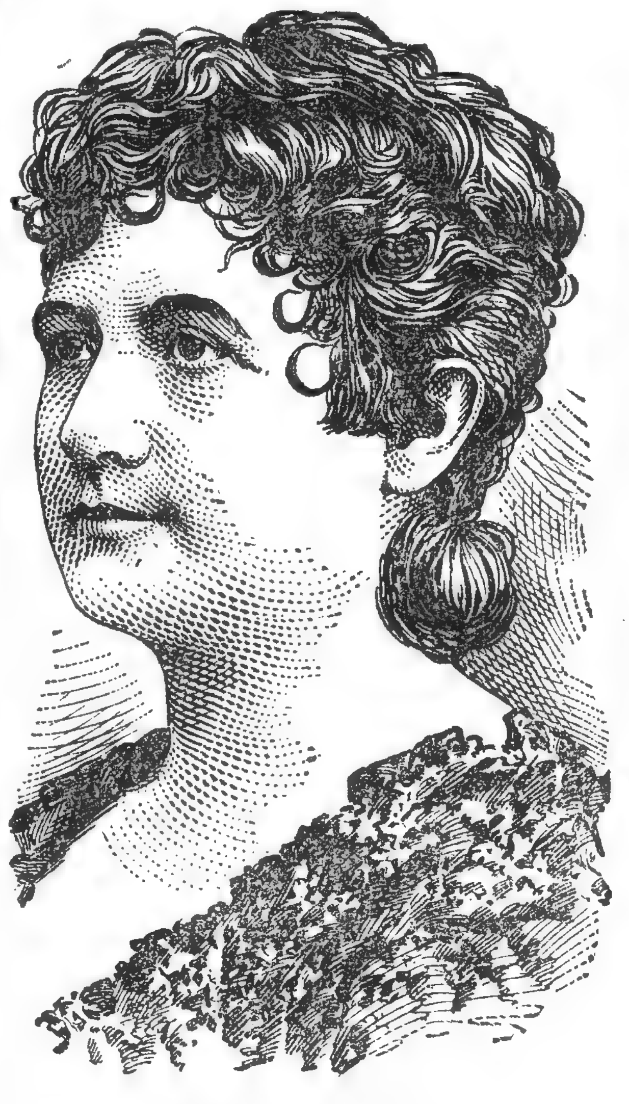
The next programme is: Gluck, overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide" (Wagner's arrangement); Lalo, symphonie espagnole, for violin and orchestra; Cowen, symphony in C minor, "Scandinavian." Mr. Timothée Adamowski will be the violinist.

The Telegram

EVENING AND SUNDAY.

SUNDAY, MARCH 7, 1897.

Only two more concerts remain of this season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Infantry hall. The fifth concert is announced for next Wednesday evening, March 10, and more than usual interest will be awakened by the fact that the soloists will be the famous pianiste, Madame Teresa Carreno, who returns to America after an absence of eight years, during which time she has scored the most brilliant triumphs in nearly all the European capitals.



TERESA CARRENO,
Pianist.

Her reputation, already great when she left this country, has been very materially enhanced during her stay abroad and today her art is well nigh perfect. Madame Carreno during the past three weeks has won a series of ovations in her performances with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. She will pay Rubinstein's tremendously difficult concerto for Pianoforte No. 4, and it is quite safe to predict a repetition of her triumphs elsewhere.

The orchestral selections include Beethoven's fourth symphony, in the very front ranks of perfect musical form and artistic inspiration. It is interesting to record the first performance of this symphony ninety years ago this month in Vienna, and it is equally pertinent to ask how many works of modern classical composers will be listed in the repertoire of every orchestra of any note ninety years later? The remaining orchestral selections are Schumann's charming "Genoveva" overture and a rarely played but most fascinating Hungarian Rhapsody known as the "Pesther Carneval" from its dedication to the city of Buda-Pesth by its composer Franz Liszt. This promises to be the most interesting of any of the concerts ever given in Providence by this celebrated organization, and an immense audience is an assured fact.

PROVIDENCE SOCIAL GOSSIP.

Not only was it the largest audience of the season's series, but the largest in Infantry hall this winter at a concert, and the very largest that the Boston Symphony orchestra has ever had greet them, that attended the symphony concert Wednesday evening.

It was an audience containing many strange faces and particularly emphasized the fact that the Boston Symphony orchestral concerts have become very popular this season and at the same time contradicts the assertion that has often been made that Providence is not a musical city. The audience, too, had some Boston folk, who came here to hear Mme. Teresa Carreno.

When there is anything of decided artistic merit, no matter whether it is musical or dramatic, this city can be relied upon to appreciate the attraction.

The audience Wednesday was decidedly enthusiastic. The applause which Mme. Carreno's playing evoked was something tremendous, and has only been equalled by one Melba night two seasons ago.

Although no unusual or special announcement was made that Mme. Carreno would appear with the orchestra, the demand for seats on the left side of the hall, so that the movement of her arms and fingers could be watched as she played, testified that the brilliant pianist was the attraction of the evening.

It was much more interesting, however, to watch her face, as every change of tempo, phrasing and movement was strikingly indicated by her countenance. As she brilliantly and forcibly concluded each movement her countenance plainly expressed how relieved she felt to think that she had accomplished her rendition so successfully.

She wore a demi-trained gown of yellow peau de soie, banded with three narrow bands of Russian sable. Her corsage was trimmed with silver lace, fastened with diamond pins and forming caps for the shoulders. The gown was most becoming to her Spanish complexion and bright expression, for, although born in Venezuela, her parents were Spaniards. The fact that she has appeared not once, but several times, in opera, and with unexpected success, may account for the expressive countenance she exhibits while playing.

The concert began with Schumann's overture to "Genoveva." As usual, because the concerts begin precisely at 8 o'clock, to enable the orchestra to catch the last train for Boston, quite a percentage of the audience missed the overture. But there was no one late for Carreno's Rubinstein concerto, which was the second number on the programme.

The applause which greeted her as she concluded the first movement was something tremendous. It was equally demonstrative as she concluded her brilliant performance. She was recalled no less than six times, the orchestra joining with the audience. Mr. Paur in his enthusiasm upset his music stand.

Mme. Carreno played the concerto in Washington last week, receiving quite an ovation from her audience of diplomats, senatorial and official folk, but they could not have expressed themselves any more forcibly than her Providence audience did on Wednesday.

Mr. Paur seemed determined that she should respond to the recalls, as he sat down and continued the applause until Mme. Carreno could not but yield. She played a Chopin waltz without orchestral accompaniment. Even when this was over the audience would have appreciated more, but withal felt that they had been very much favored, as it is so very rare indeed that encores are given at the Symphony concerts, principally because there is not sufficient time.

The orchestra evidently felt the effects of the enthusiasm and the pianoforte work, and played themselves with telling effect. The Beethoven symphony was rather misplaced, coming after Mme. Carreno's number, instead of before, so the audience was not in just the mood to appreciate its orchestral beauties. The concert ended with the "Pesther Carneval," by Liszt, which the orchestra gave for the first time.

Among the audience who enjoyed the concert were Mr. and Mrs. William Goddard, Miss Anna Roelker of Cincinnati, who sat in the front row during Mme. Carreno's playing, with Mr. and Mrs. Edward Hoffman and their party, just behind; Mr. and Mrs. Louis T. Foster, Miss Mollie Foster, Mr. Jeffrey Hazard, Miss Harriet Hazard, Mrs. Roscoe T. Washburn, Mrs. Maurice King Washburn, Mrs. H. N. Campbell, Jr., Mrs. Kimball, Miss Ruth Kimball, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Metcalf, Mr. John C. Pegram, Miss Nannie Pegram, Miss Rosa Grosvenor, Mrs. George S. Collins, Miss Dwight, Mr. and Mrs. Aldrich, Mr. Frank Cranston, Mrs. Ellen B. Cameron, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Wood, Miss Florence Wood, Mr. and Mrs. Howard O. Sturges, Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Hodgman, Dr. Ham, Miss Arnetto Ham, Mrs. George H. Corliss, Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Hunt, Mr. E. M. Guild, Mr. and Mrs. Herreshoff, Miss Sharpe, Mrs. John P. Campbell, Mrs. A. Shepardson Nauck, Mr. and Mrs. Frank E. Richmond, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Bailey, Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Childs, Mrs. Barrows, Miss Florence Reynolds, Mr. and Mrs. Amos Palmer.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.

MONDAY, MARCH 8, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY.

Mr. Arthur Whiting Plays His Own Fantasia for the Pianoforte.

Sixteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; seventeenth concert. Mr. Arthur Whiting, soloist. The programme:

Overture to "Sakuntala," op. 13..Karl Goldmark
Fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra, in B-flat minor....................Arthur Whiting
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch," Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
Overture to "Rosamunde"......Franz Schubert

Although Mr. Arthur Whiting's Fantasia has been heard before in this vicinity, it was to all intents and purposes a new work, creating new impressions, and very favorable ones. "Sanity" is the best word to describe the work—and the word means much in these days of hysterical composition. This piece runs after no strange gods, consequently bows to no false ones. Its calm classicism soothes the soul and enforces the conviction that there is still a great deal to be said in the mode that Mr. Loeffler, for instance, would scorn to employ. Nor is there lacking in Mr. Whiting's thoughts a deal of beauty and poetry of expression. All charm is not found in passion, nor all loveliness in depth. The Fantasia has moments of great interest, and has the all-saving grace of never being dull. Its writing is scholarly, its orchestration cleverly fitted to the pianoforte's share. The Pastorale in particular delights the ear by its limpid clearness, while the Allegro Scherzando bubbles over with the well-tempered enthusiasm of an evenly-balanced man. Such a work cannot be called great, but it deserves all praise in that it never attempts to do that which it cannot do well.

Mr. Whiting played the work with great care and finish. His tone is more clean and musical, his technique more sparkling, than of yore. It was evidently a labor of love, and you felt that you might go far before hearing a more logical and satisfactory performance of the work.

Nothing of Mendelssohn's stands the test of time like the "Scotch" Symphony; another labor of love glorified by a great enthusiasm and the impress of romantic surroundings. So it charms as fully on the tenth hearing as at the first. Where is a more fascinating and airy dance in all symphonic writing than the vivace of this "Scotch," or a more beautiful love song than the wonderful adagio? Save that there might have been more power and sonority of the final maestoso, the work was admirably, delightfully played.

Goldmark's rich and sensuous style is beautifully represented in the "Sakuntala" overture, which now seems sure of a permanent place in musical libraries. It had a sympathetic reading and a magnificent performance.

The "Rosamunde" shows Schubert in lightest vein, but none the less interesting for that. If at times you think you are listening to the weak Italianism of his day, some distinctively Schubertian touch soon shows your error. Its gaiety and unaffected beauty are a perfectly competent excuse for its being.

W. D. QUINT.

PROVID

THURSDAY, MARCH 11, 1897.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Large Audience and Brilliant Programme at Infantry Hall.

The fifth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Infantry Hall last evening. There was an unusually large audience, the hall being much nearer filled than at any previous concert of the series. The addition to the regular attendance was undoubtedly due to the announcement as soloist for the evening of Madame Teresa Carreno, the famous pianist, fresh from her European triumphs, and now in the midst of a phenomenally successful American tour. Nor were they disappointed, for such piano playing has seldom been heard in Infantry Hall as that which last night awoke a storm of demonstrative recognition. The orchestral part of the programme, too, was of unusual brilliancy, and played with superb precision and telling effect. The order of the evening's music was as follows:

Robert Schumann..........................
Oveuture to "Genoveva," in C minor, Op. 81
Anton Rubinstein...Concerto for pianoforte, ...No. 4, in D minor, Op.70
I. Moderato (D minor).
II. Moderato assai (F major).
III. Allegro assai (D minor).
Ludwig van Beethoven..................
..Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, Op. 60
I. Adagio (B-flat major).
Allegro vivace (B-flat major).
II. Adagio (E-flat major).
III. Allegro vivace (B-flat major).
Trio: Un poco meno Allegro (B-flat major).
IV. Finale: Allegro ma non troppe (B-flat major).
Liszt......... Hungarian Rhapsody No. 6, ...("Pesther Carneval")
(First time).

The overture to Schumann's only opera is a striking piece of music, thoroughly characteristic of its composer's peculiar and original genius. The opera itself was a partial failure, not because it did not contain good music, but rather on account of a weak and unsatisfactory libretto. Schumann did not care to repeat the effort, and in fact it may be doubtful if he would have won success in the operatic field. He was learned, ingenious, imaginative, and gifted with much poetic feeling, but the bent of his mind was introspective and found its readiest expression in the domain of pure music. This very overture is symphonic in character, though not in form. There is not an uninteresting measure in it, from its sombre and melancholy opening to its extraordinarily brilliant and resounding close. The orchestra played it with remarkable effect.

Mme. Carreno could hardly have selected anything more suitable with which to exploit her unquestioned and world-famous talent than Rubinstein's great D-minor concerto. If any of the Russian pianist-composer's works are destined to endure, it is this. It is equally great as music and as a vehicle for pianistic display. And it is especially suited for players who can compass power without undue pounding and whose performance can be adequately described by that much-abused term, brilliancy. One can easily imagine that Rubinstein wrote this concerto for himself; certainly no one can play it as it should be played unless possessed of something akin to the powers that made its composer the most famous pianist of his generation. It is a real piano concerto, that is to say the piano is the central figure, first, last and all the time, and not a mere incident to be blotted out of existence by every orchestral tutti. Of Madame Carreno's performance of this master-work it can only be said that it was mognificent in every sense of the word. Such superb brilliancy and sustained energy, such fire and dash and nervous force, coupled with astounding technical ease and facility, are seldom to be heard. Nor was delicacy and sentiment wanting in the beautiful second movement of the concerto, where ample apportunity is afforded to display the singing quality of the piano and the worth of a quiet legato. On this side, too, Madame Carreno proved herself a remarkable artist. The enthusiasm which greeted her at the concerto's close was well deserved. Time after time she was recalled, audience and orchestra joining in the applause, until finally the unusual favor at a symphony concert of an encore was granted. For this a Chopin waltz was given, played with such charm that more recalls were in order before the player was regretfully allowed to depart.

It is somewhat unusual to find a Beethoven symphony the least interesting number on a programme, but such was the case last night. The fourth symphony is not reckoned as one of his greatest, to be sure, but it is Beethoven after all. Yet it fell flat between the brilliant Rubinstein concerto and the startlingly original Liszt rhapsody. This latter was played with marvellous finesse, every bit of its gorgeous tone-color and tricky rhythm being made the most of. The orchestra, in fact, were decidedly on their mettle all the evening.

The sixth and last concert of the series will be given on the evening of Wednesday, April 21, with a soloist to be announced later.

Mus. Rec't.
Feb. 25

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Special importance was attached last evening to even such an important event as a Boston Symphony concert by the reappearance, after an absence of eight years, of Teresa Carreno. This great artist and woman has been playing in Europe for the past seven years with the enormous success which inevitably attends her every appearance. She comes back now even bigger and broader than when she left, and even then she was accounted one of the very greatest pianists of the world. So magnetic, so irresistible is her influence that to adequately describe her playing is well-nigh impossible. No other player ever had this great compelling force except Rubinstein, whom she resembles more than she does any other pianist. Rubinstein always called her his musical child, and in proof of it, compared their hands, saying: "Here is mine; here is hers, its counterpart—proof that she is my child."

She played last evening the Greig concerto, one of the loveliest works ever written for the piano. It is naturally a great favorite, both with artists and audiences. Madame Carreno played the concerto as Grieg would have it played. Three years ago she was playing it in Leipsic, the occasion being a public rehearsal of a Gewandhaus concert. After her performance a man rushed upon the stage, seized her hand, and shook it in the most enthusiastic manner, saying: "My name is Greig. I had no idea until this moment how beautiful my concerto is. It is no longer my concerto—it is yours." Since then she has played it many times under his direction in Copenhagen, Vienna and elsewhere, always with enormous success. Last night was no exception. The enthusiasm she created was so great that the usual rules of the symphony concerto had to be broken, and she was forced to play an encore, and in doing so showed her versatility. She chose to play the Chopin "Berceuse." This lovely piece, so hackneyed from being played by every pupil who studies the piano, was given the most dainty and beautifully-finished performance, entirely free from the mawkish sentimentality with which it is usually invested.

The playing of the orchestra seemed even better than ever last evening. There is no doubt that it is in more perfect technical condition this season than ever before, and its playing is flawless. The programme opened with the first symphony of Beethoven, which was given a most finished performance, and showed Mr. Paur in his most sympathetic light. The other pieces on the programme were the prelude to Part III. of "The Cricket on the Hearth," by Karl Goldmark, and the ninth Hungarian rhapsody of Liszt, the "Pesther Carnival," and numbered 6 on the programme. Both were played here for the first time, although a potpouri of airs from the "Cricket" has been played by Sousa's band, and the Liszt is familiar in its original version for the piano. The former is charming, not particularly original, but beautifully treated and orchestrated in Goldmark's best style, and it was charmingly played. It is a pity the Liszt rhapsodies have to figure on orchestral programmes; they are hackneyed from over-much piano-recital playing, and there is so much great orchestral music to be played that is not.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 14, 1897.

The Symphony Concert.

A very enjoyable program, representing the modern school of composition, was prepared by conductor Paur for the 18th of this season's symphony concerts It was as follows:

Christoph Willibald, Ritter von Gluck,
Overture to Iphigenia in Aulis.
(Richard Wagner's arrangement.)
Edouard Lalo,
Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra, in D minor, op. 21.
Karl Maria von Weber,
Invitation to the Dance, op. 65.
(Arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner.)
(First time in Boston.)
Frederic Hymen Cowen,
Symphony No. 3, in C minor, Scandinavian.
Soloist, Mr T. Adamowski.

The most agreeable feature of the concert was the performance of Weingartner's splendid transcription of the familiar "Invitation to the Dance." It is wonderfully brilliant and showy work, but is treated in a thoroughly artistic manner and faithfully preserves the melody of Weber's themes. The audience was uncommonly demonstrative in expressing delight and required Mr Paur to bow his acknowledgments half a dozen times or more. A large portion of the audience would have welcomed a repetition of the number in defiance of the orchestra's rule regarding encores. Such spontaneous applause is rarely heard at these concerts, excellent evidence that a majority of the Symphony concert patrons are fond of real melody and would be glad if given more frequent opportunities of enjoying it.

Mr [illegible] friends gave him a very cordial welcome, and generously applauded his performance of Lalo's fascinating symphony for violin and orchestra. Although the interpretation was not always faultless in the matter of tone production and occasionally lacked the effect of sincerity, his playing was very creditable, and was something of an improvement on his previous performances at these concerts.

Wagner's arrangement of Gluck's overture was played by the orchestra with splendid spirit and expression, and was listened to with genuine pleasure. Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony contains a great variety of tone color and many beautiful orchestral effects, but it is excessively long, and the monotonous repetitions are rather wearisome.

Mr Richard Burmeister will be the soloist at this week's symphony concert, playing Beethoven's No. 5 concerto for pianoforte. The other selections will be a symphonic suite by N. Rimsky Korsakow, entitled "Scheherazade," its first performance here, and Haydn's symphony in D major.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 14, 1897.

The Eighteenth in the Symphony

The program of the Symphony concert last night in Music Hall, Mr. Paur conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"......Gluck
(Wagner's arrangement.)
Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra, in D minor, Op. 21........Lalo
"Invitation to the Dance" ....Weber
(Arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner.)
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 3, in C minor, "Scandanavian" ....Cowen

And first a word about the program book. Weingartner's name is not spelled Weingaertner; or in other words the "a" is not modified.

The program book says Weingartner has written two operas. He has written three. "Genesius," the third, was produced in Berlin, Nov. 15, 1892.

The program book makes no mention of Weingartner's strife stirring pamphlets: one on conducting, in which he has a bitter attack on the ultra-modern conductor; one published last year in which he attacks the present management of the Beyreuth festival. In each of these articles he roasts Nordica unmercifully. He has written other pamphlets, and when "Genesius" was produced in Berlin he made a savage reply in the newspapers to the critics.

The program book tells when Cowen's fourth and fifth symphonies were produced. It does not give the date of the first performance of the third symphony, the one played last night. This date is Dec. 18, 1880. Nor in the sketch of Cowen's life is there any illusion to his operas, "Signa," first produced at Milan in 1893, and "Harold," produced at London in 1895. "Pauline" (1876) is mentioned, but it was a failure, not "brought out with great success"; there is no allusion to "Thorgrim," produced in 1889, which met with a happier fate.

And now let us consider the concert itself for a few minutes.

The only novelty was Weingartner's arrangement of Weber's familiar piece. The first performance that I find noted was at Berlin, Jan. 31, 1896, by the Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by the composer. This piece may be fairly called a paraphrase. Weingartner, in a cocky preface, says that Berlioz wrote his arrangement of the waltz, "as it stands, without any alteration." Weingartner, tempted by the thematic relation of the first and second themes in contrapuntal combination, has turned the simple, melodious music into polyphony, so that the climax is a case of "And now you have them all together. Just see how clever I am." His work is clever; but music should be something more than this. I do not object to this version on any ground of irreverence toward Weber, I do object to it because Weber's piece loses its continuous, flowing beauty, and its defined rhythmic swing. Nor does the tossing of themes from one instrument to another console me for the loss of continuity of phrase. The Weingartner version is a brilliant example of the craze for orchestral polyphony to display personal ability at any cost. After the performance—and it was played with great spirit—the thought came, "What a pleasure it would be to now hear the arrangement by Berlioz."

Lalo's delightful suite was first played by Sarasate at a Châtelet concert Feb. 7, 1875. It was introduced in Boston by Mr. Loeffler Nov. 12, 1887, and he played it again Feb. 8, 1890. The music itself gains at each hearing. The composer here stands above the mere folk-lorist. There is a pungent melancholy, as well as a refined joy, peculiar to Lalo, and the delicacy and the strength of the orchestration are a constant pleasure. This is more than a mere virtuoso piece. Mr. Adamowski at first was not apparently in the vein, and his intonation was impure; but he soon recovered himself, and, then, until the end his performance was admirable. He played with genuine warmth that was, however, held well in hand; his technique was equal to the demands, and it was used with a certain elegance of manner that is his own. Mr. Adamowski has true virtuoso blood in his veins. It is a pleasure to add that he shows at each performance a steady gain in purely musical qualities and a firmer control over his naturally exuberant temperament. He well deserved last night the hearty and long continued applause.

Cowen's Symphony does not wear, and much of it now seems too amiable and commonplace. The slow movement with the distant horn quartet recalls the once popular piano piece "Moonlight on the Hudson."

The Gluck overture is still noble in its simplicity and austerity in spite of Wagner's attempt to ruin it by changing the tempo. Mr. Apthorp's remarks on Wagner's views are well worth reading. Nor did Mr. Paur last night humor Wagner to the detriment of Gluck.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 15, 1897.

The Symphony Concert---Treatment of Famous Works.

The concert of Saturday presented two very interesting treatments of famous works, the first being Wagner's version of Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" overture, the second Weingartner's perversion of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance." The concert began with the former. While one cannot agree with Wagner's attack upon Mozart's treatment of the Gluck subject (remembering that Mozart was of the epoch and certainly more directly in touch with Gluck than a modern could be) one cannot but be impressed with the dignity which Wagner has displayed in retouching this number, a proof of his dramatic instinct and of his assimilation of the spirit of even the earliest works in the earnest and truthful vein.

Far apart as the two composers might seem to be on a superficial examination, there was a distinct kinship between them, and in Gluck one finds the embryo of the "School of the Future," he was the Wagner of the last century. The performance of the work was admirable, and Mr. Paur did not exaggerate the Wegner part of the old overture.

Next came Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin and orchestra, with Mr. T. Adamowski as soloist. It was interesting from its very first notes and had the great merit or defect (it all depends upon the point of view) of placing the soloist constantly in the foreground.

Mr. Adamowski stood the ordeal nobly; he was in his best form and played with an expression and surety that deserves a shower of laudatory adjectives. The finale might have had more breadth to advantage, but this slight lack was atoned for by the splendid virtuosity with which the climax was worked up, a magnificent coda.

The Scherzo was especially attractive with its hints of Fandangoes and cachucas in the background while the violin sang its poetic themes above the rhythmic support; it was altogether charming but not the least bit symphonic; in fact "Symphonie Espagnole" is decidedly a misnomer unless we take the "symphonic" in the Gallic sense of merely "orchestral" and do not look for the chief characteristics of symphonic work.

The Carillon effect of the finale gave some excellent figure treatment, the best in the whole work, and reminded of what Bizet had done in his first "Suite Arlesienne," with a similar bell-like figure. Mr. Adamowski's splendid work was thoroughly appreciated by the audience, who called him out again and again and would have continued the process had he not modestly put an end to it by resuming his seat in the orchestra.

Now followed a distortion of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," in which the great conductor, Weingaertner, proved two things,—1st, that he is possessed of much contrapuntal skill,—2nd, that he has totally misunderstood the spirit of Weber's work.

It sounds absurd to have this composer shrug his shoulders at Berlioz's conservative setting of the tone-poem, saying that "he, for once, underestimated the powers of his orchestra;" Berlioz could have given the most brilliant working up of the picture imaginable but he understood that it was a delicate representation of a scene "a deux," a sentimental dialogue, and he kept to its limitations.

Not so Weingaertner; he sets to work at painting the violet with unmitigated ardor; he paints it a bright yellow; he transforms it into something like a sun-flower; the lovers' dialogue (as definite as the dialogue of shepherd and shepherdess in the "Sinfonie Fantastique") becomes a thing of many voices—the conversation of an entire ball room. The themes are interwoven with wondrous skill, the work is interesting from first to last, but it is the right thing in the wrong place.

In the coda the themes are combined in a fierce climax; they no longer dance a waltz but the Carmagnole! This is what our composer calls translating the original piano thought into orchestral language! "Bless thee, Bottom! Bless thee! thou are translated!"

We confess to a great affection for Cowen's "Scandinavian Symphony," with which the concert ended. It gives expression to that melancholy which every traveler in Norway has felt, and it also gives voice to the characteristic folk-music that is the delight of all Scandinavia. The first movement has the true symphonic contrast, and the peculiar downward progressions of the minor mode are used in a strikingly effective fashion.

All through the work there is as much of the "paysagiste" as of the original composer present, and Cowen never allows the auditor to forget the atmosphere of the North. The strength of the broad unison passages is of Viking force, a heroic vein is attained that suits perfectly to such a song of the North. Nor is the more tender expression (often the prerogative of the subordinate theme in symphonic construction) absent; rarely in modern works have the strong and the gentle been so well united.

The slow movement is frankly picturesque, but it is none the less an effective number; even while acknowledging that the symphonic standard is not attained here, one can emphatically asseverate that the emotion pictured is the true one for its purpose. The present writer could sum up his impressions of the Norwegian fjords in the ashen daylight of a summer evening in the single verse of Longfellow:—

"A feeling of sadness and longing
That is not akin to pain,
And resembles sorrow only
As the mist resembles rain," and these lines might serve well enough for a motto for this particular Adagio. The horns played excellently in this movement and the harp echoed their distant tones with great beauty, nor must the fine playing of that instrument of dreamy melancholy, the English horn, go unrecorded.

The muted violins galloped along right merrily in the third movement, a suggestion of a winter scene, somewhat enhanced by the contrast of a sombre trio.

The finale is not so strong as the foregoing movements. It attains a certain unity with the work by introducing both the first and second subjects of the opening movement again, the latter being made very prominent. But neither these nor other devices (as, for example, the robust unison passage of the beginning of this movement) succeed in producing the effect that is intended; the reminiscences have only the effect of repetition, the movement is prolix and a true climax is not attained. One might cordially wish that some day the gifted composer would go back to Norway and think out another ending to this fine representation of the spirit of Scandinavia. Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CI., NO. 73.

SUNDAY, MARCH 14, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr. Paur and the Orchestra at Their Very Best.

The programme for last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall was:

Overture, "Iphigenia in Aulis".........Gluck
Symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra......................................Lalo
"Invitation to the Dance"...............Weber
(Weingartner's arrangement.)
"Scandinavian" symphony..............Cowen

Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist.

Richard Wagner's arrangement of the Gluck overture was the one performed. Mozart's is the more familiar, and, on the whole, the better one, since it was more in the spirit of the age in which the work was written. Wagner discussed the overture with the volubility that he discussed everything about which he undertook to write. In his simple, unpretentious introduction to the opera, Wagner professed to find "a motive of painful, gnawing sorrow; a motive of violence, of commanding, overbearing demand; a motive of grace, of maidenly tenderness; a motive of painful, tormenting pity." Unhappily, he did not find a leit motif. In the mean while, it may be safely surmised that Gluck, after the fashion of his day, was merely concerned in writing an overture pure and simple, without any thought of the variety of motives that Wagner has discovered in the contents of his work. His principal aim was, in all probability, the very sensible one of putting his audience in a proper frame of mind for what was to follow on the rising of the curtain. Wagner's ending of the overture, which originally led directly into the first scene of the opera, is well enough, and does no outrage to what goes before, and there the subject might have been left, without making so much pother over it.

The Weingartner arrangement of the Weber waltz is quite another business and calls for more weighty consideration. It is remarkably clever in its way, and much ingenuity is shown in the orchestration; but the work is no longer Weber's, under this new treatment, and is to be looked on rather in the light of a transcription or of a fantasie than as a fair carrying out of the composer's intention. Three subjects of the waltz are brought very cleverly into simultaneous conjunction in the coda, but the original spirit of the thing is changed completely, and something very nearly resembling noisy beer garden music is suggested by this violent wrenching of the themes to such treatment. It has more of the aspect of a dull joke than of serious purpose. Then, too, the melodies are so distorted in distributing them fragmentarily among the various instruments that their pristine grace and flow are completely obliterated. Weingartner has shown conclusively how very skilful he is in the use of the resources of modern instrumentation, but he has also shown how exceedingly tasteless a good musician can be when he is lacking in judgment. Under these conditions he has vulgarized what was chaste, and belittled what was as dignified as it could be. He complains that Berlioz, "that great master of the art of instrumentation, had this time undervalued the executive capacity of his orchestra in every direction," but the "great master of instrumentation," sensational as he could be when ocacsion seemed to him to demand it, was, at least, respectful to this masterpiece in little, and did not attempt to make it say what its composer never intended it should say, by changing its entire spirit, and leaving not a trace of its original harmonious hues, repainting it from a palette overcharged with glaring colors, laid on with a heavy touch and a coarse brush. There is no question of the arranger's skill, but there is a highly important question regarding the propriety and the necessity of such impertinent and perverting meddling with a standard classic. The arrangement, which makes great exactions on the performers, was brilliantly and excitingly performed, and by the enthusiastic reception given to it by the audience, it is reasonable to infer that it pleased them greatly.

Lalo's violin work wears well. It abounds in beauties of melody, treatment and orchestration, and grows in estimation the better it is known. Mr. Adamowski played the solo part with easy mastery of its difficulties, and with a thorough appreciation of its demands, technical and expressive. The performance was admirable in point of taste and able and interesting generally, and the acclaim and the three imperative recalls that rewarded him were justly bestowed.

The Symphony was perfectly read and rendered. In fact, through the whole concert Mr. Paur and the orchestra were at their very best.

The selections for the next concert are: Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," by Korsakow, first time; concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, Beethoven; symphony in D, B. and H. No. 2, Haydn. Mr. Richard Burmeister is to be the soloist.

OBSCURED TEXT

SATURDAY EVENING Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 14.

The Symphony Concert.

The 18th concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening. The programme was:

Overture, "Iphigenia in Aulis"………Gluck
Spanish Symphony, D minor, op. 21…..Lals
"Invitation to the Dance"…………Weber
(Arranged for orchestra by F. Werngartner.)
Symphony No. 3, C minor…………Cowen
Soloist, Mr. T. Adamowski.

The novelty in the programme was the Werngartner arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance." The arrangement is undoubtedly brilliant and effective, but it is the brilliancy of the chromo lithograph, with its inherent tendency to vulgarity. One can almost imagine that one sees the broad lines of demarcation that separates Werngartner from Weber, and the difference in the qualities of the two works is unpleasantly apparent. Werngartner took a rare tropical fruit and sunk it out of sight in a pretty, but unappropriate, salad dressing, and the salad dressing robs the fruit of its savor and beauty. The work composed (?) by Mr. Werngartner would be heard at its best in an open-air beer garden, but it seems ashamed of itself in a symphony concert.

In the Lals symphony, Mr. Adamowski was heard to rare advantage; he has steadily improved in his art, and he plays with admirable broadness of style, dignity, refined taste and intelligence. He is to be heartily congratulated for his solid, honest and most artistic work.

The novelty for the next concert is the symphonic suite, "Scheherzade," by N. Rimsky Korsakow. Mr. Richard Burmeister will be the soloist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 14, 1897.

The eighteenth Symphony concert roamed Europe for its programme, with this result: Ancient Greece was represented by Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" overture; Spain, by Lalo's symphony for violin, in D minor, opus 21; Germany, by Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," in the orchestral arrangement of Felix Weingartner; and Scandinavia, by Cowen's third symphony, in C minor. Of these numbers only the third was new to Boston; and of course its subject matter must have been familiar to every hearer for this many a day. But this setting had more than mere novelty; it possessed ideality, sincerity, masterfulness and sympathy. As Weingartner says in his own explanation of his course, something more is required in the true transcription from the pianoforte than the scattering about of its measures to a larger number of voices than it possesses. Those voices should be so studied and so used that at every instant the orchestra shall be repeating in its own best way what the piano had first presented with the best of its resources. There should be a translation into a richer and fuller language of the thought and phrase of the first writer. Therefore Weingartner had treated the brilliant old concert piece almost symphonically for the contrast and combination of themes, the adaptation of instruments and the elaborate blending of all the chief motives in the cumulative conclusion. The playing was superb and the audience expressed its pleasure by calling Mr. Paur forward again and again. The overture and the symphony were also altogether well played. Indeed the orchestra has now grown so responsive to Mr. Paur's lightest suggestion, that it executes with such precision and elasticity, [illegible] is almost impossible to find. Mr. Adamowski [illegible] the Lalo music to the heartily demonstrative acceptance of the audience and his associates. He grows [illegible] many excellent qualities. Sentimentality and [illegible]ism have disappeared from his [illegible], and he has gained in broadened taste and greater manliness. One cannot help wishing [illegible]—as for about all the Boston violinists—a larger, more noble tone and a sturdier approach [illegible] which either power or passion inheres. And he is still not always faithful [illegible] especially in the higher flights. He read the scherzando and andante movements delightfully, but in the opening allegro, and still more in the final rondo, he seemed to be making hard work of the music and to be so much engrossed with the mere execution as not to be able to give attention to fulness of tone or ample sweep of phrase. One could hardly help feeling some small sense of inadequacy and wishing that for these few minutes Sarasate (to whom the symphony is dedicated) could take up that rushing rondo and fill it with fire, strength, volume and speed. But Mr. Adamowski did himself honor nevertheless by choice and accomplishment.

The next programme: N. Rimsky Korsakow, Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," First time; Beethoven, Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, soloist, Mr. Burmeister; Haydn, Symphony in D major (B. & H., No. 2.)

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 14, 1897.
(Copyright, 1897, Post Publishing Company.)

THE NINETEENTH SYMPHONY.

A well chosen and generally interesting programme was what the patrons of the symphony sat through last night. Four composers were represented, and the only novelty was Felix Weingartner's arrangement for grand orchestra of the tuneful and melodic "Invitation to the Dance" of von Weber. The composition has been "arranged" for both piano and orchestra several times since it was originally written in 1819, but Weingartner's arrangement is elaborate in treatment, and radically departs from the original themes, while yet retaining its identity and all the original melody. In the present case it is worked up to a grand climax in a combination of all its motifs. As played last night, the piece was altogether delightful. Mr. Paur and his band entered into the spirit of the occasion with much enthusiasm, and the ever changing variations, together with the general color of the themes, were all effectively brought out under the careful guidance of Mr. Paur. The number gave infinite pleasure, and the conductor had to acknowledge the applause several times.

Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist, playing Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," which is not frequently heard. Four of the five movements were given, and it must be recorded that Mr. Adamowski has seldom, if ever, been heard to better advantage at these concerts. His general technique has vastly improved, and his violin was handled in such a masterly manner as to emit the purest and sweetest tones. The number is not as much of a show piece or one so calculated to exhibit the versatility of a solo performer as many others usually heard, but it seemed to fit Mr. Adamowski's style admirably. Especially delightful was he in the second movement, a sort of scherzo, and at the close of each movement he was loudly applauded, and at the close was recalled some half dozen times.

The other numbers on the programme were Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," which opened the concert, and Cowen's Scandinavian symphony in four movements, with which the programme ended.

At next week's concert Mr. Richard Burmeister will play the Beethoven concerto, No. 5, and a new symphonic suite by N. Rimsky Korsakow will be heard.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.

MONDAY, MARCH 15, 1897.

The Symphony Concert.

Sixteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; eighteenth concert, Mr. T. Adamowski, soloist. The programme:

Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"……..Gluck
(Wagner's arrangement.)
Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra, in D minor, Op. 21…………Lalo
"Invitation to the Dance"…………Weber
(Arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner.)
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 3, in C minor, "Scandanavian"……………Cowen

There is no question that the Weingartner arrangement of Weber's lovely waltz was the salient point of the concert, the feature which aroused the most genuine enthusiasm and around which revolved considerable after argument and discussion. Wahtever else the brilliant German conductor has done, in this transcription he has certainly shown originality and genius enough to awake critical attack of the earnest sort that is really a compliment.

To be sure, Weingartner has departed far from the Weber simplicity, but what was there left to do after Berlioz's splendid yet faithful orchestral setting of the "Invitation"? The composition is in the extreme modern style, with intertwining themes, daring harmonies and rich and florid instrumentation. Its exciting power cannot be denied, nor can the great ability of its orchestral treatment. As to the propriety of seizing upon a great work and embellishing it with all modern art, that is to be settled by individual taste. But it is difficult to see any objection to a work so brilliantly accomplished and affording so much sincere pleasure. It seems scarcely necessary to say that it was played magnificently.

Mr. Adamowski gave the Lalo violin piece with his customary taste and impeccable technique, and with a shade more than usual of breadth and power. The work is a thoroughly good one, and seems likely to retain its place for a long time to come.

The Wagner arrangement of Gluck's beautiful overture is as impressive as ever, and it was read with great sympathy by Mr. Paur.

Spite of the general cleverness of Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony, and the occasional spots of real beauty, it results as a whole in boredom. It meanders along to unseemly length, saying the same things over and over again. It is the musical expression of a very respectable Englishman who had taken a two weeks' trip in the Northland, and was considerably impressed with the fiords and mountains.

W. D. QUINT.

[illegible]

MONDAY, MARCH 15, 1897.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Last Saturday's programme, for the eighteenth Symphony concert, was as follows:

Gluck: Overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide."
(Richard Wagner's arrangement.)
Lalo: Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra, opus 21.
Weber: "Aufforderung zum Tanz," opus 65.
(Arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingärtner.)
(First time in Boston.)
F. H. Cowen: Symphony No. 3, in C minor, "Scandinavian."
Mr. T. Adamowski was the violinist.

Gluck's beautiful overture was admirably played. After all Wagner's talk, and the counter-talk of the classicists of his day, about the proper tempo of the second part of this overture, it may be doubted whether any very definite decision has been arrived at. Wagner's arguments that the conductor's andante beat, indicated at the beginning of the slow introduction, should be maintained throughout the work seem, on the whole, more sensible and better grounded than his arguments in other similar cases often are. His saying that thus maintaining the initial rate of beat will make the second part sound, of itself, twice as fast as the introduction, and thus render the missing indication, "Allegro," unnecessary, is perfectly true. He well says, too, that, if the missing mark, "Allegro," is put at the beginning of the second part—as his classical opponents wished it to be—and the conductor beats accordingly twice as fast as before, the second part of the overture will sound, not twice as fast, but four times as fast as the introduction. We must own to thinking Wagner right, as far as his arguments go; but they, after all, touch only part of the main point at issue: the relative quickness of the two movements. But they are no help toward finding the true tempo of either. And one may still ask: Is this tempo to be decided by the character of the introduction, or by that of the second part? On which of these two movements is the conductor to base his standard of tempo? It seems to us the second part, a movement of very distinct rhythmic character, should decide this, rather than the introduction; for the introduction is one of those rather vague slow movements that can be taken (within certain limits) at almost any slow tempo. We think Mr. Paur takes it somewhat too slow for his beat to be well maintained through the second part. The opening measures of the second part sounded heavy and dragging last Saturday evening; he himself seemed to feel this, for he gradually quickened his beat and fell into the natural gait of the movement after a while. Had the introduction been taken not quite so slow, this need not have happened. Of Wagner's arrangement of the overture it should be said that the "3 bassoons, 3 trumpets and 4 horns," indicated at the beginning, might easily give the impression that Wagner had unduly tampered with Gluck's score; but this is not really the case; Wagner's additional bassoon, trumpet and pair of horns play no additional parts, but merely serve to reënforce the wind and bring it up to the proper balance with the large mass of strings in modern orchestras. His coda would be perfect were it not that he drags out the end with a modern "hard-death" persistency not quite in keeping with Gluck's simplicity of style; otherwise his coda is admirable.

Weingärtner's atrocity on Weber's delightful "Invitation" is a disgrace to anyone calling himself a musician.

We were heartily glad to hear Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony again. It is a genial, beautiful work, excellently written and scored; only the first and last movements are perhaps a thought too much spun out. There is no very striking originality in the symphony, perhaps — that second theme in the first movement might have been written by Sterndale Bennett—and the composer does not speak the Northern dialect quite so naturally as Gade, who was born to it. In a certain sense, the whole thing is based on Mendelssohn. But, apropos of this, it is curious to note how the "Mendelssohnian" composers in general—Julius Rietz, Gade, Sterndale Bennett—have only the Mendelssohn manner, not the Mendelssohn flavor. The thematic material in this symphony of Cowen's, in Gade's "Ossian" and "Im Hochland" overtures, in Bennett's "Najaden" and "Waldnymphe," is only very superficially Mendelssohnish; its aroma is, on the contrary, quite individual; only the style of writing comes from Mendelssohn. Bennett, Gade and Cowen may be disciples, but they are not mere imitators. The symphony was beautifully played, and, if it seemed to make no very vivid impression upon the audience, this is probably chiefly attributable to Cowen's style of instrumentation—like Gade's and Bennett's—being no longer effective in our vast Music Hall, after the more incisive and brilliant scoring of later composers.

Lalo's Spanish Symphony holds its own surprisingly well, considering the light character of the work. When Mr. Loeffler first played it here, several years ago, it seemed simply bewitching, the best "musical circus" we had ever heard. At his second performance of it, a few years later, it seemed, however, to have lost some of its effervescence. But now it sounds brilliant, clever, and sparkling as ever. There is infinite go to it, and no little beauty; it is a thing of no depth, but written with enormous skill. The instrumentation is a marvel; we know of no other instance of such full scoring producing the desired effect of brilliancy and richness, without in the least drowning out a solo violin. Mr. Adamowski played the first movement solidly and well, if not particularly effectively. That sort of thing is not quite in his line. But in the dainty waltz-theme of the Scherzando (second movement) all his inimitable charm of phrasing was felt, as he unrolled the seductive melody, and one saw that this was just what the music really meant. In a word, he played the movement superbly. In the ensuing Andante, that poignant Slavic sensibility of his, that natural instinct for being at once warm and graceful, made his playing a pure delight. In the Finale he was admirable; one might at moments feel the want of a certain mordancy of accent, which is not his; but his playing was sure, brilliant and elegant, full of life and sparkle; now and then [illegible]

[illegible] he would [illegible] the [illegible] accent of that eternally re[illegible] cello-theme, thus curing the [illegible] endless repetitions of it of all taint of monotony. At times one could almost see the theme wink! Mr. Adamowski was warmly received, and as warmly applauded and recalled. He richly deserved it.

The next programme is: Rimsky-Korsakoff, symphonic suite, "Scheherezade" (first time in Boston); Beethoven, pianoforte concerto No. 5, in E-flat major, opus 73; Haydn, symphony in D major (No. 2, Breitkopf & Härtel and Peters eds.). Mr Richard Burmeister will be the pianist.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 17, 1897.

The program of the eighteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra this season was as follows:

Overture to Iphigenia in Aulis……………………………Gluck
(Wagner's arrangement.)
Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra, in D minor, op. 21……………………………Lalo
Invitation to the Dance……………………………Weber
(Arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner.)
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 3, in C minor, Scandinavian…………………Cowen

The arrangement by Berlioz of Weber's piano piece never seemed so beautiful as it did in the memory of last night, after the performance of Weingartner's clever trick. For the trick is clever; and if cleverness were the only thing in music hats should be tossed in air for Weingartner. I see him watching the audience. At the climax he exclaims: "And now, ladies and gentlemen, you have all the themes together. Listen. Do you not hear them distinctly? There is no deception, I assure you. Thank you for your attention and applause." This pitching of the themes from one instrument to another, and this polyphonic cleverness do not console me for the loss of the original flowing, continuous beauty and defined rhythmic elegance.

The Scandinavian Symphony, by Cowen, does not wear well. It is too amiable in its expression—too suggestive of Cook's tourists in its local color. The slow movement, with the distant horn quartet, always puts me in mind of a part-song for male voices, beginning:

"Come away, come away;
Oh, come where the silver waves break!
Come away, come away;
There's moonlight on the lake."

Do you remember it? It's a sweet thing.

On the other hand, Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole gains at each hearing. It is much more than a display piece for a virtuoso. The composer is something more than a folklorist. The ingenuity, the delicacy, and at the same time the firmness of the orchestration are delightful, and the embroidery of the themes is so free from that which is vulgar or for the selfish pleasure of the violinist! Mr. Adamowski at first was not at his best; he soon recovered himself, and then acquitted himself admirably unto the end. Warmth, brilliancy and personal elegance of delivery, as well a sympathetic appeal made his performance an uncommon pleasure.

Mr. Paur did not give way too much to Wagner's opinions concerning the proper place of the overture by Gluck. Mr. Apthorp's remarks in the program book on Wagner's views are well worth reading. He well says: "Wagner himself admits that Mozart's concert coda to the overture is unbearable, if played at his (Wagner's) slower tempo; this shows pretty plainly, as it seems to me, that Mozart had the conventional, quicker tempo in mind when he wrote his coda. Now, Mozart must almost of necessity have been more in touch with the musical spirit of Gluck's day than Wagner can have been, and known the traditions better. Mozart's evidently pitching upon the quicker tempo for the second part of Gluck's overture may be accepted as pretty strong authority therefor."

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 21, 1897.

The program of the 19th Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in G minor, No. 40……….Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in F minor, op. 21………………………Chopin
Orchestration (and Cadenza for first movement) by R. Burmeister.
Symphony in D major (B. & H., No. 2)..Haydn

There is very little to be said about this concert, which was extraordinary only in the program. That Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite, which had been announced, was found too difficult for performance after a few rehearsals, was no excuse for presenting a program so trite and with such insufficient contrasts. The G minor symphony is a delightful work, an immortal work if you please, but the performance of a Mozart Symphony and a Haydn Symphony in one evening is too much of an eminently respectable thing, even in Lent.

Mr. Burmeister played with conspicuous elegance. His tone was eminently agreeable, his performance was very clean and fluent. His emotion, however, did not rise above well-bred salon behavior. You admired, you congratulated and complimented the pianist, but you could not help feeling that there is more in the concerto than was brought to the smooth surface. Mr. Burmeister is a well-equipped musician as well as pianist, and his orchestration is far less objectionable than the work of several who have tinkered the two concertos of Chopin. The elegance of his playing and the quiet modesty of his bearing pleased the audience mightily, but there have been more soulful performances of the F minor Concerto in Music Hall.

PHILIP HALE.

OBSCURED TEXT

SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 14.

The Symphony Concert.

The 18th concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening. The programme was:

Overture, "Iphigenia in Aulis" ....Gluck
Spanish Symphony, D minor, op. 21.....Lals
"Invitation to the Dance" ....Weber
(Arranged for orchestra by F. Werngartner.)
Symphony No. 3, C minor..............Cowen
Soloist, Mr. T. Adamowski.

The novelty in the programme was the Werngartner arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance." The arrangement is undoubtedly brilliant and effective, but it is the brilliancy of the chromo lithograph, with its inherent tendency to vulgarity. One can almost imagine that one sees the broad lines of demarcation that separates Werngartner from Weber, and the difference in the qualities of the two works is unpleasantly apparent. Werngartner took a rare tropical fruit and sunk it out of sight in a pretty, but unappropriate, salad dressing, and the salad dressing robs the fruit of its savor and beauty. The work composed (?) by Mr. Werngartner would be heard at its best in an open-air beer garden, but it seems ashamed of itself in a symphony concert.

In the Lals symphony, Mr. Adamowski was heard to rare advantage; he has steadily improved in his art, and he plays with admirable broadness of style, dignity, refined taste and intelligence. He is to be heartily congratulated for his solid, honest and most artistic work.

The novelty for the next concert is the symphonic suite, "Scheherzade," by N. Rimsky Korsakow. Mr. Richard Burmeister will be the soloist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 14, 1897.

The eighteenth Symphony concert roamed Europe for its programme, with this result: Ancient Greece was represented by Gluck's "Iphigenia in Antis" overture; Spain, by Lalo's symphony for violin, in D minor, opus 21; Germany, by Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," in the orchestral arrangement of Felix Weingartner; and Scandinavia, by Cowen's third symphony, in C minor. Of these numbers only the third was new to Boston; and of course its subject matter must have been familiar to every hearer for this many a day. But this setting had more than mere novelty; it possessed ideality, sincerity, masterfulness and sympathy. As Weingartner says in his own explanation of his course, something more is required in the true transcription from the pianoforte than the scattering about of its measures to a larger number of voices than it possesses. Those voices should be so studied and so used that at every instant the orchestra shall be repeating in its own best way what the piano had first presented with the best of its resources. There should be a translation into a richer and fuller language of the thought and phrase of the first writer. Therefore Weingartuer had treated the brilliant old concert piece almost symphonically for the contrast and combination of themes, the adaptation of instruments and the elaborate blending of all the chief motives in the cumulative conclusion. The playing was superb and the audience expressed its pleasure by calling Mr. Paur forward again and again. The overture and the symphony were also altogether well played. Indeed the orchestra has now grown so responsive to Mr. Paur's lightest suggestion, that it executes with such precision and elasticity, [illegible] is almost impossible to find. Mr. Adamowski [illegible] the Lalo music to the heartily demonstrated acceptance of the audience and his associates. He grows in many excellent qualities. Sentimentality and romanticism have disappeared from his [illegible], and he has gained in broadened taste and greater manliness. One cannot help wishing [illegible]—as for about all the Boston violinists—a larger, [illegible] more noble tone and a sturdier approach [illegible] which either power or passion inheres. And he is still not always faithful [illegible], especially in the higher flights. He read the scherzando and andante movements delightfully, but in the opening allegro, and still more in the final rondo, he seemed to be making hard work of the music and to be so much engrossed with the mere execution as not to be able to give attention to fulness of tone or ample sweep of phrase. One could hardly help feeling some small sense of inadequacy and wishing that for these few minutes Sarasate (to whom the symphony is dedicated) could take up that rushing rondo and fill it with fire, strength, volume and speed. But Mr. Adamowski did himself honor nevertheless by choice and accomplishment.

The next programme: N. Rimsky Korsakow, Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," First time; Beethoven, Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, soloist, Mr. Burmeister; Haydn, Symphony in D major (B. & H., No. 2.)

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 14, 1897.
(Copyright, 1897, Post Publishing Company.)

THE NINETEENTH SYMPHONY.

A well chosen and generally interesting programme was what the patrons of the symphony sat through last night. Four composers were represented, and the only novelty was Felix Weingartner's arrangement for grand orchestra of the tuneful and melodic, "Invitation to the Dance" of von Weber. The composition has been "arranged" for both piano and orchestra several times since it was originally written in 1819, but Weingartner's arrangement is elaborate in treatment, and radically departs from the original themes, while yet retaining its identity and all the original melody. In the present case it is worked up to a grand climax in a combination of all its motifs. As played last night, the piece was altogether delightful. Mr. Paur and his band entered into the spirit of the occasion with much enthusiasm, and the ever changing variations, together with the general color of the themes, were all effectively brought out under the careful guidance of Mr. Paur. The number gave infinite pleasure, and the conductor had to acknowledge the applause several times.

Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist, playing Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," which is not frequently heard. Four of the five movements were given, and it must be recorded that Mr. Adamowski has seldom, if ever, been heard to better advantage at these concerts. His general technique has vastly improved, and his violin was handled in such a masterly manner as to emit the purest and sweetest tones. The number is not as much of a show piece or one so calculated to exhibit the versatility of a solo performer as many others usually heard, but it seemed to fit Mr. Adamowski's style admirably. Especially delightful was he in the second movement, a sort of scherzo, and at the close of each movement he was loudly applauded, and at the close was recalled some half dozen times.

The other numbers on the programme were Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," which opened the concert, and Cowen's Scandinavian symphony in four movements, with which the programme ended.

At next week's concert Mr. Richard Burmeister will play the Beethoven concerto, No. 5, and a new symphonie suite by N. Rimsky Korsakow will be heard.

The Boston Traveler
PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.

MONDAY, MARCH 15, 1897.

The Symphony Concert.

Sixteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; eighteenth concert, Mr. T. Adamowski, soloist. The programme:

Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"........Gluck
(Wagner's arrangement.)
Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra, in D minor, Op. 21...........Lalo
"Invitation to the Dance".............Weber
(Arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner.)
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 3, in C minor, "Scandanavian" ....Cowen

There is no question that the Weingartner arrangement of Weber's lovely waltz was the salient point of the concert, the feature which aroused the most genuine enthusiasm and around which revolved considerable after argument and discussion. Wahtever else the brilliant German conductor has done, in this transcription he has certainly shown originality and genius enough to awake critical attack of the earnest sort that is really a compliment.

To be sure, Weingartner has departed far from the Weber simplicity, but what was there left to do after Berlioz's splendid yet faithful orchestral setting of the "Invitation"? The composition is in the extreme modern style, with intertwining themes, daring harmonies and rich and florid instrumentation. Its exciting power cannot be denied, nor can the great ability of its orchestral treatment. As to the propriety of seizing upon a great work and embellishing it with all modern art, that is to be settled by individual taste. But it is difficult to see any objection to a work so brilliantly accomplished and affording so much sincere pleasure. It seems scarcely necessary to say that it was played magnificently.

Mr. Adamowski gave the Lalo violin piece with his customary taste and impeccable technique, and with a shade more than usual of breadth and power. The work is a thoroughly good one, and seems likely to retain its place for a long time to come.

The Wagner arrangement of Gluck's beautiful overture is as impressive as ever, and it was read with great sympathy by Mr. Paur.

Spite of the general cleverness of Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony, and the occasional spots of real beauty, it results as a whole in boredom. It meanders along to unseemly length, saying the same things over and over again. It is the musical expression of a very respectable Englishman who had taken a two weeks' trip in the Northland, and was considerably impressed with the fiords and mountains.

W. D. QUINT.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 15, 1897.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Last Saturday's programme, for the eighteenth Symphony concert, was as follows:

Gluck: Overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide."
(Richard Wagner's arrangement.)
Lalo: Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra, opus 21.
Weber; "Aufforderung zum Tanz," opus 65.
(Arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingärtner.)
(First time in Boston.)
F. H. Cowen: Symphony No. 3, in C minor, "Scandinavian."
Mr. T. Adamowski was the violinist.

Gluck's beautiful overture was admirably played. After all Wagner's talk, and the counter-talk of the classicists of his day, about the proper tempo of the second part of this overture, it may be doubted whether any very definite decision has been arrived at. Wagner's arguments that the conductor's andante beat, indicated at the beginning of the slow introduction, should be maintained throughout the work seem, on the whole, more sensible and better grounded than his arguments in other similar cases often are. His saying that thus maintaining the initial rate of beat will make the second part sound, of itself, twice as fast as the introduction, and thus render the missing indication, "Allegro," unnecessary, is perfectly true. He well says, too, that, if the missing mark, "Allegro," is put at the beginning of the second part—as his classical opponents wished it to be—and the conductor beats accordingly twice as fast as before, the second part of the overture will sound, not twice as fast, but four times as fast as the introduction. We must own to thinking Wagner right, as far as his arguments go; but they, after all, touch only part of the main point at issue: the relative quickness of the two movements. But they are no help toward finding the true tempo of either. And one may still ask: Is this tempo to be decided by the character of the introduction, or by that of the second part? On which of these two movements is the conductor to base his standard of tempo? It seems to us the second part, a movement of very distinct rhythmic character, should decide this, rather than the introduction; for the introduction is one of those rather vague slow movements that can be taken (within certain limits) at almost any slow tempo. We think Mr. Paur takes it somewhat too slow for his beat to be well maintained through the second part. The opening measures of the second part sounded heavy and dragging last Saturday evening; he himself seemed to feel this, for he gradually quickened his beat and fell into the natural gait of the movement after a while. Had the introduction been taken not quite so slow, this need not have happened. Of Wagner's arrangement of the overture it should be said that the "3 bassoons, 3 trumpets and 4 horns," indicated at the beginning, might easily give the impression that Wagner had unduly tampered with Gluck's score; but this is not really the case; Wagner's additional bassoon, trumpet and pair of horns play no additional parts, but merely serve to reënforce the wind and bring it up to the proper balance with the large mass of strings in modern orchestras. His coda would be perfect were it not that he drags out the end with a modern "hard-death" persistency not quite in keeping with Gluck's simplicity of style; otherwise his coda is admirable.

Weingärtner's atrocity on Weber's delightful "Invitation" is a disgrace to anyone calling himself a musician.

We were heartily glad to hear Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony again. It is a genial, beautiful work, excellently written and scored; only the first and last movements are perhaps a thought too much spun out. There is no very striking originality in the symphony, perhaps — that second theme in the first movement might have been written by Sterndale Bennett—and the composer does not speak the Northern dialect quite so naturally as Gade, who was born to it. In a certain sense, the whole thing is based on Mendelssohn. But, apropos of this, it is curious to note how the "Mendelssohnian" composers in general—Julius Rietz, Gade, Sterndale Bennett—have only the Mendelssohn manner, not the Mendelssohn flavor. The thematic material in this symphony of Cowen's, in Gade's "Ossian" and "Im Hochland" overtures, in Bennett's "Najaden" and "Waldnymphe," is only very superficially Mendelssohnish; its aroma is, on the contrary, quite individual; only the style of writing comes from Mendelssohn. Bennett, Gade and Cowen may be disciples, but they are not mere imitators. The symphony was beautifully played, and, if it seemed to make no very vivid impression upon the audience, this is probably chiefly attributable to Cowen's style of instrumentation—like Gade's and Bennett's—being no longer effective in our vast Music Hall, after the more incisive and brilliant scoring of later composers.

Lalo's Spanish Symphony holds its own surprisingly well, considering the light character of the work. When Mr. Loeffler first played it here, several years ago, it seemed simply bewitching, the best "musical circus" we had ever heard. At his second performance of it, a few years later, it seemed, however, to have lost some of its effervescence. But now it sounds brilliant, clever, and sparkling as ever. There is infinite go to it, and no little beauty; it is a thing of no depth, but written with enormous skill. The instrumentation is a marvel; we know of no other instance of such full scoring producing the desired effect of brilliancy and richness, without in the least drowning out a solo violin. Mr. Adamowski played the first movement solidly and well, if not particularly effectively. That sort of thing is not quite in his line. But in the dainty waltz-theme of the Scherzando (second movement) all his inimitable charm of phrasing was felt, as he unrolled the seductive melody, and one saw that this was just what the music really meant. In a word, he played the movement superbly. In the ensuing Andante, that poignant Slavic sensibility of his, that natural instinct for being at once warm and graceful, made his playing a pure delight. In the Finale he was admirable; one might at moments feel the want of a certain mordancy of accent, which is not his; but his playing was sure, brilliant and elegant, full of life and sparkle; now and then [illegible] would [illegible] touch of humor, especially in the clever way he would vary the expression and accent of that eternally recurring saltarello-theme, thus curing the almost endless repetitions of it of all taint of monotony. At times one could almost see the theme wink! Mr. Adamowski was warmly received, and as warmly applauded and recalled. He richly deserved it.

The next programme is: Rimsky-Korsakoff, symphonic suite, "Scheherezade" (first time in Boston); Beethoven, pianoforte concerto No. 5, in E-flat major, opus 73; Haydn, symphony in D major (No. 2, Breitkopf & Härtel and Peters eds.). Mr Richard Burmeister will be the pianist.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 17, 1897.

The program of the eighteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra this season was as follows:

Overture to Iphigenia in Aulis..................................Gluck
(Wagner's arrangement.)
Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra, in D minor, op. 21......................................Lalo
Invitation to the Dance.......................................Weber
(Arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner.)
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 3, in C minor, Scandinavian..................Cowen

The arrangement by Berlioz of Weber's piano piece never seemed so beautiful as it did in the memory of last night, after the performance of Weingartner's clever trick. For the trick is clever; and if cleverness were the only thing in music hats should be tossed in air for Weingartner. I see him watching the audience. At the climax he exclaims: "And now, ladies and gentlemen, you have all the themes together. Listen. Do you not hear them distinctly? There is no deception, I assure you. Thank you for your attention and applause." This pitching of the themes from one instrument to another, and this polyphonic cleverness do not console me for the loss of the original flowing, continuous beauty and defined rhythmic elegance.

The Scandinavian Symphony, by Cowen, does not wear well. It is too amiable in its expression—too suggestive of Cook's tourists in its local color. The slow movement, with the distant horn quartet, always puts me in mind of a part-song for male voices, beginning:

> "Come away, come away;
> Oh, come where the silver waves break!
> Come away, come away;
> There's moonlight on the lake."

Do you remember it? It's a sweet thing.

On the other hand, Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole gains at each hearing. It is much more than a display piece for a virtuoso. The composer is something more than a folklorist. The ingenuity, the delicacy, and at the same time the firmness of the orchestration are delightful, and the embroidery of the themes is so free from that which is vulgar or for the selfish pleasure of the violinist! Mr. Adamowski at first was not at his best; he soon recovered himself, and then acquitted himself admirably unto the end. Warmth, brilliancy and personal elegance of delivery, as well a sympathetic appeal made his performance an uncommon pleasure.

Mr. Paur did not give way too much to Wagner's opinions concerning the proper place of the overture by Gluck. Mr. Apthorp's remarks in the program book on Wagner's views are well worth reading. He well says: "Wagner himself admits that Mozart's concert coda to the overture is unbearable, if played at his (Wagner's) slower tempo; this shows pretty plainly, as it seems to me, that Mozart had the conventional, quicker tempo in mind when he wrote his coda. Now, Mozart must almost of necessity have been more in touch with the musical spirit of Gluck's day than Wagner can have been, and known the traditions better. Mozart's evidently pitching upon the quicker tempo for the second part of Gluck's overture may be accepted as pretty strong authority therefor."

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 21, 1897.

The program of the 19th Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in G minor, No. 40..........Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in F minor, op. 21.........................Chopin
Orchestration (and Cadenza for first movement) by R. Burmeister.
Symphony in D major (B. & H., No. 2)..Haydn

There is very little to be said about this concert, which was extraordinary only in the program. That Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite, which had been announced, was found too difficult for performance after a few rehearsals, was no excuse for presenting a program so trite and with such insufficient contrasts. The G minor symphony is a delightful work, an immortal work if you please, but the performance of a Mozart Symphony and a Haydn Symphony in one evening is too much of an eminently respectable thing, even in Lent.

Mr. Burmeister played with conspicuous elegance. His tone was eminently agreeable, his performance was very clean and fluent. His emotion, however, did not rise above well-bred salon behavior. You admired, you congratulated and complimented the pianist, but you could not help feeling that there is more in the concerto than was brought to the smooth surface. Mr. Burmeister is a well-equipped musician as well as pianist, and his orchestration is far less objectionable than the work of several who have tinkered the two concertos of Chopin. The elegance of his playing and the quiet modesty of his bearing pleased the audience mightily, but there have been more soulful performances of the F minor Concerto in Music Hall.

PHILIP HALE.

[96]

[illegible] Globe.
SUNDAY [illegible] 21, 1897.

Mr Burmeister Soloist at Symphony Concert.

"Carmen" at the Castle Sq Theater—Grand Opera Season.

Band Concerts at the Boston Today—Preludes ond Echoes.

The soloist at the 19th symphony concert was Mr Richard Burmeister, who played the piano part of Chopin's F minor concerto. The orchestral numbers were Mozart's G minor symphony and Haydn's symphony in D major. In the Chopin selection Mr Burmeister's orchestration and cadenza for the first movement were used instead of the more familiar original score.

The wonderful Mozart symphony was admirably played throughout, the work of the strings in the chief figure in the first movement making a graceful introduction that gave promise of a very enjoyable interpretation; an intimation that was fully realized. The phrases given out by the cellos and basses in the opening of the second movement were richly sonorous, and the work of the light strings formed a harmonizing figuration of great delicacy. The contrasts between the minuet and the trio in the third part were not too broadly shown, and the dance-like measures and fantasia of the finale were each given its relative characteristics, the cantabel themes by the woodwinds and strings being sung with a beautiful tonality.

Mr Burmeister's orchestration for the Chopin concerto sounds somewhat strange to those accustomed to the lighter scoring of the original work. The new writing is skilfully arranged and proportioned, although the elaboration, at times, is not to the advantage of the pianist, the instrumental background being much heavier than that scored by the Polish composer.

The orchestral work was very commendable and Mr Burmeister sustained his portion of the performance in a manner that won many plaudits. The introductory movement was played with authority and in the brilliant passages succeeding the pianist gave the embellishments gracefully, delicately and with apparent ease.

In the climax of the second part of the movement the piano work glowed brilliantly against the more sonorous working out by the orchestra, and the finale was also admirable for its vivid interpretation. The swing of the chief theme in the second movement was notably Chopinesque, and in the beautiful intermezzo the melody was charmingly sustained. The bassoon here played an important part, and played it well. The feature of the closing movement was the so-called waltz, which Mr Burmeister gave with splendid effect. The odd violin accompaniment, made by striking the strings with the wooden part of the bow, was given without exaggeration by the orchestra. Mr Burmeister's chord runs were as smoothly and rapidly performed as one could wish, and his whole interpretation was that of a gifted pianist heartily in spirit with the composer's ideas. The pianist was rapturously recalled at the close of his performance.

The performance of the orchestra in the Haydn symphony was up to the usual standard. The flute and the oboes are worthy of special mention for their work in the first movement, and the violins were notably good in the allegro spiritoso. The next rehearsal and concert will take place April 2 and 3. Mr Leo Schultz, cellist, will be the solo performer. The orchestral numbers will comprise Weber's "Oberon" overture, Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 21, 1897.
(Copyright, 1897, Post Publishing Company.)

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the Symphony concert last night was a classical one throughout, presenting Mozart, Chopin and Haydn. The soloist, Mr. Richard Burmeister, is also not a novice to Boston audiences, and demonstrated anew the strong hold he has on their affection, for round after round of applause compelled him to bow again and again, a well deserved tribute for his masterly execution of Chopin's piano concerto No. 2 in F minor.

The first number on the programme was Mozart's symphony in G minor, which has been heard in Boston oft before, and calls for no comment.

Haydn's symphony in D major is not so well known, and its overflowing humor was appreciated by a delighted audience. It is brilliant throughout, especially the last movement, which is in a regular and very fully developed sonata form, not a rondo, as was usual with Haydn. The coda is quite extended and elaborate, which is also a departure with Haydn.

Nothing need be said of the playing of the orchestra, which, thanks to Mr. Paur's painstaking care, did full justice to its grand task.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 22, 1897.

Saturday's Symphony Concert and Its Familiar Programme.

There has probably been no programme given since the symphony concerts were founded that has required less of critical comment than the one given at Saturday's concert. Not that the numbers were not enjoyable; they were both agreeable and well played, but every part of the performance was "familiar in our mouths as household words."

The concert began with the ever beautiful, but very well known, G minor symphony by Mozart, which was followed by the equally well worn F minor concerto by Chopin, and the closing number was a Haydn symphony, one of the English set, not recently performed here, but as like its familiar brethren as one pea resembles another.

These works were all of them well under the technical limitations of our orchestra, and it would be a waste of adjectives to tell of the flawless performance. The G minor symphony can never wear out its welcome, but to add a Hydn symphony to its simple measures seemed to be pushing matters too far in the direction of Watteau-like simplicity, and crowding the shepherds.

Mr. Richard Burmeister was the pianist. His playing of the Chopin concerto was imbued with a surety that was not without its charm, but scarcely made full amends for a lack of passion; intellectuality rather than poetry seemed to dominate the interpretation. It was good and manly playing, however, and won three recalls at the close of the performance.

The Larghetto of this work, one must remember, was composed under the influence of the tender passion, and Chopin intended it almost for a love-dream; therefore, in this, the clear and precise performance was not quite in place.

Mr. Burmeister's orchestration was masterly. Musicians know how necessary it is to revise the orchestral thoughts of Chopin. Here is a solitary instance, among the great masters, of a composer achieving all his real greatness upon a single instrument. Beethoven, Bach, Schumann, in fact all the other great masters have won their laurels in every musical field from opera or oratorio to piano compositions; Chopin alone made his success solely upon the piano. It is but a few days since we were called upon to mention the dryness of his trio; if his concertos are not dry it is only because they are not true concertos—they are piano works with a weak orchestral accompaniment.

Taussig has led the way towards rectifying this error by giving them new settings, and Mr. Burmeister has done a good work in rescoring the flimsy orchestration which the composer originally gave to this concerto. He has retained the composer's chief effects even to the "frappe" of the violins in the finale, and has not been too audacious in retouching the score. His cadenza, too, is musicianly in a high degree and deserves its meed of praise. But we would much rather have heard Mr. Burmeister in the Beethoven selection originally chosen, than in this ultra-poetical school; the memories of De Pachmann and of Paderewski are too recent for anyone but the Chopinzee to the manner born to undertake the Polish tone poems.

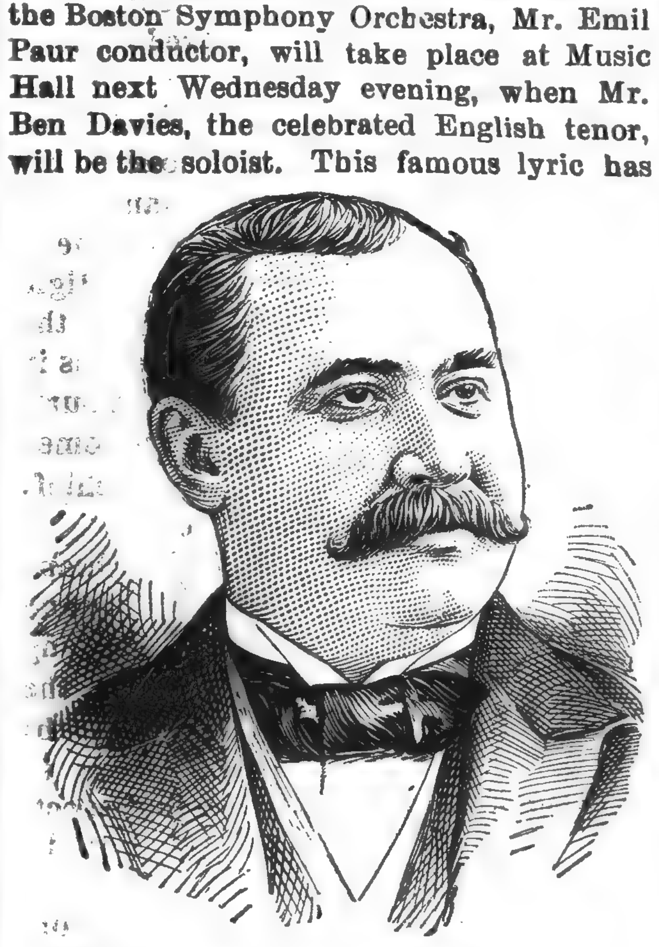
The Haydn symphony with which the concert closed was given a broad and dignified reading in its first movement, avoiding that prettiness with which too many conductors invest this composer.

The other movements call for no special comment but were pleasing all the same. "Happy are those nations which have no histories"—and pleasant are those concerts which require no reviews.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Concert.

The fifth and last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, will take place at Music Hall next Wednesday evening, when Mr. Ben Davies, the celebrated English tenor, will be the soloist. This famous lyric has electrified two continents. His tour in this country has been eminently successful and there has been but one impression of his ability. His voice is of that rich, resonance admirably suited to the concert stage. The programme will be exclusively devoted to numbers from Wagner, an always enjoyable treat, when rendered by this admirable organization. It comprises Prelude to "Parsifal;" Lohengrin's Legend; a Faust Overture; Preludes to Acts I, and III., "Lohengrin;" a Siegfried Idyl; Overture, "Rienzi;" "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm;" "Siegmund's Love-song" and "Ride of the Walkyries," from "Die Walkure."



MR. BEN DAVIES.

Tickets now on sale at ALBERT'S.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 21, 1897.

As the expected "Scheherazade" suite could not be got ready in time for the nineteenth Symphony concert, there was substituted for it in the first place on the programme Mozart's beautiful-thoughted and exquisitely adorned symphony in G minor, opus 40, which enjoys the reputation of being among the truly perfect compositions in the world. One can never cease wondering that the master should have attained so much strength and decision with the orchestra which modern notions would think adequate for little more than grace, daintiness, fancy and poetic rapture. For the string choir has for all its assistance and diversity only a single flute and a pair each of oboes, bassoons and horns. And yet what fresh, alluring and delightful effects are produced by Mozart's use of this small choir, especially in the airy trio of the minuet!

Another symphony ended the programme—Haydn in D major, numbered as the second in the Breitkopf and Hartel list. This has a more nearly modern apportionment, although the wind instruments still remain in pairs, and there are no trombones; a pair of kettledrums help along with the more vigorous parts, however. The general temper of the work is not dissonant from that of the Mozart, but its greater sturdiness and the busy haste of its livelier movements make it more appropriate for a final number. Both were admirably played.

The middle number was Chopin's second pianoforte concerto, played by Mr. Richard Burmeister, who had also revised the orchestration and written the cadenza for the first movement. There cannot be a great deal done to Chopin's scoring of his concertos without coming out just where Weingartner did with his orchestration of Webers "Invitation to the Dance," and making something which, in spite of cleverness, power, brilliancy and excitement, would be quite another composition from the original. Chopin wrote thinly and baldly for the orchestra, because his thought and affection were concentrated on the pianoforte and he only wanted the other instruments to keep along with that somehow—pretty much as if he felt forced to have them because he could not make the concertos which he ambitioned without them. Mr. Burmeister has enhanced, enriched and enforced the primary treatment, but reasonably and consistently, preserving the desired prominence of the solo instrument throughout. His cadenza was difficult enough, in all conscience; but it was accordant with Chopin's style and sentiment and fell naturally into its place. His playing was exceedingly fine at all points,—dignified and broad or scintillant and light, as occasion required, equable in feeling, quiet but firm in exposition, and elegant in finish.

This is the blank week, but a week later on the programme will be: Weber's "Oberon" overture, Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony, Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture, and a violoncello solo by Mr. Leo Schulz.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CI., NO. 80.

SUNDAY, MARCH 21, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Programme of Familiar Selections—Mr. Richard Burmeister, Soloist.

The 19th concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening, with the following programme:

Symphony in G minor, No. 40..........Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor....Chopin
Symphony in D, B. and H. No. 2........Haydn

The soloist was Mr. Richard Burmeister. The selections are so thoroughly familiar that it would be puzzling indeed to say anything about them that has not been said over and over again during the past 16 years. The Mozart symphony, which continues to hold its own among the immortal masterpieces in its class, was gloriously interpreted from beginning to end. Mr. Paur's tempi were sympathetically just, and the pace at which he took the andante, somewhat faster than is customary, brought the movement closer together and heightened its effect. The work was perfectly played.

Like justice was done the Haydn symphony. It is one of the symphonies he wrote for the Salomon concerts in London, which are the best of the very many works he wrote of that species. Oddly enough, there are none of Haydn's symphonies that have been qualified as great; none that stand out from his others as do the last three written by Mozart, and yet he continued to compose seven or eight years after Mozart's death, the symphony in question having been produced four years after that date.

Mr. Burmeister's performance of the concerto was exceedingly thoughtful, smooth and brilliant. He played without seeming effort, and in a style free from affectation and with artistic purity of taste. His technique responded freely and charmingly to the demands made on it, and if the interpretation was wanting somewhat in regard to warmth of sentiment in the more cantabile moments of the work, it was nevertheless well considered and interesting as a whole. The high worth of the effort received a cordial recognition in long-continued plaudits and four irresistible recalls.

There will be no rehearsal and no concert this week. The next programme is: Overture, "Oberon," Weber; solo for 'cello, not yet named, with Mr. Leo Schulz as soloist; Symphony No. 6, Tschaikowsky, and Overture "Tannhauser," Wagner.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 24, 1897.

The program of the nineteenth Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in G minor, No. 40..Mozart
Concerto for piano, No. 2, in F minor..........................Chopin
Orchestration (and cadenza for first movement) by R. Burmeister.
Symphony in D major (Breitkopf & Härtel, No. 2)..............Haydn

A very dull program. A program without sufficient contrasts. Yet Mr. Burmeister played with unusual fluency and elegance, and for the clearness and the easy brilliancy of his performance he was recalled several times.

Someone spoke to me last night concerning the pace of the andante in the G minor symphony. Mr. Paur took it perhaps a little quicker than is customary. He might well have taken it still faster. Mottl astonished Brussels lately by turning the whole andante into a gentle Sicilienne, and, as Kuffarth aptly observed, the movement gained in conciseness and clarity and it lost nothing of its grace. "The melody of Mozart, so caressing, so enveloping, is not suited to the broad reading which the slow movements of Beethoven demand."

PHILIP HALE.

Itinerary Boston Symphony.

THE following is the immediate itinerary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

Concert in Music Hall, Mount Royal avenue and Cathedral street, Baltimore, to-night, March 24, at 8 P.M.

Leave Baltimore, Camden street station, B. & O. RR., Wednesday, March 24, at midnight.

Arrive New York, depot Central RR. of N. J., Thursday, March 25, at 7 A.M.
New York Address, Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square.

Concert in Metropolitan Opera House, at 8 P.M. to-morrow.

Concert in Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, March 26, at 8 P.M.

Concert (matinée) in Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, March 27, at 3 P.M.

Leave New York, Grand Central Depot, Saturday, March 27, at midnight.

Arrive Boston Sunday, March 28, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.

THE SUN. BALTIMORE.
MORNING, MARCH 25, 1897

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Lovers of Wagner Heard a Splendid Performance at Music Hall Last Night.

A Wagner concert is always a make-shift. The Baireuth master did not write, except in a very few instances, purely orchestral works. But the musical public has gotten to the place where it demands Wagner. The "music of the future" has become the music of the day, with the result that if operatic representations are impossible or infrequent, Wagner concerts must be given.

The one which was given last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall was memorable, and it is safe to say that none of the series of which it was the final concert has given as much pleasure. The programme was familiar, so that the magnificent work of the orchestra was apparent to all. Enthusiasm was universal, and expressions of regret that the end of the series was at hand were heard on all sides. The programme was as follows:

Prelude to Parsifal; Lohengrin's Narrative from "Lohengrin;" a Faust overture; preludes to acts first and third of "Lohengrin;" a Siegfried Idyl; overture to Rienzi; Siegmund's Love Song from "Die Walkuere," and Wotan's Farewell and Fire Charm, and the Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkuere."

The soloist was Ben Davies, a well-known English tenor, who appeared at the Wagner concert last season. Mr. Davies is an unconventional Wagnerian singer, but the impression made last night was much stronger than that at his former appearance. The applause at the conclusion of both his solos was spontaneous and prolonged.

Mr. Paur's appreciative rending of the several numbers was intelligent and inspiring. There was at times a notable tendency to retard, especially in the preludes to "Lohengrin," but the reckless abandon with which the other "Lohengrin" prelude was played more than compensated for the sluggishness of the preceding number.

The audience was the largest of the season, the double card of a vocalist and a Wagnerian programme being very attractive.

The work of the orchestra during the past season has been of the highest kind, and its close finds the Boston organization more firmly fixed than ever in the musical life of Baltimore.

A WAGNER PROGRAMME.

Symphony Concert Season to Close Tonight.

The series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1896-'7 will close with tonight's performance at Music Hall. The Orchestra is in the city today ready to make the last concert the best of the season. The programme will be devoted entirely to the compositions of Wagner, and the admirers of the great German composer will have an opportunity to hear Conductor Paur's interpretation of the works which are so much admired and equally disliked by various classes. The soloist will be Mr. Ben Davies, the English tenor. He appeared last year also with the Symphony. The concerts of last season closed with a Wagner evening, and its success induced Conductor Paur to end this season the same way. It will probably become a permanent feature.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 21, 1897.

Mr Burmeister Soloist at Symphony Concert.

"Carmen" at the Castle Sq Theater—Grand Opera Season.

Band Concerts at the Boston Today—Preludes and Echoes.

The soloist at the 19th symphony concert was Mr Richard Burmeister, who played the piano part of Chopin's F minor concerto. The orchestral numbers were Mozart's G minor symphony and Haydn's symphony in D major. In the Chopin selection Mr Burmeister's orchestration and cadenza for the first movement were used instead of the more familiar original score.

The wonderful Mozart symphony was admirably played throughout, the work of the strings in the chief figure in the first movement making a graceful introduction that gave promise of a very enjoyable interpretation; an intimation that was fully realized. The phrases given out by the cellos and basses in the opening of the second movement were richly sonorous, and the work of the light strings formed a harmonizing figuration of great delicacy. The contrasts between the minuet and the trio in the third part were not too broadly shown, and the dance-like measures and fantasia of the finale were each given its relative characteristics, the cantabel themes by the woodwinds and strings being sung with a beautiful tonality.

Mr Burmeister's orchestration for the Chopin concerto sounds somewhat strange to those accustomed to the lighter scoring of the original work. The new writing is skilfully arranged and proportioned, although the elaboration, at times, is not to the advantage of the pianist, the instrumental background being much heavier than that scored by the Polish composer.

The orchestral work was very commendable and Mr Burmeister sustained his portion of the performance in a manner that won many plaudits. The introductory movement was played with authority and in the brilliant passages succeeding the pianist gave the embellishments gracefully, delicately and with apparent ease.

In the climax of the second part of the movement the piano work glowed brilliantly against the more sonorous working out by the orchestra, and the finale was also admirable for its vivid interpretation. The swing of the chief theme in the second movement was notably Chopinesque, and in the beautiful intermezzo the melody was charmingly sustained. The bassoon here played an important part, and played it well. The feature of the closing movement was the so-called waltz, which Mr Burmeister gave with splendid effect. The odd violin accompaniment, made by striking the strings with the wooden part of the bow, was given without exaggeration by the orchestra. Mr Burmeister's chord runs were as smoothly and rapidly performed as one could wish, and his whole interpretation was that of a gifted pianist heartily in spirit with the composer's ideas. The pianist was rapturously recalled at the close of his performance.

The performance of the orchestra in the Haydn symphony was up to the usual standard. The flute and the oboes are worthy of special mention for their work in the first movement, and the violins were notably good in the allegro spiritoso. The next rehearsal and concert will take place April 2 and 3. Mr Leo Schultz, cellist, will be the solo performer. The orchestral numbers will comprise Weber's "Oberon" overture, Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 21, 1897.
(Copyright, 1897, Post Publishing Company.)

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the Symphony concert last night was a classical one throughout, presenting Mozart, Chopin and Haydn. The soloist, Mr. Richard Burmeister, is also not a novice to Boston audiences, and demonstrated anew the strong hold he has on their affection, for round after round of applause compelled him to bow again and again, a well deserved tribute for his masterly execution of Chopin's piano concerto No. 2 in F minor.

The first number on the programme was Mozart's symphony in G minor, which has been heard in Boston oft before, and calls for no comment.

Haydn's symphony in D major is not so well known, and its overflowing humor was appreciated by a delighted audience. It is brilliant throughout, especially the last movement, which is in a regular and very fully developed sonata form, not a rondo, as was usual with Haydn. The cada is quite extended and elaborate, which is also a departure with Haydn.

Nothing need be said of the playing of the orchestra, which, thanks to Mr. Paur's painstaking care, did full justice to its grand task.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 22, 1897.

Saturday's Symphony Concert and Its Familiar Programme.

There has probably been no programme given since the symphony concerts were founded that has required less of critical comment than the one given at Saturday's concert. Not that the numbers were not enjoyable: they were both agreeable and well played, but every part of the performance was "familiar in our mouths as household words."

The concert began with the ever beautiful, but very well known, G minor symphony by Mozart, which was followed by the equally well worn F minor concerto by Chopin, and the closing number was a Haydn symphony, one of the English set, not recently performed here, but as like its familiar brethren as one pea resembles another.

These works were all of them well under the technical limitations of our orchestra, and it would be a waste of adjectives to tell of the flawless performance. The G minor symphony can never wear out its welcome, but to add a Hydn symphony to its simple measures seemed to be pushing matters too far in the direction of Watteau-like simplicity, and crowding the shepherds.

Mr. Richard Burmeister was the pianist. His playing of the Chopin concerto was imbued with a surety that was not without its charm, but scarcely made full amends for a lack of passion; intellectuality rather than poetry seemed to dominate the interpretation. It was good and manly playing, however, and won three recalls at the close of the performance.

The Larghetto of this work, one must remember, was composed under the influence of the tender passion, and Chopin intended it almost for a love-dream; therefore, in this, the clear and precise performance was not quite in place.

Mr. Burmeister's orchestration was masterly. Musicians know how necessary it is to revise the orchestral thoughts of Chopin. Here is a solitary instance, among the great masters, of a composer achieving all his real greatness upon a single instrument. Beethoven, Bach, Schumann, in fact all the other great masters have won their laurels in every musical field from opera or oratorio to piano compositions; Chopin alone made his success solely upon the piano. It is but a few days since we were called upon to mention the dryness of his trio; if his concertos are not dry it is only because they are not true concertos—they are piano works with a weak orchestral accompaniment.

Taussig has led the way towards rectifying this error by giving them new settings, and Mr. Burmeister has done a good work in rescoring the flimsy orchestration which the composer originally gave to this concerto. He has retained the composer's chief effects even to the "frappe" of the violins in the finale, and has not been too audacious in retouching the score. His cadenza, too, is musicianly in a high degree and deserves its meed of praise. But we would much rather have heard Mr. Burmeister in the Beethoven selection originally chosen, than in this ultra-poetical school; the memories of De Pachmann and of Paderewski are too recent for anyone but the Chopinzee to the manner born to undertake the Polish tone poems.

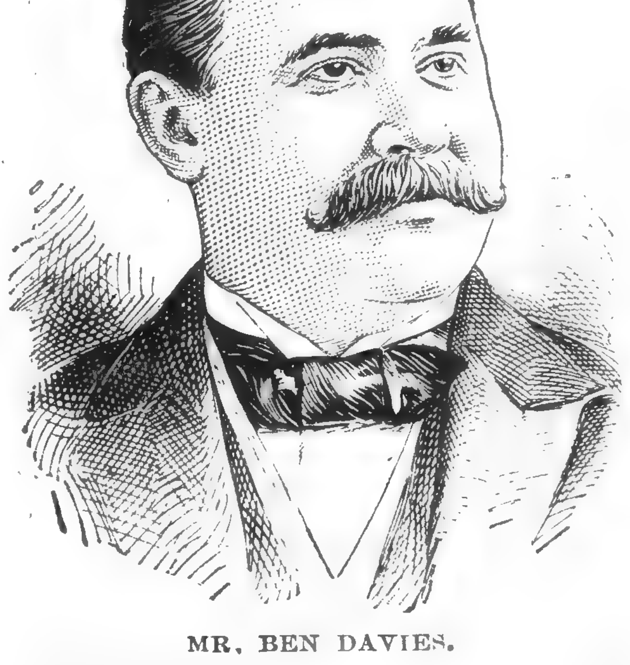
The Haydn symphony with which the concert closed was given a broad and dignified reading in its first movement, avoiding that prettiness with which too many conductors invest this composer.

The other movements call for no special comment but were pleasing all the same. "Happy are those nations which have no histories"—and pleasant are those concerts which require no reviews.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Concert.

The fifth and last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, will take place at Music Hall next Wednesday evening, when Mr. Ben Davies, the celebrated English tenor, will be the soloist. This famous lyric has electrified two continents. His tour in this country has been eminently successful and there has been but one impression of his ability. His voice is of that rich, resonance admirably suited to the concert stage. The programme will be exclusively devoted to numbers from Wagner, an always enjoyable treat, when rendered by this admirable organization. It comprises Prelude to "Parsifal;" Lohengrin's Legend; a Faust Overture; Preludes to Acts I, and III., "Lohengrin;" a Siegfried Idyl; Overture, "Rienzi;" "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm;" "Siegmund's Love-song" and "Ride of the Walkyries," from "Die Walkure."



MR. BEN DAVIES.

Tickets now on sale at ALBERT'S.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 21, 1897.

As the expected "Scheherazade" suite could not be got ready in time for the nineteenth Symphony concert, there was substituted for it in the first place on the programme Mozart's beautiful-thoughted and exquisitely adorned symphony in G minor, opus 40, which enjoys the reputation of being among the truly perfect compositions in the world. One can never cease wondering that the master should have attained so much strength and decision with the orchestra which modern notions would think adequate for little more than grace, daintiness, fancy and poetic rapture. For the string choir has for all its assistance and diversity only a single flute and a pair each of oboes, bassoons and horns. And yet what fresh, alluring and delightful effects are produced by Mozart's use of this small choir, especially in the airy trio of the minuet!

Another symphony ended the programme—Haydn in D major, numbered as the second in the Breitkopf and Hartel list. This has a more nearly modern apportionment, although the wind instruments still remain in pairs, and there are no trombones; a pair of kettledrums help along with the more vigorous parts, however. The general temper of the work is not dissonant from that of the Mozart, but its greater sturdiness and the busy haste of its livelier movements make it more appropriate for a final number. Both were admirably played.

The middle number was Chopin's second pianoforte concerto, played by Mr. Richard Burmeister, who had also revised the orchestration and written the cadenza for the first movement. There cannot be a great deal done to Chopin's scoring of his concertos without coming out just where Weingartner did with his orchestration of Webers "Invitation to the Dance," and making something which, in spite of cleverness, power, brilliancy and excitement, would be quite another composition from the original. Chopin wrote thinly and baldly for the orchestra, because his thought and affection were concentrated on the pianoforte and he only wanted the other instruments to keep along with that somehow—pretty much as if he felt forced to have them because he could not make the concertos which he ambitioned without them. Mr. Burmeister has enhanced, enriched and enforced the primary treatment, but reasonably and consistently, preserving the desired prominence of the solo instrument throughout. His cadenza was difficult enough, in all conscience; but it was accordant with Chopin's style and sentiment and fell naturally into its place. His playing was exceedingly fine at all points,—dignified and broad or scintillant and light, as occasion required, equable in feeling, quiet but firm in exposition, and elegant in finish.

This is the blank week, but a week later on the programme will be: Weber's "Oberon" overture, Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony, Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture, and a violoncello solo by Mr. Leo Schulz.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CI., NO. 80.

SUNDAY, MARCH 21, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Programme of Familiar Selections—Mr. Richard Burmeister, Soloist.

The 19th concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening, with the following programme:

Symphony in G minor, No. 40..........	Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor....	Chopin
Symphony in D, B. and H. No. 2.......	Haydn

The soloist was Mr. Richard Burmeister. The selections are so thoroughly familiar that it would be puzzling indeed to say anything about them that has not been said over and over again during the past 16 years. The Mozart symphony, which continues to hold its own among the immortal masterpieces in its class, was gloriously interpreted from beginning to end. Mr. Paur's tempi were sympathetically just, and the pace at which he took the andante, somewhat faster than is customary, brought the movement closer together and heightened its effect. The work was perfectly played.

Like justice was done the Haydn symphony. It is one of the symphonies he wrote for the Salomon concerts in London, which are the best of the very many works he wrote of that species. Oddly enough, there are none of Haydn's symphonies that have been qualified as great; none that stand out from his others as do the last three written by Mozart, and yet he continued to compose seven or eight years after Mozart's death, the symphony in question having been produced four years after that date.

Mr. Burmeister's performance of the concerto was exceedingly thoughtful, smooth and brilliant. He played without seeming effort, and in a style free from affectation and with artistic purity of taste. His technique responded freely and charmingly to the demands made on it, and if the interpretation was wanting somewhat in regard to warmth of sentiment in the more cantabile moments of the work, it was nevertheless well considered and interesting as a whole. The high worth of the effort received a cordial recognition in long-continued plaudits and four irresistible recalls.

There will be no rehearsal and no concert this week. The next programme is: Overture, "Oberon," Weber; solo for 'cello, not yet named, with Mr. Leo Schulz as soloist; Symphony No. 6, Tschaikowsky, and Overture "Tannhauser," Wagner.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 24, 1897

The program of the nineteenth Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in G minor, No. 40....................................	Mozart
Concerto for piano, No. 2, in F minor..........................	Chopin
Orchestration (and cadenza for first movement) by R. Burmeister.
Symphony in D major (Breitkopf & Härtel, No. 2)............	Haydn

A very dull program. A program without sufficient contrasts. Yet Mr. Burmeister played with unusual fluency and elegance, and for the clearness and the easy brilliancy of his performance he was recalled several times.

Someone spoke to me last night comcerning the pace of the andante in the G minor symphony. Mr. Paur took it perhaps a little quicker than is customary. He might well have taken it still faster. Mottl astonished Brussels lately by turning the whole andante into a gentle Sicilienne, and, as Kuffarth aptly observed, the movement gained in conciseness and clarity and it lost nothing of its grace. "The melody of Mozart, so caressing, so enveloping, is not suited to the broad reading which the slow movements of Beethoven demand."

PHILIP HALE.

◆

Itinerary Boston Symphony.

THE following is the immediate itinerary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

Concert in Music Hall, Mount Royal avenue and Cathedral street, Baltimore, to-night, March 24, at 8 P.M.
Leave Baltimore, Camden street station, B. & O. RR., Wednesday, March 24, at midnight.
Arrive New York, depot Central RR. of N. J., Thursday, March 25, at 7 A.M.
New York Address, Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square.
Concert in Metropolitan Opera House, at 8 P.M. to-morrow.
Concert in Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, March 26, at 8 P.M.
Concert (matinée) in Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, March 27, at 3 P.M.
Leave New York, Grand Central Depot, Saturday, March 27, at midnight.
Arrive Boston Sunday, March 28, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.

THE SUN, BALTIMORE.
MORNING, MARCH 25, 1897

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Lovers of Wagner Heard a Splendid Performance at Music Hall Last Night.

A Wagner concert is always a make-shift. The Baireuth master did not write, except in a very few instances, purely orchestral works. But the musical public has gotten to the place where it demands Wagner. The "music of the future" has become the music of the day, with the result that if operatic representations are impossible or infrequent, Wagner concerts must be given.

The one which was given last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall was memorable, and it is safe to say that none of the series of which it was the final concert has given as much pleasure. The programme was familiar, so that the magnificent work of the orchestra was apparent to all. Enthusiasm was universal, and expressions of regret that the end of the series was at hand were heard on all sides. The programme was as follows:

Prelude to Parsifal; Lohengrin's Narrative from "Lohengrin;" a Faust overture; preludes to acts first and third of "Lohengrin;" a Siegfried Idyl; overture to Rienzi; Siegmund's Love Song from "Die Walkuere," and Wotan's Farewell and Fire Charm, and the Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkuere."

The soloist was Ben Davies, a well-known English tenor, who appeared at the Wagner concert last season. Mr. Davies is an unconventional Wagnerian singer, but the impression made last night was much stronger than that at his former appearance. The applause at the conclusion of both his solos was spontaneous and prolonged.

Mr. Paur's appreciative rending of the several numbers was intelligent and inspiring. There was at times a notable tendency to retard, especially in the preludes to "Lohengrin," but the reckless abandon with which the other "Lohengrin" prelude was played more than compensated for the sluggishness of the preceding number.

The audience was the largest of the season, the double card of a vocalist and a Wagnerian programme being very attractive.

The work of the orchestra during the past season has been of the highest kind, and its close finds the Boston organization more firmly fixed than ever in the musical life of Baltimore.

◆

A WAGNER PROGRAMME.

Symphony Concert Season to Close Tonight.

The series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1896-'7 will close with tonight's performance at Music Hall. The Orchestra is in the city today ready to make the last concert the best of the season. The programme will be devoted entirely to the compositions of Wagner, and the admirers of the great German composer will have an opportunity to hear Conductor Paur's interpretation of the works which are so much admired and equally disliked by various classes. The soloist will be Mr. Ben Davies, the English tenor. He appeared last year also with the Symphony. The concerts of last season closed with a Wagner evening, and its success induced Conductor Paur to end this season the same way. It will probably become a permanent feature.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 22, 1897.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the nineteenth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mozart: Symphony in G minor, No. 40.
Chopin: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in F minor, opus 21.
(Cadenza to first movement, and orchestration, by R. Burmeister.)
Haydn: Symphony in D major (B. & H., No. 2).
Mr. Richard Burmeister was the pianist.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherezade" had been announced for this concert; but it was found at rehearsal that the work contained peculiar difficulties and that it would be impossible to prepare it adequately for performance in time; so it was postponed to a future concert, and Mozart's G-minor symphony substituted for it.

The programme, as it stood, was one of the best and most enjoyable we have had: the two kindred geniuses, Mozart and Haydn, each represented by one of his greatest symphonies, with Chopin—the modern romanticist par excellence, in the best acceptation of the term, the romanticist who never spoils sport for the classicists in whose company he may be—coming between them with one of his two great concertos! The concert had an atmosphere to it; there was enough of contrast, with no rude disruption of musical mood.

Both the symphonies were admirably played in the main. Mr. Paur took the wonderful first movement of the Mozart G minor at a tempo which allowed of all duly graceful and expressive treatment of the theme, and at the same time complied with Mozart's marking, "allegro molto." In both symphonies there was an occasional over-finical toying with the rhythm that we could not like; for instance, in the trio of the scherzo in Haydn's D major, that holding back the beat on the little beckoning D-F figure, whenever it was unaccompanied with running contrapuntal figuration, seemed unnecessary, and, by association, rather trivial; it reminded one too much of the traditional ritenuto at the beginning of certain phrases in Strauss waltzes. Then, why should second themes always go slower? But these tricks are by no means idiosyncrasies of Mr. Paur's; they, and their like, have the vote of the majority in the musical world today, and we are in the protesting minority. As we have said, the two symphonies were, for the most part, admirably played; we enjoyed them to the top of our bent.

In rewriting the orchestral part of Chopin's F-minor concerto, Mr. Burmeister has attempted a task the performance of which has long been deemed a desideratum. He has had the example of Tausig and Klindworth; for the former rewrote the E-minor concerto, and the latter this one in F minor. How needful, or superfluous, Mr. Burmeister's work on the F minor was, we hardly know; Klindworth's version is not published, and the MS. seems not easily obtainable; we, for one, have never been able to get any satisfactory account of its character or quality. We doubt whether Mr. Burmeister ever saw it. Still, considering Klindworth's affiliations, it is not impossible that his version of the F minor may be guilty of sins like those committed by Tausig in his version of the E minor—sins of the blackest dye, if the truth be told. At all events, it was worth Mr. Burmeister's while to try his hand at the task. Before considering how he has succeeded in it, let us first consider what the task itself properly is.

As a writer for the pianoforte, Chopin still carries off the palm for sympathetic and always euphonious treatment of that instrument. In this one matter of constant euphony he has never been equalled; neither by his predecessors nor by any of his contemporaries or followers. Neither Liszt nor Tausig—the two modern men whose Klaviersatz is most individual—can vie with him in this single particular. One may say without hyperbole that whatever Chopin wrote for the pianoforte, it invariably showed off the instrument at its best and never overstepped its best and finest capabilities. But of the orchestra Chopin knew next to nothing; at most, as much as a fairly intelligent pupil who had taken one term in orchestration. He was not only orchestrally ignorant, like Schumann when he began to write, but he did not feel orchestrally—as Schumann certainly did; he had no orchestral picture, so to speak, before his mind's ear, and scored by rote, like a schoolboy. His treatment of the orchestra had only one distinguished merit: his accompaniments not only give the solo instrument the fullest fair play, but, what is still more important in this connection, they are perfectly adapted to letting his peculiar treatment of the pianoforte gain its ends with absolute sureness. Such accompaniments might be sheer nonsense to a pianoforte part written by Mozart, or Beethoven, or Liszt, or Brahms; but they suit Chopin's individual pianoforte style to a T. Chopin's orchestral accompaniments are accompaniments, for the most part, and nothing more: they very seldom take any active part in the musical business in hand, seldom allow themselves to expatiate or enlarge upon what the solo instrument has to say; they furnish a delicate background of orchestral color, that is all.

Now, it has long been lamented that, whereas the accompaniments in Chopin's concertos are in perfect harmony with his peculiar style of pianoforte writing, the tuttis are scored in a pallid, slovenly style that forms the most unwelcome, inartistic contrast with the exquisite and glowing coloring of the pianofore passages. One commonly looks to the tuttis in a concerto to step in at moments and say things more strongly, more warmly and glowingly, than the pianoforte can. But in Chopin's concertos they do nothing of the sort; his tuttis are the cold, weak, gray moments, thin and ineffectual, with a coarse undercurrent of clumsily used trombone. No one in his senses can imagine for a moment that Chopin said what he wished to in these tuttis of his, for he had as fine a sense of color and proportion as any man going; he said in them only what his orchestral ignorance and clumsiness would let him say, and no more.

[illegible] question of rescoring the orchestral part of Chopin's concertos, the tutti passages most surely claim the remodeller's attention. And we are free to say that we should by no means care to have these tuttis rescored in the extreme modern style; say, in the style of Saint-Saëns or Richard Strauss. That would make them start out from the general frame of the work too noticeably, and sever their ideal connection with the rest. A style of orchestration like that employed by Weber in his Conzertstück would, it seems to us, fill the bill. And note that Weber in his Conzertstück writes for precisely the same orchestra that Chopin does in his concertos; only he treats it with the consummate skill of a master.

As for rescoring Chopin's accompaniments, that seems to us unnecessary—save in a very few sporadic cases—and even impertinent. No matter what opinion one may hold about the proper relations of pianoforte and orchestra in concertos in general; no matter whether one agrees with Berlioz about the faultiness of this relation in Chopin's concertos in particular. This has, to our thinking, little to do with the question in hand. Berlioz wrote:

"In Chopin's compositions the whole interest is centred in the pianofore part, the orchestra in his concertos is nothing more than a cold and almost useless accompaniment. . . . . . To make the solo instrument reign, without requiring the abdication of the orchestra, such was the problem which Beethoven was the first to solve triumphantly. And even Beethoven perhaps made the orchestra predominate too much, to the detriment of the solo part."

This may all be true enough on general principles, save that one word, "cold," applied to Chopin's accompaniments; modest and unobtrusive they are, but we can find no coldness in them. Only we cannot find that it applies to the question in hand, And this question, to our mind, is not whether Chopin ought by rights to have made his orchestra say more, or not; the fact is that he actually made it say next to nothing at all, and that this was part and parcel of his style and artistic point of view (remember, we are now speaking only of his accompaniments, not of his tuttis). And any attempt to make the orchestra say more, to make it take a more active part in the musical development than he has is a direct cutting into his peculiar style. We can almost say that it cannot be done without prejudice to the effect of his individual treatment of the solo instrument, without distracting the attention of the listener from more important matter. To elaborate—contrapuntally or otherwise—a Chopin accompaniment is much like elaborating the accompaniment to an aria by Bellini. And, whether the thing is artistically possible or not, we can surely say that we have not seen it well done. On the whole, this matter of elaborating the accompaniments in Chopin's concertos forms no part of what is properly called rescoring. Even admitting, for the sake of argument, that Chopin was so little of a master of orchestration that his accompaniments can be legitimately improved by a more skilful use of instruments, he was certainly master enough of musical composition to make his accompaniments plastically just what he wanted them to be. His concertos are not like the incomplete scores of Bach and Handel, which have to be filled out contrapuntally and harmonically, in which the arranger has to do actual additional composing before they are in condition to be performed. The scores of his concertos are perfectly complete in themselves, and the question whether you or I, or Tom, Dick or Harry wishes he had made them more elaborate is not worth considering. None of us has any artistic right to interfere with him in this matter. To lend him a helping hand (in the one matter of orchestration) where he was acknowledgedly weak, and could not do what he in all probability wished to do, is one thing; but to step in and do for him what he plainly did not care to do is quite another.

Mr. Burmeister has not only rescored the tuttis in Chopin's F minor concerto, but has also rescored and considerably elaborated many passages in the accompaniments, making the orchestra take active part in the musical development where Chopin had given it a merely passive part to play. In the first matter—that of the tuttis—we think he might well have gone to work more boldly; he might have remodelled the orchestration de fond en comble with good effect, instead of retaining some of what seems to us Chopin's weakest scoring, especially of his use of the wind instruments. In his rescoring of some passages in the accompaniments we think he has been injudicious; he has given the orchestra too great a prominence, and too much strength for the pianoforte part. His figural and quasi-contrapuntal elaboration of the accompaniments shows the hand of a trained musician; this part of the work he has done undeniably well. Only, as we have said, we think it should by rights not have been done at all; it changes the peculiar physiognomy of much of the concerto, and makes it too plainly un-Chopinesque. Now and then even his coloring is anachronistic; for instance, when he gives the beautiful bassoon response in the Larghetto to the 'celli and horn; it sounds well, if you please, but out of place. But this is not all; his undue swelling of the accompaniment has necessitated a tampering with Chopin's pianoforte part in certain places—so as to make the part heard. Taking his inch has, as it were, forced him to take his ell, too! Now, changing Chopin's pianoforte writing is like altering Wagner's instrumentation; a thing no sensible artist would care to undertake. His cadenza strikes us as wholly bad; in the first place, there is no room for one in the concerto; in the next place, the first half of the cadenza is but a needless repetition of matter already heard in the course of the movement, and the second half runs to contrapuntal developments that fit Chopin as the fist fits the eye.

Mr. Burmeister played the concerto with fluent, facile, sure technique, and with a beauty of tone and touch that was a constant charm to the ear. His phrasing was constantly artistic and graceful, his feeling warm and steadily musical. What one felt to be a drawback was a certain monotony, a lack of what the Italians call "disinvoltura;" one phrase sounded pretty much like another; there was little emphasis, and a certain academic strictness of time that gave little notion of the Chopin rubato. There was little of the poetic atmosphere in which Chopin lived and moved and had his being. He was warmly applauded and recalled.

[illegible] Weber, overture to "O[illegible]"; [illegible] for 'cello, to be announced; Tschaikowsky, symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," opus 74; Wagner, overture to "Tannhäuser." Mr. Leo Schulz will be the 'cellist. There is no rehearsal nor concert this week.

THE WILKES-BARRE RECORD
WILKES-BARRE.
F. C. JOHNSON. J. C. POWELL.
THURSDAY .... MARCH 25, 1897

A HIGH CLASS CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony and Ben Davies at the Academy in Philadelphia,

That superb orchestra, the Boston Symphony, gave its last concert of the current season in Philadelphia on Monday evening last. The soloist was Ben Davies, one of the very first of the great concert singers of the world.

The Academy of Music, big as it is, was packed from top to bottom with as fine and distinguished an audience as the Quaker City is capable of attracting under any possible circumstances.

The program interpreted was made up entirely of the creations of Wagner, and it is certainly a tribute to his masterful genius that so many people could sit a whole evening listening to the harmonies that teemed through his great mind without feeling somewhat tired or wishing that some relief might be afforded by the substitution here and there in the program of excerpts of the inspirations of some of the other masters.

The "Parsifal" prelude was given first and the orchestra had scarcely played four bars of the faith motive, following the "Call to Prayer," when the audience began to grow cold and warm alternately and from then on till the end of the concert the power of the music was of such a superior character, so full of deep, noble feeling, that every one must have felt they were really capable of great things after listening to it.

The Lohengrin selections were interpreted with such a brilliancy and charm that the whole house burst into tremendous applause lasting for several minutes. Mr. Paur, the conductor, with a face that seemed illuminated with spirituality, bowed and bowed as the storm of hand clapping raged throughout the big Academy. This tribute, and the others that followed, for everything was played with such great ability that the audience was in a perpetual state of delight, must have convinced him that Philadelphia at least thinks that the orchestra is doing nobly under his baton and that, in fact, the management could have scoured Europe and not secured a greater conductor. In some quarters the idea has been entertained that the Boston Symphony reached its climax of greatness under Nikisch, and that after he left deterioration would naturally follow, but time has shown this to be a mistake, for musical people now think the orchestra has played better this season than ever. Mr. Paur has thus vindicated the wisdom of his selection and the profession is glad to acknowledge it, as it always is glad to acknowledge superiority when clearly manifested.

Of the other selections the "Siegfried Idyl" was played with wonderful feeling and poetic finish and the Rienzi overture with great breadth and dash.

Ben Davies sang "Lohengrin's Farewell" and "Siegmund's Love Song." He did full justice to both numbers, receiving five recalls for the first and four for the second. This is the fourth season he has sung with the orchestra, meeting with so much success each time that Mr. Ellis, the manager, promptly engages him for the following season. His voice is broadening all the while, his upper tones being very trumpety in character. His art, too, increases with the improvement in the quality of his voice and it was a treat to hear him in Lohengrin's farewell to Elsa. The words were pronounced so distinctly and the atmosphere of the music was preserved so well that the mystical character of Lohengrin was vividly suggested. The suave flowing melody of the "Spring Song" was rendered with a beauty of tone, a clearness of expression and with a smoothness of phasing that won him fresh laurels. He remains in this country eight weeks and will be heard in nearly all of the big spring festivals throughout the country between now and June.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Concluding Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last concert of this season of the Boston Orchestra was given last night in Music Hall before a large audience. All the music was Wagner's. This was the program: Prelude to "Parsifal," the Lohengrin legend, A "Faust" overture, preludes to Act I. and III. of "Lohengrin," the "Siegfried Idyl," the overture to "Rienzi," and Wotan's farewell and fire charm, Siegmund's love song, and the Ride of the Walkyries from "Die Walkure." The concert was a genuine treat from beginning to end. The orchestra was on a high plane throughout, and rendered the music in a manner that, no doubt, would have delighted Wagner himself. Every number was heartily applauded, and Director Paur was compelled to come forward and bow his thanks again and again. Mr. Ben Davies was the soloist. He rendered the legend and the love song in an artistic and charming manner. The concerts have been greatly enjoyed by our people. This is the twelfth season the orchestra has been playing in Baltimore. Its work has been thoroughly appreciated. As a body of players, they have never been surpassed by any similar organization that has ever performed in Baltimore. The music-loving people cannot do without the orchestra and Kneisel quartet.

THE LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The musical season was practically brought to a close last evening by the final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Each season the work of the orchestra is better than that of the preceding year, though its perfection seems almost to preclude the possibility of further improvement. Perhaps the only drawback to these concerts is Mr. Paur's style of making programmes. Novelties figure rarely. He gives practically the same works year after year. His programme last night was almost identical with the Wagner programme of last season. From three of the greatest works of this composer, "Tristan and Isolde," "Meistersinger" and "Gotterdammerung," nothing was selected. The "Parsifal" prelude, with which the concert opened, although beautifully played, was marred by the unusually slow tempo in which it was taken by Mr. Paur; this was also the case in the first "Lohengrin" prelude and the "Abschied" from the "Walkure."

The audience was aroused to its greatest enthusiasm by the magnificent playing of the second "Lohengrin" prelude, which it would gladly have had repeated. The real gem of the concert was the "Siegfried Idyl," which was given a most artistic performance. The programme was brought to a tremendous climax by the "Ride of the Walkuries," which was the final number. It was taken with a sweep and breadth which were stirring, even exceeding in brilliancy the "Rienzi" overture, which, being a great favorite with Mr. Paur, is always conducted by him with inspiring enthusiasm.

Mr. Ben Davies, the English tenor, who appeared at the last Wagner concert, was again the soloist. He has a most beautiful voice, and, barring his inability to sing legato, possesses an intelligent, musicianally style. His voice production, however, is very throaty and his tones not properly supported. Otherwise it would not be difficult for him to sing higher than A flat. The "Lohengrin" narrative gave the impression of being too high for his voice throughout and he was therefore more at home in the "Spring Song" from "Walkure," which has a lower tessitura. His climaxes failed of their proper effect because they were just out of reach, which ought not to be, as Mr. Davies' voice is undoubtedly a pure tenor and capable of fulfilling the most exacting demands which can be made upon it.

A WAGNER CONCERT.

Director Paur and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Give the "Music of the Future" in Fine Style.

The programme of the fifth and last concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was devoted exclusively to Wagner compositions. It did not, however, on this account become monotonous. On the contrary, it was highly interesting, presenting, as it did, three distinct periods in Wagner's career, with the unfolding of genius characteristic thereof.

The early period was represented by a Faust overture, rarely given and not heard here for a long time, and the "Rienzi" overture, that brilliant tone work, in which Wagner is so unlike the maestro of Bayreuth that there appears to be no connection between the two, the only common trait being a stupendous energy, which manifests itself in almost every bar. To the intermediate period may be said to belong the "Lohengrin Legend," the preludes to acts one and three, and the "Siegfried" idyl, the latter especially with the beautiful slumber air appealing to the fancy of the audience. The compositions of the last period rendered were the "Parsifal" prelude, and three numbers from "Die Walkure"—"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," Siegmund's love song, and the "Ride of the Walkyries."

The love song and the "Lohengrin Legend" were vocal numbers, acceptably sung by Mr. Ben Davies. His voice has the merit of being true, although his enunciation is sometimes indistinct. The high notes lack fullness. The orchestra acquitted itself admirably. Excepting some unevenness in the Faust overture, which is full of most difficult passages, the entire programme was distinguished by smoothness. Pianissimo passages and crescendoes were given with marked delicacy and finish. The brasses and drums were well handled. Altogether, the concert was most enjoyable.

A large number of Wagnerites had turned out to pay homage to the memory of their prophet, and there was a good attendance of others, to whom the interpretation the compositions received afforded new light and revealed beauties previously unnoticed. Director Paur was rewarded with liberal applause.

Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall.

The fourth concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall is announced for Wednesday evening, February 24, with Madame Teresa Carreno as soloist, who will play the Gregg Concerto for Pianoforte in a minor. The programme opens with Beethoven's first symphony, ranking as an almost unsurpassed example of perfect musical form. The second number by the orchestra is a novelty, the prelude to part III. of the opera by Karl Goldmark, "The Cricket on the Hearth," adapted from Dickens' Christmas story. This opera was first brought out at the Court Opera in Vienna on March 21, 1896, and its success was instantaneous. The concert closes with the Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 6, by List. Mme. Carreno has not been heard in Baltimore in many years and a return of the great exponent of compositions for the piano will be received with more than ordinary enthusiasm, particularly as she has always been an esteemed favorite with Baltimore patrons of music.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 22, 1897.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the nineteenth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mozart: Symphony in G minor, No. 40.
Chopin: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in F minor, opus 21.
(Cadenza to first movement, and orchestration, by R. Burmeister.)
Haydn: Symphony in D major (B. & H., No. 2).
Mr. Richard Burmeister was the pianist.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite "Scheherezade" had been announced for this concert; but it was found at rehearsal that the work contained peculiar difficulties and that it would be impossible to prepare it adequately for performance in time; so it was postponed to a future concert, and Mozart's G-minor symphony substituted for it.

The programme, as it stood, was one of the best and most enjoyable we have had: the two kindred geniuses, Mozart and Haydn, each represented by one of his greatest symphonies, with Chopin — the modern romanticist par excellence, in the best acceptation of the term, the romanticist who never spoils sport for the classicists in whose company he may be—coming between them with one of his two great concertos! The concert had an atmosphere to it; there was enough of contrast, with no rude disruption of musical mood.

Both the symphonies were admirably played in the main. Mr. Paur took the wonderful first movement of the Mozart G minor at a tempo which allowed of all duly graceful and expressive treatment of the theme, and at the same time complied with Mozart's marking, "allegro molto." In both symphonies there was an occasional over-finical toying with the rhythm that we could not like; for instance, in the trio of the scherzo in Haydn's D major, that holding back the beat on the little beckoning D-F figure, whenever it was unaccompanied with running contrapuntal figuration, seemed unnecessary, and, by association, rather trivial; it reminded one too much of the traditional ritenuto at the beginning of certain phrases in Strauss waltzes. Then, why should second themes always go slower? But these tricks are by no means idiosyncrasies of Mr. Paur's; they, and their like, have the vote of the majority in the musical world today, and we are in the protesting minority. As we have said, the two symphonies were, for the most part, admirably played; we enjoyed them to the top of our bent.

In rewriting the orchestral part of Chopin's F-minor concerto, Mr. Burmeister has attempted a task the performance of which has long been deemed a desideratum. He has had the example of Tausig and Klindworth; for the former rewrote the E-minor concerto, and the latter this one in F minor. How needful, or superfluous, Mr. Burmeister's work on the F minor was, we hardly know; Klindworth's version is not published, and the MS. seems not easily obtainable; we, for one, have never been able to get any satisfactory account of its character or quality. We doubt whether Mr. Burmeister ever saw it. Still, considering Klindworth's affiliations, it is not impossible that his version of the F minor may be guilty of sins like those committed by Tausig in his version of the E minor—sins of the blackest dye, if the truth be told. At all events, it was worth Mr. Burmeister's while to try his hand at the task. Before considering how he has succeeded in it, let us first consider what the task itself properly is.

As a writer for the pianoforte, Chopin still carries off the palm for sympathetic and always euphonious treatment of that instrument. In this one matter of constant euphony he has never been equalled; neither by his predecessors nor by any of his contemporaries or followers. Neither Liszt nor Tausig—the two modern men whose Klaviersatz is most individual—can vie with him in this single particular. One may say without hyperbole that, whatever Chopin wrote for the pianoforte, it invariably showed off the instrument at its best and never overstepped its best and finest capabilities. But of the orchestra Chopin knew next to nothing; at most, as much as a fairly intelligent pupil who had taken one term in orchestration. He was not only orchestrally ignorant, like Schumann when he began to write, but he did not feel orchestrally—as Schumann certainly did; he had no orchestral picture, so to speak, before his mind's ear, and scored by rote, like a schoolboy. His treatment of the orchestra had only one distinguished merit: his accompaniments not only give the solo instrument the fullest fair play, but, what is still more important in this connection, they are perfectly adapted to letting his peculiar treatment of the pianoforte gain its ends with absolute sureness. Such accompaniments might be sheer nonsense to a pianoforte part written by Mozart, or Beethoven, or Liszt, or Brahms; but they suit Chopin's individual pianoforte style to a T. Chopin's orchestral accompaniments are accompaniments, for the most part, and nothing more: they very seldom take any active part in the musical business in hand, seldom allow themselves to expatiate or enlarge upon what the solo instrument has to say; they furnish a delicate background of orchestral color, that is all.

Now, it has long been lamented that, whereas the accompaniments in Chopin's concertos are in perfect harmony with his peculiar style of pianoforte writing, the tuttis are scored in a pallid, slovenly style that forms the most unwelcome, inartistic contrast with the exquisite and glowing coloring of the pianofore passages. One commonly looks to the tuttis in a concerto to step in at moments and say things more strongly, more warmly and glowingly, than the pianoforte can. But in Chopin's concertos they do nothing of the sort; his tuttis are the cold, weak, gray moments, thin and ineffectual, with a coarse undercurrent of clumsily used trombone. No one in his senses can imagine for a moment that Chopin said what he wished to in these tuttis of his, for he had as fine a sense of color and proportion as any man going; he said in them only what his orchestral ignorance and clumsiness would let him say, and no more.

So it seems to us that, when there is a question of rescoring the orchestral part of Chopin's concertos, the tutti passages most surely claim the remodeller's attention. And we are free to say that we should by no means care to have these tuttis rescored in the extreme modern style; say, in the style of Saint-Saëns or Richard Strauss. That would make them start out from the general frame of the work too noticeably, and sever their ideal connection with the rest. A style of orchestration like that employed by Weber in his Conzertstück would, it seems to us, fill the bill. And note that Weber in his Conzertstück writes for precisely the same orchestra that Chopin does in his concertos; only he treats it with the consummate skill of a master.

As for rescoring Chopin's accompaniments, that seems to us unnecessary—save in a very few sporadic cases—and even impertinent. No matter what opinion one may hold about the proper relations of pianoforte and orchestra in concertos in general; no matter whether one agrees with Berlioz about the faultiness of this relation in Chopin's concertos in particular. This has, to our thinking, little to do with the question in hand. Berlioz wrote:

"In Chopin's compositions the whole interest is centred in the pianofore part; the orchestra in his concertos is nothing more than a cold and almost useless accompaniment. . . . . . To make the solo instrument reign, without requiring the abdication of the orchestra, such was the problem which Beethoven was the first to solve triumphantly. And even Beethoven perhaps made the orchestra predominate too much, to the detriment of the solo part."

This may all be true enough on general principles, save that one word, "cold," applied to Chopin's accompaniments; modest and unobtrusive they are, but we can find no coldness in them. Only we cannot find that it applies to the question in hand. And this question, to our mind, is not whether Chopin ought by rights to have made his orchestra say more, or not; the fact is that he actually made it say next to nothing at all, and that this was part and parcel of his style and artistic point of view (remember, we are now speaking only of his accompaniments, not of his tuttis). And any attempt to make the orchestra say more, to make it take a more active part in the musical development than he has is a direct cutting into his peculiar style. We can almost say that it cannot be done without prejudice to the effect of his individual treatment of the solo instrument, without distracting the attention of the listener from more important matter. To elaborate—contrapuntally or otherwise—a Chopin accompaniment is much like elaborating the accompaniment to an aria by Bellini. And, whether the thing is artistically possible or not, we can surely say that we have not seen it well done. On the whole, this matter of elaborating the accompaniments in Chopin's concertos forms no part of what is properly called rescoring. Even admitting, for the sake of argument, that Chopin was so little of a master of orchestration that his accompaniments can be legitimately improved by a more skilful use of instruments, he was certainly master enough of musical composition to make his accompaniments plastically just what he wanted them to be. His concertos are not like the incomplete scores of Bach and Handel, which have to be filled out contrapuntally and harmonically, in which the arranger has to do actual additional composing before they are in condition to be performed. The scores of his concertos are perfectly complete in themselves, and the question whether you or I, or Tom, Dick or Harry wishes he had made them more elaborate is not worth considering. None of us has any artistic right to interfere with him in this matter. To lend him a helping hand (in the one matter of orchestration) where he was acknowledgedly weak, and could not do what he in all probability wished to do, is one thing; but to step in and do for him what he plainly did not care to do is quite another.

Mr. Burmeister has not only rescored the tuttis in Chopin's F minor concerto, but has also rescored and considerably elaborated many passages in the accompaniments, making the orchestra take active part in the musical development where Chopin had given it a merely passive part to play. In the first matter—that of the tuttis—we think he might well have gone to work more boldly; he might have remodelled the orchestration de fond en comble with good effect, instead of retaining some of what seems to us Chopin's weakest scoring, especially of his use of the wind instruments. In his rescoring of some passages in the accompaniments we think he has been injudicious; he has given the orchestra too great a prominence, and too much strength for the pianoforte part. His figural and quasi-contrapuntal elaboration of the accompaniments shows the hand of a trained musician; this part of the work he has done undeniably well. Only, as we have said, we think it should by rights not have been done at all; it changes the peculiar physiognomy of much of the concerto, and makes it too plainly un-Chopinesque. Now and then even his coloring is anachronistic; for instance, when he gives the beautiful bassoon response in the Larghetto to the 'celli and horn; it sounds well, if you please, but out of place. But this is not all; his undue swelling of the accompaniment has necessitated a tampering with Chopin's pianoforte part in certain places—so as to make the part heard. Taking his inch has, as it were, forced him to take his ell, too! Now, changing Chopin's pianoforte writing is like altering Wagner's instrumentation; a thing no sensible artist would care to undertake. His cadenza strikes us as wholly bad; in the first place, there is no room for one in the concerto; in the next place, the first half of the cadenza is but a needless repetition of matter already heard in the course of the movement, and the second half runs to contrapuntal developments that fit Chopin as the fist fits the eye.

Mr. Burmeister played the concerto with fluent, facile, sure technique, and with a beauty of tone and touch that was a constant charm to the ear. His phrasing was constantly artistic and graceful, his feeling warm and steadily musical. What one felt to be a drawback was a certain monotony, a lack of what the Italians call "disinvoltura;" one phrase sounded pretty much like another; there was little emphasis, and a certain academic strictness of time that gave little notion of the Chopin rubato. There was little of the poetic atmosphere in which Chopin lived and moved and had his being. He was warmly applauded and recalled.

The next programme (for [illegible]) is: Weber, overture to "Oberon;" solo for 'cello, to be announced; Tschaikowsky, symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," opus 74; Wagner, overture to "Tannhäuser." Mr. Leo Schulz will be the 'cellist. There is no rehearsal nor concert this week.

THE WILKES-BARRE RECORD
WILKES-BARRE.
F. C. JOHNSON. J. C. POWELL.
THURSDAY .... MARCH 25, 1897

A HIGH CLASS CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony and Ben Davies at the Academy in Philadelphia.

That superb orchestra, the Boston Symphony, gave its last concert of the current season in Philadelphia on Monday evening last. The soloist was Ben Davies, one of the very first of the great concert singers of the world.

The Academy of Music, big as it is, was packed from top to bottom with as fine and distinguished an audience as the Quaker City is capable of attracting under any possible circumstances.

The program interpreted was made up entirely of the creations of Wagner, and it is certainly a tribute to his masterful genius that so many people could sit a whole evening listening to the harmonies that teemed through his great mind without feeling somewhat tired or wishing that some relief might be afforded by the substitution here and there in the program of excerpts of the inspirations of some of the other masters.

The "Parsifal" prelude was given first and the orchestra had scarcely played four bars of the faith motive, following the "Call to Prayer," when the audience began to grow cold and warm alternately and from then on till the end of the concert the power of the music was of such a superior character, so full of deep, noble feeling, that every one must have felt they were really capable of great things after listening to it.

The Lohengrin selections were interpreted with such a brilliancy and charm that the whole house burst into tremendous applause lasting for several minutes. Mr. Paur, the conductor, with a face that seemed illuminated with spirituality, bowed and bowed as the storm of hand clapping raged throughout the big Academy. This tribute, and the others that followed, for everything was played with such great ability that the audience was in a perpetual state of delight, must have convinced him that Philadelphia at least thinks that the orchestra is doing nobly under his baton and that, in fact, the management could have scoured Europe and not secured a greater conductor. In some quarters the idea has been entertained that the Boston Symphony reached its climax of greatness under Nikisch, and that after he left deterioration would naturally follow, but time has shown this to be a mistake, for musical people now think the orchestra has played better this season than ever. Mr. Paur has thus vindicated the wisdom of his selection and the profession is glad to acknowledge it, as it always is glad to acknowledge superiority when clearly manifested.

Of the other selections the "Siegfried Idyl" was played with wonderful feeling and poetic finish and the Rienzi overture with great breadth and dash.

Ben Davies sang "Lohengrin's Farewell" and "Siegmund's Love Song." He did full justice to both numbers, receiving five recalls for the first and four for the second. This is the fourth season he has sung with the orchestra, meeting with so much success each time that Mr. Ellis, the manager, promptly engages him for the following season. His voice is broadening all the while, his upper tones being very trumpety in character. His art, too, increases with the improvement in the quality of his voice and it was a treat to hear him in Lohengrin's farewell to Elsa. The words were pronounced so distinctly and the atmosphere of the music was preserved so well that the mystical character of Lohengrin was vividly suggested. The suave flowing melody of the "Spring Song" was rendered with a beauty of tone, a clearness of expression and with a smoothness of phasing that won him fresh laurels. He remains in this country eight weeks and will be heard in nearly all of the big spring festivals throughout the country between now and June.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Concluding Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last concert of this season of the Boston Orchestra was given last night in Music Hall before a large audience. All the music was Wagner's. This was the program: Prelude to "Parsifal," the Lohengrin legend, A "Faust" overture, preludes to Act I. and III. of "Lohengrin," the "Siegfried Idyl," the overture to "Rienzi," and Wotan's farewell and fire charm, Siegmund's love song, and the Ride of the Walkyries from "Die Walkure." The concert was a genuine treat from beginning to end. The orchestra was on a high plane throughout, and rendered the music in a manner that, no doubt, would have delighted Wagner himself. Every number was heartily applauded, and Director Paur was compelled to come forward and bow his thanks again and again. Mr. Ben Davies was the soloist. He rendered the legend and the love song in an artistic and charming manner. The concerts have been greatly enjoyed by our people. This is the twelfth season the orchestra has been playing in Baltimore. Its work has been thoroughly appreciated. As a body of players, they have never been surpassed by any similar organization that has ever performed in Baltimore. The music-loving people cannot do without the orchestra and Kneisel quartet.

[98]

THE LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The musical season was practically brought to a close last evening by the final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Each season the work of the orchestra is better than that of the preceding year, though its perfection seems almost to preclude the possibility of further improvement. Perhaps the only drawback to these concerts is Mr. Paur's style of making programmes. Novelties figure rarely. He gives practically the same works year after year. His programme last night was almost identical with the Wagner programme of last season. From three of the greatest works of this composer, "Tristan and Isolde," "Meistersinger" and "Gotterdammerung," nothing was selected. The "Parsifal" prelude, with which the concert opened, although beautifully played, was marred by the unusually slow tempo in which it was taken by Mr. Paur; this was also the case in the first "Lohengrin" prelude and the "Abschied" from the "Walkure."

The audience was aroused to its greatest enthusiasm by the magnificent playing of the second "Lohengrin" prelude, which it would gladly have had repeated. The real gem of the concert was the "Siegfried Idyl," which was given a most artistic performance. The programme was brought to a tremendous climax by the "Ride of the Walkuries," which was the final number. It was taken with a sweep and breadth which were stirring, even exceeding in brilliancy the "Rienzi" overture, which, being a great favorite with Mr. Paur, is always conducted by him with inspiring enthusiasm.

Mr. Ben Davies, the English tenor, who appeared at the last Wagner concert, was again the soloist. He has a most beautiful voice, and, barring his inability to sing legato, possesses an intelligent, musicianally style. His voice production, however, is very throaty and his tones not properly supported. Otherwise it would not be difficult for him to sing higher than A flat. The "Lohengrin" narrative gave the impression of being too high for his voice throughout and he was therefore more at home in the "Spring Song" from "Walkure," which has a lower tessitura. His climaxes failed of their proper effect because they were just out of reach, which ought not to be, as Mr. Davies' voice is undoubtedly a pure tenor and capable of fulfilling the most exacting demands which can be made upon it.

A WAGNER CONCERT.

Director Paur and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Give the "Music of the Future" in Fine Style.

The programme of the fifth and last concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was devoted exclusively to Wagner compositions. It did not, however, on this account become monotonous. On the contrary, it was highly interesting, presenting, as it did, three distinct periods in Wagner's career, with the unfolding of genius characteristic thereof.

The early period was represented by a Faust overture, rarely given and not heard here for a long time, and the "Rienzi" overture, that brilliant tone work, in which Wagner is so unlike the maestro of Bayreuth that there appears to be no connection between the two, the only common trait being a stupendous energy, which manifests itself in almost every bar. To the intermediate period may be said to belong the "Lohengrin Legend," the preludes to acts one and three, and the "Siegfried" idyl, the latter especially with the beautiful slumber air appealing to the fancy of the audience. The compositions of the last period rendered were the "Parsifal" prelude, and three numbers from "Die Walkure"—"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," Siegmund's love song, and the "Ride of the Walkyries."

The love song and the "Lohengrin Legend" were vocal numbers, acceptably sung by Mr. Ben Davies. His voice has the merit of being true, although his enunciation is sometimes indistinct. The high notes lack fullness. The orchestra acquitted itself admirably. Excepting some unevenness in the Faust overture, which is full of most difficult passages, the entire programme was distinguished by smoothness. Pianissimo passages and crescendoes were given with marked delicacy and finish. The brasses and drums were well handled. Altogether, the concert was most enjoyable.

A large number of Wagnerites had turned out to pay homage to the memory of their prophet, and there was a good attendance of others, to whom the interpretation the compositions received afforded new light and revealed beauties previously unnoticed. Director Paur was rewarded with liberal applause.

Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall.

The fourth concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall is announced for Wednesday evening, February 24, with Madame Teresa Carreno as soloist, who will play the Gregg Concerto for Pianoforte in a minor. The programme opens with Beethoven's first symphony, ranking as an almost unsurpassed example of perfect musical form. The second number by the orchestra is a novelty, the prelude to part III. of the opera by Karl Goldmark, "The Cricket on the Hearth," adapted from Dickens' Christmas story. This opera was first brought out at the Court Opera in Vienna on March 21, 1896, and its success was instantaneous. The concert closes with the Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 6, by List. Mme. Carreno has not been heard in Baltimore in many years and a return of the great exponent of compositions for the piano will be received with more than ordinary enthusiasm, particularly as she has always been an esteemed favorite with Baltimore patrons of music.

3/20 Courier

JEWISH

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, will give its fifth and last concert for the season at the Music Hall Wednesday evening, March 24, when the programme will be exclusively composed of selections from the works of Richard Wagner. The orchestral numbers will include the overture to "Parsifal," a "Faust" overture, the preludes to the first and third acts of "Lohengrin," the "Siegfried Idyll," the overture to "Rienzi" and the "Fire Charm" and "Ride of the Valkyries," from "Die Walkure." Mr. Ben Davies will be the soloist, and will sing the "Legend" from "Lohengrin" and the famous "Spring" song of Siegmund, from "Die Walkure." Last year the all-Wagner concert, with pretty much the came programme, was the most popular of the season, and this induced the repetition of what looked like a doubtful experiment.

* * *

Life

The programme for the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Music Hall, Wednesday, will be exclusively devoted to Wagner. The best and most popular selections from the great composer's works have been selected for the occasion.

* * *

Life

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Emil Paur, conductor, takes place at the Music Hall Wednesday evening. Ben Davies will be the soloist, and a fine Wagner programme has been arranged for the final one of these always enjoyable musical events.

* * *

* * *

The Wagner programme for the final symphony concert on Wednesday is announced as follows: Prelude to "Parsifal;" Lohengrin's Legend; a Faust Overture; Preludes to Acts I. and III., "Lohengrin;" a Siegfried Idyl; Overture, "Rienzi;" "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire-Charm;" "Siegmund's Love-song" and "Ride of the Walkyries," from "Die Walkure."

Philadelphia Inquirer

ESDAY MARCH 23, 1897

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Last Concert of the Season at the Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its twelfth season in this city last night at the Academy of Music. It was a Wagner night and this was the program:

"Parsifal," prelude; "Lohengrin," Lohengrin's Legend;" a Faust overture; "Lohengrin," a, prelude to Act I; b, prelude to Act III; a "Siegfried" idyl; "Rienzi," overture; "Die Walkure," "Wotan's Farewell' and 'Fire Charm;" "Siegmund's Love Song," "Ride of the Walkyries." Soloist, Mr. Ben Davies.

There are people who undoubtedly thought that a Wagner program could not be complete without the "Tannhauser" overture and the Siegfried Funeral March from "Gotterdammerung;" and yet, although there were probably hundreds of persons in the Academy last night who would have agreed with them, what was given was interpreted in such translucence, delicacy, rare dramatic feeling and musical intelligence that the audience were at once made willing captives, and gave themselves up to the witchery of the hour. The prelude to "Parsifal," the only part of that music drama which can be given in this country, showed not only in its interpretation the trained skill of the players, but the deep sympathy of the conductor with the meaning of the composer. In no other number on the program save, perhaps, in the "Faust" overture were the brasses and wood winds heard in greater richness of tone and phrasing than in this prelude, and if nothing else had been played the work of the orchestra would have been a distinct triumph. The dainty, child-like and fairy beauty of the "Siegfried" idyl was deliciously pictured, as also were the motives in the two "Lohengrin" preludes, the one full of dreamy mysticism and presaging the tragedy with which the drama ends, the other sparkling, joyous and almost bacchanalian in its unrestrained buoyancy. The "Wotan Farewell" and the "Fire Charm" music had bestowed upon them the lusciousness, sadness, strength and color that the composer surrounded them with, and the ride of the Valkyries was depicted with all its weird storm and tumult.

Mr. Ben Davies sang Lohengrin's legend from "Lohengrin" and Siegmund's "Love Song" from "Die Walkure." He was in excellent voice, and while it is difficult to picture either Lohengrin or Siegmund without a mystic background, yet the effect that he produced by his artistic method, admirable finish and sympathetic touch was satisfying.

By the way, will some philosopher who has studied small things, explain why certain men and women who can sit until midnight watching a drama are irresistibly compelled to leave a concert [illegible] o'clock, and that during the [illegible] a number which demands ab- [illegible]

The Philadelphia Press.

TUESDAY, MARCH 23, 1897.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Final Programme Devoted Exclusively to Wagneriana.

As before—and it was a popular move—the Boston Symphony Orchestra closed one of its succesful seasons last night at the Academy of Music with a Wagner programme that showed the master at his best, and perhaps at his worst, if the tawdry bombast of the 'Rienzi Overture" be taken into account. It was a varied and interesting programme, in which, as was fitting, Mr. Paur selected two of Wagner's compositions which belong to the concert hall, "A Faust Overture," and the "Siegfried Idyll," and then, in handling his excerpts from the Bayreuth master's operatic works, he treated them more from the point of view of musical compositions than as preludes and overtures of anticipatory dramatic value or as purely dramatic accompaniments to action on the stage, and so gave them all a true concert touch.

Consequently the reading of the "Lohengrin" prelude to Act I was not, and with reason, as one would hear it from Seidl or Damrosch. Under Paur it has a concert effect and suggests such a drawing out of sentiment as would hardly be allowable with four hours of opera yet to come, but the beauty of the rendering is unquestioned. Curiously enough, the very noisy "Rienzi" overture—and Mr. Paur gave all the noise—which made Wagner's evil reputation as a man of brass and musical bluster, seemed to please the audience most of all, as it rather endured than enjoyed the "Parsifal" prelude, which was rendered with much dignity. The audience, however, put its stamp of approval also on what was the best work of the evening in the shorter pieces, the spirited handling of the "Lohengrin" prelude to Act III, while all the "Die Walkure" music gave great delight, as it came in for a particularly fine interpretation, the orchestra rendering the "Ride of the Valkyries" with splendid force and masterly characterization. The "Faust Overture" and "Siegfried Idyll" were much refined in handling, the latter gaining, probably, the former losing by this treatment. The soloist of the evening was Mr. Ben Davies, who sang the two old favorites, the "Lohengrin Legend" and "Siegmund's Love Song," but in neither case with notable success.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, MARCH 23, 1897.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Last Concert for the Season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There was the usual crowded and brilliant audience at the Academy of Music last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, gave its fifth and last concert for the season. The programme upon this occasion consisted exclusively of selections from the compositions of Wagner, but so judicious had the selections been chosen and so superbly were they played that the monotony which might have been apprehended from this arrangement was agreeably absent, and the evening was one of great interest and enjoyment. It can hardly be necessary to say how worthty of all praise was the work of the orchestra. Mr. Paur is in everything much more sure of his effects and clearer in his purposes than he was a few seasons ago, and he rarely fails to evoke the meaning and express the beauty of any composition which he undertakes to interpret. But undoubtedly it is as a conductor of Wagner's music that he is at his best, and last night's concert was superlatively notable for its tonal beauty and illuminative. It illustrated with matchless eloquence and art every phase of Wagner's many-sided genius, and whether it was the ecstatic serenity of the "Parsifal" prelude, the mystical soarings of the "Lohergrin" vorspiel, the tender grace and sylvan poetry of the "Siegfried Idyll," the passionate romanticism of the "Rienzi" ovrture, or the epic grandeus of t he "Firc-charm" and Valkyrie's Ride" music, each quality of the score found a most appreciative and impressive embodiment. The soloist was that admirable artist, Mr. Ben Davies, who delivered Lohengrin's "Legend" and the "Spring Song" from Die Walkare with a smoothness of phasing a clearness of enunciation and a beauty of tone which were wholly admirable. There will be general regret that this unsurpassable series of concerts is at an end.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fifth and last concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew to the Academy of Music last evening an audience that taxed the seating capacity of the house. It was a Wagner programme, and the great gathering of devotees of music was a convincing proof that Wagner's genius is not fading in the popular estimation as the years pass. It was also a fine tribute, and one eminently deserved, to the uncommon ability of the orchestra and to the conspicuous talents of Mr. Paur as a leader. Not an instrument but felt the mastery of his baton, not a conception of his mind but was instantly caught up by the efficient corps of musicians under his guidance. The critics may fight it out among themselves as to the relative merits of Wagner and other composers, and the supporters of the Italian school may deride his later operas as soporific rather than kindling in their tendencies. But there was nothing somniferous about last night's programme, as interpreted by Mr. Paur's skillful performers. Even Wagner admits of contrasts with himself, and the bill of fare was so discreetly adjusted as to make it ever interesting, sometimes delightful, and occasionally inspiring.

The prelude to "Parsifal" served as an introduction, and was given with that precision and fineness of phrasing for which the orchestra is famous. The "Faust" overture, eminently Wagnerian, though written before he had freed himself from the influence of other composers, was given with equal facility. The preludes to the first and third acts of "Lohengrin" were rendered to fine effect, the familiar wedding march eliciting enthusiastic applause for the brilliancy of its execution. The "Siegfried" idyl was essayed with equal success. It is one of the few examples in which the composer is gentle even to playfulness, and it has a tender and melodic charm which was admirably set forth by Mr. Paur's musicians. The noble overture to "Rienzi" followed, and possibly was the most popular number of the evening, a fact which excites an expression of regret that this opera is not more conspicuous in the repertory of modern impresarios. The "Ride of the Walkyries" concluded the bill. Mr. Ben Davies was the soloist, and his singing in English of Lohengrin's legend and Siegmund's love song was worthy of unstinted praise. He was in excellent voice, and his style and method left little lacking. The entire performance was in fine keeping with the high standing of the orchestra.

The Times

TEN PAGES

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 23, 1897.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening. As at the closing concert of last year, Mr. Paur had arranged his programme entirely of excerpts from the works of Wagner. They were all familiar, but it was a great pleasure to hear them with the clear tone and smooth execution of this noble orchestra. Ben Davies was, as before, the soloist, and renewed the impression he had made as a firm, clear, intelligent tenor singer. The audience was large and very enthusiastic.

THE RECORD

Philadelphia, March 23, 1897.

The Last Boston Symphony Concert.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the twelfth as of the eleventh Philadelphia was devoted to a Wagner programme. This second Wagnerian evening was even more delightful than the first, being much more elaborate and better arranged than the original. The little "Siegfried Idyl," composed by the master in honor of his wife's birthday, and his decidedly enigmatical "Faust" overture were repeated, and almost all the actual concert numbers of the Wagnerian repertoire not before performed were given. The interpretation throughout was magnificent, and the audience was sincerely enthusiastic. The opening number was the "Parsifal" interlude, which was listened to with deep interest. Mr. Ben Davies sang once again Siegmund's spring song, and also Lohengrin's Legend. He has a saccharine tenor which lacks the highest Wagnerian qualities, but imparted an enjoyable, sugary sweetness to his songs.

The Morning Advertiser.

FRIDAY, MARCH 26, 1897.

WAGNER IN PLENTY.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Ben Davies, Soloist, Sang Legend from "Lohengrin" and Siegfried's Love Song.

New Yorkers are taking their Wagner in large doses this season. Notwithstanding that we have had Wagner twice this week and are to have him twice again, the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew one of the largest houses it has had in New York this season, last night, to hear a "Wagner programme." And it was in every way a programme worthy of the patronage it received. Mr. Paur's scholarly conducting was never more satisfactory, and the beautiful finish with which the famous band played was a triumph of orchestral art.

Ben Davies was the soloist. He sang the legend from "Lohengrin" and Siegfried's love song. In the latter he did much better than in the former, his high notes going all to pieces in the selection from "Lohengrin."

The rest of the programme consisted of the prelude from "Parciful," the "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried" idyll and the Ride of the Valkyries.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

FRIDAY, MARCH 26, 1897.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its eleventh annual series of concerts in New-York at the Metropolitan Opera House with a concert devoted wholly to the music of Wagner. Ten pieces were on the programme, eight of which were excerpts from operas and dramas, arranged without regard to chronological sequence. The two exceptions were the "Siegfried Idyl" and "A Faust Overture." There were three numbers from "Lohengrin" (the preludes to Acts I and III and the narrative from the third act sung by Mr. Ben Davies), the prelude to "Parsifal," the overture to "Rienzi," the forest music from Act II of "Siegfried," Siegmund's love song from "Die Walküre" (sung by Mr. Davies) and the Ride of the Valkyrior from the same drama. The same programme will be repeated at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn this afternoon, except that the finale from "Die Walküre" will take the place of the fragment from "Siegfried." This programme has occupied the attention of Mr. Paur and his men all the week, and they were of course expected to be letter-perfect in it. Nevertheless, it seemed last night as if it required some time to warm them to their work. The "Parsifal" prelude was played somewhat perfunctorily, and lacked elevation, to say nothing of that mystical feeling of consecration which is so essential to it. Ragged entrances of the wind choir also weakened the effect of the second and third themes, with their burden of aspiration and sturdy faith. In the subsequent numbers the orchestra grew better and better, and the concert came to a brilliant close. Mr. Davies, who was warmly received, seemed to be a bit under the weather, all the high notes in the "Lohengrin" narrative being emitted with a care bordering on timidity. His singing in the other number, however, won him several hearty recalls. The audience was the most numerous that the orchestra has had here this season—a fact that may be set down to the credit of Wagner.

3/20 Commwlth

JEWISH

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, will give its fifth and last concert for the season at the Music Hall Wednesday evening, March 24, when the programme will be exclusively composed of selections from the works of Richard Wagner. The orchestral numbers will include the overture to "Parsifal," a "Faust" overture, the preludes to the first and third acts of "Lohengrin," the "Siegfried Idyll," the overture to "Rienzi" and the "Fire Charm" and "Ride of the Valkyries," from "Die Walkure." Mr. Ben Davies will be the soloist, and will sing the "Legend" from "Lohengrin" and the famous "Spring" song of Siegmund, from "Die Walkure." Last year the all-Wagner concert, with pretty much the came programme, was the most popular of the season, and this induced the repetition of what looked like a doubtful experiment.

* * *

Life

The programme for the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Music Hall, Wednesday, will be exclusively devoted to Wagner. The best and most popular selections from the great composer's works have been selected for the occasion.

* * *

Life

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Emil Paur, conductor, takes place at the Music Hall Wednesday evening. Ben Davies will be the soloist, and a fine Wagner programme has been arranged for the final one of these always enjoyable musical events.

* * *

* * *

The Wagner programme for the final symphony concert on Wednesday is announced as follows: Prelude to "Parsifal;" Lohengrin's Legend; a Faust Overture; Preludes to Acts I. and III., "Lohengrin;" a Siegfried Idyl; Overture, "Rienzi;" "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire-Charm;" "Siegmund's Love-song" and "Ride of the Walkyries," from "Die Walkure."

Philadelphia Inquirer

TUESDAY - - - - - MARCH 23, 1897

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Last Concert of the Season at the Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its twelfth season in this city last night at the Academy of Music. It was a Wagner night and this was the program:

"Parsifal," prelude; "Lohengrin," Lohengrin's Legend;" a Faust overture; "Lohengrin," a, prelude to Act I; b, prelude to Act III; a "Siegfried" idyl; "Rienzi," overture; "Die Walkure," "Wotan's Farewell' and "Fire Charm;" "Siegmund's Love Song," "Ride of the Walkyries." Soloist, Mr. Ben Davies.

There are people who undoubtedly thought that a Wagner program could not be complete without the "Tannhauser" overture and the Siegfried Funeral March from "Gotterdammerung;" and yet, although there were probably hundreds of persons in the Academy last night who would have agreed with them, what was given was interpreted in such translucence, delicacy, rare dramatic feeling and musical intelligence that the audience were at once made willing captives, and gave themselves up to the witchery of the hour. The prelude to "Parsifal," the only part of that music drama which can be given in this country, showed not only in its interpretation the trained skill of the players, but the deep sympathy of the conductor with the meaning of the composer. In no other number on the program save, perhaps, in the "Faust" overture were the brasses and wood winds heard in greater richness of tone and phrasing than in this prelude, and if nothing else had been played the work of the orchestra would have been a distinct triumph. The dainty, child-like and fairy beauty of the "Siegfried" idyl was deliciously pictured, as also were the motives in the two "Lohengrin" preludes, the one full of dreamy mysticism and presaging the tragedy with which the drama ends, the other sparkling, joyous and almost bacchanalian in its unrestrained buoyancy. The "Wotan Farewell" and the "Fire Charm" music had bestowed upon them the lusciousness, sadness, strength and color that the composer surrounded them with, and the ride of the Valkyries was depicted with all its weird storm and tumult.

Mr. Ben Davies sang Lohengrin's legend from "Lohengrin" and Siegmund's "Love Song" from "Die Walkure." He was in excellent voice, and while it is difficult to picture either Lohengrin or Siegmund without a mystic background, yet the effect that he produced by his artistic method, admirable finish and sympathetic touch was satisfying.

By the way, will some philosopher who has studied small things, explain why certain men and women who can sit until midnight watching a drama are irresistibly compelled to leave a concert before 10 o'clock, and that during the playing of a number which demands absolute quiet? There must be some reason. [illegible] physical or mental weakness was [illegible] evidence last night.

The Philadelphia Press.

TUESDAY, MARCH 23, 1897.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Final Programme Devoted Exclusively to Wagneriana.

As before—and it was a popular move—the Boston Symphony Orchestra closed one of its succesful seasons last night at the Academy of Music with a Wagner programme that showed the master at his best, and perhaps at his worst, if the tawdry bombast of the 'Rienzi Overture" be taken into account. It was a varied and interesting programme, in which, as was fitting, Mr. Paur selected two of Wagner's compositions which belong to the concert hall, "A Faust Overture," and the "Siegfried Idyll," and then, in handling his excerpts from the Bayreuth master's operatic works, he treated them more from the point of view of musical compositions than as preludes and overtures of anticipatory dramatic value or as purely dramatic accompaniments to action on the stage, and so gave them all a true concert touch.

Consequently the reading of the "Lohengrin" prelude to Act I was not, and with reason, as one would hear it from Seidl or Damrosch. Under Paur it has a concert effect and suggests such a drawing out of sentiment as would hardly be allowable with four hours of opera yet to come, but the beauty of the rendering is unquestioned. Curiously enough, the very noisy "Rienzi" overture—and Mr. Paur gave all the noise—which made Wagner's evil reputation as a man of brass and musical bluster, seemed to please the audience most of all, as it rather endured than enjoyed the "Parsifal" prelude, which was rendered with much dignity. The audience, however, put its stamp of approval also on what was the best work of the evening in the shorter pieces, the spirited handling of the "Lohengrin" prelude to Act III, while all the "Die Walkure" music gave great delight, as it came in for a particularly fine interpretation, the orchestra rendering the "Ride of the Valkyries" with splendid force and masterly characterization. The "Faust Overture" and "Siegfried Idyll" were much refined in handling, the latter gaining, probably, the former losing by this treatment. The soloist of the evening was Mr. Ben Davies, who sang the two old favorites, the "Lohengrin Legend" and "Siegmund's Love Song," but in neither case with notable success.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, MARCH 23, 1897.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Last Concert for the Season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There was the usual crowded and brilliant audience at the Academy of Music last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, gave its fifth and last concert for the season. The programme upon this occasion consisted exclusively of selections from the compositions of Wagner, but so judicious had the selections been chosen and so superbly were they played that the monotony which might have been apprehended from this arrangement was agreeably absent, and the evening was one of great interest and enjoyment. It can hardly be necessary to say how worthty of all praise was the work of the orchestra. Mr. Paur is in everything much more sure of his effects and clearer in his purposes than he was a few seasons ago, and he rarely fails to evoke the meaning and express the beauty of any composition which he undertakes to interpret. But undoubtedly it is as a conductor of Wagner's music that he is at his best, and last night's concert was superlatively notable for its tonal beauty and illuminative. It illustrated with matchless eloquence and art every phase of Wagner's many-sided genius, and whether it was the ecstatic serenity of the "Parsifal" prelude, the mystical coarings of the "Lohergrin" vorspiel, the tender grace and sylvan poetry of the "Siegfried Idyll," the passionate romanticism of the "Rienzi" ovrture, or the epic grandeus of t he "Fire-charm" and Valkyrie's Ride" music, each quality of the score found a most appreciative and impressive embodiment. The soloist was that admirable artist, Mr. Ben Davies, who delivered Lohengrin's "Legend" and the "Spring Song" from Die Walkare with a smoothness of phasing a clearness of enunciation and a beauty of tone which were wholly admirable. There will be general regret that this unsurpassable series of concerts is at an end.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Tuesday, March 23, 1897.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fifth and last concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew to the Academy of Music last evening an audience that taxed the seating capacity of the house. It was a Wagner programme, and the great gathering of devotees of music was a convincing proof that Wagner's genius is not fading in the popular estimation as the years pass. It was also a fine tribute, and one eminently deserved, to the uncommon ability of the orchestra and to the conspicuous talents of Mr. Paur as a leader. Not an instrument but felt the mastery of his baton, not a conception of his mind but was instantly caught up by the efficient corps of musicians under his guidance. The critics may fight it out among themselves as to the relative merits of Wagner and other composers, and the supporters of the Italian school may deride his later operas as soporific rather than kindling in their tendencies. But there was nothing somniferous about last night's programme, as interpreted by Mr. Paur's skillful performers. Even Wagner admits of contrasts with himself, and the bill of fare was so discreetly adjusted as to make it ever interesting, sometimes delightful, and occasionally inspiring.

The prelude to "Parsifal" served as an introduction, and was given with that precision and fineness of phrasing for which the orchestra is famous. The "Faust" overture, eminently Wagnerian, though written before he had freed himself from the influence of other composers, was given with equal facility. The preludes to the first and third acts of "Lohengrin" were rendered to fine effect, the familiar wedding march eliciting enthusiastic applause for the brilliancy of its execution. The "Siegfried" idyl was essayed with equal success. It is one of the few examples in which the composer is gentle even to playfulness, and it has a tender and melodic charm which was admirably set forth by Mr. Paur's musicians. The noble overture to "Rienzi" followed, and possibly was the most popular number of the evening, a fact which excites an expression of regret that this opera is not more conspicuous in the repertory of modern impresarios. The "Ride of the Walkyries" concluded the bill. Mr. Ben Davies was the soloist, and his singing in English of Lohengrin's legend and Siegmund's love song was worthy of unstinted praise. He was in excellent voice, and his style and method left little lacking. The entire performance was in fine keeping with the high standing of the orchestra.

The Times

TEN PAGES

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 23, 1897.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening. As at the closing concert of last year, Mr. Paur had arranged his programme entirely of excerpts from the works of Wagner. They were all familiar, but it was a great pleasure to hear them with the clear tone and smooth execution of this noble orchestra. Ben Davies was, as before, the soloist, and renewed the impression he had made as a firm, clear, intelligent tenor singer. The audience was large and very enthusiastic.

THE RECORD

Philadelphia, March 23, 1897.

The Last Boston Symphony Concert.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the twelfth as of the eleventh Philadelphia was devoted to a Wagner programme. This second Wagnerian evening was even more delightful than the first, being much more elaborate and better arranged than the original. The little "Siegfried Idyl," composed by the master in honor of his wife's birthday, and his decidedly enigmatical "Faust" overture were repeated, and almost all the actual concert numbers of the Wagnerian repertoire not before performed were given. The interpretation throughout was magnificent, and the audience was sincerely enthusiastic. The opening number was the "Parsifal" interlude, which was listened to with deep interest. Mr. Ben Davies sang once again Siegmund's spring song, and also Lohengrin's Legend. He has a saccharine tenor which lacks the highest Wagnerian qualities, but imparted an enjoyable, sugary sweetness to his songs.

The Morning Advertiser.

FRIDAY, MARCH 26, 1897.

WAGNER IN PLENTY.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Ben Davies, Soloist, Sang Legend from "Lohengrin" and Siegfried's Love Song.

New Yorkers are taking their Wagner in large doses this season. Notwithstanding that we have had Wagner twice this week and are to have him twice again, the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew one of the largest houses it has had in New York this season, last night, to hear a "Wagner programme." And it was in every way a programme worthy of the patronage it received. Mr. Paur's scholarly conducting was never more satisfactory, and the beautiful finish with which the famous band played was a triumph of orchestral art.

Ben Davies was the soloist. He sang the legend from "Lohengrin" and Siegfried's love song. In the latter he did much better than in the former, his high notes going all to pieces in the selection from "Lohengrin."

The rest of the programme consisted of the prelude from "Parciful," the "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried" idyll and the Ride of the Valkyries.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

FRIDAY, MARCH 26, 1897.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its eleventh annual series of concerts in New-York at the Metropolitan Opera House with a concert devoted wholly to the music of Wagner. Ten pieces were on the programme, eight of which were excerpts from operas and dramas, arranged without regard to chronological sequence. The two exceptions were the "Siegfried Idyl" and "A Faust Overture." There were three numbers from "Lohengrin" (the preludes to Acts I and III and the narrative from the third act sung by Mr. Ben Davies), the prelude to "Parsifal," the overture to "Rienzi," the forest music from Act II of "Siegfried," Siegmund's love song from "Die Walküre" (sung by Mr. Davies) and the Ride of the Valkyrior from the same drama. The same programme will be repeated at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn this afternoon, except that the finale from "Die Walküre" will take the place of the fragment from "Siegfried." This programme has occupied the attention of Mr. Paur and his men all the week, and they were of course expected to be letter-perfect in it. Nevertheless, it seemed last night as if it required some time to warm them to their work. The "Parsifal" prelude was played somewhat perfunctorily, and lacked elevation, to say nothing of that mystical feeling of consecration which is so essential to it. Ragged entrances of the wind choir also weakened the effect of the second and third themes, with their burden of aspiration and sturdy faith. In the subsequent numbers the orchestra grew better and better, and the concert came to a brilliant close. Mr. Davies, who was warmly received, seemed to be a bit under the weather, all the high notes in the "Lohengrin" narrative being emitted with a care bordering on timidity. His singing in the other number, however, won him several hearty recalls. The audience was the most numerous that the orchestra has had here this season—a fact that may be set down to the credit of Wagner.

Sun.

1897.

WAGNER MUSIC PLAYED.

Fifth and Last Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Any one chancing to visit this great metropolis of ours during this week might reasonably conclude that the musical portion of our community had gone quite Wagner mad. Four performances of the great German's operas, and a concert devoted entirely to the playing of extracts from his works, all within the space of six days, would surely furnish ample ground for such suspicions.

Before last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra one might have felt inclined to think that Mr. Paur had erred in presenting his Wagner programme in the midst of the Bayreuthian deluge with which we are at present being overwhelmed; but after hearing the Boston men all is forgotten save the intense delight which their playing invariably inspires.

The virtuosity of this wonderful orchestra is never more favorably displayed than in the music of Wagner, and no one was disposed to complain even when they found that last evening's programme was almost the exact duplicate of the one offered by Mr. Paur at last year's Wagner concert.

No music played with such perfection of tone, such brilliancy of technique and such sincere musical feeling as the Boston men bring to their work can become tiresome from too frequent repetition.

The only selections on the list of last night which were not given a year ago were the "Parsifal" prelude and the "Lohengrin" narrative. Mr. Ben Davies sang the narrative, but not with the effect he might have created had he not been evidently suffering from the epidemic of throat trouble which has made a universal victim of the whole community. Later Mr. Davies gave the "Spring Song" from "Die Walküre" with much greater success, the latter music not demanding so lavish a use of high notes as the narrative.

The audience was large and demonstrative and had the unwritten law of the Boston Orchestra not forbidden encores it is safe to say that almost every selection would have been redemanded.

Following is the programme in full of this memorably fine concert. It well merits being recorded in print.

Prelude	"Parsifal"
Narrative	"Lohengrin"
A Faust overture.
(a) Prelude to Act I. (b) Prelude to Act III.	"Lohengrin"
A Siegfried Idyl.
Overture	"Rienzi"
Waldmeben	"Siegfried"
Siegmund's Love Song	"Die Walküre"
Ride of the Walkyries	"Die Walküre"

The New York Times

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 26, 1897.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Wagner Programme Played Before a Large Audience.

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra is growing in popularity in this city is an undoubted fact. It is one, too, on which music lovers are to be felicitated, for it shows that they know a good thing, and intend to cherish it. It would be fortunate if the success of the gentlemen of Boston should bestir our local musicians to better performances; but, as most of them deny that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is any better than our own orchestras, we need not hope for much improvement. Last night's concert, which was devoted to the performance of Wagner's music, was unfortunately prolific in technical slips, but it was a very admirable concert for all that.

Mr. Paur chose from Wagner's works the "Parsifal" prelude, the "Lohengrin" narrative and preludes to the first and third acts, the "Faust" overture, "Siegfried Idyll," Siegmund's love song, "Rienzi" overture, "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," and "Ride of the Valkyries." Mr. Ben Davies, the popular English tenor, was the vocalist. His work may be dismissed very briefly. His lovely voice was suffering from the vagaries of our March weather, and his "Lohengrin" excerpt was sung in a labored manner; but Siegmund's song, which is easier, he sang delightfully.

In the early part of the programme the orchestra did not quite do itself justice; even the "Lohengrin" prelude, magnificently played as a whole, was marred by some small slips. But after that particular number had warmed the players to their work, they played superbly. The introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin" was full of spirit and color, and the Idyll was read by Mr. Paur in a much more animated style than it usually is here. The "Rienzi" overture brought out the power of the orchestra, while its delicacy was beautifully displayed in the "Waldweben." The "Ride of the Valkyries" was notably well done, the "Hojotoho" passage in the strings coming out with unwonted eloquence, and the rhythmic strength and instrumental color of the whole number being well shown.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 26, 1897.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final concert of their New York season last night. It is not saying too much to pronounce it the best of the series, notwithstanding the fact that each of the nine numbers was a Wagner composition. The superb manner in which Mr. Paur's orchestra interpreted the master's ideas must have been a revelation to any doubting Thomas who may have strayed into the Metropolitan Opera House. Mr. Ben Davies, the English tenor, who was the soloist, sang Siegmund's love song from "Die Walkure" and "Lohengrin's Legend." He was not in good voice, which was a pity, for he is an excellent artist.

---

by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PAR
New York.

FRIDAY, MARCH 26, 1897.

WAGNER AT THE METROPOLITAN.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Closes the Season with a Brilliant Programme.

It might have been thought that an exclusively Wagner programme coming in the midst of an operatic season devoted exclusively to Wagner opera would be neither judicious nor well-timed from a popular standpoint.

But not at all! What the public wants is beyond guessing and past finding out, for the audience at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan last night, the final one of the series, was one of the best of the season and the rather long Wagner request programme was highly appreciated. What with the "Parsifal" and "Lohengrin" preludes, the overture to "Rienzi," the Siegfried Idyl and "Waldweben," "Eine Faust Overture" and the "Ride of the Valkyries," together with two vocal selections, the Lohengrin's Legend and Siegmund's Love Song from the Walkuere," sung by that admirable English tenor, Ben Davies, Mr. Paur succeeded in presenting a many-sided and sufficiently varied view of the work of the master.

And yet I have heard more interesting Wagner programmes. Mr. Paur seemed last night to be seeking to give us Wagner when most subtle, inward and spiritual and not when most majestic and impressive. I thought the programme might have shown more contrast, but perhaps that was not Mr. Paur's intention.

The orchestra certainly played magnificently; with an authority and precision which brought out the intricacies and contrasted color and effects of Wagner's wonderful orchestration with a clarity and balance of tonal values as admirable as it is uncommon.

But superlatives are unavoidable in speaking of the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for in their particular province they stand alone.

I have heard Mr. Davies sing the Lohengrin Legend better than he did last night. He was a tifle husky at first and his high notes suffered thereby. Mr. Paur also dragged the tempo somewhat. The Siegmund Love Song went far better. Mr. Davis always sings with refinement, taste and feeling, and his voice is certainly one of charming quality. But how funny and strange Wagner sounds in English.

The high lights of the programme for me were the Prelude to "Lohengrin," Act III., played with magnificent dash; the Rienzi Overture, whose brilliancy was almost lurid, and the "Walkuerenritt," replete with fire and fury. Both the Idyl and the "Waldweben" struck me as a trifle cold and unpoetic, though rendered with absolute finish. The finish and precision of the "Faust" Overture, too, were marvelous, while the Parsifal Prelude was given with due reverence and respect. Indeed, all Mr. Paur's readings were in the main spirited, intelligent and appreciative, and the concert certainly brought the eleventh season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York to a brilliant close. One only regretted that the concert should be the last one.

REGINALD DE KOVEN.

The New York Press

DAILY EDITION.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 26, 1897.

LAST CONCERT THE BEST

Boston Symphony Orchestra Says Adieu with Wagner.

It is with much regret that music lovers bid adieu to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season. This admirable artistic organization gave its fifth and last concert last night at the Metropolitan Opera House, the programme consisting entirely of Wagner's works. It was the most enjoyable concert of the Boston Symphony's season, and a large audience attested its delight by hearty applause.

The numbers were: Prelude to "Parsifal," "Lohengrin's Legend," "A Faust Overture," preludes to acts I. and III., "Lohengrin," "A 'Siegfried' Idyl," the overture of "Rienzi," the "Forest Sounds" from the second act of "Siegfried," Siegmund's love song (usually known as the "Spring Song") from "Die Walkure" and the "Ride of the Valkyries."

Ben Davies sang "Lohengrin's Legend" and the "Spring Song," and gave as much pleasure as he did last year. He was more successful in the excerpt from "Die Walkure" than in the "Legend," as its exquisite, flowing melody is better suited to his voice. He sang this entrancing song in a way which gave genuine pleasure.

It is said of Wagner that toward the close of his life he became ashamed of his early opera, "Rienzi," but the audience last night appeared to enjoy the spirited overture more than any other number, with the exception of Siegmund's song; and in truth it is a stirring composition, if it has few touches of Wagner as he is known in his music-dramas. The orchestra played with that perfection which has placed it at the head of instrumental organizations in this country, and which is the marvel of all concert goers. Mr. Paur, however, might study pianissimo effects with advantage. He is a great success, at any rate, so far as fortissimo is concerned.

From The Standard Union March 27 189

Compliments H. L. Bridgman,
Business Manager.

LAST BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

It was little short of an inspiration for Mr. Paur to close the series of concerts under the auspices of the Institute with a full Wagner programme. Last year in New York this same thing was done before a great house, but Brooklyn had to be satisfied with something very different. The size and appreciation of the audience last night at the Academy proved conclusively that Wagner can be as acceptable under one conductor, if the conditions are propitious, as under another. Certainly the splendor and finesse of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought out those "Lohengrin" and "Walkure" numbers as they never were by the little band of scarcely fifty under the leadership of Seidl. Even a conductor of acknowledged power in certain lines cannot outbalance insufficient brasses, wide gaps in the wood wind, and a paucity of strings. In fact, such insufficient orchestral strength is apt to take the heart out of the leader, and to cause him to conduct with a listlessness not conducive to artistic results, as was the case at not a few of the Seidl concerts this winter. It was, therefore, a delight last evening just to look at the orchestra, ample to the verge of magnificence, and, after warming to its work, full of zeal, vigor and enthusiasm. The "Parsifal" prelude, possibly because it was the first number, and the audience as tardy as ever, but more likely because Mr. Paur lacks something in delicacy and tenderness, failed to convey the full measure of spiritual longing, aspiration and faith, for which it stands to the musical world almost as conclusively as the Gospel to the orthodox Christian. Yet, on the other hand, the "Lohengrin" prelude, containing the Grail motive in a different form, but even more subtle in meaning and fine in effect, was given as never before in that auditorium—the violins in their perfect pianissimo seeming only a shade removed from those angelic spheres, the going-forth and home-coming of whose messengers they are supposed to accompany and depict. The prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin," the joyful music of the wedding, was given with that electric precision and lusty vigor in which Mr. Paur delights, and in which one hundred well-disciplined men support him with enthusiasm.

There were two overtures last evening—those to "Faust" and "Rienzi." The former, as is well known, is not an overture at all, but the first movement to an uncompleted symphony, while the latter represents Wagner in his "salad days," so to speak. Yet there is a martial opulence about the Rienzi work, which in conjunction with the Boston orchestra and Mr. Paur is capable of producing quite a sensation, though generally speaking it is one of the least satisfactory of the Wagnerian overtures. Preceding it on the programme was the "Siegfried Idyl," that monotonous composition which is too long by half, and which so easily gets on one's nerves—like the old torture of the constant drop of water on the prisoner's head. Why always this tiresome "idyl," when there is the exquisite "Waldweben," a far more lovely idyl than the other can ever hope to be, a genuine echo of the forests, instead of this manufactured thing of boredom, as tiresome as it is tormenting. But the audience lived through it, and eventually came those two precious gems, "Wotani Farewell and Fire Charm," and the "Ride of the Valkyries." Few who have listened to the Magic Fire Scene at midnight, under the manipulation of a tired orchestra, and after four hours of bad ventilation, can conceive how fascinating, despite the absence of flames and the sleeping Brunnhilde, this rare piece of musical color can become. Last evening it received all the resources of one of the finest orchestras in the world; almost overpowering was that wealth of tonal beauty as brought out by some of the best musicians of the day. The flood of melody gained every instant from the sombre notes of the "Farewell" to the warm and flowing rhythm of the fire scene, till the flames seemed literally to leap and quiver before one as they performed their office of protection to the fallen goddess. Last of all came the "Ride of the Valkyries," full of stirring animal life and the fresh north wind—always an ideal composition on which to send an audience home.

Mr. Ben Davies was the soloist of the occasion, and did what soloists ought to do—fall in harmoniously with the scheme of the evening, instead of interfering with it at every point. His numbers were Lohengrin's Legend and Siegmun's Love Song. Mr. Davies' voice is a most agreeable one, a hearty, earnest, straightforward tenor, but he was quite hoarse last night, and reached the high notes in the Lohengrin song with difficulty. The beautiful Spring Song of Siegmund's went better. As is usually the case, the soloist was recalled a sufficient number of times to warrant an encore, which he steadily and very properly refused to give.

Yet the real triumph of the evening lay with Mr. Paur and his men. Some of the numbers were so wonderfully performed—with such absolute accuracy as well as uncommon dash and fire, with crescendos as perfectly attuned as the law of gravitation, and fortissimos as sure as a clap of thunder—that it seemed almost as if we now heard them for the first time. To a certain extent the audience appreciated this fact, and Mr. Paur had his happy moment. So also did the Brooklyn Institute, with every seat occupied, and four rows of boxes filled to the guards. Today marks the last matinee, at which a new symphony, by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, is in progress.

From The Standard Union Mar. 29 189

Compliments H. L. Bridgman,
Business Manager.

LAST BOSTON ORCHESTRA MATINEE.

Brooklyn music lovers must all regret that the last concert and matinee of the season have been given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Paur knows how to group attractive programmes. That on Saturday afternoon was listened to with great interest by an audience composed largely of women, who were, no doubt, especially desirous of hearing the "Gaelic" Symphony in E minor by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach of Boston. This woman is not yet 30 years of age, but she is a composer of whom we may be proud. She has, of course, had musical training, but she is largely self-taught. Still, she has pursued her studies under most favorable circumstances, having always had the leisure and freedom from care given by the possession of wealth. Her husband, Dr. Beach, is also musical and an artist, and closely in sympathy with her pursuit. This symphony is one of her most ambitious works, and is truly able. There is nothing feminine about the writing; all her work is strong and brilliant. The first movement, "Allegro con fuoco" in E minor, has a beautiful Gaelic folk-song interwoven with the theme, played in canon form by the oboe, flute and strings, where it dies away in a pianissimo. There is also a beautiful pizzicato for the strings. The second movement, Alla Siciliana," in F major, has a charming melody, tranquil and sweet, alternating with a fascinating scherzo. The third movement, "Lento con Molto expressione" in E minor, is composed of three themes, each beginning with a short prelude for the wind instruments, kettle drums and basses. All three themes resemble folk-songs, and have the strongly marked closing minor cadence of Gaelic music. The fourth movement, "Allegro Molto" in E minor is also a development of a folk-song theme, but a song of more brilliant style, that goes with the wild dash of a slogan. The second and third movements are the most pleasing. All the parts are well scored, and the orchestra played with a brilliancy and perfection of attack that almost surprised their previous work this winter. Their playing was superb all through the programme. The other numbers were a concert overture by our townsman, E. C. Phelps, dedicated "To the Memory of Augustus Graham, Founder of the Brooklyn Academy of Arts and Sciences." This opened the programme, and was well received. It is a graceful composition written in a smooth style. The second number was, (a), Adagio, Op. 38 by Bargiel, and (b), a Rondo, Op. 49. Dvorak, for violoncello and orchestra, the soloist being Leo Schultz, of the orchestra, who played finely, as he always does, and was rewarded with much applause. The first is a dinty piece of writing, in which the flute and 'cello alternate on a pleasing little melody, and which ends in a full chord wherein the flute note is prominent, then diminishes to the faintest pianissimo. The second is in part like a little hornpipe, with a soft accompaniment of running chords for the violins, and is as quaint as an English madrigal. The programme closed with Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodie, No. 6 (Pesther Carnival), the first time it has been given at these concerts. Brilliant as all Liszt's Rhapsodies, it makes rather more of the Magyr melody, forming its theme, which is worked out with varied orchestration.

One of the most interested listeners was a bright-eyed little Japanese lady in the box at the right of the stage. Miss Joshi Kajaro, from Tokio, a student at Mount Holyoke Seminary, and now visiting friends in this city.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, MARCH 26, 1897.

WAGNER MUSIC PLAYED.

Fifth and Last Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Any one chancing to visit this great metropolis of ours during this week might reasonably conclude that the musical portion of our community had gone quite Wagner mad. Four performances of the great German's operas, and a concert devoted entirely to the playing of extracts from his works, all within the space of six days, would surely furnish ample ground for such suspicions.

Before last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra one might have felt inclined to think that Mr. Paur had erred in presenting his Wagner programme in the midst of the Bayreuthian deluge with which we are at present being overwhelmed; but after hearing the Boston men all is forgotten save the intense delight which their playing invariably inspires.

The virtuosity of this wonderful orchestra is never more favorably displayed than in the music of Wagner, and no one was disposed to complain even when they found that last evening's programme was almost the exact duplicate of the one offered by Mr. Paur at last year's Wagner concert.

No music played with such perfection of tone, such brilliancy of technique and such sincere musical feeling as the Boston men bring to their work can become tiresome from too frequent repetition.

The only selections on the list of last night which were not given a year ago were the "Parsifal" prelude and the "Lohengrin" narrative.

Mr. Ben Davies sang the narrative, but not with the effect he might have created had he not been evidently suffering from the epidemic of throat trouble which has made a universal victim of the whole community. Later Mr. Davies gave the "Spring Song" from "Die Walküre" with much greater success, the latter music not demanding so lavish a use of high notes as the narrative.

The audience was large and demonstrative and had the unwritten law of the Boston Orchestra not forbidden encores it is safe to say that almost every selection would have been redemanded.

Following is the programme in full of this memorably fine concert. It well merits being recorded in print.

Prelude	"Parsifal"
Narrative	"Lohengrin"
A Faust overture.
(a) Prelude to Act I. (b) Prelude to Act III.	"Lohengrin"
A Siegfried Idyl.
Overture	"Rienzi"
Waldmeben	"Siegfried"
Siegmund's Love Song	"Die Walküre"
Ride of the Walkyries	"Die Walküre"

The New York Times

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 26, 1897.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Wagner Programme Played Before a Large Audience.

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra is growing in popularity in this city is an undoubted fact. It is one, too, on which music lovers are to be felicitated, for it shows that they know a good thing, and intend to cherish it. It would be fortunate if the success of the gentlemen of Boston should bestir our local musicians to better performances; but, as most of them deny that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is any better than our own orchestras, we need not hope for much improvement. Last night's concert, which was devoted to the performance of Wagner's music, was unfortunately prolific in technical slips, but it was a very admirable concert for all that.

Mr. Paur chose from Wagner's works the "Parsifal" prelude, tne "Lohengrin" narrative and preludes to the first and third acts, the "Faust" overture, "Siegfried Idyll," Siegmund's love song, "Rienzi" overture, "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," and "Ride of the Valkyries." Mr. Ben Davies, the popular English tenor, was the vocalist. His work may be dismissed very briefly. His lovely voice was suffering from the vagaries of our March weather, and his "Lohengrin" excerpt was sung in a labored manner; but Siegmund's song, which is easier, he sang delightfully.

In the early part of the programme the orchestra did not quite do itself justice; even the "Lohengrin" prelude, magnificently played as a whole, was marred by some small slips. But after that particular number had warmed the players to their work, they played superbly. The introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin" was full of spirit and color, and the Idyll was read by Mr. Paur in a much more animated style than it usually is here. The "Rienzi" overture brought out the power of the orchestra, while its delicacy was beautifully displayed in the "Waldweben." The "Ride of the Valkyries" was notably well done, the "Hojotoho" passage in the strings coming out with unwonted eloquence, and the rhythmic strength and instrumental color of the whole number being well shown.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 26, 1897.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final concert of their New York season last night. It is not saying too much to pronounce it the best of the series, notwithstanding the fact that each of the nine numbers was a Wagner composition. The superb manner in which Mr. Paur's orchestra interpreted the master's ideas must have been a revelation to any doubting Thomas who may have strayed into the Metropolitan Opera House. Mr. Ben Davies, the English tenor, who was the soloist, sang Siegmund's love song from "Die Walkure" and "Lohengrin's Legend." He was not in good voice, which was a pity, for he is an excellent artist.

---

by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK
New York.

FRIDAY, MARCH 26, 1897.

WAGNER AT THE METROPOLITAN.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Closes the Season with a Brilliant Programme.

It might have been thought that an exclusively Wagner programme coming in the midst of an operatic season devoted exclusively to Wagner opera would be neither judicious nor well-timed from a popular standpoint.

But not at all! What the public wants is beyond guessing and past finding out, for the audience at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan last night, the final one of the series, was one of the best of the season and the rather long Wagner request programme was highly appreciated. What with the "Parsifal" and "Lohengrin" preludes, the overture to "Rienzi," the Siegfried Idyl and "Waldweben," "Eine Faust Overture" and the "Ride of the Valkyries," together with two vocal selections, the Lohengrin's Legend and Siegmund's Love Song, from the Walkuere," sung by that admirable English tenor, Ben Davies, Mr. Paur succeeded in presenting a many-sided and sufficiently varied view of the work of the master.

And yet I have heard more interesting Wagner programmes. Mr. Paur seemed last night to be seeking to give us Wagner when most subtle, inward and spiritual and not when most majestic and impressive. I thought the programme might have shown more contrast, but perhaps that was not Mr. Paur's intention.

The orchestra certainly played magnificently; with an authority and precision which brought out the intricacies and contrasted color and effects of Wagner's wonderful orchestration with a clarity and balance of tonal values as admirable as it is uncommon.

But superlatives are unavoidable in speaking of the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for in their particular province they stand alone.

I have heard Mr. Davies sing the Lohengrin Legend better than he did last night. He was a trifle husky at first and his high notes suffered thereby. Mr. Paur also dragged the tempo somewhat. The Siegmund Love Song went far better. Mr. Davis always sings with refinement, taste and feeling, and his voice is certainly one of charming quality. But how funny and strange Wagner sounds in English.

The high lights of the programme for me were the Prelude to "Lohengrin," Act III., played with magnificent dash; the Rienzi Overture, whose brilliancy was almost lurid, and the "Walkuerenritt," replete with fire and fury. Both the Idyl and the "Waldweben" struck me as a trifle cold and unpoetic, though rendered with absolute finish. The finish and precision of the "Faust" Overture, too, were marvelous, while the Parsifal Prelude was given with due reverence and respect. Indeed, all Mr. Paur's readings were in the main spirited, intelligent and appreciative, and the concert certainly brought the eleventh season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York to a brilliant close. One only regretted that the concert should be the last one.

REGINALD DE KOVEN.

The New York Press

DAILY EDITION.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 26, 1897.

LAST CONCERT THE BEST

Boston Symphony Orchestra Says Adieu with Wagner.

It is with much regret that music lovers bid adieu to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season. This admirable artistic organization gave its fifth and last concert last night at the Metropolitan Opera House, the programme consisting entirely of Wagner's works. It was the most enjoyable concert of the Boston Symphony's season, and a large audience attested its delight by hearty applause.

The numbers were: Prelude to "Parsifal," "Lohengrin's Legend," "A Faust Overture," preludes to acts I. and III., "Lohengrin," "A 'Siegfried' Idyl," the overture of "Rienzi," the "Forest Sounds" from the second act of "Siegfried," Siegmund's love song (usually known as the "Spring Song") from "Die Walkure" and the "Ride of the Valkyries."

Ben Davies sang "Lohengrin's Legend" and the "Spring Song," and gave as much pleasure as he did last year. He was more successful in the excerpt from "Die Walkure" than in the "Legend," as its exquisite, flowing melody is better suited to his voice. He sang this entrancing song in a way which gave genuine pleasure.

It is said of Wagner that toward the close of his life he became ashamed of his early opera, "Rienzi," but the audience last night appeared to enjoy the spirited overture more than any other number, with the exception of Siegmund's song; and in truth it is a stirring composition, if it has few touches of Wagner as he is known in his music-dramas. The orchestra played with that perfection which has placed it at the head of instrumental organizations in this country, and which is the marvel of all concert goers. Mr. Paur, however, might study pianissimo effects with advantage. He is a great success, at any rate, so far as fortissimo is concerned.

From The Standard Union March 27 189

Compliments H. L. Bridgman,
Business Manager.

LAST BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

It was little short of an inspiration for Mr. Paur to close the series of concerts under the auspices of the Institute with a full Wagner programme. Last year in New York this same thing was done before a great house, but Brooklyn had to be satisfied with something very different. The size and appreciation of the audience last night at the Academy proved conclusively that Wagner can be as acceptable under one conductor, if the conditions are propitious, as under another. Certainly the splendor and finesse of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought out those "Lohengrin" and "Walkure" numbers as they never were by the little band of scarcely fifty under the leadership of Seidl. Even a conductor of acknowledged power in certain lines cannot outbalance insufficient brasses, wide gaps in the wood wind, and a paucity of strings. In fact, such insufficient orchestral strength is apt to take the heart out of the leader, and to cause him to conduct with a listlessness not conducive to artistic results, as was the case at not a few of the Seidl concerts this winter. It was, therefore, a delight last evening just to look at the orchestra, ample to the verge of magnificence, and, after warming to its work, full of zeal, vigor and enthusiasm. The "Parsifal" prelude, possibly because it was the first number, and the audience as tardy as ever, but more likely because Mr. Paur lacks something in delicacy and tenderness, failed to convey the full measure of spiritual longing, aspiration and faith, for which it stands to the musical world almost as conclusively as the Gospel to the orthodox Christian. Yet, on the other hand, the "Lohengrin" prelude, containing the Grail motive in a different form, but even more subtle in meaning and fine in effect, was given as never before in that auditorium—the violins in their perfect pianissimo seeming only a shade removed from those angelic spheres, the going-forth and home-coming of whose messengers they are supposed to accompany and depict. The prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin," the joyful music of the wedding, was given with that electric precision and lusty vigor in which Mr. Paur delights, and in which one hundred well-disciplined men support him with enthusiasm.

There were two overtures last evening—those to "Faust" and "Rienzi." The former, as is well known, is not an overture at all, but the first movement to an uncompleted symphony, while the latter represents Wagner in his "salad days," so to speak. Yet there is a martial opulence about the Rienzi work, which in conjunction with the Boston orchestra and Mr. Paur is capable of producing quite a sensation, though generally speaking it is one of the least satisfactory of the Wagnerian overtures. Preceding it on the programme was the "Siegfried Idyl," that monotonous composition which is too long by half, and which so easily gets on one's nerves—like the old torture of the constant drop of water on the prisoner's head. Why always this tiresome "idyl," when there is the exquisite "Waldweben," a far more lovely idyl than the other can ever hope to be, a genuine echo of the forests, instead of this manufactured thing of boredom, as tiresome as it is tormenting. But the audience lived through it, and eventually came those two precious gems, "Wotani Farewell and Fire Charm," and the "Ride of the Valkyries." Few who have listened to the Magic Fire Scene at midnight, under the manipulation of a tired orchestra, and after four hours of bad ventilation, can conceive how fascinating, despite the absence of flames and the sleeping Brunnhilde, this rare piece of musical color can become. Last evening it received all the resources of one of the finest orchestras in the world; almost overpowering was that wealth of tonal beauty as brought out by some of the best musicians of the day. The flood of melody gained every instant from the sombre notes of the "Farewell" to the warm and flowing rhythm of the fire scene, till the flames seemed literally to leap and quiver before one as they performed their office of protection to the fallen goddess. Last of all came the "Ride of the Valkyries," full of stirring animal life and the fresh north wind—always an ideal composition on which to send an audience home.

Mr. Ben Davies was the soloist of the occasion, and did what soloists ought to do—fall in harmoniously with the scheme of the evening, instead of interfering with it at every point. His numbers were Lohengrin's Legend and Siegmun's Love Song. Mr. Davies' voice is a most agreeable one, a hearty, earnest, straightforward tenor, but he was quite hoarse last night, and reached the high notes in the Lohengrin song with difficulty. The beautiful Spring Song of Siegmund's went better. As is usually the case, the soloist was recalled a sufficient number of times to warrant an encore, which he steadily and very properly refused to give.

Yet the real triumph of the evening lay with Mr. Paur and his men. Some of the numbers were so wonderfully performed—with such absolute accuracy as well as uncommon dash and fire, with crescendos as perfectly attuned as the law of gravitation, and fortissimos as sure as a clap of thunder—that it seemed almost as if we now heard them for the first time. To a certain extent the audience appreciated this fact, and Mr. Paur had his happy moment. So also did the Brooklyn Institute, with every seat occupied, and four rows of boxes filled to the guards. To-day marks the last matinee, at which a new symphony, by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, is in progress.

From The Standard Union Mar. 29 189

Compliments H. L. Bridgman,
Business Manager.

LAST BOSTON ORCHESTRA MATINEE.

Brooklyn music lovers must all regret that the last concert and matinee of the season have been given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Paur knows how to group attractive programmes. That on Saturday afternoon was listened to with great interest by an audience composed largely of women, who were, no doubt, especially desirous of hearing the "Gaelic" Symphony in E minor by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach of Boston. This woman is not yet 30 years of age, but she is a composer of whom we may be proud. She has, of course, had musical training, but she is largely self-taught. Still, she has pursued her studies under most favorable circumstances, having always had the leisure and freedom from care given by the possession of wealth. Her husband, Dr. Beach, is also musical and an artist, and closely in sympathy with her pursuit. This symphony is one of her most ambitious works, and is truly able. There is nothing feminine about the writing; all her work is strong and brilliant. The first movement, "Allegro con fuoco" in E minor, has a beautiful Gaelic folk-song interwoven with the theme, played in canon form by the oboe, flute and strings, where it dies away in a pianissimo. There is also a beautiful pizzicato for the strings. The second movement, Alla Siciliana," in F major, has a charming melody, tranquil and sweet, alternating with a fascinating scherzo. The third movement, "Lento con Molto expressione" in E minor, is composed of three themes, each beginning with a short prelude for the wind instruments, kettle drums and basses. All three themes resemble folk-songs, and have the strongly marked closing minor cadence of Gaelic music. The fourth movement, "Allegro Molto" in E minor is also a development of a folk-song theme, but a song of more brilliant style, that goes with the wild dash of a slogan. The second and third movements are the most pleasing. All the parts are well scored, and the orchestra played with a brilliancy and perfection of attack that almost surprised their previous work this winter. Their playing was superb all through the programme. The other numbers were a concert overture by our townsman, E. C. Phelps, dedicated "To the Memory of Augustus Graham, Founder of the Brooklyn Academy of Arts and Sciences." This opened the programme, and was well received. It is a graceful composition written in a smooth style. The second number was, (a), Adagio, Op. 38 by Bargiel, and (b), a Rondo, Op. 49, Dvorak, for violoncello and orchestra, the soloist being Leo Schultz, of the orchestra, who played finely, as he always does, and was rewarded with much applause. The first is a dinty piece of writing, in which the flute and 'cello alternate on a pleasing little melody, and which ends in a full chord wherein the flute note is prominent, then diminishes to the faintest pianissimo. The second is in part like a little hornpipe, with a soft accompaniment of running chords for the violins, and is as quaint as an English madrigal. The programme closed with Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodie, No. 6 (Pesther Carnival), the first time it has been given at these concerts. Brilliant as all Liszt's Rhapsodies, it makes rather more of the Magyr melody, forming its theme, which is worked out with varied orchestration.

One of the most interested listeners was a bright-eyed little Japanese lady in the box at the right of the stage. Miss Joshi Kajaro, from Tokio, a student at Mount Holyoke Seminary, and now visiting friends in this city.

Daily [illegible] News.

FALL RIVER, Mass.

TUESDAY, MARCH 30.

THE SYMPHONY.

A Concert That Pleased All Auditors.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave at the Academy, Monday night, a concert that may justly be classed as the most generally enjoyable ever given by that great organization in this city. It is safe to say that there was not a person in the big audience who did not enjoy some portion of the concert, and that is something that cannot always be said of a symphony concert. Excepting the symphony number the music was of a lighter character than is usually played in symphony music. There was a dash and catch to it that made it very attractive. It was still, however, thoroughly good music and of a very high class, but it was less complicated and elaborate in orchestration than most symphony concert selections, and in consequence more musical, and more enjoyable for the musically uneducated who compose the great part of a concert audience in this city. These people do not know music technically, and they make no pretense of doing so, but they do thoroughly enjoy hearing good music, and when the program is made up of numbers that do not require an exhausting effort to follow them, the pleasure and appreciation of the audience is constantly evident.

The popularity of the concert last night was evident in the manner of the audience as it went out. No one was wearied, and all carried away with them pleasant memories of the sweet, full tones of the closing number, the overture from "William Tell." One symphony number is enough for an evening, and last night it was well placed first on the program, when people were fresh and could follow it with enjoyment. It is good evidence of the wholly satisfactory character of the whole concert, that the comparatively few people present who are sufficiently trained in music to be able to criticise technically such a concert, were as much pleased with it as any of the others.

There is much satisfaction to be derived from the statement that the audience was a large one. It was the largest for a symphony concert in four years and the third largest that the city has turned out for such a concert. The receipts were large enough to warrant a hope of a continuance of the annual concert, though that all expenses were cleared, as the running expense of the organization are enormous, is not certain. The audience was enthusiastic as well as large, and it must have been a pleasure for the musicians to play. Certainly Mr. Emil Pain, the conductor, showed in is fine, strong face a strong pleasure in the applause.

There was a great curiosity to see Madam Szumowska, Paderewski's only and celebrated pupil and much anticipation of pleasure in hearing her play. No one was disappointed. Her playing is remarkable for the brilliancy and delicacy of its execution. Her playing is in power that of a woman, not of a man, but there is a dash of playing and perfection of execution that aroused the enthusiasm of the audience. It is very seldom that her equal as a performer on the pianoforte is to be found. Madame Szumowska is a woman of stately carriage and figure and she has a fine face. She won the sympathy of the spectators by her appearance before she aroused their enthusiasm as an audience by her playing. She was called out three times by the long continued and insistent applause, in which the musicians joined heartily. The rule barring encores was adhered to.

Seventy-five men were brought down, and there were on the stage for one selection 68 of them. The orchestra appeared, if possible, to be better balanced than it ever was before. The control of Mr. Paur is always something remarkable, and it is always apparent in the perfect time of his orchestra. He was given a very warm welcome when he came out. The first number was the symphony, No. 4 in B-flat major, opus 60, by Beethoven, came first. It is in four movements. The symphony had never been given here before. Other symphonies that have been given here were perhaps more generally enjoyed, but the number brought out with great distinctness the power and control of the orchestra, and the very great ability of the musicians included in it. A musical authority says that the characteristic feature of this symphony which distinguishes it from the rest of the nine that Beethoven wrote is its unceasing, irrepressible brightness and cheerfulness. There is a transient gloom in the introductory adagio and a rough burst in the finale, but aside from these hardly a sombre bar. The symphony was written in 1806 and first performed in 1807 at a subscription concert for Beethoven's benefit. It is known as his Spring symphony. The first movement specially is one of singing and unbroken happiness, indicating a capricious humor which Beethoven never exceeded. The second movement, the adagio, was probably the most enjoyed.

The pianoforte selection, the concerto, No. 2 in G minor, by Saint-Saens, was the second number. There were three movements of which the third, the presto, was perhaps the most brilliant. Madame Szumowska's playing is marked more by the brilliancy and delicacy of expression than by its expression. The instrument appeared to lack something in melody.

There were in her playing touches of delicate expressions and some feeling, but they were not frequent nor did they mark the number.

The little suite from Bizet, "Children's Games," opus 22, was probably the most enjoyed. The first was the march, trumpet and drums. The sweetest was the berceuse, the cradle song carried by the strings. The impromptu, the top, was short as the spinning of the top, whose humming could be easily distinguished. The duo between the violins and heavier strings was odd and taking, and the lively galop at the close brought the strings and reeds out in great power. There was a beautiful swing all through this number. The selection was new here.

Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," opus 65, arranged for the orchestra by Felix Weingartner, gained a new interest in this arrangement and every one welcomed an old acquaintance in new dress.

The overture from Rossini's "William Tell" was put in the program by request. Every one delights in it and as it is of course best heard when played by the symphony orchestra every one was left in a pleasant mood by the closing number.

The Daily Globe

MARCH 30, 1897.

GRAND MUSICAL EVENT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Attracts a Large and Fashionable Audience.

"It was the finest I ever heard, by long odds." This remark, made by a gentleman coming out of the Academy last night after the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, voices the sentiment of probably every one in the large audience which greeted the finest orchestra in America. From the Beethoven symphony to Rossini's grand overture to "William Tell," the last number on the programme, it was a delightful musical treat. The orchestra never played better in any previous concert given in this city. The audience was the largest that ever listened to a symphony here before. There were some vacant seats, but not many.

The programme was a most pleasing one. It consisted of Beethoven's symphony No. 4, in B flat, major, op. 60, concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, op. 60, bp Saint-Saens, little suite, "Children's Games," op. 22, by Bizet, "Invitation to the Dance," op. 65, by Weber, arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner, and the overture to "William Tell," by Rossini. Two of these numbers were played here for the first time by the orchestra—Bizet's suite and Weber's "Invitation to the Dance." The latter was a gem. Three times Emil Paur, the conductor, was forced to bow his acknowledgements for the enthusiastic applause at the conclusion of this selection.

The 'cellos and violins have the first part, which is a slow movement, the violins replying to the 'cellos' invitation. Then the full orchestra begins playing a beautiful waltz, at the conclusion of which the 'cellos and violins end the selection. It was a beautiful thing. Bizet's suite was pleasing. It was not accorded all the applause it deserved. The first movement went by without a hand, but this was probably due to its briefness and the fact that the conductor held his baton aloft ready to start the next movement. The duo ("Little Husband, Little Wife") was accorded the most applause of any of the movements in this suite. It was a delightful selection. The Berceuse ("The Doll") was sweet and pretty, played with united violins.

The orchestra was heard at its best in the "William Tell" overture. The cello solo in the first part was skilfully played and the duet for flute and oboe was fine. The full strength of the orchestra was heard in the last part and it was grand.

Not the least pleasing portion of the programme was the concerto for pianoforte played by Mme Antoinette Szumoswka, and accompanied by the full orchestra.

She displayed wonderful skill and played with considerable force. She is a woman of striking appearance and this lent an additional charm to her playing. The second movement of the concerto was splendidly rendered and was enthusiastically applauded. She was recalled several times at the conclusion of the number. The audience wos loath to let her go without an encore selection, but she only gratified it with a few charming bows.

Taken all together it is doubtful if the music loving people of this city ever listened to a more delightful or artistic musical entertainment than that of last evening and it was a fact that he audience was a large one and included a large section of the cultured and fashionable people.

Fall River Daily Herald

MARCH 30, 1897

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Largest Audience of Many Seasons Welcomed Mr. Paur's Musicians.

The largest audience that ever welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this city, assembled last evening, to listen to an exceptionally attractive programme.

This programme as arranged, announced, and executed was:

Symphony No. 4, in B flat major.........................Beethoven
I. Adagio, Allego Vivace.
II. Adagio.
III. Allegro Vivace, Trio: Un poco meno Allegro.
IV. Finale: Allegro ma non troppo.
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor............Saint Saens
I. Andante sostenuto.
II. Allegretto scherzando.
III. Presto.
Little Suite, "Children's Games,". Bizet
I. March, (Trumpets and Drums.)
II. Berceuse, (The Doll.)
III. Impromptu, (The Top.)
IV. Duo, (Little Husband, Little Wife.)
V. Gallop. (The Ball.).
Invitation to the Dance.........Weber
(Arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner.)
Overture, "William Tell,".......Rossini

Connoisseurs with fluttering scores touched elbows with Philistines, and all alike expectantly awaited the first strains of Beethoven's fourth symphony. The melancholy atmosphere of the adagio movement was exquisitely breathed forth in the sad sighing of the violins. It is in this symphony that the drum rises to the dignity of a solo instrument and it rose with honor last night. The work of the strings in the allegro vivace was particularly fine, and the finale left nothing to be desired, save a repetition. But there were to be no responses to encores, as was clearly proved after the next number, Saint Saens, G minor concert for pianoforte.

In vain did the audience appland, Mme. Antoinette Szumowska would only grant a smile and bow, but that indeed three times, and then withdrew followed by many reluctant and admiring eyes. Her delightful freedom and grace of playing, and, withal, her unassuming manner won for her a host of friends.

The Little Suite of "Children's Games," by Bizet, followed—illustrations of programme music, all, yet belonging to different classes. Of these the "Berceuse" was perhaps the favorite. The flute music is irresistibly sweet and tender.

On the whole it may be safe to say that Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" was the most popular selection on the programme. The ensemble work was grandly executed, and surely a more seductive invitation on the dreamy mazes of the valse was never more alluringly interpreted.

Music lovers are always glad to find one old friend on the programme—and especially so when the friend proves to be "William Tell." Everywhere, as the audience at last turned homeward, were heard the strains of that delightful overture, which was rendered with exceptional finish of style.

The fact that this season's audience was the largest that has ever greeted the Symphony Orchestra in Fall River is significant. It shows a constantly growing appreciation of what is best in music, and it points, perhaps, to the time when Symphony concerts will no longer have to be subscription concerts in this city, and when we shall hear "the finest band in the world," as it has been called, not once, but twice or three times within the space of a season.

The receipts at the concert were the largest that have been taken at a symphony concert in this city for the past four seasons, and in the 14 years that the orchestra has been visiting Fall River the audience of last night has been exceeded in numbers but a few times. If the receipts of last night had been $10 larger, they would have exceeded those of last season exactly 50 per cent. The public is indebted to O. Elton Borden for his able management of the interests of the orchestra in this city and for the enterprise which brings such an annual treat to this city.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 31, 1897.

Boston Symphony Concert.

THE fifth and last concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Metropolitan Opera House on Thursday evening last, the 25th inst. The program, which was almost an exact duplication of the most brilliant one of the season 1895–6, given just one year ago, deserves to stand as a sort of climacteric in the career of this famous band. No more delicate, sonorous, multicolored page has been turned than this one of Wagner, and no more superb example of executive power has ever been given by the Boston band than in this choice series of excerpts culled to reflect in the most effective degree the salient points of Wagner's genius.

Mr. Ben Davies was the soloist and sang in English the narrative from Lohengrin and Siegmund's Love Song from the Walküre. Orchestral numbers included the prelude to Parsifal, Eine Faust overture, preludes to Acts I. and III. of Lohengrin, the Siegfried Idyll and Waldweben and the Ride of the Valkyries.

Mr. Paur read his program with strong dramatic force and delicate insight. The band was led into judicious and effective fury, or held within delicately calculated poetic bounds. The sombre intensity of the Faust overture was nobly expressed, and whosoever missed this rare performance missed the most perfect of its kind which times are apt to bring forth. The imposing, mellow, musical sonority of the band was at all times evident, even overwhelming, in places; while delicate color, every degree of fineness in tonal shade and beauty were enunciated with graciously intellectual charm. Due stimulus and fire now flow throughout the veins of Mr. Paur, the material to his hand being of the most capable and responsive in the world. Results are naturally beyond cavil. We hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and have the proud satisfaction of realizing that finer performances of its varying programs it would be impossible to enjoy on one or other continent.

Mr. Ben Davies gave Siegmund's Love Song musically and intelligently. It lies within his voice, which is anything but a pure average tenor. Mr. Davies commands the range of a baritone; it matters not that his voice have the tenor timbre. For this reason his singing of the Lohengrin narrative was bad, drawing the singer as it did into heights which his compass scaleth not. Naturally he cracked up high and made his narrative a grievous one. The Love Song of Siegmund, however, was an artistic reparation, as Mr. Davies, when not put to a strain on the score of compass, is a highly satisfying lyric artist. He was cordially received.

This last concert of the Boston Symphony stands forth with red-letter emphasis as one of the most brilliant of its career. The primary note was a dramatic one, and the full-blooded intensity and glow with which it was uttered caused a frequent thrill. Throughout all the superb command of detail the intellectual appreciation of every finest shade of poetic or dramatic tint filled mind and ear with genuine delight.

The audience was one of the largest every attracted by the band. The house was packed.

The Independent

130 FULTON STREET,

NEW YORK, April 1, 1897.

Persons desiring the return of their manuscripts, if not accepted, should send a stamped and directed envelop. We cannot, however, even in that case, hold ourselves responsible for their return. Authors should preserve a copy.

For Subscription Terms, see Page 31.

A late acknowledgment at least is due the volume in which are bound the PROGRAMS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, for the season of 1895–'96, at its Boston concerts, with Mr. William F. Apthorp's descriptive and other notes on each program, and his more miscellaneous but not less acceptable selections of reading-matter inserted on the pages styled "Entr'acte." Were all concert-intermissions as instructively spent, the schoolmaster in musical history and in taste could soon be sent abroad. Aside from the driest bones of analysis of a symphony or a concerto, and similar didactics, Mr. Apthorp's chat is pleasing enough to the average concert-auditor and to auditors superior to that class. A good deal of the information and suggestion furnished by a handy musical encyclopedia, or the odds and ends belonging to musical biography and criticism, may be derived from this Boston publication. In its lighter vein, attention may be called to Mr. Apthorp's amusing pages of memorabilia, appearing in connection with programs of March, under the caption: "Musical Reminiscences of Boston Thirty Years Ago"; "Stray Thoughts Anent Librettos," and to the articles on "Form in Music," "Fashion in Music," and "Naturalism in Music," with their well-balanced considerations. The volume is concluded with Mr. F. R. Comee's valuable summaries of composers, compositions, soloists, and similar matter for ready reference. The programs of this Boston orchestra, by the by, can always be subscribed for, and the completed volumes of the series can be procured, by addressing the management of the concerts at the Music Hall, Boston.

Daily Evening News.

FALL RIVER, Mass.

TUESDAY, MARCH 30.

THE SYMPHONY.

A Concert That Pleased All Auditors.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave at the Academy, Monday night, a concert that may justly be classed as the most generally enjoyable ever given by that great organization in this city. It is safe to say that there was not a person in the big audience who did not enjoy some portion of the concert, and that is something that cannot always be said of a symphony concert. Excepting the symphony number the music was of a lighter character than is usually played in symphony music. There was a dash and catch to it that made it very attractive. It was still, however, thoroughly good music and of a very high class, but it was less complicated and elaborate in orchestration than most symphony concert selections, and in consequence more musical, and more enjoyable for the musically uneducated who compose the great part of a concert audience in this city. These people do not know music technically, and they make no pretense of doing so, but they do thoroughly enjoy hearing good music, and when the program is made up of numbers that do not require an exhausting effort to follow them, the pleasure and appreciation of the audience is constantly evident.

The popularity of the concert last night was evident in the manner of the audience as it went out. No one was wearied, and all carried away with them pleasant memories of the sweet, full tones of the closing number, the overture from "William Tell." One symphony number is enough for an evening, and last night it was well placed first on the program, when reople were fresh and could follow it with enjoyment. It is good evidence of the wholly satisfactory character of the whole concert, that the comparatively few people present who are sufficiently trained in music to be able to criticise technically such a concert, were as much pleased with it as any of the others.

There is much satisfaction to be derived from the statement that the audience was a large one. It was the largest for a symphony concert in four years and the third largest that the city has turned out for such a concert. The receipts were large enough to warrant a hope of a continuance of the annual concert, though that all expenses were cleared, as the running expense of the organization are enormous, is not certain. The audience was enthusiastic as well as large, and it must have been a pleasure for the musicians to play. Certainly Mr. Emil Pain, the conductor, showed in his fine, strong face a strong pleasure in the applause.

There was a great curiosity to see Madam Szumowska, Paderewski's only and celebrated pupil and much anticipation of pleasure in hearing her play. No one was disappointed. Her playing is remarkable for the brilliancy and delicacy of its execution. Her playing is in power that of a woman, not of a man, but there is a dash of playing and perfection of execution that aroused the enthusiasm of the audience. It is very seldom that her equal as a performer on the pianoforte is to be found. Madame Szumowska is a woman of stately carriage and figure and she has a fine face. She won the sympathy of the spectators by her appearance before she aroused their enthusiasm as an audience by her playing. She was called out three times by the long continued and insistent applause, in which the musicians joined heartily. The rule barring encores was adhered to.

Seventy-five men were brought down, and there were on the stage for one selection 68 of them. The orchestra appeared, if possible, to be better balanced than it ever was before. The control of Mr. Paur is always something remarkable, and it is always apparent in the perfect time of his orchestra. He was given a very warm welcome when he came out. The first number was the symphony, No. 4 in B-flat major, opus 60, by Beethoven, came first. It is in four movements. The symphony had never been given here before. Other symphonies that have been given here were perhaps more generally enjoyed, but the number brought out with great distinctness the power and control of the orchestra, and the very great ability of the musicians included in it. A musical authority says that the characteristic feature of this symphony which distinguishes it from the rest of the nine that Beethoven wrote is its unceasing, irrepressible brightness and cheerfulness. There is a transient gloom in the introductory adagio and a rough burst in the finale, but aside from these hardly a sombre bar. The symphony was written in 1806 and first performed in 1807 at a subscription concert for Beethoven's benefit. It is known as his Spring symphony. The first movement specially is one of singing and unbroken happiness, indicating a capricious humor which Beethoven never exceeded. The second movement, the adagio, was probably the most enjoyed.

The pianoforte selection, the concerto, No. 2 in G minor, by Saint-Saens, was the second number. There were three movements of which the third, the presto was perhaps the most brilliant. Madame Szumowska's playing is marked more by the brilliancy and delicacy of expression than by its expression. The instrument appeared to lack something in melody.

There were in her playing touches of delicate expressions and some feeling, but they were not frequent nor did they mark the number.

The little suite from Bizet, "Children's Games," opus 22, was probably the most enjoyed. The first was the march, trumpet and drums. The sweetest was the berceuse, the cradle song carried by the strings. The impromptu, the top, was short as the spinning of the top, whose humming could be easily distinguished. The duo between the violins and heavier strings was odd and taking, and the lively galop at the close brought the strings and reeds out in great power. There was a beautiful swing all through this number. The selection was new here.

Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," opus 65, arranged for the orchestra by Felix Weingartner, gained a new interest in this arrangement and every one welcomed an old acquaintance in new dress.

The overture from Rossini's "William Tell" was put in the program by request. Every one delights in it and as it is of course best heard when played by the symphony orchestra every one was left in a pleasant mood by the closing number.

The Daily Globe

MARCH 30, 1897.

GRAND MUSICAL EVENT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Attracts a Large and Fashionable Audience.

"It was the finest I ever heard, by long odds." This remark, made by a gentleman coming out of the Academy last night after the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, voices the sentiment of probably every one in the large audience which greeted the finest orchestra in America. From the Beethoven symphony to Rossini's grand overture to "William Tell," the last number on the programme, it was a delightful musical treat. The orchestra never played better in any previous concert given in this city. The audience was the largest that ever listened to a symphony here before. There were some vacant seats, but not many.

The programme was a most pleasing one. It consisted of Beethoven's symphony No. 4, in B flat, major, op. 60, concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, op. 60, bp Saint-Saens, little suite, "Children's Games," op. 22, by Bizet, "Invitation to the Dance," op. 65, by Weber, arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner, and the overture to "William Tell," by Rossini. Two of these numbers were played here for the first time by the orchestra—Bizet's suite and Weber's "Invitation to the Dance." The latter was a gem. Three times Emil Paur, the conductor, was forced to bow his acknowledgements for the enthusiastic applause at the conclusion of this selection.

The 'cellos and violins have the first part, which is a slow movement, the violins replying to the 'cellos' invitation. Then the full orchestra begins playing a beautiful waltz, at the conclusion of which the 'cellos and violins end the selection. It was a beautiful thing. Bizet's suite was pleasing. It was not accorded all the applause it deserved. The first movement went by without a hand, but this was probably due to its briefness and the fact that the conductor held his baton aloft ready to start the next movement. The duo ("Little Husband, Little Wife") was accorded the most applause of any of the movements in this suite. It was a delightful selection. The Berceuse ("The Doll") was sweet and pretty, played with united violins.

The orchestra was heard at its best in the "William Tell" overture. The cello solo in the first part was skilfully played and the duet for flute and oboe was fine. The full strength of the orchestra was heard in the last part and it was grand.

Not the least pleasing portion of the programme was the concerto for pianoforte played by Mme Antoinette Szumoswka, and accompanied by the full orchestra .

She displayed wonderful skill and played with considerable force. She is a woman of striking appearance and this lent an additional charm to her playing. The second movement of the concerto was splendidly rendered and was enthusiastically applauded. She was recalled several times at the conclusion of the number. The audience wos loath to let her go without an encore selection, but she only gratified it with a few charming bows.

Taken all together it is doubtful if the music loving people of this city ever listened to a more delightful or artistic musical entertainment than that of last evening and it was a fact that he audience was a large one and included a large section of the cultured and fashionable people.

Fall River Daily Herald

MARCH 30, 1897

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Largest Audience of Many Seasons Welcomed Mr. Paur's Musicians.

The largest audience that ever welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this city, assembled last evening, to listen to an exceptionally attractive programme.

This programme as arranged, announced, and executed was:

Symphony No. 4, in B flat.......... major...................Beethoven
I. Adagio, Allego Vivace.
II. Adagio.
III. Allegro Vivace, Trio: Un poco meno Allegro.
IV. Finale: Allegro ma non troppo.
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor...........Saint Saens
I. Andante sostenuto.
II. Allegretto scherzando.
III. Presto.
Little Suite, "Children's Games,".Bizet
I. March, (Trumpets and Drums.)
II. Berceuse, (The Doll.)
III. Impromptu, (The Top.)
IV. Duo, (Little Husband, Little Wife.)
V. Gallop. (The Ball.).
Invitation to the Dance.........Weber
(Arranged for orchestra by Felix Weingartner.)
Overture, "William Tell,".......Rossini

Connoisseurs with fluttering scores touched elbows with Philistines, and all alike expectantly awaited the first strains of Beethoven's fourth symphony. The melancholy atmosphere of the adagio movement was exquisitely breathed forth in the sad sighing of the violins. It is in this symphony that the drum rises to the dignity of a solo instrument and it rose with honor last night. The work of the strings in the allegro vivace was particularly fine, and the finale left nothing to be desired, save a repetition. But there were to be no responses to encores, as was clearly proved after the next number, Saint Saens, G minor concert for pianoforte.

In vain did the audience applaud, Mme. Antoinette Szumowska would only grant a smile and bow, but that indeed three times, and then withdrew followed by many reluctant and admiring eyes. Her delightful freedom and grace of playing, and, withal, her unassuming manner won for her a host of friends.

The Little Suite of "Children's Games," by Bizet, followed—illustrations of programme music, all, yet belonging to different classes. Of these the "Berceuse" was perhaps the favorite. The flute music is irresistibly sweet and tender.

On the whole it may be safe to say that Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" was the most popular selection on the programme. The ensemble work was grandly executed, and surely a more seductive invitation on the dreamy mazes of the valse was never more alluringly interpreted.

Music lovers are always glad to find one old friend on the programme—and especially so when the friend proves to be "William Tell." Everywhere, as the audience at last turned homeward, were heard the strains of that delightful overture, which was rendered with exceptional finish of style.

The fact that this season's audience was the largest that has ever greeted the Symphony Orchestra in Fall River is significant. It shows a constantly growing appreciation of what is best in music, and it points, perhaps, to the time when Symphony concerts will no longer have to be subscription concerts in this city, and when we shall hear "the finest band in the world," as it has been called, not once, but twice or three times within the space of a season.

The receipts at the concert were the largest that have been taken at a symphony concert in this city for the past four seasons, and in the 14 years that the orchestra has been visiting Fall River the audience of last night has been exceeded in numbers but a few times. If the receipts of last night had been $10 larger, they would have exceeded those of last season exactly 50 per cent. The public is indebted to O. Elton Borden for his able management of the interests of the orchestra in this city and for the enterprise which brings such an annual treat to this city.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 31, 1897.

Boston Symphony Concert.

THE fifth and last concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Metropolitan Opera House on Thursday evening last, the 25th inst. The program, which was almost an exact duplication of the most brilliant one of the season 1895–6, given just one year ago, deserves to stand as a sort of climacteric in the career of this famous band. No more delicate, sonorous, multicolored page has been turned than this one of Wagner, and no more superb example of executive power has ever been given by the Boston band than in this choice series of excerpts culled to reflect in the most effective degree the salient points of Wagner's genius.

Mr. Ben Davies was the soloist and sang in English the narrative from Lohengrin and Siegmund's Love Song from the Walküre. Orchestral numbers included the prelude to Parsifal, Eine Faust overture, preludes to Acts I. and III. of Lohengrin, the Siegfried Idyll and Waldweben and the Ride of the Valkyries.

Mr. Paur read his program with strong dramatic force and delicate insight. The band was led into judicious and effective fury, or held within delicately calculated poetic bounds. The sombre intensity of the Faust overture was nobly expressed, and whosoever missed this rare performance missed the most perfect of its kind which times are apt to bring forth. The imposing, mellow, musical sonority of the band was at all times evident, even overwhelming, in places; while delicate color, every degree of fineness in tonal shade and beauty were enunciated with graciously intellectual charm. Due stimulus and fire now flow throughout the veins of Mr. Paur, the material to his hand being of the most capable and responsive in the world. Results are naturally beyond cavil. We hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and have the proud satisfaction of realizing that finer performances of its varying programs it would be impossible to enjoy on one or other continent.

Mr. Ben Davies gave Siegmund's Love Song musically and intelligently. It lies within his voice, which is anything but a pure average tenor. Mr. Davies commands the range of a baritone; it matters not that his voice have the tenor timbre. For this reason his singing of the Lohengrin narrative was bad, drawing the singer as it did into heights which his compass scaleth not. Naturally he cracked up high and made his narrative a grievous one. The Love Song of Siegmund, however, was an artistic reparation, as Mr. Davies, when not put to a strain on the score of compass, is a highly satisfying lyric artist. He was cordially received.

This last concert of the Boston Symphony stands forth with red-letter emphasis as one of the most brilliant of its career. The primary note was a dramatic one, and the full-blooded intensity and glow with which it was uttered caused a frequent thrill. Throughout all the superb command of detail the intellectual appreciation of every finest shade of poetic or dramatic tint filled mind and ear with genuine delight.

The audience was one of the largest every attracted by the band. The house was packed.

The Independent

130 FULTON STREET,

NEW YORK, April 1, 1897.

Persons desiring the return of their manuscripts, if not accepted, should send a stamped and directed envelop. We cannot, however, even in that case, hold ourselves responsible for their return. Authors should preserve a copy.

For Subscription Terms, see Page 31.

A late acknowledgment at least is due the volume in which are bound the PROGRAMS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, for the season of 1895–'96, at its Boston concerts, with Mr. William F. Apthorp's descriptive and other notes on each program, and his more miscellaneous but not less acceptable selections of reading-matter inserted on the pages styled "Entr'acte." Were all concert-intermissions as instructively spent, the schoolmaster in musical history and in taste could soon be sent abroad. Aside from the driest bones of analysis of a symphony or a concerto, and similar didactics, Mr. Apthorp's chat is pleasing enough to the average concert-auditor and to auditors superior to that class. A good deal of the information and suggestion furnished by a handy musical encyclopedia, or the odds and ends belonging to musical biography and criticism, may be derived from this Boston publication. In its lighter vein, attention may be called to Mr. Apthorp's amusing pages of memorabilia, appearing in connection with programs of March, under the caption: "Musical Reminiscences of Boston Thirty Years Ago"; "Stray Thoughts Anent Librettos," and to the articles on "Form in Music," "Fashion in Music," and "Naturalism in Music," with their well-balanced considerations. The volume is concluded with Mr. F. R. Comee's valuable summaries of composers, compositions, soloists, and similar matter for ready reference. The programs of this Boston orchestra, by the by, can always be subscribed for, and the completed volumes of the series can be procured, by addressing the management of the concerts at the Music Hall, Boston.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 5, 1897.

The Symphony Concert—A Brilliant Performance.

It was high-water mark with the symphony orchestra Saturday night; if ever the organization won a triumph it was at this concert, and the audience was not slow in perceiving that there was a musical electricity in the air and the applause was continuous.

Weber's "Oberon" overture began the programme, and although there was a bit of false intonation in the opening horn phrase, the performance was as brilliant as any we have ever heard. That fearfully loud chord (Weber always wanted it so) was given with an explosion strong enough to shock the Boston Gas Co. within its walls, and the clarinette solo which followed was excellently played. Weber loved horns and clarinettes and constantly brought these instruments to the front. Both instruments deserve praise for their work in this overture. The applause at the end of the number was absolutely enthusiastic, and it was deserved.

Now followed that sterling artist, Mr. Leo Schulz, in two interesting violoncello numbers. Bargiel's Adagio gave good chances for breadth of tone and sympathetic quality, and Mr. Schulz was easily adequate in these directions.

The Dvorak Rondo, which received its first performance in Boston on this occasion, makes heavier demands upon the performer; it is a composition half-virtuosity, half-expression, calling upon two diverse schools of work in its chief theme and its two counterthemes. It is a clear enough example of second-rondo form, with excellent contrasts between its divisions.

The chief theme brought in a copious display of harmonics and high position work. The work is thoroughly in the folk-music style, its first theme sounding as if an American negro had been shipwrecked on a seacoast in Bohemia. Its countertheme was the most expressive part of the composition, and Mr. Schulz played it with much feeling. The second countertheme was not far removed from an Irish jig, leading to still more varied contrasts. Clear in form and very melodic, the work will become a favorite with all violoncellists. Mr. Schulz was recalled over and over again at its end.

There probably is not an orchestra in the world that could perform Tschailowsky's "Pathetic Symphony" as well as it was given at this concert; it is difficult for the reviewer to hold the reins over his enthusiasm for the work and its noble interpretation. Mr. Paur is right to give the symphony many times, as he has done, for in this case familiarity only breeds greater respect for the composition.

It may not be the greatest "Symphony" of our generation, measured by the classical yardstick (this achievement belong to the man who died in Vienna on the very day of the concert), but it is certainly the most passionate, the most moving orchestral work of this half of the century. By frequent performance our symphony men have grown into its spirit, the great technical difficulties are relegated to the background, and the result is something memorable. The audience, too, seemed to have become inducted into its subtleties, and grew very demonstrative after each movement. It is something something that seems to have been written in the shadow of death (although there is not the slightest truth in the rumors of the composer's subsequent suicide) as Mozart's "Requiem" was, and that has moved the composer mightily, and therefore has mighty power upon the auditor.

> "More than light airs and recollected terms
> Of these most brisk and giddy-paced times,"

The first movement, with its turbulence and struggle, the second (the longest instance of 5-4 rhythm that we know of) with its strange pedal point of kettledrum notes, the third taking the place of a Scherzo but by no means a playful movement, telling its tale of War and Glory ("The paths of Glory lead but to the Grave" would certainly be its fitting motto) and the final Threnody, with its muted horn tones telling of evil, disaster and death, its solemn gong stroke, and its throbbing heart gradually numbed to rest, all these points were brought out as never before—an indescribably great performance.

One would have thought that anything after this triumph would be in the nature of an anti-climax, but Mr. Ben Davies, who followed, for it was a concert with two soloists, managed to keep matters at a white heat by a very artistic interpretation of "Deeper and Deeper Still" and "Waft Her, Angels," from Handel's "Jephtha."

He overshaded a little, some of his pianissimo effects being almost inaudible, but his expression was well-fitted to his theme, the recitative being very dramatic, and he was clear in enunciation and sure in intonation, even in the highest register, his tone never appearing forced or unmusical even in the most trying passages, wherefore the recalls at the close of the aria were numerous and hearty, and the exceptional character of the concert was sustained.

It is not so long ago that we stated that no American orchestra could play the "Tannhaeuser" overture as our band plays it; the confirmation of this statement came at the close of this remarkable concert. The work was interpreted magnificently; the combat between the solemn religious theme of the pilgrims, and the exciting, almost frenzied Venus music, was finely drawn; it was a reduction into musical tones of Swinburne's "Lilies and Languors of Virtue, and Roses and Raptures of Vice," with the odds in favor of the lilies.

Of course the chief praise belongs to the violins who did splendid work in both camps, giving the high positions of the Venus music and the trying scales of the culmination of the Pilgrim's chorus with clearness and surety, but the horns and trombones also deserves much praise. The concert should be marked with a white stone, even among the many excellent concerts we have had from our Symphony Orchestra. Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, APRIL 4, 1897.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Tschaikowsky's Marvelous Death-Chant the Feature of the Concert—Messrs. Ben Davies and Leo Schulz the Soloists.

The program of the 20th Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall, Mr. Paur conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "Oberon"	Weber
Adagio for Violoncello, op. 38	Bargiel
Rondo for Violoncello, op. 94 (first time in Boston)	Dvorak
Symphony No. 6, in B minor "Pathétique," op. 74	Tschaikowsky
Recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still," and Aria, "Waft Her, Angels," from "Jephtha"	Handel
Overture to "Tannhäuser"	Wagner

There are moments, yea, hours in this too daily life when existence seems really worth while, and man appears a superb animal even in his death struggle. Such was the time spent in listening again to Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony.

I am aware that there are estimable persons—excellent musicians, some of them, with many curious facts about the Sonata form—who insist that this work is a suite rather than a symphony. It makes little difference whether you call the marvelous masterpiece a symphony or a suite; the music is the same, the emotions are aroused in either case, the effect is as overwhelming.

I am also aware that there are persons restlessly critical, who complain of the "cheapness" of the second theme of the first movement. It is true that Tschaikowsky remembered well the long, flowing cantilena dear to Italian opera makers. Never mind in what country he found his tunes; the question is, "What did he do with them after he had found them?"

No, this symphony is not easily sniffed away. Each hearing enlarges the admiration excited by its first performance, and now admiration is akin to awe.

The work now seems firmly knit together, each part indispensable to the effect of the whole, whereas at first the relation of the third movement was not wholly clear. This strange, battle-drunk, delirious march must precede the wild lamentation of the finale. James Shirley long ago wrote the motto that might well stand between the triumph and the mourning.

> The glories of our blood and state
>   Are shadows, not substantial things;
> There is no armour against fate;
>   Death lays his icy hands on Kings.

And at each hearing new harmonic beauties appear, as well as hitherto unnoticed passages of most ingenious orchestration. The very tune that some call "cheap" or "common" is the one necessary, inevitable tune in its place; any other tune would be incongruous, impertinent. It is the one sensuous streak in the powerful, sombre work. It is the voice of the young man, recalled by the man of experience who is about to die. It breathes the foolishness of youth that is often more than the wisdom of maturity. And he who cannot recall such foolishness is indeed unhappy, for he has not known the fullness of life.

I have spoken of this symphony at length and in rhapsodic speech before this in the Journal. Nor have I now the wish or the disposition to speak analytically or even coolly of such music. Here is a work that, without a hint or a suggestion of program, sums up in the most imaginative language the life of man, with his illusions, desires, loves, struggles, victories, unavoidable end. Tschaikowsky may have written this Requiem for himself (for they who were nearest to him do not deny that, wearied and disgusted, he took poison); but he also wrote it for the race itself.

The performance was one never to be forgotten. Conductor and players were as inspired men. No doubt the news of Brahm's death was not without influence in the impassioned result, for such a lamentation as the finale is an honor to any composer, poet, or potentate.

⁂

Mr. Schulz played uncommonly well. The adagio by Bargiel was given with unusual tenderness and depth, and the Rondo by Dvorak was played with keen appreciation of rhythm and nuances. Mr. Schulz has never been heard in Music Hall to such advantage, admirable as his playing has been in the past. Last night he showed a refinement and an emotional nature that were hitherto kept in the background by envious technical accuracy.

⁂

Mr. Davies sang the recitative and air from "Jephthah" just about a year ago at one of these concerts. He declaimed last night the recitative with breadth and intelligence. The air was sung with much taste and with unexaggerated expression. The voice itself did not seem to be in best condition. Certain tones were veiled, and there was occasionally an exhibition of effort.

⁂

There was a very large and unusually applausive audience.

Philip Hale.

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 4, 1897.
(Copyright, 1897, Post Publishing Company.)

SONG AND CELLO.

Davies and Schultz Divide Solo Honors at the Symphony Concert.

Oberon's magic horn sounded the opening of last night's Symphony concert, the twentieth of the current season, and a beauty. First, the Oberon overture, dainty, weird, melodious and startling; for is it not here, as the programme tells us, that we get the "loudest chord in all orchestration," a "surprise" like the one that gives the name to Haydn's sixth symphony?

To be sure, the programme forgot to say that a louder and much more startling chord was to come in the first movement of the Tschaikowsky symphony, which the audience could not be expected to know much about, since it is not yet two years old. It is a trick of these concert programmes to give much more accurate descriptions of the familiar compositions than of the newer ones.

The second number of the programme was a couple of cello solos; those who remembered the unrivalled Schroeder's rendering of Dvorak's violoncello concerto earlier in the season, with nimble passage-work like the tricks of a kittenish elephant, must have felt all the more the slow and tender beauty of Woldemar Bargiel's Adagio (Opus 38); and still more the graceful scherzo-like Rondo by Dvorak, too (Op. 94), which was the second solo. The soloist's execution was faultless, but a trifle lacking in power.

The Tschaikowsky symphony (No. 6, in B minor), "Pathetique," is a considerable innovation as to structure. The first part of the first movement dies away with a melodious theme in the clarinets, and after a hush that seems full of music comes the startling chord spoken of before, the whole strength of everything in the orchestra going off like a cannon shot. It is followed by the vigorous scoring of the working out, and the first movement closes with but little formal repetition of the opening themes.

The second movement, instead of being slow and romantic as usual, is again an allegro, this time in the remarkable rhythm of five-fourths; the third movement is also an allegro. This succession of movements in a symphony is unprecedented.

The fourth movement, Adajio lamentoso, is very mournful—almost a dirge. Coming, as it did, the last of the composer's writings, it is looked upon as his expression of foreboding—like Mozart's requiem.

Davies's singing of the two arias from Haendel's Jephthah was the best vocal performance heard this season at these concerts. Other great soloists have seemed not to be in accord with the place and the vast melodies of the orchestra, but there was no one who did not feel last night's pathos and beauty to the bottom of his soul.

And the applause was uncontrolled until Mr. Paur, seeing that Davies's conclusive acknowledgments did not serve to conclude the recalls, stepped to his stand, rapped for attention, and began at once on the Tannhauser overture without waiting for the score to be brought to him. But it was wonderfully played just the same.

The programme for the next concert is: Mendelssohn, Overture, "Ruy Blas"; Goetz, Aria from "Taming of the Shrew"; Gernsheim, Concerto for violin, D major; and Schumann, Symphony No. 3, E flat major, "Rhenish." Miss Lena Little will sing, and Schnitzler is the violinist.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 4, 1897.

The twentieth Symphony programme was enriched beyond previous promise by the addition of that beautiful old favorite oratorio air from Handel's "Jeptha," beginning "Angels ever bright and fair," which was perfectly sung and delicately informed with true feeling by Mr. Ben Davies. Mr. Schulz also appeared as a soloist according to announcement and rendered two morceaus for violoncello—Bargiel's adagio, opus 38, and a rondo, opus 94, by Dvorak, which was new to Boston hearers. Mr. Schulz is an artist who grows in all good qualities, and is not content to develop his technique merely, but-enlarge his scope ef sympathy, his breadth of fulness and power and his nicety of taste from year to year. His playing demonstrated his many excellencies clearly both in the smooth, quiet legato and the lively, agile rondo, and he was heartily applauded and recalled. The orchestra began its work with Weber's "Oberon" overture, and ended it with the Tannhauser, each delivered in masterly fashion with appropriate regard for its character and style. The symphony was Tschaikowsky's sixth—the "Pathetic"—which has taken so firm a hold upon the affections of the whole musical world and which seemed more inspirational and poetic than before in the magnificent representation which Mr. Paur gave it. The enthusiasm manifested after the second and third movements was remarkable.

The next programme has been appointed thus: Mendelssohn, Overture, "Ruy Blas;" Goetz, Aria from Act III. of the Opera "Taming of the Shrew;" Gernsheim, Concerto for violin, in D major; Schumann, Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Rhenish." Soloists, Miss Lena Little and Mr. Isidor Schnitzler.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CI., NO. 94.
SUNDAY, APRIL 4, 1897.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" Is Surpassingly Rendered.

Mr. Paur Gives a Magnificent Interpretation of the Noble Symphony, Which Is Lavishly Prolific in Musical Beauties—Ben Davies and Leo Schulz the Soloists.

The 20th concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last night, presented the following programme:

Overture, "Oberon"	Weber
Adagio for 'cello, op. 38	Bargiel
Rondo for 'cello, op. 94	Dvorak
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique"	Tschaikowsky
Aria, "Waft Her, Angels"	Handel
Overture, "Tannhauser"	Wagner

The soloists were Mr. Ben Davies and Mr. Leo Schulz.

The noble symphony grows with every successive hearing. It is beyond all cavil the largest and greatest of modern works in its kind, an epic masterpiece of the first order, from whatever standpoint it may be viewed; lavishly prolific in musical beauties of every description, wonderful in its richness and variety of effect and sounding almost the whole gamut of lofty emotion, the finale being one of the most eloquent and searching expressions of majestic pathos that ever composer conceived. Mr. Paur's interpretation of it last night was magnificent, often thrilling, in its broad and spirited sweep, and its passionateness, and the performance by the orchestra was surpassing in its fire, its brilliant virtuosity and splendor and wealth of tone color.

Bargiel's beautiful and chaste adagio was played by Mr. Schulz with delighting tenderness and refinement, and artistic purity of taste, especially in its quieter phases, which were exquisitely rendered in an absolutely perfect cantabile style.

The Dvorak rondo, which is new here, is a pleasing work, graceful and flowing in its themes, and free from the eccentricities of rhythm and that monotonous excess of national character in which the composer so persistently indulges. Now and then it barely escapes lapsing into conventional commonplace, but that danger is skilfully avoided. This selection, also, was beautifully read and played by Mr. Schulz, who was applauded with great acclaim and recalled several times.

